power, we have the Crown, and any attack on the prerogative of the Crown is an attack on the prerogative of the House of Commons. Let us look practically at the matter. Hon. Members seem surprised; but if they sit here long enough, I really think they will begin to know something about the Constitution. Let us look at the effect of the change suggested—this bringing in a Bill to give effect to a Treaty. At this moment the Treaty-making power is in the hands of the Executive. What is the Executive? It consists of the representatives of the great Party majority in this House. Consequently, when the Executive makes a Treaty, it has—it must have, in the nature of things—this House at the back of it. But what is the change proposed by this Bill? That you take out of the hands of the Executive the power of contracting a Treaty, and you give the House of Lords the power of vetoing that Treaty. Now, we all know perfectly well that, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has said, the House of Lords is a permanently Conservative Assembly. It is not in any sense of the word a Popular Assembly; it is, in the Party sense of the word, simply a Conservative Assembly. Now, supposing a Liberal Ministry wanted to make a Treaty with a Foreign Power, what would that Foreign Power say? It would say, "No, we will not treat with you, because you will have to submit the Treaty to the House of Lords, and you have not a majority in the House of Lords. The only result will be a waste of time, because you will have to submit the Treaty to the House of Lords, and the House of Lords will not agree to it." Take as an illustration the case of the retrocession of the Transvaal. We know that in the minds of hon. Gentlemen of the Party opposite that appears one of the most monstrous acts ever committed. Well, they had a majority in the House of Lords, and may we not suppose that if it had been necessary to pass a Bill for the retrocession of the Transvaal the House of Lords would have thrown out that Bill? There is not the slightest doubt but they would, just as they would reject this Bill if it had emanated from the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. Supposing the right hon. Gentleman for Mid Lothian had proposed to cede Heligoland, Gentlemen opposite would have been up in arms to denounce it as a horrible thing, and the country would have rung with Jingo oratory in defence of the integrity of the Empire. No doubt, the House of Lords, in such circumstances, would reject this Bill for the cession of Heligoland. But I want hon. Gentlemen to see the effect of this attempt to bolster up the view that the prerogative of the Crown is something in opposition to the sense of this House. I will take, for instance, two Bills. Suppose a Bill is introduced to provide that no new Peers should be created without the consent of Parliament. What would be the effect of the passing of such a Bill? The House of Lords would never consent to a Bill creating Liberal Peers, and so only Conservative gentlemen would be sent up to the other House. "So much the better," says an hon. Friend of mine, and perhaps the objection is not so strong as in the other instance I will give. Suppose, again, an attack made on the prerogative of the Crown to dissolve Parliament, and a Bill passed providing that dissolution shall require the assent of Parliament. Again, that would be giving the House of Lords power to prevent a dissolution if they chose, no matter what the will of the House of Commons. So, I say you are taking away power from the popular element in Parliament, while theoretically attacking the prerogative. When we talk of giving power to Parliament we must remember that Parliament consists not only of a Popularly-Elected Assembly, but partly of a permanent, hereditary, Conservative Assembly, and it is very dangerous to take away the prerogatives of the Crown, as you call them, but, as I call them, the prerogatives of the House of Commons, and give them to a Parliament of both Houses. What we say, and what we Radicals have always urged, is that this House ought to be consulted in regard to Treaties—that Treaties ought not to become valid without the consent of the House. Treaties should not be made by Ministers in the dark. The majority here should have an opportunity of expressing an opinion in regard to them. What I think we ought to do in such cases is this. A Treaty is signed by those who have full powers to sign it, and it then has to be ratified. Before it is ratified it ought to be submitted to this House, laid on the Table for a certain number of days, and if during that period no action is taken against it, it would be rendered effective. But, in the meantime, the House would have the opportunity of challenging the wisdom of the Treaty. If it were challenged and rejected it would disappear, and the Government would disappear with it. That, I think, would be far better than the scheme the Government has put forward in the present case, namely, that the two Houses should have a veto only under the circumstances which the Government have submitted. I think that the action taken by the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Mid Lothian and for Derby will make it clear that this is not to be a precedent, and that the Liberal Government will revert to the old constitutional system. With respect to the merits of this particular Treaty, I disagree with a good deal that has been said on this side of the House. I have no sort of objection to the cession of Heligoland. I consider that that island is not of the slightest use for defensive purposes, because we have not even fortified it, and I am afraid that in these days, if a fit of Jingoism happened to be going over the country, we might be called upon at some particular moment to spend a million or two for the fortifications of that place. I am glad we have got rid of Heligoland. We are told it may be of use defensively to Germany. I am glad if that is the case, because I think that the best security for peace is that every country should be strong defensively, and not strong offensively. Hitherto we have wanted Heligoland to be strong offensively against Germany, but Germany wants it to be strong defensively against any Power that may attack her. That is the reason why she has done so much to acquire the island; but it is somewhat absurd that this proposal should be made by Her Majesty's Government, considering that only about three weeks ago, when the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy and myself took the liberty to suggest that Heligoland was a worthless possession, we were denounced sky-high by Her Majesty's Ministers. "What," said the Under Secretary for the Colonies, "This is rank treason! Give up Heligoland, that glorious possession of the British Crown; you will next give up the Isle of Jersey or the Isle of Wight." I cannot understand how it is that after this act of the cession of Heligoland has been done by the Government the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies is still found sitting on the Ministerial Bench. I should have thought he would have resigned on the instant rather than have become a partner in their guilt. But no—Ministers do not resign, bye-elections may go against them, public opinion may condemn them, but they have one policy to which they have been true up to the present moment—that of sticking to their places. I must, however, endeavour to relieve the minds of some Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House with regard to the feeling of the Heligolandians. There are some gentlemen on these Benches who have been greatly moved by the thought that the Heligolandians do not wish to have anything to do with Germany, and that they are in a state of utter despair at the cession of their island to that country, whereby they cease to live under the British flag. I would remind those hon. Members that in 1871, while the Franco-German War was going on, a request was made by the French people to the Heligolandians to give them pilots. Well this is what the Heligolandians, whose dream is said to be ever to remain British subjects, replied to that invitation—

Mr. Labouchere

"We, the inhabitants of Heligoland, feel compelled to remind you that we still continue to have German blood in our veins. German is at present, as it ever will be, the language of our schools and our Church. We have no sympathies other than what may be called German sympathies, and we think it but right to remind Germany that here, in the middle of the North Sea, there are Germans who are still awaiting their liberty."

Therefore, I say, we have at least the satisfaction of knowing that we have done a grateful act towards those Heligolandians who informed Germany that they were awaiting their liberation from us. Now, as far as Heligoland is concerned, I should be entirely in favour of the present Treaty, but when I look at the quid pro quo which is to be given for the cession of Heligoland I can hardly regard it as sufficient, although I do not say this for the reasons urged by hon. Members on this side of the House. I am not going to haggle and naggle about the interior of a country of which very few persons know the exact geographical position. I am not going into questions relating to the rivers, of which we know nothing, or to extensive forests and pigmy races which Mr. Stanley and other travellers have seen, but of which we have little or no knowledge whatever. I think, however, we are giving too much of Africa, and that the public are getting too little. We are told that we get a Protectorate over Zanzibar. An hon. Member was very indignant because I said we had not yet got Zanzibar. I repeat that we have not yet got it, because we have entered into a Treaty with France. [Cries of "No."] Hon. Members say "No," but I have it here in French. [Cries of "Read."] No, I will give it in English. It runs thus—"They, the two Governments, have reciprocally engaged to respect the independence of Zanzibar." And in a letter from Mons. Freycinet, four years afterwards, that Minister pointed out that on the 20th of March, 1862, England recognised the independence of Zanzibar, so that we have absolutely guaranteed the independence of that State. I am not complaining of this for a moment, because I should be very glad if France were to interfere and say we are not to have a Protectorate over Zanzibar, because that Protectorate means that we are to guarantee the territories attaching to Zanzibar against all other countries. That is a most responsible engagement. We have a wide field, it is true, and the Government are always increasing that field; but, still, we are always told that the great object is to secure the safety of the possessions we have already acquired. Therefore, I say it is a very strong measure for the English Government to guarantee the island of Zanzibar against Russia, France, Germany, and the rest of Europe. This, however, is what the Government are pleased to call the quid pro quo for Heligoland. What else do we do? We not only hold an enormous amount of territory, but we are desirous of augmenting that territory. Many hon. Members will remember the horror which some years ago was excited in the breasts of most

Englishmen when Sir Bartle Frere announced that he was going to found a great empire in Africa. Sir B. Frere at that moment never dreamed of the great empire we are attempting to found at the present time. At that time the suggestion was that we should go as far as the Orange River, but we have gone far beyond that, because we have gone to the Zambezi, and created what is, in reality, an enormous empire; and we are not content with that, we have laid hold of Egypt and are remaining there, and have practically come to consider that Egypt is a part of our Empire, and because we have Egypt we must have something else. We must have the Equatorial Provinces, containing some 12,000,000 inhabitants. Then, having got the Equatorial Provinces in the north, and the huge empire I have spoken of in the south, the Government is denounced because it does not lay hold of the strip of territory which connects the two. It is said we ought to have that territory, and this seems to me very much like stealing a man's hat and boots, and then saying because you have got his hat and boots you ought also to have his trousers. We are incurring enormous responsibilities in regard to this matter, and, so far as I can understand it, the Jingo dream at the present moment is to have a great empire stretching from Alexandria in the north down to Simon's Bay in the south. For my part, I am glad that Germany has interposed to prevent the connecting links being made between our northern and southern territory in Africa, or rather between our equatorial territory and our great southern empire. I am only sorry Germany has not got more. [Cries of "Oh!"] Yes, I am very sorry, and I would point out to hon. Gentlemen opposite who interrupt me that that would be a judicious step to take, because it would tend to the security of peace. The more Germany has to look after the less likely is she to go to war. She seems to want colonies. We have enough. Let Germany have what she wants of these territories and undertake the work of civilisation which that possession will necessitate, and we shall have a guarantee that Germany will not attack us, because if she does we shall then be enabled to lay hold of the whole of the continent which the Germans may have assisted in civilising at enormous cost. We laid hold of India and took it from the French. We did the same thing with regard to America, and we have done something like it in most places throughout the world. In fact, we are the most thoroughgoing buccaneers and land grabbers that ever existed. Some of us have cultivated land grabbing in Ireland, and we want to apply the same system to the entire globe. The earth hunger of this country is one of the strangest things I know of. We do not want these countries, but yet no sooner is a new province explored in any part of the world than we try to get hold of it, not because we really want it ourselves, but in order to prevent anybody else obtaining possession of it. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies has pointed out that there was a time when we could have got the whole of Africa by merely taking it. Why did we not take it? Simply because nobody else wanted it at that time. But no sooner does Germany and France go there, than we lay down a sort of manifesto that the whole of Africa belongs to us, and that we are at any rate to have the best portions of it. I say that we have no right to be there at all. Some hon. Gentlemen argue as if we had a right to the whole of Africa. But, in the first place, I assert that Africa belongs to the Africans; and, in the second place, if it is admitted that we ought to have colonies there, we have no more right to the interior of Africa than has any other country on the globe. It is precisely this notion, that we have a sort of primitive right to every part of the globe, that gets us into trouble. The Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs stated that no secret Treaty had been entered into with Germany. What I ask is, what secret Treaty has been entered into before with Germany; what obligations have we taken with regard to the Triple Alliance? The Under Secretary said there had been an exchange of Notes. Are these negotiations not going on now? Those communications ought to be submitted to the House. All I can say is, that certain communications having been made by Lord Salisbury in reference to the Triple Alliance, Italy was induced to join it. Why have those communications not been laid on the Table of the House? If they are not, all we can say is that Italy and Germany must thoroughly understand that these are mere expressions of opinion on the part of Lord Salisbury, and that this country is in no way responsible for the engagements that Lord Salisbury negotiated. I recall with surprise the expressions of approval of Lord Salisbury as Foreign Minister which have come from this side of the House. I regard him as one of the most dangerous Foreign Ministers that ever has been in the Foreign Office. His policy is simply that of interfering in Europe by truckling to Germany, and whenever he gets the opportunity of turning the cold shoulder to France. I hope that we will soon have a General Election, and so avoid the danger which I am perfectly certain we incur of being dragged into some European War. With regard to this Treaty, I am not opposed to getting rid of Heligoland and the Governor's salary. But I am opposed to the Treaty, because in South Africa we incur great responsibilities and liabilities which will eventually increase the taxation of this country. On the Colonial Votes I shall have something to say about the Chartered Companies. I can only say that in the territories which we do obtain from other Powers, we realise the very worst fears of the people by putting them into the hands of Conservative Dukes and others under the guise of Chartered Companies. Lastly, I object to the Treaty because it is an attempt to establish an exceedingly bad precedent, and I can only console myself with the thought that no Liberal Government ever can or will accept the precedent.

(7.54.) MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): The Government need not despair of carrying their Bill after the speech we have just heard. At first the hon. Member said we had got too little for Heligoland, and then that we had really got too much. Which argument does he prefer to stand by?

MR. LABOUCHERE: I did not say we had not received adequate value. I said we had received too great value, improper value, which really would cost us a great deal of money without any countervailing advantage.

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE: I am prepared to accept the hon. Member's correction, though I have no doubt the reporters to-morrow will refresh his memory as to what he did say. Anyhow, whatever the hon. Member did say, his speech was not one about which we need take any particular care. After two days' debating, there is very little that is new to be said on this subject. For my own part, I am perfectly prepared to support the Agreement, not because it is perfect, but because it is as good as can be expected under the circumstances. Considering those circumstances, hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, like the right hon. Member for Denbighshire, who lost us the Cameroons, half of New Guinea, and Damaraland, ought to be a little silent or criticise more fairly the present Agreement. I admit, however, that there are questions left unsettled in Africa which will be of great importance to us at a later stage of our national existence. South African colonists, for example, have a good right to complain that they should have their northern line cut off by a strip 20 miles broad, enhancing the value of Damaraland and shutting off their trade to the North, and arresting the natural expansion of South Africa. I believe even more important still is the question with regard to Walvisch Bay; and that that matter is left unsettled, while Heligoland is surrendered, is a serious blot in the Agreement. An hon. Member has urged the Government to put friendly pressure on Germany. The remark shows how little he understands the signs of the present day. I ask the hon. Member whether Germany has ever yielded to friendly pressure, and whether her pressure has ever been friendly. Passing from those points, however, considering that the circumstances of this case are totally different from the circumstances of past years, and considering also how much has been gained, the House ought, I think, to be thankful. Germany entered upon the negotiations knowing full well that the Government would not be supported by the British electorate in moving a ship or landing a battalion in order to obtain an acre of land in Africa. How different is the position of the German Emperor. Hon. Gentlemen opposite ought to go to the country and tell their constituents to support a spirited foreign policy. I do not agree that we do not want these countries for ourselves. I have heard that all the great wars of the last century were undertaken for the purposes of trade. I am prepared to further forward a policy for the purposes of trade; for, although we have great colonies, and surrounded by friendly nations, all our markets are shut up; we are hemmed in by protective duties, and unless we can find new countries we may as well shut ourselves up at home. I think that, on the whole, Her Majesty's Government are to be congratulated on the great field which they have opened up to British trade, for which there is a great future in that district. I am prepared to forward a policy which will develop our trade by firmness, and by force, if necessary. This Treaty is not only to be looked on as beneficial to the East African Company, but to the whole country, as it opens up a route for trade to the Nile. I am not inclined to underestimate the interests of our South African colonists. There are, undoubtedly, some points in which their feelings and wishes ought to have been met, but I hold that by this Agreement they have a great area for extension opened up. They have an enormous tract of territory that it will take at least a century to open up and adequately develop, and though I am sorry that the Damaraland boundary has been altered, I am sure that if the colonists will stand shoulder to shoulder and drop their racial differences, they have a future before them almost as great as that of Australia, and perhaps even greater. Though I have been bound to offer these criticisms to some parts of the Agreement, I am bound to give support to it on the whole. (8.5.)

(8.35.) Mr. A. PEASE (York): I rise to add my protest against the very humiliating Agreement, which depends on the passing of this Bill. No great amount of eulogy or praise has been bestowed on the Government measure even by the supporters of the Government. Even the speeches of the Prime Minister in another place, and of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in this House, were made in an apologetic tone. The hon. Member who last addressed the House said he was in favour of a spirited foreign policy, and a policy of resorting to force, if necessary, to hack up the commercial enterprise of this country. I do not pretend to be governed by the motives actuating the hon. Gentleman when I say it is a disastrous thing for this country if legitimate commercial enterprise is hindered by any action of the Government, and I think that legitimate commercial enterprise is restricted and endangered in many quarters of Africa. One hon. Member has said that we have bartered away our birthright in Africa for a mess of pottage. We have bartered away our birthright, but I cannot see where the mess of pottage comes in. I cannot see what we have gained in any direction by the Anglo-German Agreement. If we compare our position in Africa in 1886 with our position there to-day the change is distinctly for the worse. We were told that the proposed concessions and surrenders, and the evacuation of Heligoland are necessary in order to secure the friendship of Germany. I feel pretty confident that even after we have done all that is proposed, Germany's policy will still be mainly dictated by her own interest. In my opinion, the first step towards obtaining the friendship of Germany would be to obtain her respect, and I cannot see how Germany can have any respect for a Government or a Power which so willingly and, I believe, so unnecessarily surrenders her hold upon great areas in Africa. I willingly admit that there is ample room for dissatisfaction with regard to the policy pursued by the Liberal Administration with regard to Damaraland and Namaqualand, but I maintain that things have been made infinitely worse by the concessions just made. It is contended that we still retain our influence at Zanzibar; but let me point out that our influence is now restricted to the Islands of Zanzibar and Pemba. Before, however, I deal with the question of the Sultanate of Zanzibar, I desire to refer to the Heligoland part of the Treaty. An hon. and gallant Member has deprecated the position of Heligoland as a point of strategic value. I do not know whether the hon. and gallant Member is a more competent authority than some of those authorities who appeared before the Commission on the Colonial Defences, or whether he is a more competent authority than some of the great men who preceded those authorities. But whilst the

hon. and gallant Member was speaking I turned to a Despatch written by Admiral Russell in 1807, in which the gallant Admiral said of Heligoland that at a small expense the island could be made a small Gibraltar. I do not profess to know anything at all about the question of the strategic value of Heligoland, but I remember that even Lord Salisbury in another place dwelt on the great use that Heligoland had been when Napoleon promulgated his decrees against the commerce of Great Britain, and endeavoured to suppress British commerce on the Continent of Europe. He pointed out how, Heligoland being a smuggling emporium, it was Heligoland smugglers who arrested and defeated the policy of Napoleon. I suppose if Heligoland was of use at the beginning of the century, events may arise that may make Heligoland again useful in that or in other respects impossible now to anticipate. But the Prime Minister has also stated that it is better to cede Heligoland when we can get a quid pro quo than to undergo the humiliation of surrendering it in time of war; and he has pointed out that we should be obliged to do that, because within a few hours of a declaration of war Germany would send a fleet, an armed force, and artillery to occupy the island, and we should be ousted from our possession. But I presume that, in the event or probability of war with Germany, some steps would be taken to protect the island from the fate foreshadowed by the Prime Minister. For my own part, I do not anticipate any trouble with Germany in Europe. I cannot imagine any event in Europe that would bring the two countries into conflict or unfriendly contact. Our interests are in common, and there is no reason to suppose we shall have any but friendly relations with the German Empire; and even if it were not so, Germany has little power to damage us in Europe, whilst I should have supposed that those in favour of a spirited foreign policy, such as indicated by the hon. Member who spoke last, would have hesitated before handing over our outpost in the North Sea. The reason why I regret the cession is because the inhabitants have shown plainly, absolutely, and resolutely a preference to remain subjects of the British Crown, while we abuse their loyalty by transferring them, as if they were cattle, to the dominion of another State. Germany, at any rate, has no old claim to Heligoland. This is not a recession of territory as has been stated by one hon. Member. Heligoland, I believe, has never at any time belonged to Germany. Lord Salisbury deprecated a plebiscite being taken; but I think, at any rate, he might have taken the opinion of the Nominees Council. We have no evidence that he did seek any information in that direction. But I regard the cession of Heligoland as the smallest part of the Agreement, and I should be willing to support it provided we get a proper equivalent. I ask the House for a moment to follow me whilst I endeavour to show what is the position of this country and Germany in Africa, where we are supposed to have obtained an equivalent as compared with that of four or five years ago. In a Despatch to Sir Edward Malet in 1885, Lord Granville pointed out that "Apprehensions with regard to the policy of Germany towards the Sultan of Zanzibar are not shared by Her Majesty's Government, who continue to respect the assurances given to Sir Edward Malet by Prince Bismarck on May 28, 1884, that Germany will not endeavour to obtain a protectorate over Zanzibar."

And then he goes on to state that for a century the Sultans of Zanzibar and Muscat had been under the administrative influence of this country and the Government of India, and that in 1861, by the decision of the Viceroy of India, the two countries, Muscat and Zanzibar, were divided by an arrangement which has continued since. The Despatch went on to point out that Her Majesty's ships had kept the peace in Zanzibar waters; that British trade was closely connected with the country, that the British Government had subsidised steamers from this country to Zanzibar, and that British-Indian subjects had settled there in considerable numbers, and that British influence was used for the advantage of the trade of all nations under liberal Commercial Treaties existing with the Sultan. Well, what was the condition of things that followed upon this? Germany assumed certain rights by force over certain territories behind the coast line of the Sultanate on the mainland. The Sultan protested, and the British Government preceding the present, if anything supported the Sultan in his protest; but, later on, in September, 1885, we find Lord Salisbury had changed the tone towards Germany, and received compliments and thanks from the German Government for good offices in bringing pressure to bear on the Sultan of Zanzibar. I could quote from the Blue Books several instances of pressure brought to bear upon the Sultan, and there is one instance that shows indisputably how this pressure was brought to bear on the Sultan in favour of Germany, and which I intended to quote, but I find I have not the book with me. It is an instance in which, in a Despatch, Lord Salisbury declares that such pressure was employed. I might refer also to the quotation that was used in another place from a Despatch by the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord Randolph Churchill) showing what the position was in 1886. The noble Lord said—

"Our position at the moment is one of immense value and strength; the whole of the tribes in that territory are under our influence, look up to, and are determined to be guided by us;"

and he went on to point out how preponderating was the influence of this country in Zanzibar. Germany, step by step, sometimes by violence and sometimes by pressure exercised on the Sultan, though the English Foreign Office obtained a footing on the Zanzibar coast of Africa. And now, to sum up, look at the position of this country in Africa and in Europe in relation to Germany, as compared to what it was in 1886. In 1886 we possessed Heligoland; we had a preponderating influence and power throughout the Sultanate of Zanzibar, the Island of Zanzibar, the Island of Pemba, and 500 or 600 miles of coast line; the question of Damaraland was not settled; Germany claimed certain concessions in the district which we had not consented to acknowledge. To-day what is the position in which this country finds itself? Germany has got Heligoland, Damaraland, Namaqualand, and the mainland territories of the Sultan of Zanzibar; concessions in other districts, for instance, in the Gulf of Guinea; and I presume, after 1910, according to this Treaty, she will have power to exclude our trade from the Sultanate of Zanzibar or the mainland coast of Africa. What is our position? We have lost Heligoland; we have lost the enjoyment of some of the fruits of British discovery and enterprise in North East Africa; we have a lessened authority in Zanzibar, a Protectorate dependent on concessions from France and the Sultan; and our fellow-countrymen who are engaged in the enterprise of the British East Africa Company are cut off from communication between Tanganyika and Central Africa, debarred from the route extending from Central Africa to our possessions in the South; we have a discontented colony at the Cape in consequence of concessions made to Germany without consulting the colonists; and the probability of friction with France. And the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has stated that even such authority as we have in Zanzibar is to be exercised in no exclusive manner; he seemed to deprecate even the little influence left to us in that island. I cannot understand why there is this sacrifice of British interests in Africa and Germany. I much prefer English methods of colonisation to German and French methods. We have had most lamentable occurrences by the Germans on the mainland of the Sultanate of Zanzibar. There have been methods adopted which have been condemned by our Naval Commanders on the African Coast. As the noble Lord the Member for Paddington has pointed out, one concession after another has been made in order to secure our position in Egypt, and he has pointed out the fruits and consequences of the policy we have pursued. There are other advantages almost as undesirable we have given the Germans. We have allowed Captain Weissman to go to Egypt and recruit a force there for his expedition into Central Africa. You would never have allowed a French officer—I doubt if you would have allowed an officer of any other country—to recruit forces in Cairo and other parts of Egypt for warfare, or any other enterprise in the interior of Africa. That I may be under no accusation of misrepresentation in this matter, let me call attention to the answer given by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Poplar. My hon. Friend asked if the attention of the Government had been directed to a telegram, dated Alexandria, February 25, to the effect that Captain Weissman had arrived on his way to Zanzibar; that he would proceed to Cairo, and would recruit his force with some 100 blacks, and whether the consent of the Egyptian Government had been obtained to the enlistment of Egyptian subjects. The answer was that Sir Evelyn Baring had reported the arrival of Captain Weissman at Cairo; had stated that his proceedings had received no official sanction, but that the Egyptian Government did not propose to offer any objection to the voluntary enlistment of a few blacks for certain police purposes. Well, we know how the police force is used by the Germans in their work of colonisation. Much has been said about the "Hinterland" doctrine; and though it has in some degree been denied, it is practically a doctrine admitted in this Anglo-German Agreement. The Hinterland doctrine, it would seem, is to be allowed to be applied by Germany, but it is not to apply to any other country. We know the position taken up by this country in regard to Portugal. If any country has a right to claim territory on the Hinterland principle that country is Portugal. She has territory on the coast line on West and East Africa, not a bare coast line, but territory reaching a considerable distance into the interior. But Portugal is a very weak State, and Germany a very strong one. We have, I say, in this Agreement practically admitted the Hinterland doctrine, and I think that is pretty clear from the Despatch of Lord Salisbury to Sir Edward Malet on June 14th last. The second paragraph of that Despatch reads—

"The claims of the German Government are based chiefly on the contention that where one Power occupies the coast another Power may not, without consent, occupy unclaimed regions in its rear. It would be too much to affirm that this contention is entirely destitute of support from international usage."

That, I say, is conceding the doctrine in some degree—

"But its operation cannot be unlimited, while the boundaries within which it should be restricted are very hard to draw."

Later on, Lord Salisbury fully admits the doctrine. He goes on to say—

"Her Majesty's Government had, therefore, no title to advance which could countervail the claim which the German Government based on the fact that this region"— that is, territory to the north of Tanganyika—

"Was in the immediate rear of their own; and their pretension derived additional support from the circumstance that it would practically have the effect of dividing the shores of Lake Victoria Nyanza into two portions approximately equal between the two Governments, &c."

Well, I say, the Hinterland doctrine is conceded wherever the Germans have set it in operation; while the Foreign Office have, so far as I can gather from the correspondence, never once insisted absolutely on any point they have urged. So much has been said about concessions in the South-West of Africa and the lamentable extension of German territory along the banks of the Chobe River to the Zambesi, that I need not dwell on that. I admit that the first concessions in that direction were begun under a Liberal Government; but I consider that the present Government, knowing what were the concessions to British subjects in Damaraland; what was the feeling at the Cape; what was the feeling of the King of the Damaras, are very much to blame in not taking care that the interests of British colonists at the Cape, and the interests of the natives were protected by restricting the concessions in Damaraland to a much narrower district. I know it is too late now to do anything towards upsetting, altering, or amending the Agreement; nevertheless, I do believe it is the duty of Parliament to reject this Agreement, and, although few may vote against it, I certainly shall vote with my hon. Friend the Member for Lanark against what I consider this most humiliating Agreement. While I give every credit to the desire of the Government to maintain friendly relations with Germany, so far as I can see they do nothing towards obtaining or securing the gratitude of Germany, while I can see that they may land us in material difficulties with our colonists before very long.

(9.10.) CAPTAIN BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): I am sorry to hear the hon. Gentleman is going to vote against the Bill for the reason he has given, namely, that the Hinterland doctrine has been applied solely for the benefit of Germany. He and other speakers on this side have overlooked one part of the arrangement. While it is true we have given up considerable territory on the Hinterland principle to Germany on the East, it is also true that south of Lake Nyassa there is a territory of 60,000 square miles secured on the Hinterland principle to this country. So it is unjust to say that the Hinterland doctrine has been applied solely for the benefit of Germany. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) gave us a long controversial argument, in which he attributed sinister designs to the Government and the House of Lords. I do not know whether we are to consider the hon. Gentleman as a Constitutional Authority, but I do not think he convinced the House that the constitutional question involved is a very serious one. His hon. Colleague the junior Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) hailed the introduction of the Bill with satisfaction as a precedent by which a prerogative of the Crown is limited or forfeited. He argued that when once the Crown had abandoned a prerogative it had never been asserted again. Now, I think, to such a statement there are very considerable limitations. It is true that prerogatives of the Crown being abandoned after conflict between Crown and Parliament have never been revived, but I do not think it can be asserted that a prerogative abandoned by the will or the wish of the Crown, waived, so to speak, is absolutely abandoned.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): What I stated, and what I believe to be the case, was that there is no case in which, the Crown having lost its prerogative by enactment to which, of course, the Crown had to be a consenting party, that prerogative was ever re-asserted or re-taken.

CAPTAIN BETHELL: That is very likely, by express enactment, but as we have been assured, and by right hon. Gentlemen opposite, most emphatically, this at any rate is not to form a precedent. But the hon. Gentleman considers it is to form a precedent for a prerogative abandoned by the Crown. Now, in regard to the cession of Heligoland, I fear there is a prospect that the running sore between this country and America may find its counterpart in the complications which will arise under a sub-section of the 12th Article having reference to rights of fishing. It is provided that our fishermen are to have rights of taking in provisions and water, and other rights for all time. This is just one of the provisions that have given rise to so much difficulty and correspondence with America, and I think the sub-section is also likely to give rise to future trouble with the German Empire. I should have thought it would have been wiser to have limited the reservation of rights to some specific period of time. Upon the cession of the island I do not propose to say anything further, except to remark, upon the complaint that we have not an equivalent concession, that a few weeks ago in a discussion on the Estimates several hon. Gentlemen on the other side expressed a desire to cede Heligoland, not for any quid pro quo, but simply on sentimental grounds, and it was not until the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan) suggested that it was a valuable property to Germany, and that if we gave it up we ought to get something substantial in return, that Members then considered it might be desirable, and the hon. Member for the Scotland Division (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), correcting what he had previously said, explained that he did not mean that the island should be given up for nothing, and out of friendship merely. It is a little surprising now to find hon. Gentlemen so shocked and horrified at finding we are to get so little in return. I should take out of the Agreement altogether, for the purpose of summing up our gains and losses, a large piece of Central Africa. Consider, then, what remains. We have given up Heligoland and a certain portion of South-West Africa. The cession of Heligoland has already been sufficiently discussed, and it is to the South-West African question that I wish to direct my criticism. Some weeks ago, before this arrangement was concluded, we had a discussion on this question in Committee, and on that occasion I took the opportunity of saying I was strongly opposed to ceding any more territory to Germany in that region. My reason differed from that given by the hon. Member who last spoke. Where he got his information about Namaqualand I cannot imagine. I never heard that that country had been explored.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camberne): There is plenty of gold there.

CAPTAIN BETHELL: That may be so. The hon. Gentleman seems to take a very rosy view of the country. My objection to this arrangement, however, is an almost sentimental one. I am looking to the future of the Anglo-Saxon Empire South of the Zambesi being prejudiced by the intrusion of another foreign element. I think the original admission of the Germans was a gross mistake, and I deprecate as strongly as I can the giving up of anything further in South Africa to the Germans, because it will tend to render more difficult our ultimate success there. I cannot understand why Germany is so very anxious to get this territory. I have heard that the German negotiators were very stiff-necked about it. I could understand our Foreign Minister making a concession if he were going to get a quid pro quo; but I do not think he has got one in this instance. I may say, therefore, that so far as this portion of the Agreement is concerned I join with those who deprecate the concessions which have been made. In estimating our gains and losses by the Treaty, I certainly think it should be noted that one great gain we have secured is such a re-arrangement of territory among the nations in Africa as will tend to obviate disputes and difficulties henceforward—difficulties that have led to trouble in the past, and might easily do so again, unless the position and territory of each country is clearly defined. Whatever other value the Agreement may have I venture to say it is most valuable as constituting an important factor in the peace of the world, and no doubt that consideration was present to the mind of Lord Salisbury. As to Zanzibar, I hope, that, notwithstanding the action of France and Germany with regard to the island in the past, we shall in future exercise a substantial Protectorate over it. With regard to the remarks of the senior Member for Northampton, it will be remembered that the French and ourselves guaranteed the independence of the Sultan of Zanzibar. So also did the Germans, and now that they have withdrawn, surely we are not bound to insist on that independence. In fact, the word guarantee was not used in the Treaty: the engagement was to respect the Sultan's independence, and not to guarantee it—a very different thing. The value of the island and the Protectorate will largely depend on the results of German colonisation in Africa. If that action is successful, and they are able to create and develop ports on the coast sufficient for the purposes of their trade, Zanzibar will not be so valuable as it would otherwise be. Still, there can be no doubt that it will always be a valuable British possession for warlike or maritime purposes, and especially as a coaling station. Although I am glad to see Great Britain getting her fair share of possessions in Africa, and other parts of the world, to which she is entitled, yet I do not see why this country should be regarded as the only colonising and civilising Power in Africa. Germany, or any other country that undertakes this work, should have its fair share of territory to carry out its purposes, and with regard to the contrast that has been drawn between Lord Salisbury's treatment of Portugal on the one hand and of Germany on the other, it should be remembered that though Portugal first discovered the territories in Africa which she claimed, she has never established herself in them, and in the circumstances it was impossible for Lord Salisbury to recognise all her claims. It must be admitted that we can no more rest our claim to the territories we have discovered in Africa on their original discovery by us, since we have not established ourselves in them, than Portugal can lay claim to the territories North of the Zambesi. Therefore, I do not think that Lord Salisbury has acted towards Portugal as a weak Power, while he has acted towards Germany as a strong Power. On the contrary, I believe he has acted towards that country with much dignity. I hope that in the negotiations with France and Portugal the same dignified efforts will be made to reconcile the rights of all.

*(9.30.) Mr. STOREY: I am sorry I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down in one of the observations he made. He said that Lord Salisbury had treated Portugal in exactly the same spirit as he treated Germany, but I am afraid that I must, even at the risk of condemnation, come to the conclusion that Lord Salisbury treated Portugal as a weak Power, and Germany as a strong Power. He negotiated with the one, and took a strong handed course with the other, which he would not have dared to had she possessed the power of Germany. I differ, too, from many of my Liberal and Radical Friends in regard to this Agreement. I entirely concur in the wisdom of the cession of Heligoland to Germany, and I think Lord Salisbury is entitled to much credit for having done a very sensible and statesmanlike thing. The importance of Heligoland to this country has been greatly over-estimated, and I have come to the conclusion, after listening to the Debates, and reading what has been said in some of the newspapers, that a great many Gentlemen who have discussed the matter have never seen the island, and have never taken the trouble to understand what it is. One hon. Gentleman described it as the key to the North Sea. What magnificent folly to describe it in that fashion. Another, out-Heroding Herod, has spoken of it as the key of the Baltic, which is about as sensible as if I were to say that the Isle of Man is the key of the English Channel. Heligoland is a beggarly little rock, with a little bit of sand tacked on to it, as a sort of fringe to its garment; it has got a population limited in number, but German in sympathy and in many other ways. Therefore, as far as the rock is concerned, I am glad it is going to Germany. I wish hon. Gentlemen who oppose this cession would realise what we should feel if the Goodwin Sands were once more to stand perpetually out of the sea, and if every ship in and out of the Port of London were to see the German flag flying there. It would do us no damage, but it would offend our sentimental feeling. The Germans must have the same feeling at seeing the English flag flying on this little island close to the mouth of the Elbe. It is only natural that they should, and I commend Lord Salisbury for the taking note of that sentiment, and frankly handing Heligoland over to Germany. But I have to make one remark on the point, not of a complimentary character. I would make it a rule to have a very generous feeling towards the sentiments of foreign nations. The hon. Gentleman who has just spoken said that we ought to have got something in return for Heligoland. I think that great nations in treating with one another ought not to seek a quid pro quo, but ought to act with the generosity of gentlemen, and not seek for a quid pro quo in the spirit of a pedlar. The complaint that I have to make against Lord Salisbury is that he has sought for concessions in other parts of the world. And what sort of a bargain has he made? Germany has to give us a lot of territory which is not hers to give, and we have to give Germany a lot of territory which is not ours to give. Since the day Dick Turpin and Tom King met to divide the plunder of Hagley Hall I do not know of any more atrocious thing than has been done by those two great civilising Powers in Africa. The Under Secretary has talked in magniloquent terms about partitioning Africa. The right hon. Gentleman partitioned to Germany what was not his, and accepted from Germany what was not hers, and this without considering the views of the people who inhabit the land. I am utterly against England having possessions or points of land scattered up and down the world, except for one reason. I admit it is absolutely essential that England should have coaling stations throughout the world. I shall never be opposed to obtaining fairly, and keeping with a strong hand, such coaling stations as are necessary for our Fleet and our Mercantile Marine. Heligoland never could have been a coaling station. Coaling stations must be defensible, and to fortify and defend that island would have involved enormous expenditure, the benefits derived from which would never be commensurate with the outlay. I have no objection to our having Gibraltar, Malta, and other places of the kind, and, therefore, I have not the smallest objection to make to Lord Salisbury's acquiring the Island of Zanzibar. But, having surrendered Heligoland to Germany because it is close to that Empire, the very same condition of things will exist 50 years hence with respect to Zanzibar. Zanzibar will be an English island placed just off the coast of an enormous German Empire, and the same sentimental feeling which makes us surrender Heligoland to Germany now will compel us then to surrender Zanzibar to the holders of the German Empire in Africa. Just now I unwittingly incurred the censure of the hon. and gallant Member for Evesham by sneering at an observation he made. He thought that I sneered at the missionaries, but I sneered at the sentiment he was enunciating. So long as he talked about the relations between the two Powers, and about the advantages of trade, I thought he was on common-sense ground, but when he suggested the utter cant—and I can call it by no other words—that we were going to Africa to support the missionaries, I could not help sneering, and I shall sneer every time such observations are made by any Member of this House. What is the use of humbugging, or attempting to humbug, the world? We do not go to Africa to support the missionaries, or to civilise the natives; as everybody knows in his secret heart, we go for the purpose of obtaining land and making money; and what becomes of those poor wretches the Africans we care not one button. Did we go to North America, to civilise the Indians; to Australia, to civilise the natives; or to New Zealand, to civilise the Maories? No, we went to make money, to carry on trade, to acquire land, and to make an opening for our sons. That was our purpose, and we ought to say so honestly. We did not go to civilise. What do we carry to these natives? We carry to them the three R's; not those which we give to the children of this country, but the rifle, rum, and religion. The rifle and the rum are slowly destroying these populations. Heaven grant that the third of the three R's—religion—may give them entrance to a place where grasping Emperors do not govern, and where philanthropic and pious traders are unknown. I have learned one lesson from this action of ours in Africa. We are giving land to Germany which we have no right to give, and Germany is giving land to us to which she has no right. There is, however, no opinion taken of the populations of these territories. I do not admit that they are poor and scattered. I believe that they are not of the bloodthirsty and plundering types which have been found in other uncivilised portions of the world. Probably in that favoured region there are races capable of great development. I am sure of one thing, that the ordinary processes which have characterised the march of the Anglo-Saxon and every other European nation in their dealings with savage nations, will, if adopted in this case, civilise these peoples off the face of the earth. Now, the lesson I have learnt is this: that all our outeries against Russia, on the ground that she has acquired enormous territories by nefarious means, are the merest sham. With what sense of moral worth can our Government hereafter complain—with what justice can the Tory Party hereafter complain—about Russia? I was in the House when the unfortunate butcheries in Afghanistan occurred during the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. I can remember the outcry raised by Members of the Conservative Party as to the grasping tendencies of Russia, and the nefarious means by which she managed to get control of one Khanate after another, and one valley after another. I can remember the outeries from the same ranks when Russia re-acquired Bessarabia, which we took from her in 1856. How piously we then condemned Russia. But with what face can England hereafter condemn acquisitions by other Powers? If there is any Power which goes up and down the world, like a raging lion seeking what it may devour, it is this great Empire of Great Britain and Ireland. Look at the acquisitions we have made in recent days. Who took Cyprus? The Tory Government. Who took Burma? The Tory Government; and if the hon. and gallant Member for Evesham had his way we should absorb not only all this earth, but the moon too, in the name of Great Britain. You have acquired land in every part of the world without the least regard for the interests of the inhabitants, simply through a greed of lust, and power, and growth, which seems inherent in a certain class of the English people. Yet, when other nations commit this offence you hold up your hands and thank Heaven you are not as other men—not even as this publican Russia. I think it is very much to be deplored that any Party in this House should connect itself with such a wholesale proposal of partition as is contained in this Bill. I admit that the partition is nominal, and on paper; it is not a proposal that you should at once acquire land, because, if it meant that, it would involve an expenditure of money and men, which would speedily push the Government from Office. I can understand a Government taking possession of a territory which it feels the circumstances of the time require it should, but for the first time in our history you have entered into a covenant for the possession of an enormous amount of plunder in land of which neither of the contracting parties can yet take possession. You are setting a bad example to other nations of the world, and you are doing more, for you are shutting our mouths, if ever there should be cause for righteous complaint. When Russia comes down to the Bosphorus, as she will, or if she acquires Persia, she will reply to our complaints by pointing to this Treaty with Germany, and will say that we entered cold-blooded into a Treaty to partition half a continent. I have learned another lesson from this transaction. If I, as a humble Member of the Radical Party, try simply to change the form of Government in Ireland, and to give the Irish people the right to manage their internal affairs, I am told that I seek the disintegration of the Empire; but if the Tories sell, in the spirit of a pedlar, a portion of the Empire to another nation, then they are not disintegrating the Empire. I trust that the public of this country will learn that lesson. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General last night made some observations on the serious constitutional question raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. I do not propose to attempt to discuss that question, but one remark made by the hon. and learned Member particularly struck me. He said he had always understood that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby hated the power of the Crown, and that that night he had been amazed to see him defending the prerogative of the Crown as against the power of the House of Lords. He added that the right hon. Gentleman's hatred of the Crown had been obscured and swallowed up by his hate of the House of Lords. What right had the hon. and learned Member to assume that any person on these Benches, either a Constitutional Whig, as I should call my right hon. Friend, or an extreme Revolutionist, as I might call myself, ever hated or was opposed to the prerogative of the Crown. Everyone knows, I presume, that if at this time, I were called upon to mould a Constitution for this island, I would not make it monarchical. But, then, like most other northern people, I have just got sufficient common sense to know that a change from the system which has grown up, and has, on the whole, worked so well, involving, as it would, an enormous expenditure of money, time, and perhaps blood—I say that a change of such a terrible nature would never be compensated for by any advantage that would accrue from our having merely the form we prefer. Like common sense people we accept the present position of things. Anyone who suggests that I am opposed to the prerogative of the Crown is manifestly mistaken. We, on these Benches, regard the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian and his Colleagues as the guardians of the present English Constitution against the revolutionary persons who constitute the present Government. Everyone knows that the prerogative of the Crown is the prerogative of the House of Commons, and that the prerogative of the House of Commons is the prerogative of the majority of the people of this country. We do not hate the House of Lords. In the present circumstances, the House of Lords are, unfortunately, our masters, and therefore, we assert against hon. Gentlemen opposite the prerogative of the Crown. I believe that what the Government are aiming at is the exalting of the power of the House of Lords in this as in other matters, so that the House of Commons could not decide any foreign question unless the House of Lords liked. We are not prepared to put the House of Lords into such a position as that. Rather than give them more powers on foreign matters, we desire to reduce their powers on home matters. I venture to think that a great number of constitutional Radicals prefer the old method of the will of the Crown, which is the will of the people, being supreme in foreign affairs, and, therefore, we are unable to vote for the Amendment of my hon. Friend any more than for the Motion for the Second Reading of the Bill.

(10.5.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): Sir, I will not abuse the right which the Amendment gives me to say a few words. The Attorney General has charged the Opposition with having taken the Government by surprise; but I am surprised that the Government should have been taken by surprise. A Cabinet which consists of responsible Ministers of the Crown ought not to be taken by surprise when they are asked why they have abandoned what they admit to be an established head of a prerogative which has never been abandoned before. I venture to say that if the Bench of Bishops were to drop one of the 39 Articles, and then, when asked why they had done it, were to say, we would like to have time to consider before we give a reason, it would be rather an extraordinary situation. Prima facie, Ministers of the Crown are the Trustees of the prerogative of the Crown, and when they come to the opinion that it is necessary to change a constitutional practice, one would suppose that they would first of all state to Parliament why they have done so; but when the Government are asked for their reasons they say they are taken by surprise. Having been asked, they have attempted various answers. 'I really have risen for the purpose of attempting to reconcile, as far as I can, the statements they have made in the interests of what I believe Theologians would call the harmony of the Gospels of the Treasury Bench. The view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, one of the greatest authorities on the Treasury Bench, is that this is a thing which the Government are bound to do on this occasion, though they would not be bound to do it upon any occasion, nor even in a similar case. He says, "I rest upon the argument that we are not obliged to ask the assent of Parliament." I venture rather to demur to this, and to contend that there is some danger if this is done once that it may be done again, and that Parliament might claim that having been done once it should be done again. Then came into the field a very different knight from the Chancellor of the Exchequer—a dashing authority, the Secretary for Ireland. He said that they found the Treaty-making power of the Crown in a nebulous condition.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Not the power of Treaty making, but the power of dealing with cessions of territory.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I beg pardon; that is what I meant. Philosophers distinguish between the effective and subjective of the question. I admit the nebulousness, but I cannot state whether it was in the person contemplating or the thing contemplated. The matter is perfectly clear, and it is not a question of this lawyer or of that. I do not wish to speak disrespectfully of the lawyers, but I cannot help remembering the criticism of Mr. Burke, when the lawyers gave an opinion in the case of the impeachment of Warren Hastings. He dismissed the opinion of the lawyers with the remark—

“That a rabbit could not be a judge of the gestation of the elephant, and, therefore, he could not conceive that the opinion of practising barristers in the fields of private business were conclusive upon great constitutional questions.”

Though not complimentary, I think that view of Mr. Burke was well founded. On the other hand, the Secretary for Ireland said this was one of the undecided cases of constitutional practice and law. How undecided? It has been decided by the practice of centuries. There has not been a single exception, and, in my opinion, that is a decision of Constitutional Law which stands far above the opinion of any lawyer or individual. The Chief Secretary also said that the Government found the question in a nebulous condition, and determined—though they were taken by surprise—to establish a precedent which should dispose of this nebulous state of things, and settle Constitutional Law for the future. It will be observed that a very different view was taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who said it would decide nothing for the future. I said across the floor of the House: “Is it a binding precedent?” The Secretary for Ireland said: “Yes; it is a binding precedent.” That is very important. The Government have decided an undecided question of Constitutional Law. The Secretary for Ireland says that what the Government have to do in this doubtful and undetermined condition of the Constitution, is to decide for the future on which side they should attempt, by establishing a precedent, to determine an undetermined question. We shall know what it is this reflecting and unanimous Cabinet have determined is to be the real Constitution for the future. Now, the object was a very good object; it was “to enable Parliament to prevent the Ministry beforehand from falling into error.” A very necessary object, especially in the present day. Parliament was to be invited to prevent Lord Salisbury from falling into error by the action of Parliament anticipatory of that of the Foreign Office. I commend this to the attention of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. I suppose this new principle is to be inscribed in letters of gold in the Foreign Office—the principle that Parliament is to be called upon to prevent the Government from falling into error. Well, let us examine the precedent which is thus laid down by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and see what it really amounts to. First of all we are told that is only to apply in time of profound peace; that Parliament is not to be consulted in case of war; that is not to be within the precedent. Very well, to this extent we have got at the mind of the Government. In time of profound peace, when no great emergencies threaten, Parliament may be consulted; but if great emergencies arise Parliament is not to be considered. Then there is the further condition that no ulterior considerations are involved, because if they are present Parliament must not be consulted; but where the surrender of territory involves no ulterior considerations Parliament may be consulted. We might suppose that the surrender of Malta and Gibraltar involved ulterior considerations, but in that case Parliament is not to be consulted. This is the settlement of the law which the present Cabinet announce. Then, if difficulties of negotiation are introduced Parliament is not to be consulted; but in that case I do not see how we are, beforehand, to prevent the Ministry from falling into error, which is the object at which this new principle is to be aimed. This is the new settlement of a nebulous question by which the Cabinet has decided to determine the undecided principles of the Constitution. The proposition, in fact, amounts to this: the Government may say, “Oh, yes; let us make such or such a cession of territory; but if it involves ulterior considerations Parliament is not to be consulted in the matter.” The result must be that if all these conditions are to be fulfilled no transfer of territory could take place till the assent of both Houses of Parliament is obtained. That is the constitutional view which is presented by the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, and then, having announced this clear and definite principle of constitutional usage, he says, "This is a question which we have settled, and this is a principle which I hope will always be adhered to." This being the view presented by the right hon. Gentleman, he was followed by the Attorney General; and I noticed that the hon. and learned Gentleman was a little more cautious, owing, no doubt, to his professional experience, than the Chief Secretary. The hon. and learned Gentleman did not tell the House his own opinion, and in that I think he was wise, because he would have found it very difficult to have reconciled any opinion he might have been able to give with the views of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Therefore, he did not give us his own views on this great constitutional question; nor did he tell us whether his opinion had been consulted. He gave us the opinions of other Law Officers; but what were the views of the present Law Officers he took good care not to state. The hon. and learned Gentleman brought forward a very curious statement about the Orange River case, and he rather reproached me with having been ignorant of what had happened in regard to the Orange River territory. I may, however, tell him that I was perfectly familiar with that case, and may also state that it has nothing to do with the case before the House. We are here talking of a Treaty cession by Parliament; in the Orange case there was simply an abandonment of sovereignty by the Sovereign Power. The hon. and learned Gentleman quoted what he supposed to be the opinion of Lord Selborne, when he was Sir Roundell Palmer, in regard to this question of cession. I was a little amazed at what he told us, and I think the hon. and learned Gentleman was not very kind to Lord Selborne, because he suggested that that eminent lawyer had given an opinion that the Orange River territory could not be abandoned without an Act of Parliament. If the then Sir Roundell Palmer did give that opinion, everybody treated it as worthless, because the sovereignty of that territory was abandoned without an Act of Parliament. As an old friend of Sir Roundell Palmer, I should like to defend him, and I should trust that no such opinion was ever given by him. I remember that Sir Charles Adderley, now Lord Norton, made a speech, in which he said he had not read the opinion of Sir Roundell Palmer; but he stated what he believed to be the views of that Law Officer, as he understood them from a conversation he had had with him on the subject the night before. Sir Roundell Palmer was a man of subtle mind, and the opinion the Attorney General cited as that of Sir Roundell Palmer was an opinion which he had obtained after it had been filtered through the mind of Sir Charles Adderley, the object being to afford the Attorney General a Constitutional authority for overthrowing the Constitutional practice of generations. I do not know what Sir Roundell Palmer's opinion was in those days; but in 1875, when the question was argued before the Privy Council, I am sure that Sir Roundell Palmer held none of the opinions attributed to him by Sir Charles Adderley. So much for the opinions of the Law Officers, to which the Attorney General referred. I now want to examine what is the opinion of the Attorney General himself on this question. The House will find that the hon. and learned Gentleman differs very widely from the doctrines laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and harks back on those of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He said he contended that there was no change whatever involved in the procedure of the Government. Now, the Chief Secretary for Ireland had laid down a new principle, which is to govern the future, in consequence of the undetermined condition of the law, and then he said that if that was so there was a binding precedent. But the Attorney General's doctrine was that the question was as to its being in the power of the Crown to act in one way or the other. It was an optional prerogative. And afterwards, speaking of the settlement in Africa, the hon. and learned Gentleman said the existing condition of things was that of a "go-as-you-please contest."

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I do not wish the right hon. Gentleman to misrepresent me. The phrase "go-as-you-please contest" was not applied by me in connection with the constitutional question. I applied the phrase, which was suggested by the speech of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, to the idea of the European nations being allowed to do what they liked in Africa.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I accept the hon. and learned Gentleman's correction, but I was only applying the phrase to the doctrine of the Attorney General, which struck me as pointing to a go-as-you-please prerogative — a prerogative which you may use or not, just as you like, which you may give up one day and take up the next. That is the doctrine of the Attorney General, who did not contest the right of the Crown to cede territory without the consent of Parliament, when the nature of the negotiations or the interests involved rendered it desirable to proceed in that way. He said—

"The Crown had the right to cede territory without the consent of Parliament, but the fact that the prerogative of the Crown may sometimes be exercised that way did preclude the Crown from the possibility of adopting the other way when it appeared expedient to do so."

That is the hon. and learned Gentleman's doctrine: you may act either one way or the other, as you deem it expedient. Well, this doctrine was so new to me that I shook my head, and the hon. and learned Gentleman rebuked me for shaking my head; but I venture to think that when the Crown invokes a partner in its acts in this way it cannot always very easily get that partner out of the concern. Now, I should like to put to the Attorney General the case suggested by my hon. Friend the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere.) I hope the junior Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) will forgive me for preferring the constitutional doctrine of the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere.) Suppose, to take the case put by the senior Member for Northampton, the House were asked by Bill to assent to the creation of new Peers, would the prerogative be left where it was before? Suppose the Crown, by means of a Bill, asked the assent of Parliament to a dissolution, would the prerogative remain exactly where it was before? I should say, certainly not. I am told I stated too broadly that the prerogative would be gone at once if Parliament were ever associated with its exercise. I hope not. So anxious am I that it should not go, that I will not assert that in a broad way. But I say that if a practice of this kind were acquiesced in and continued the prerogative would be impaired, and ultimately destroyed. That is the history of all the limitations of prerogative in this country. The Attorney General challenged me to give examples where the prerogative has been destroyed by associating Parliament with the exercise of that prerogative. It would take an hour to give all the examples. Hundreds of things are now done by Parliament which in old days were done by the prerogative. Orders in Council, proclamations, monopolies, patents, standards of weights and measures, coin—all these things were pure prerogative rights in former times, and now are all controlled by Parliament. I am stating no new doctrine when I say that if the action of Parliament upon a prerogative right be invited and acquiesced in, in time that prerogative right will be altered and impaired. That is the seriousness of the proceeding of the Government in the present case. If Treaties of Cession are to be dealt with by Parliament it is impossible to say that we can revert to the prerogative unchanged as it was before. The Chief Secretary (Mr. A. J. Balfour) taunted me with a new-born zeal for the prerogative. I do not know why he attributed to me such ignorance of our constitutional history. What Liberal does not know that the great reforms that have taken place in this country since Parliament was reformed have been effected by the prerogative? The old feeling about prerogative depended upon the existence of a corrupt Parliament, which was controlled by the King. The great struggle with the House of Lords in 1832 ended and the people prevailed by the courage with which Lord Grey and Lord Brougham used the prerogative of the Crown. It was the prerogative of dissolution which struck the first blow, and what struck the last blow and overcame the House of Lords was the insistence of Lord Grey and Lord Brougham that they should have unlimited power to create new Peers. Every man who understands how this contest has been fought before, and may have to be fought again, knows the value of the prerogative. Are we going to deprive ourselves of those weapons which were used with so much effect, and place any prerogative of the Crown at the mercy of the House of Lords? It is surprising to some people that those on this side of the House should be the defenders of the Constitution. Why should we not be? Who made the Constitution?—the Liberals or the Tories? Who limited the Monarchy? Who restrained the power of the Church? Who has restrained the power of the House of Lords? Who has aggrandised the powers of the House of Commons, and made its Members the representatives of the people instead of the nominees of the owners of rotten boroughs and the aristocracy? Was it the Tory Party? I should like to know why we should not defend the Constitution. When you taunt us with defending the Constitution we say you are attacking the Constitution by the precedent you are establishing to-night. It is because we see the mischiefs and the dangers of this proceeding that we have protested against it, and I should be very happy if I could accept the doctrine, not of the Secretary for Ireland, but of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Attorney General, that the prerogative given away to-day may be resumed to-morrow.

*(10.40.) SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I am sorry to prolong this Debate, the inutility of which has been amply demonstrated. I think there were a good many persons in the country this morning who must have asked why my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) made his speech of last night; but still more persons to-morrow will inquire why the second edition of that speech has been delivered. Recollecting, as I do, the views which my right hon. Friend has before expressed, I cannot solve that question except by reference to a law of physical science. Electricians tell us that if you have a very high tension of electricity it ceases to be a useful agent and expends itself in wasteful and dangerous sparks. My right hon. Friend has been for some time in such a high state of opposition tension towards the Government, that he is constantly emitting, if he will allow me to say so, wasteful and dangerous sparks. This is a very interesting occasion. Of course, we all pay deference to the observations of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian in this House, but it is quite clear that he only represented a secondary current, induced by the primary current of the Member for Derby. My right hon. Friend the Member for Derby has come forward in an entirely new capacity. He is a defender of the prerogative. Very eloquent on the subject he was in his peroration. He would not have it destroyed, or even impaired. But I recollect another night, and another scene. My right hon. Friend was then in a powerful state of Liberalism. His place was below the Gangway in those days, and, standing erect in the purity of his Liberalism, he said, "Mr. Speaker, we below the Gangway do not like prerogatives." My right hon. Friend is bold enough to say that those who made the Constitution of this country did so behind the shield of prerogative. To my mind, the reverse is the fact. Our Constitution, as it now exists, was made by the men who fought against, not for, prerogative. Well, Sir, we Liberal Unionists are sometimes charged with having mitigated our Liberalism in order to support the Government; but here is a change of Liberalism in order to attack it. My right hon. Friend says the Government have abandoned prerogative, for once having submitted to Parliament a subject which can be dealt with by prerogative you can never again deal with it by prerogative.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I said the continued practice of submitting it to Parliament would in time destroy the prerogative.

SIR H. JAMES: I beg my right hon. Friend's pardon. I was speaking of what he stated last night, not of the revised edition. My right hon. Friend distinctly stated last night, "If once you submit a subject that can be dealt with by prerogative to Parliament to exercise its discretion upon it, the prerogative action is lost and cannot be exercised again." I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby can support his position by authorities? Let me remind him that the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, in 1871, introduced into this House a Bill for the abolition of purchase in the Army—a matter that could have been dealt with directly by the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown. That Bill was rejected by Parliament, but within a few hours of the rejection the prerogative of the Crown was exercised, and purchase in the Army was abolished. It is rather strange that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby under these circumstances should adopt the high tone he does when he suggests that, because the Government have submitted this question of the cession of Heligoland to Germany for the approval of Parliament in the form of a Bill, henceforth there is an end of the prerogative of the Crown to conclude Treaties with Foreign Powers. I am rather diffident after what he has said to enter into this question, which is not a very practical question, at any great length, because the right hon. Gentleman, referring to the old saying of Mr. Burke as to a comparison between a rabbit and an elephant, said it was unbecoming in a lawyer to deal with this subject. I have listened carefully to the right hon. Gentleman, and I should like to know what position he wishes to occupy—the position of the rabbit or the elephant. Perhaps he is something between the two. But a rabbit may be so inflated as to cause people, or to cause the rabbit at least to think that he is an elephant. I confess I think the right hon. Gentleman has to-night spoken rather as a lawyer, which he was and is—than as a constitutional statesman. The right hon. Gentleman has said that this measure involves a great constitutional question, but in that case I should like to know what effect the right hon. Gentleman's observations, made 19 years ago, will have upon the hon. Members below the Gangway to whom he to-night addresses himself. Will those hon. Members divide in favour of the exercise of the prerogative by what the right hon. Gentleman characterises as being the most incompetent Ministry that has ever conducted the business of the country, or will they divide in favour of that prerogative being exercised with the approval of Parliament? I must confess I welcome the step that has been taken. My right hon. Friend told us in his speech yesterday that the power of the Crown was diminishing, that the prerogative was not so powerful as before, and that the power of Parliament, which to him is the power of the House of Commons, is increasing. This is another offering to the increased power of the House of Commons. Will any of the hon. Members below the Gangway object to the action of the Government in the exercise of its discretion submitting a question of this kind to the decision of Parliament in a case where the Crown chooses to do so? My proposition is that the prerogative of the Crown is in no way diminished or weakened by the fact that the Crown has chosen to ask the approval of Parliament to the terms of this Treaty. This is not an attack on the Crown but a concession by it. The Attorney General was quite right when he stated that the prerogative of the Crown to make such Treaties remains undiminished although Her Majesty's Ministers have brought in this measure. I altogether repudiate the narrow view which the right hon. Member for Derby has taken, that the introduction of this measure abrogates the prerogative of the Crown to make Treaties without the assent of Parliament. The position that the right hon. Gentleman has taken up is that, notwithstanding the fact that the power of the prerogative is diminishing, while the power of the House of Commons is increasing, he desires that all questions relating to Treaties shall be decided by the Crown independently of the opinion of Parliament. For my own part, I heralded this concession to the power of Parliament as against the arbitrary action of Ministers as an acknowledgment that we are advancing towards a fuller exercise of Democratic power. I believe the present system is an insufficient system. When you ask Parliament to express its approbation or disapprobation of a Treaty what does the request amount to? The Treaty has, then, been made and carried into effect. You can do no more than pass censure on the Government, which may, in consequence, be thrown out of office. There is many a Treaty which a man will condemn but in regard to which he will say, "I must leave my opinion unexpressed, because, if I express it, the Government will go out of office." That is not a true expression upon a Treaty. The purest way of obtaining the opinion of Parliament by those who value it is to ask Parliament for an expression of opinion directly upon the Treaty itself. How is that to be done unless the Treaty is submitted to Parliament? If the circumstances attaching to the Treaty are such that the Government, acting on the advice of its Ministers, say, "We will consult our Parliament and our people before we allow the Treaty to come into positive effect," where is there any impairing of the proper position of the Crown? In showing greater confidence in the country where is the injury to the State? My right hon. Friend has not pointed out any substantial injury. Let me look to the future. Any cessions of territory we may hereafter make must be of territory in India, the colonies, or of a few valuable possessions, like Gibraltar and Malta, in Europe. India presents many peculiar considerations, and of it I will say nothing. Are we to be told by one professing Liberal principles that before any cession of territory is to be made the sanction of Parliament should not be given? Ought any of our colonial possessions, to which we have given Legislative powers, to be ceded without the sanction of Parliament? And I ask if any of our few possessions in Europe, if Gibraltar and Malta had to be given up, is there any man, who values the proper condition of political life in this country, who would allow his hatred of a Ministry to influence him so much as to cause him to object to the fact that before those valued possessions are yielded up the policy of the Ministry in so doing should be discussed by Parliament? Avowedly, when we have legislated for our territories, they should not be ceded without the assent of Parliament, for if they were, the Crown might to repeal the legislative Acts of Parliament. I regret that I have occupied the attention of the House, even for a short period, but I was anxious that some old comrade of my right hon. Friend (Sir W. Harcourt) in the happier days of his truer Liberalism should remind him of the time when his actions and opinions were not distorted, as I fear they now are, by the overpowering desire to defeat a Party and destroy a Government.

(11.0.) SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): The Division that is shortly to take place looks as if it were going to be a go-as-you-please Division, and before voting I should like to say a few words on the Bill before us. I think we have got into a rather extraordinary position. The position of Parties seems to a casual observer to be somewhat reversed. We have our Tory Friends opposite apparently giving up the prerogative which they are generally supposed to support. We have some of our Radical friends going to vote for the Government. What is more remarkable, we have a difference of opinion between the two Members for Northampton, and, most remarkable thing of all, we have a declaration from the Members on the Front Opposition Bench that they are not going to vote at all. I daresay that is a patriotic, and I have no doubt it is a prudent, course. We have heard a great deal about the object of the Agreement—about opening out Africa. The Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs said the object of the Agreement was to make the Sultan of Zanzibar more comfortable. We have been told a great deal about "spheres of influence." We have been told that it is for the good of the human race. Then we have had Christianity and civilisation brought in. I got a circular the other day from the Duke of Fife, asking me to take shares in a steamer for the African Lakes, which he said was going to promote Christianity. I do not believe in Dukes promoting Christianity among the Hottentots by steam. When Englishmen talk about Christianity and civilisation in those parts of the world they mean rum and gunpowder. We are told from the opposite side of the House that this is a great and statesmanlike policy. My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce) said the Agreement was to the effect that within certain limits Great Britain and Germany would not interfere with one another. But they agree that they will interfere with the natives to whom the country belongs, and with whom they ought to have nothing to do. It is a Treaty to divide the spoil. Of course, the principal thing mentioned in the Bill is the giving up of Heligoland. I take a great interest in Heligoland, because I have been told it is the cradle of my race. The Under-Secretary of State told us that some man had been there and talked with a hundred people, and that he only found one who did not wish to be united with Germany. I should like to know who it was that got the information. I admit that there is some good in this Treaty—in some parts of it. It frees the Heligolanders and arranges for the preservation of their native customs. I do not altogether dislike this giving up of Heligoland. It is a good precedent. The hon. Member for Whitty, in his able speech last night, alluded to Heligoland as the Northern Gibraltar. Well, when the Tories give up the Northern Gibraltar I hope to goodness when the Liberals come in they will give up the Southern Gibraltar. On these grounds I have come to the conclusion that, on the whole, this Treaty will not do any more harm than most Treaties do. I was very strongly tempted to vote for it; in fact, it was a long time before I could make up my mind. I do not quite agree with my hon. Friends who so ably discussed the constitutional question. I daresay they are right, as they understand the matter so thoroughly, which I do not pretend to do. Ever since I have been in this House I have done all I can to procure for it a more complete control over all these Treaties. I agree very much with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary last night, or with a great portion of his speech. He said that to take these matters into consideration before the evil was done was better than inflicting a punishment after the event upon those responsible, which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby seems to think would be sufficient. The Chief Secretary said, "Prevention is better than cure." He also said he wished to give the greatest authority to Parliament in this matter. These are very Radical doctrines, in my view. I agree with them, as I think that, though there may be objections to what is going on, it is a great thing to have it admitted by the Tory Party that these things ought to be under the full and complete control of Parliament. As the junior Member for Northampton said in his speech, "You cannot go behind it when you have done it." It was the same with the Compensation Bill. If you had bought out the publicans you could never have got behind it, and if you bring one Treaty before Parliament you can never make another without bringing it fully and completely before Parliament. That is my opinion, and, because I believe in representative Government, I believe the Representatives of the people ought to have full and complete control over all these matters. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby pointed out a danger when he said, "You should not give a veto on foreign policy to the House of Lords." I quite agree with that. I should like to give them a veto on nothing, but we cannot help ourselves. The House of Lords is a danger to all our proceedings. They never do any good anywhere. If we ever do a good thing, they upset it—that is their business, and so long as the people of this country are willing to keep a House of Lords to overthrow whatever we do, we must make the best of it. Parliament is Parliament. I thank the Government very cordially for having taken this Radical step of introducing a Bill on real Radical lines, instead of keeping the thing out of the power of the House of Commons. But to come to the Bill itself, which has not been very much discussed, it is a measure intended to meddle and muddle and interfere with places and people whom we had much better let alone, and, therefore, on that ground, thinking the Bill is calculated to do more harm than good, I shall vote with my hon. Friend.

Sir W. Lawson

*(11.12.) Mr. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) (who spoke amid loud cries of "Divide!"): I intend to record my vote against this proposal, because I think it is an odious and a dangerous precedent to hand over British subjects and an English colony to a foreign country without formally and in a constitutional manner ascertaining the wishes of the inhabitants. As a Radical, I have no sympathy with the Jingoism which has talked of nothing during the last two nights' discussion but the conquest and appropriation of different spheres in Africa. That, and the grave constitutional question raised by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, have taken up the whole of the Debate, and practically nothing has been said on the real point raised by this Bill. I wish here to enter my protest against handing over these people to a foreign Power without consulting their wishes.

(11.15.) Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I should not have risen but for two reasons; one is the unseemly howls which have proceeded from the other side of the House—

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is entitled to a hearing, which I hope he will receive, but he is out of order in making use of such an expression.

Mr. CONYBEARE: I bow to your ruling, Sir, and will not use such an expression again, and I hope I may be allowed to proceed. I was going to say another reason why I intervene in the discussion at this point is because certain words fell from the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth to which, as a Radical, I must take exception. The hon. Baronet has fallen into the bad habit of congratulating and complimenting the Party opposite, a habit which I think ought to be repudiated on this side, particularly when the hon. Baronet says that a precedent is being set for the Radical Party. Rightly considered, it is a precedent of a most vicious character, against which Radicals should protest, because if you consider the true aspect of the question, from a constitutional point of view, it is perfectly clear that although the Tory Party are pretending to do something to transfer some of the Treaty-making power from the Crown to this House, in effect they are doing nothing of the kind. They are diminishing by one-half the power this House has hitherto possessed by allowing the other House to interfere in the control this House possesses over the Ministry in the exercise of the Treaty-making authority that lies with the Crown. For this reason, and on this constitutional ground, I strongly resent the suggestion that Radicals should support the Government proposal as a good precedent. My hon. Friend (Sir W. Lawson) has commented with approval upon what the Chief Secretary said last night, that "Prevention is better than cure," but it has not been shown how this copy-book aphorism bears on this case. The Government come down and throw this Bill at our heads, but the Treaty is signed already, and much mischief is done, even though we refuse to ratify it by rejecting the Bill. We should do something on the Radical lines if we could compel a Conservative Government, before the signing of a Treaty, to come to the House of Commons and say, It is for you to decide whether this should become a Treaty or not. It was for that reason that within a few months of my entering the House I voted against my own Government for a Resolution tending in the direction I have indicated, and I am not going back upon that vote now by my vote to-night, which I shall give heartily, and without the least compunction, against the Government. I would make it necessary for the Government to come to this House, and not to go to a hereditary House, who represent nobody but themselves, before signing a Treaty, and get the consent of this House. Such a proposal as that would proceed on Radical lines, but this Bill forms no precedent of the kind. If I may leave the constitutional question I will say a word or two upon the Agreement as it stands. I have followed the Debate throughout, but I have not heard the important question argued that we ought to have insisted at all hazards on the retention of the right of way—not an imaginary easement, but a solid right of way—provided in the Agreement between Lake Tanganyika and the Victoria Nyanza. I refer to that because, so far as I am able to judge, nobody, with all the talk of the necessity and duty of ourselves and Germany to carry civilisation through Africa, has pointed out that the most effective method of civilisation will be by opening railway communication. Those who look beyond the immediate present, and take a fair view of the future, know that one of these days a trunk line of railway must be constructed north and south, and by the limitations involved in the acceptance of the Hinterland doctrine laid down by the German Government, and allowing them to push their territory from the coast to the boundary of the Congo territory, our Government have cut off this country from all right to lay down such a means of communication to connect our territory on the Zambesi with that north of the German sphere of influence. This is a fatal blot in the Agreement, however beneficial it might be in other respects. There are some hon. Members on this side who have said we ought to have thrown Heligoland to Germany as a gift, without compensation or quid pro quo, but I disapprove of the cession, not as the giving up of a mere piece of land, but as disposing of the population without their consent, or any attempt to ascertain their wishes, for political purposes, as if they were mere pawns on a chess-board, or mere appurtenances of the island. I do not think it is incumbent upon us on any high moral doctrine to say to Germany you shall have it without anything in return. It is of value to us if it has a value to Germany, and we are justified in making the best arrangement we can. While I admit this, I must protest against the Jingo doctrine of unlimited annexation. I do not desire that we should go about the world snapping up any "unconsidered trifles" of land, and warning the rest of mankind from poaching on our manor. But I do say this, that when by colonising actively we have secured anything like power and influence over territory, where we have shown ourselves able to introduce order and good government, and to confer benefits on the native population—I say when we have done that, in spite of all the evils of the three R's my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) described, then we have a right to take such steps as will protect our interests. But my contention is that we have yielded to Germany in every quarter of Africa, and the concessions in return are of little worth. It is not necessary for me to travel over the whole ground covered by the Agreement. I could point to Despatch after Despatch in which, although it may be true that we have not in so many words guaranteed the independence of Zanzibar, we have entered into solemn engagement to respect the independence of the Sultan of Zanzibar, and I want to know how we can face the world and claim respect for Treaties when we go behind the back of one contracting Power, France, and make an arrangement with Germany, deliberately violating that independence of Zanzibar which, with two other Powers, we entered into engagements to respect and protect. What is the meaning of respecting the independence if we are going to take over the Protectorate, that is to destroy the sovereignty of the Sultan on the island, as a quid pro quo for concessions given to Germany? One of two positions it is impossible to deny; either we are getting nothing at all, so far as Zanzibar is concerned, for Heligoland and all the rest of the sacrifices made to Germany, or else we are getting actual sovereignty over Zanzibar, going back upon our word, tearing up a Treaty, and flinging an insult in the face of France, a party to that Treaty, and with whom we must, I suppose, arrange to give up some little corner of the Empire as a solatium. All this is done by the Party who, a few years ago, were rampaging up and down the country declaring against separation and disruption of the Empire, because we proposed to give the power of dealing with their own affairs to one section of our fellow-subjects. But the action of hon. Gentlemen on those Benches does not surprise me; it is only one more of their election pledges broken, for which their constituents will, ere long, call them to account.

(11.30.) Mr. SYDNEY GEDGE rose in his place, and claimed to move "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

(11.30.) Sir J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I ask the House to allow me a few words. Though a seaman by profession, I do not pretend to be a sea lawyer, and, passing by the constitutional question, I look at this from a plain business-like point of view. Here we have given up to Germany, Damaraland and Namaqualand, while we retain Walfisch Bay. I do not pretend to be envious of the possession of Damaraland and Namaqualand; no doubt, the territory has considerable mineral wealth; although there is a great lack of water. But I do protest against Walfisch Bay being held without any determination of boundary; it is extremely likely to lead to complications with the German Empire. This is a question of great importance to Cape colonists, to the Orange Free State, and the Transvaal Republic. Both of those great countries will, no doubt, in a short space of time find it to their great advantage to join the English colonies of the Cape of Good Hope and Natal in a confederation, such as that of the Australian colonies, or in some way to come under the British flag. These colonies are now rapidly developing their trade. I call them colonies, for although the Orange Free State and the Transvaal have separate flags, we have suzerainty over these States. They are most anxious to develop trade to the North-West. I have had personal practical experience, which I think no other Member of the House has had, as a resident in the country just south of Zanzibar, and I know that to the North-West of the Zambesi and the Victoria Falls there is a populated country, which is of the utmost importance to Cape Colony and the Orange Free State as a market for their produce and European imports. I would not propose taking possession of that, but it is important that the route should be kept open, and the effect of the extension of the German boundary to Long. 21° E., and to a point north as far as Victoria Falls is that, to use a familiar expression, the South African colonies have "got their head into Chancery," with the German arm round their neck. We are left with but a narrow neck of territory of 300 miles between Victoria Falls and Zumbo. Now, I contend Germany should not be allowed to make good this claim to put an arm round Cape Colony. Germany has, I believe, only some 200 German subjects in Damaraland and Namaqualand, and it is quite absurd for them to put forward the declaration that they wish to open trade to the North-West of the Zambesi. Then a part of the Treaty applies to the route between Nyassa and Tanganyika. There we have the Stevenson Road, and the Germans come within three or five miles of that road, with the consequence that there will be everlasting disputes, and that trade will be choked. It has been urged, and I do hope the Government will still urge, that the German Government should allow their boundary to be pushed to latitude 8°, including within British territory the highlands to the North-East of Lake Nyassa, a health plateau of enormous value as a sanatorium to our miners and traders. This is really one of the most important points in this Treaty, this highland at the North End of Nyassa, and we ought to secure a belt of British territory to the end of the Stevenson Road of 60 or 100 miles. We are to have the "Protectorate" of Zanzibar, but why modify terms? What is really meant is, we are to take possession. But we cannot do that without coming to terms with France, and what terms will France demand? She will demand possession, call it a Protectorate if you like, of the Island of Madagascar. Consider the effect of this. In case of war the Suez Canal would be blocked in a fortnight, and all our communication with our Indian possessions would have to be round the Cape. From Madagascar there would be ready means to harass, if not to stop, our communication with India. These are matters that should be taken into consideration in a broad view of the situation and its probabilities. We have heard a great deal of the benefit of our rule to native races, but this has been by no means an unmixed blessing. Tribes have disappeared in consequence of European vices and diseases introduced among them. What may we reasonably expect from the German rule? One of the first things they did when they got possession of the Zanzibar coast was to follow the bad old British custom of bombarding the natives. I had hoped this custom had been given up, but the Germans followed our bad example of the last century. Again, I would press on Her Majesty's Government to re-consider the boundary between British and German territory, and not to allow the German boundary to be pushed up to Victoria Falls, where they have no earthly claim, and within five miles of the Stevenson Road. We know from experience traders frequently make a détour of 200 or 300 miles through a sandy desert rather than go through the Transvaal Republic, where they would be harassed by the authorities and subjected to duties, and I fear that equally deterrent difficulties will present themselves when the Germans have established themselves permanently in the North-West of Cape Colony. I do hope that Her Majesty's Government will endeavour to modify this part of the Agreement.

(11.40.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I only wish to indicate the magnificent nature of the gift Her Majesty's Government are making to the German Emperor. Heligoland is admirably adapted for fortification, and could be made most formidable in time of war. When German engineers and Krupp have had it in hand for two or three years it would be a very difficult thing, I think, for the whole British fleet to take possession of it after a three years' siege, even if not a single German ship were to sail out from ports in the rear. It is just the right size for fortification; the cliffs are admirably adapted for it, and the garrison need not be large. It is not adapted for a good Naval port, but the Germans do not want it for that, but as a fortress, under protection of the guns of which German vessels can run when attacked by superior force. Vessels can, I believe, run close in, for there is a depth of 26 feet at low spring tides. Its position is just what is required by Germany, and if the German Emperor had the power of moving the island I do not think he could find a better place. It is 25 miles from the mouths of the Weser and the Elbe, and as there are guns that will carry 15 or 16 miles, the Germans will have a full command of the passage between the island and the mainland, and it would be impossible for any large ship to intercept communication with the mainland in time of war. In future warlike operations all lines of blockade will have to be drawn outside Heligoland, and that means a line so long that it would be practically impossible to effectually blockade the Weser and the Elbe. Nothing is more likely to lead to complications with neutral Powers than an inefficient blockade of a belligerent port. If Heligoland is not in the hands of the German Emperor it is possible to blockade the Weser and Elbe, but if Heligoland is in the hands of Germany, it will be impossible, even for a great Naval Power, to keep up an efficient blockade. I do not blame you for giving this gift to the German Emperor, but why did you not at the outset say what you were giving? The Ministry and the Conservative Party, with one or two exceptions, have minimised the value of Heligoland because they do not wish the English people to think they are giving away too much. I acknowledge the island is far more valuable to Germany than to England, but still it would be valuable to England. I should like to know whether it is true, as reported in the newspapers, that Russia has addressed remonstrances to us against the cession. I can understand that Russia will not like Heligoland in the hands of the Germans, because it will be a sort of temptation to the German Government to one day annex Holland. In that case Germany would be a formidable rival of ours, both at sea and in respect to our Colonial Empire.

(11.50.) The House divided:—Ayes 209; Noes 61.—(Div. List, No. 201).

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

SUPPLY [18th July]—REPORT.

Order read, for further consideration of postponed Resolution:—

"That a sum, not exceeding £97,499, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the expenses of the General Prisons Board in Ireland, and of the Prisons under their control; and of the Registration of Habitual Criminals."

(12.0.) Mr. J. G. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): I beg to move a reduction in the amount of this Vote, and I do so in reference to grave matters in connection with prison administration in Ireland which I have to lay before the House. This is necessary from the failure of the Chief Secretary to give any reply to these grave specific charges which were made, not for the first time, when we were considering this Vote in Committee, and this must be my apology for again troubling the House on this the final stage of the Vote. The prison to which I refer is Derry Gaol, and the officials against whom charges are made are Dr. Plunket; Dr. O'Farrell, the Inspector of Prisons; and Sir William Miller, who is still medical officer to the prison in which those prisoners to whom I shall presently refer lost their lives, which loss of life I hold the prison administration responsible for. I do not desire to do the Chief Secretary an injustice, and, therefore, I will mention that on the last occasion the right hon. Gentleman said the accusations made were not those that were brought forward on a previous occasion last year; that Derry Gaol was undoubtedly old, and many cells therein were not equal in size to those found in modern prisons, and that all that was required was to diminish the number of prisoners sent to Derry Gaol, so that there should be no necessity to use the smaller cells. I now propose to make my accusations exactly in the same form as they were made last year, so that the Chief Secretary may have no complaint to make on that score, and I think I can show that something more is needed than a reduction in the number of prisoners to avoid the introduction into the prison of that plague against which we warned the right hon. Gentleman 12 months ago, and which, if it once enters, is as likely to kill a small number as a large number of prisoners confined therein. To make myself clear, I shall be obliged to touch upon what the right hon. Gentleman calls ancient history, and to which he seems to have much aversion since public opinion compelled him to recede from the position he formerly took up and to have recourse to the more modern methods of prison treatment. It will be within the recollection of the House that lamentable occurrences followed the earlier methods, ending in the death of John Mandeville and others, and permanent injury to the health of many of my hon. Friends. The right hon. Gentleman, by declarations in and out of the House, threw the whole onus of the care of prisoners on the Prisons Board, against whom as a body I have not a word to say. But, unfortunately, these lamentable occurrences did not end with the declarations of the right hon. Gentleman. A disease, to which I shall presently refer, broke out in Derry Gaol, attacking four prisoners, three men and one woman, and it killed the woman and two of the men. Among the deceased was the youth M'Gee, who had been allowed to remain in prison during the whole time of his illness, and who was sent to his desolate home on the morning following a night passed in delirium. All these prisoners were allowed to be done to death in prison month after month under the ignorant eyes of the medical officer, Sir William Miller, whom I charge with incompetence, but whom the Chief Secretary describes as an able public servant. In consequence of these deaths, we called for an examination into the condition of the prison. This was made by Dr. O'Farrell, who made a Report, and to one or two paragraphs of this Report I shall have to refer. He says—

"A careful examination of the present sanitary arrangements of the prison has satisfied me that there is nothing in the condition of these that would be in any way injurious to health. The buildings are in good condition, and are kept scrupulously clean and orderly; the cells are well ventilated, and the closets of modern type."

In another portion of the Report the Inspector supports me in my charge of incompetency against Sir William Miller, because he says—

"Looking back on the whole circumstances of the case, it is a pity that the disease of which the boy M'Gee died was not observed before."

That is to say, that the prisoner died of a disease contracted in prison; that he had it all the time he was in prison, and the doctor in charge knew nothing about the disease. I beg the House to remember what Dr. O'Farrell says about the sanitary condition of the prison. Now I come to brief references from a more recent Report made by Major Beamish, an English Prisons Inspector. He says—

"At the south-west angle of the male prison there is a hole in the ground where ashes and other refuse accumulate for six months before being cleared."

and, Major Beamish naïvely remarks,

"It is not a good sanitary arrangement to allow refuse to thus accumulate for such a length of time."

Major Beamish says the cells are half the size of those in English prisons; that there are 75 inches allowed for the inlet and outlet of fresh air, and no means whatever for the exit of foul air. English prison cells have 108 square inches for inlet and outlet, besides ventilating traps in the wards and air shafts in connection with the ventilators for the exhaustion of foul air. There is no reception room in the prison, but there is a bath room used as a reception room, where prisoners are huddled together higgledy-piggledy, and where, Major Beamish remarks, the air is very foul, and here the prisoners' clothes and changes of clothes for the prisoners are kept. But this is a trifling matter compared with the Report as to the sanitary condition of the gaol. Here we are told there is no trap at the base of the soil pipe and no ventilation for air to enter the drain. It is a matter of opinion among sanitary scientists whether air can possibly escape through Buchan's trap; but here there is no trap whatever; the air consequently entered the prison through the closets, and no doubt was an important factor in producing the complaint for which these Derry prisoners died. At the time the Report was first brought under our notice I charged Sir William Miller, the medical officer, with incompetency, and, as to Dr. Plunket, I said he was entirely ignorant of sanitary science. It was reported that these patients died of galloping consumption. I say that they died of diseases perfectly well known to medical men—i.e., typhoid-pneumonia, and suppurated typhoid-pneumonia. I want security for the future. I say that this prison must be levelled to the ground before it can be made fit for the reception of prisoners, and you have no right—legal or moral—to confine any class of prisoners, and much less prisoners for a crime created by yourselves, in a prison which your own Inspector has admitted should be pulled down. We hold the Chief Secretary, who is the head of the Irish Government, responsible for these lives; we say that they were sacrificed to the avarice of his unworthy confederates, and that they would never have acquired the gaol plague had he not driven them from desolate homes in order to collect the rents of his friends. There is no other people on the face of the earth whose kith and kin would not exact vengeance from you in the form of the lynch law advocated by one of your Judges. Derry Prison is a pest hole and fever den, and I trust the right hon. Gentleman will give us an assurance that in the future he will not confine prisoners there. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name—a reduction of the Vote by £2,000.

Amendment proposed, to leave out "£97,499," in order to insert "£95,499."
—(Mr. Fitzgerald.)

Question proposed, "That '£97,499' stand part of the Resolution."

(12.24.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I regret that my enforced absence on public duties elsewhere last week prevented me from taking part in the discussion on this Vote, because it is more convenient to bring forward facts and complaints at a time when it is possible to speak more than once, and to expose the fallacies in which the Chief Secretary indulges. I think I was entitled to address the House even at some length on my own treatment in Ireland by the Resident Magistrates at Falcarragh, but I refrained from doing that last night because I preferred to describe my treatment in Derry Gaol. I have listened with great interest to the clear and precise statement by my hon. Friend who moved the reduction of this Vote. I shall not attempt to follow him in dealing with the sanitary deficiencies of Derry Gaol from a scientific point of view. But I am, like my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Tipperary—a co-criminal with myself—able to speak on the general character of the prison arrangements, and I think I am in a position to throw some light on matters mentioned in Major Beamish's Report and the observations thereon of the General Prisons Board. While I was incarcerated in this gaol I had the satisfaction of seeing this Inspector going his rounds. Now, I will first deal with his statement as to the cells for first-class misdemeanants. He says there are two large cells in detached blocks for the use of first-class misdemeanants; each containing 675 feet cubic space. In the observations of the General Prisons Board I find that Colonel Burke states that, in addition to the ordinary cells, there are now provided two other first-class cells, one containing 1,000 cubic feet space, and the other 1,600 cubic feet, both boarded and well ventilated and artificially lighted. My complaint is that these statements are absolutely misleading, and I ask the leave of the House to explain exactly what those cells are and what they were intended for before Father McFadden and myself came to occupy them. The cell in which I was incarcerated for 13 weeks and 8 hours contained 1,600 cubic feet, but it will better explain if I state that it is a tunnel 15 feet long and 9 feet high. So far from it having been intended for first-class misdemeanants, I am positively assured by the Governor of the gaol and by the Visiting Magistrates, who on two occasions punished me for my rebellious conduct, that there was no provision for first-class misdemeanants. In fact, my cell and a lesser one near had been used as store rooms. The lower part of the other cell was cut off for the purpose of being used as a water closet. For the first 24 hours of my confinement there was no ventilation beyond the air let in at the top of the window through an aperture of not more than five or six inches. Almost all the windows of the prison are of roughened glass to prevent the prisoners looking out. That is a refinement of cruelty which is a shame and a scandal. When Dr. O'Farrell came his round, I told him I should certainly prefer a complaint as to why the window of my cell could not be properly opened; and I told him that if it was not opened I would smash the whole thing to smithereens. My remonstrance had the desired effect; and I had the satisfaction of looking from my prison window to the green fields, which could be seen beyond the intervening roofs. But Father Stephen, Kelly, and others, who were imprisoned for exactly the same crime as that for which I was confined, had the plank bed and mean prison fare, and they were unable to see from their windows. It was an unnecessary refinement of cruelty, because, with the warders constantly patrolling, there was no danger of escape had the windows been opened. It is said in the Report that there is plenty of ventilation in the corridors of Derry Gaol; but it should not be forgotten that the prisoners are shut up in their cells for the whole 24 hours, excepting two allowed for exercise. We are told that the gaol must be entirely levelled and rebuilt, but we have no assurance from the Chief Secretary that that radical reform will be instituted. There are eight or nine different yards of different sizes in which the prisoners are exercised, and I pointed out to the Magistrates that it was possible to place a shelter in more than one of those yards; but the only answer I got was that the prisoners had got on as well without it so far; that it would be an expensive job, and that they did not know that anything of the kind existed in any English prison. The result is that on wet days the prisoners either have to remain in their cells during the whole 24 hours, which happened more than once while I was there, or they had to walk round the yards in the pouring rain, and afterwards to go and sit in their damp cells in their dripping clothes. This being so, there can be no wonder that typhoid fever, consumption, pneumonia, and other fatal diseases have carried off some of the prisoners during the right hon. Gentleman's régime. Such a state of things is a scandal even to the civilised rule of the present Chief Secretary for Ireland, and I say we have a right to insist that in the future this House shall have some assurance not only that these evils shall be remedied, but that there shall be adequate shelters for the prisoners on wet days, and that as far as may be no more lives shall be sacrificed to the ruthless vengeance of the present Government of Ireland. There is another point on which I addressed a remonstrance to the Visiting Justices, and that was a point on which I succeeded in carrying my suggestion. It will be remembered that questions were asked in this House last year, as to the effect of the constant glare of the whitewashed walls on the eyesight of the prisoners; but I had no fear that in the comparatively short time of three months or so I should myself naturally suffer from this cause; but having to spend most of my time in reading in my cell, my eyes did suffer great inconvenience. I will give some proof of the effect of the glare of the whitewashed walls on the eyesight. I was exercising at half-past 9 o'clock one morning when the doctor came to see me. It was not Sir William Miller, but Sir William Miller's son. I may here say that although I do not think Sir William Miller is a competent authority on hygiene, I was always treated with the greatest kindness and consideration by that gentleman, and when he was absent by his son. Of course, I was a first-class misdemeanant, and perhaps Sir William Miller may have thought that he might allow more latitude in listening to my chaff about Home Rule, and so forth, than would be the case when he was talking to John Kelly. At any rate, I believe I may say without exaggeration that whatever may have been their motives these gentlemen did their best to make my lines in prison as comfortable as they reasonably could. But in speaking of my own personal treatment it must not be taken that I am excusing the treatment in the shape of harshness of other prisoners worse circumstanced than myself. Well, returning to Sir William Miller's son, we were standing close to a whitewashed wall, and the doctor turned away, saying, "How the glare of that whitewash does affect my eyes." Now if, when the glare of the sun was on that wall, the doctor found it too strong for his eyes during a few moments, surely we prisoners had a right to complain when we had to stand it day after day for months. The hon. Member for Clare, who was once incarcerated for nine months, found his eyesight naturally affected from the same cause. Well, before my time had expired the order had gone forth that the prisoners' cells should be blackwashed, that is to say, they were coloured with a sort of dusky tint, which afforded relief to the eyes, although it had the effect of somewhat darkening the cells. I now want to say a few words about the cells of the first-class misdemeanants. They are in the reception block, which is situate in that part of the buildings immediately at the back of the gaol office. There is one staircase in the block, and on the left-hand side of the staircase is the bath-room. What I want to put before the House is the fact that there is no proper distinction, in regard to this matter, between the prisoners of the worst and dirtiest class and the first-class misdemeanants, who are in other respects placed in a much more favourable position than the other prisoners. The new prisoners are brought into the waiting-room on the right-hand side, so that their descriptions may be taken down, and so forth; but at night that room was not in use, and the block in which I was imprisoned contained the casual ward, into which most of the drunken and noisy prisoners were introduced before examination, and locked up until they could be seen to in the morning. This is a matter on which, if I had been desirous of making a complaint, I should have been quite justified in so doing; because often, when I had retired to rest, these prisoners, many of whom were brought in for being drunk and disorderly or riotous, gave the warders a great deal of trouble, and there was so much noise on that staircase as to completely disturb everybody in that block. Naturally, a great many of these prisoners were of the lowest character, reeking with vermin of all descriptions. They were taken into a room called the bathing and dressing room, and in this same apartment—this very small apartment—was the weighing machine, in which all the prisoners were required to be weighed. Week after week, during the time that I was incarcerated, I was brought down to be weighed on this machine, so anxious was the Chief Secretary to show that I was improving in weight. I was brought into this disgusting hole perhaps a few moments after the dirtiest of the dirty had been in the scale, and I was compelled to stand there in my bare feet. After this had been going on for some weeks, as the House is aware, I was attacked by a loathsome and troublesome complaint, which I do not desire any further to refer to. It occasioned all these Reports on which we are basing this discussion to-night, and Dr. O'Farrell came down to discover, if he could, what was the origin of this particularly noxious complaint. I believe he tried his best to come to a conclusion, and all sorts of theories were suggested. It was said that even the unfortunate pigeons who used to feed in my cell were caught and examined to see if they could have communicated this pestilence to me. But after

I had seen one of these ordinary dirty prisoners stripped naked in this waiting room, I came to the conclusion that the fact of my being compelled to go into the scale barefooted after one of these fellows had been weighed was the cause of my misfortune, and therefore, when I came to this conclusion, I declared my refusal to go into the scale in that cell any more, whatever punishment they might choose to inflict upon me for such refusal. In this case, as, in fact, in every other, I got what I wanted. After a few days they took the scales out of this waiting room, and weighed me in the yard. To get to the store-room, where the private clothes of the prisoners were kept, it was necessary to pass through this filthy waiting and bathing place. Some of my things were kept in this store-room with those of the ordinary prisoners. I hold that it was a most improper thing to put the clothes of the first-class misdemeanants in such a place, where they had to run the gauntlet of being infected with all sorts of filth and vermin. To say that in this gaol there was any accommodation for first-class misdemeanants is the most ridiculous statement ever ventured upon, and if it is not a mistake in these Reports it is put in for the purpose of deceiving the House. The Chief Secretary may reply that there were so few first-class misdemeanants that they were not worthy of consideration; but, I say, why not place such first-class misdemeanants as you do get, however few in number, in a proper place? Mr. T. D. Sullivan, when Lord Mayor of Dublin, was incarcerated in Kilmainham Gaol as a first-class misdemeanant, and he was supplied with two rooms—a sitting-room as well as a bed-room. The rooms were properly ventilated, and he had an open fire-place in his sitting-room. That was accommodation with which one could not have found any complaint, and I never heard that the hon. Member had to run the gauntlet of a cell through which the dirtiest and most pestilential prisoners had to pass. Mr. W. T. Stead and Mr. Gent-Davis were also first-class misdemeanants. The former, who was no more criminal than I was, was placed in a more or less comfortable apartment in Holloway Gaol. There was a good deal of difference between the criminality of the offences of Mr. Stead and myself as compared with that of the offence of Mr. Gent-Davis. My only offence was giving a loaf of bread to a starving family, whereas that of Mr. Gent-Davis was one of having grossly defrauded parties to whom he was deeply indebted, and yet his accommodation, as hon. Members who remember what was said about it at the time will recollect, was palatial compared with either that of myself or the hon. Member for the College Green Division when we were first-class misdemeanants. We have a right to insist upon this point, because, if there is one argument, except the tu quoque argument, on which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary prides himself more than another, it is—"You have no right to complain, as first-class misdemeanants are treated in England in the same way as in Ireland." Anyone who knows the facts of the case knows that that is not so. Now, towards the end of my imprisonment I was anxious to consult a solicitor in regard to certain libels which had been published against me in certain newspapers. After some difficulty I succeeded in obtaining the assent of the Prisons Board to an interview with my solicitor, but when that interview took place a warder came and thrust himself into the little apartment in which I was to confer with my legal adviser. I refused to hold any conference with my solicitor under those conditions, and, by reference to the prison rules, I insisted on my right to have a private interview with my solicitor. I was not even then allowed to have a private interview in the proper sense of the term. I was compelled to take my seat on one side of a table, with my solicitor at the other; the blinds of the window were drawn up, and a warder was posted outside to spy out everything that took place, and, if possible, to listen to everything that was said. That is the way the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary treats his first-class misdemeanants. I do not wish unnecessarily to dwell upon the details of these particular inconveniences and annoyances to which I was subjected; but I may say, while it is in my mind, that the prison authorities did what they could in this mean and petty way, so characteristic of the present Tory administration, to heap what they thought was indignity and insult upon me. When I was leaving the gaol to return to England on the termination of my sentence I asked for that which I believe I had a perfect right to, namely, first-class railway fare, but this was denied me, a second-class railway ticket being thrust into my hand by a warder. This is a petty matter, and I merely mention it to show the miserably mean and vindictive methods by which it was sought to humiliate me, my treatment in this respect being different to that of my Friend, Mr. Kelly, under the late Mr. Forster. And now, to show the idiotic fashion in which the Prisons Board of Ireland conduct their affairs, I will refer to the question of correspondence. I was allowed to correspond within certain limits, and naturally, not feeling in the least any lively sentiment of gratitude or affection towards the Chief Secretary, I was not very nice in my choice of the terms in which I spoke of him in some of my letters. I hold in my hand a post-card which I wrote to a friend of mine a few days after my imprisonment. It contains the words—

"Healy is going to try for a Habeas Corpus. I wish it was Balfour's carcass we could have in Court."

That was a ridiculous little joke. It was my carcass that was going to be dealt with by the Court, and I thought the meanest intelligence would have seen that it was not intended as abuse. However, the post-card was not allowed to pass. It has never received the sign manual of the Governor of the gaol, and I suppose, like a great deal more of my correspondence, it was sent up to the Prisons Board, to be examined by that learned body. Even if one is a first-class misdemeanant, one is expected to conform to certain rules. I was expected to do so, but I did not. I can understand that there must be a supervision over the correspondence of prisoners going out of prison; therefore, I took good care, when I wished to send anything to the newspapers which I did not desire the Chief Secretary to see, not to send it in a manner which was under the supervision of the Governor of the gaol.

THE MARQUESS OF CARMARTHEN rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. CONYBEARE: This is the first time I have had an opportunity of dealing with this matter, and I think I should be allowed to conclude my observations without interruption. The point I was endeavouring to make when I was interrupted was this: I do not complain so much of my own correspondence being intercepted, but when the correspondence of gentlemen outside, over whom I could have no control, was stopped, and letter after letter was refused me simply because they contained some miserable little expression, such as the name "Bomba," applied to the Chief Secretary, I do think the matter was carried to a ridiculous extreme. One letter I hold in my hand, sent to me by a little child six years old, was sent all the way to Dublin, and placed before the Prisons Board, because there was at the end of it, in the child's scrawl, "Three cheers for the Plan of Campaign." Another important question that has not yet been settled is that of the dismissal of Father Doherty, the Catholic Chaplain, from Derry Gaol in September last. When the Chief Secretary is again in the shades of the Opposition, but not till then, I shall be very glad to explain to him how I got my letters out of prison, and to initiate him into what I may call the freemasonry of criminals. Although it has generally been supposed that Father Doherty was the medium by which I succeeded in communicating my letters to the Press and to friends outside, and he was dismissed for that reason, it was not technically the case, and I had at least half-a-dozen methods by which I was able at all times to communicate with the outer world. So elaborate were the arrangements I was able to make that letters of mine passed through the hands of the Governor, and he was no more aware of their contents than the Chief Secretary himself. A fortnight or three weeks after the dismissal of Father Doherty I succeeded, in one day, in passing 12 letters out of the prison, and they all appeared in due course in different newspapers. This, I think, will convince the right hon. Gentleman that he hardly treated Father Doherty with justice in dismissing him on suspicion—for there was no proof—of carrying my letters. I may say also there is not a warder at this moment in Derry Gaol who has any idea how I succeeded in passing my correspondence out of prison. I was particularly careful not to ask the gaolers for a single favour which could, by any possibility, bring them under the lash of the right hon. Gentleman's punishment. The only warder who, unfortunately, suffered anything in consequence of what I did, was a young fellow named Patrick Barry, who was fined 2s. 6d. by the Governor for replying to a few casual remarks I made about the weather, and so forth, whilst I was in the exercise ground, and he was waiting for another warder to bring him the key of a gate. Many unkind things have been said about my having sought the services of a Catholic Chaplain. When I was first taken into the prison and searched I was asked what religion I was. I replied, "That is not a question you have a right to ask, and which I shall, under no circumstances, reply to." I was then asked what service in the chapel I proposed to attend, and was informed that there was a Presbyterian service, a Disestablished Irish Church service, and a Roman Catholic service. I said, "I propose to attend the Roman Catholic service." I was perfectly justified in doing so. I never belonged to the Disestablished Church of Ireland, and if I had belonged to it I should have objected to the ministrations of a man who was, under the immediate jurisdiction of the Bishop of Derry, who at the time was the holder of 40 shares in the Smith-Barry Eviction Syndicate—a criminal conspiracy of a far worse character than any from which anyone has suffered in Ireland. Nor if I had been a Presbyterian would I have accepted the services of a minister who was the father of the blatant orator who was paid by the right hon. Gentleman opposite to abuse me and hunt me down before the County Court Judge of Derry. I cannot speak in too high praise of the devotion of the Catholic clergymen to every class of prisoners in Derry Gaol, and of the incessant kindness to the poor people committed to their care. When several of my letters written in prison had been published, the authorities decided to hold a Star Chamber inquiry into the methods by which I passed my correspondence out of gaol, and they sent down a gentleman named Joyce. I was summoned before him and questioned about a letter that had appeared in the Star. I declined to say anything, and was sent back to my cell. Father Doherty was also summoned, and was put on his oath. He was then insulted by being asked a question which he very properly refused to reply to, and it was because he refused to hold any communication with this official, and not because he had been proved to have done anything wrong, that he was discharged from his chaplaincy. That was a monstrous injustice. Father Doherty refused to hold any communication with this man for one special reason, namely, that on a previous occasion Joyce had been sent down to the gaol and had ordered the warders to act as spies upon the chaplains in their communications with the prisoners. Father Doherty very properly refused to have anything to say to a man who had acted in this way. Father Doherty might have gone further and said: "I am placed here in confidential communication with the prisoners, and it would be almost a crime on my part if I were to reveal what has passed in confidence between me and these poor criminals whom it is my duty to solace with the ministrations of their religion." I hold that you have no right to deprive prisoners not only of the ministrations of their priest, but of the power of worshipping God one day in the week. There were, I think, 150 of these prisoners in the gaol at the time of Father Doherty's dismissal, and, to my knowledge, they have had no power since of conferring with a minister of religion, or of worshipping in their own religion on Sundays. I want to know from the Chief Secretary whether he has taken any steps whatever to replace Father Doherty by some other chaplain. Every man who calls himself a Roman Catholic has a right to the ministrations of a Roman Catholic clergyman. Just at the time Father Doherty was dismissed, the Bishop of the Diocese died. It is well understood that the Bishop of the Diocese has the right to nominate a person to fill the office of chaplain. A deadlock arises. The Chief Secretary or the Prisons Board would not reinstate Father Doherty, and they had no power to appoint anybody else, because, as far as the new Bishop was concerned, they were not able to bring sufficient influence from Rome to bear upon him to induce him to nominate one who would have been acceptable to the Prisons Board. On this point I may be permitted to quote one or two sentences from a letter I addressed to the Chairman of the Prisons Board on the 1st of October, 1889. I wrote—

"Sir,—Now that I am on the point of being released, I beg to offer for your consideration the following information, which may interest you, even if it fails to convince you that your arbitrary dismissal of the Catholic Chaplain was, to say the least, over-hasty; and is in any case grossly unjust to the Catholic prisoners, who, for no offence of their own, have been deprived now for more than three weeks both of the visits of their chaplain and of the consolations of their religion in Divine Service on Sundays—

1. The real ground of Father Doherty's dismissal (whatever the nominal reason) was no doubt that you believed him to have co-operated with me in the publication in the Star newspaper of a certain letter alleged to have been written by me. That letter was written by me; but I can assure you that Father Doherty knew no more about it until it was published than you did. How I procured its publication is my affair, not yours."

This letter must have come under the Chief Secretary's cognisance, and yet, after my distinct assurance that Father Doherty had nothing to do with the letter, he has thought fit to continue the punishment in the shape of the dismissal of Father Doherty.

"2. During the last three weeks since Father Doherty's dismissal I have continued to publish in the Press and otherwise whatever letters I desired. I have written and despatched, through the Governor's office, and subject to official censorship, more than one letter to the editors of different newspapers, and scarcely a day has passed during the last week that the newspapers have not published some communication written by me, and bearing my signature, which undoubtedly had never received the imprimatur either of Dublin Castle or of the Authorities here, so absolutely impotent are you to stop my writing and publishing what I please. I laugh to scorn all your attempts to muzzle me, and treat with contempt your decrees which assume to punish me for breach of prison discipline. For instance—I asked you the other day, when I was deprived of writing materials, to forward for me a prepaid telegraphic message, which a friend in London was waiting for. But courtesy is not cultivated in Dublin Castle; and you returned my telegram to me. I at once despatched it myself, without further troubling myself about you.

3. Let me at once say that with all the increased rigor of the vigilance exercised over me since Father Doherty's dismissal, there is no single official here who knows anything of the means by which I am able to evade their watchfulness. I have all along made it a point of honour never to ask them to do for me anything which could bring their conduct into question, and I cannot too highly commend the fidelity with which my gaolers have fulfilled their duty to your Board in exercising the strictest watch over all my actions.

4. Considering the impunity with which I have continued to defy your authority and evade your prison regulations—all the more since your dismissal of the chaplain by which you thought you had seized my 'secret despatch boat'—I would venture to suggest that it is about time for you to send Inspector Joyce to hold another Star-Chamber Inquisition. But I can promise you that the results will not be such as to justify his travelling expenses.

5. Under all the circumstances, would it not be more dignified on your part to frankly acknowledge your error and at once reinstate Father Doherty as chaplain, instead of sulking like an ill-conditioned school boy, who 'won't play any more' because he has received a back-hander? You have chosen to try a fall with the Catholic Priesthood on an issue in which you cannot possibly win. No clergyman will sacrifice the principle of the sacred secrecy which should veil the confidential relations between himself as a priest and the prisoners who look to him for spiritual guidance and consolation. Your claim that the chaplain should submit to the examination of your Inspector means simply this, that that relationship shall be laid bare to the cold-blooded dissection of the sneering and cynical 'philosopher,' who at present controls the destinies of this unfortunate country.

By the information I have now given you, I offer you a last chance of escape from the false position you have assumed. If you accept it, you may escape further contempt, though you cannot avoid the ridicule you have already incurred."

That was the letter I wrote to the Prisons Board, and the right hon. Gentleman will probably not be surprised to hear that a peremptory order was sent down that no more of my letters were to be forwarded to the Prisons Board. One, however, did pass to the Prisons Board after that. I wrote that letter simply in order to clinch what I had already said to prove that the pretexts on which Father Doherty was dismissed, and the supposition that he had infringed the Prison Rules, were wholly without foundation, and that a gross act of injustice had been done the rev. gentleman and the prisoners who were entitled to a continuance of his religious ministrations. I will not add anything else. I will be content on this occasion with having done something I hope to throw a little light upon a portion of the right hon. Gentleman's administration in Ireland, which, but for the happy incident of my imprisonment, it might have been exceedingly difficult to drag into the light of day. There are plenty of other matters connected with my imprisonment, and what was called my trial, which call for remark, but I will take my own time in referring to them. I will spare the right hon. Gentleman any further humiliation by dwelling more at length upon the absurdities of his administration, and shall conclude by expressing my obligation to the House for having listened to me.

(1.52.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think the hon. Gentleman has amply indemnified himself to-night for the enforced silence he was put to during the rest of the Irish Estimates. He has given us a long and elaborate account of his imprisonment in Derry Gaol, but he must choose between the characters in which he evidently wishes to appear before the House—a martyr or a rebel. He has spoken of his sufferings in gaol, and has exulted at his evasion of the Prison Rules. I think he has exaggerated the interest taken in the affair. The hon. Gentleman has complained bitterly of the action the Government have taken in regard to the Catholic chaplain of Derry Gaol. That action was very simple, and was in accordance with every rule of prison discipline. Father Doherty was asked to state, amongst other things, whether he was responsible for breaches of discipline. He refused to give the information, and if the result has been that prisoners of the Roman Catholic faith have been deprived of the ministrations of a Roman Catholic chaplain, the fault lies with the Roman Catholic Bishop in declining to appoint a successor to Father Doherty. The hon. Gentleman then complained that he did not receive the treatment of a first-class misdemeanant—

MR. CONYBEARE: I did not complain. I merely mentioned it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: He complained that he suffered from mildew in the prison. I assure the hon. Gentleman I have carefully examined into the matter, and my investigations do not bear out his statement as to the state of the prison in this respect. The hon. Gentleman told us that his eyes suffered from the whitewash on the walls, and that his health may have suffered from the fact that there were no sheds provided in the prison yard under which prisoners might exercise.

MR. CONYBEARE: I did not complain in regard to myself, but complained that ordinary prisoners had to exercise in torrents of rain, and then had to sit in their cells, their clothes having to dry on them.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that it is the universal rule to white-wash the walls of English prisons, and that ophthalmia does not result. With regard to sheds, I have only to say that sheds do not exist, as far as I know, in English or Irish prisons; it would be extremely inconvenient and unhealthy to construct them in most prisons.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman pardon me for a moment? Some time ago I asked him a question with reference to the sheds in Derry Prison. That question was suggested to me by the hon. Member for Camborne, who wrote me a letter on the subject. He complained that the prisoners were exposed not only to rain, but in the summer time to the heat of the sun. Is it not the fact that within five days of my question being put a prisoner in Derry Gaol was struck dead while at exercise?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know anything about the particular case the hon. Gentleman alludes to, but I have no doubt I gave him an answer at the time. On the general question of sheds for exercise in Irish prisons, I may say that such structures would be in many cases exceedingly inconvenient, and I do not know why they should be provided for one special class of prisoners who make themselves amenable to the laws of their country. I do not quite know what is the hon. Gentleman's complaint of the room in which he was confined—he did not like the proportions, I think—but, by his own account, the room was a large one, about twice as large as in first-class prisons. As to the general condition of Derry Gaol, it is one of those which, when they came under the management of the Prisons Board in 1878, were by no means up to modern requirements. But an immense deal has been done since that time. Derry Gaol is not of a modern type, and is now used for prisoners sentenced to short terms of imprisonment. It would be a great mistake to suppose it is unhealthy. The statistics of health are good; the drainage is reported good; the water supply is good; and as to the apprehensions of zymotic disease, I am assured they are altogether delusions. The Prisons Board are hastening on the work of re-modelling prisons in Ireland to meet modern requirements, and there is no reason to complain of their action in this or any other respect.

(2.2.) MR. HARRISON (Tipperary, Mid): It has been found necessary once more to direct the attention of the House to the condition of Derry Gaol, and I cannot, I confess, accept the remarks with which the Chief Secretary has favoured us as at all satisfactory. I wish to press upon his attention again the points I ventured to raise in Committee. I referred then to ventilation, the size of the cells, the arrangements which, I still maintain, are not such as to ensure cleanliness, and the defective sewerage. The right hon. Gentleman on the last occasion referred to one point only upon which his assurance was not unsatisfactory, and if he had referred to other matters his assurances might have been such that it would not have been necessary for me to press these points upon him again. Perhaps it was due to inadvertence; perhaps I did not make myself clear, and I will endeavour to make those points clear now. I referred to the size of the cells and the insufficiency of ventilation, and the assurance the right hon. Gentleman gave was that the cells, being unhealthy, should no longer be used for the confinement of prisoners whose sentences exceeded three months. I asked the right hon. Gentleman on what ground he thought it right that prisoners whose offences were presumably small should be subject to unhealthy conditions from which greater criminals, sentenced to longer terms of imprisonment, were exempt, and it seemed to me that it could only be on the principle of taking as much out of the health of a prisoner as was consistent with turning him out alive at the end of his term of imprisonment. What I wish to press on the right hon. Gentleman now is that he will give an undertaking beyond that he has given, that, pending reconstruction, Derry Gaol shall be closed. I touched upon Major Beamish's Report, and I made reference to the statement we had 12 months ago, on his personal experience, from the hon. Member for South Armagh (Mr. Blane), and which was never answered, and I can now refer to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Camborne (Mr. Conybeare), to which I am bound to say we have had no satisfactory answer. In addition there is a serious question of discipline, arising in this way. A warder in the prison, suspected of sympathy with the popular cause, went into the prison store, and the head warder, with whom he was in ill favour, happened to be there, together with other warders and prisoners. It appears a few stores were missing, and the head warder, turning to the Nationalist warder, as he was supposed to be, said, "Wait here while I go and see if I can find the missing stores in your quarters." The warder, who bears a high character, refused to patiently bear this imputation, and said he would accompany the chief warder if he wished to make a search; and for this breach of discipline, pardonable under the circumstances, he was dismissed. It was a frivolous pretext; the real cause was he was suspected of having espoused the National cause, and so was considered objectionable. The question of the sanitary condition of the prison has, I think, been sufficiently dealt with. The Chief Secretary says that the health statistics are good; but I need scarcely say we have a deeply-rooted distrust of these official Reports. By keeping prisoners out of the hospital the health record may be kept up, and my hon. Friend has given sufficient proof of the culpable negligence of the medical officer. I presume the right hon. Gentleman has read the Report of Major Beamish, and that he has some knowledge, however superficial, of sanitary science. Anybody who reads between the lines of that Report must see that the sanitary conditions of Derry Gaol are in a distinctly dangerous state.

(2.14) Mr. BROOKE ROBINSON rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but Mr. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

Debate resumed.

Mr. HARRISON: I quite agree with the hon. Gentlemen who interrupt me that this is not a fitting time of night to be dealing with an important question of this kind, and to mark my sense of this, and my sympathy with hon. Members, I beg to move that this Debate be now adjourned.

Mr. SPEAKER being of opinion that the Motion was an abuse of the Rules of the House, declined to propose the Question thereupon to the House.

Mr. Harrison

(2.14.) Mr. A. J. BALFOUR rose in his place and claimed to move that the Question be now put.

Various exclamations, among which Dr. TANNER was heard to say "Scandalous."

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member for Mid Cork has made use of an expression which he is not entitled to use.

Dr. TANNER: I did make use of an expression, Sir, in immediate reference to the action of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, but it was addressed to an hon. Friend near me, and not to the Chair.

*MR. SPEAKER: I did not suppose the hon. Member addressed the remark to the Chair, or I should have ordered him out of the House immediately. The expression is one that ought not to have been used. I take no further note of it now.

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

Question put accordingly, "That '£97,499' stand part of the Resolution."

(2.25.) The House divided:—Ayes 112; Noes 46.—(Div. List, No. 203.)

Main Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

Mr. ARTHUR BALFOUR claimed "That the Main Question be now put."

Question put accordingly, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

ARMY—NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS.

THE EARL OF DUNDONALD: My Lords, in asking for the Return which I have placed on the Notice Paper of your Lordships' House, I do not wish to occupy many minutes of your time in explaining the desirability of that Return being granted. First of all, the information I seek is not in the preliminary Annual Returns for the British Army; and I think it is desirable to know the age and services of the non-commissioned officers who are brought into direct contact with the men, excluding those non-commissioned officers who are generally of mature age and of longer service, and who are specially employed in staff appointments in their various regiments. I think, if this Return is granted, it will be seen that the non-commissioned officers are, as a rule, of such a youthful age, and of such short service, that they cannot exercise that authority over the men, nor imbue the men with the respect which is, as a rule, accorded by young men to those older than themselves, and which is so necessary in the interests and the well-being of the Army. Roughly speaking, the conditions of service of the non-commissioned officers are as follows: the non-commissioned officer after a year's probation can engage on for 12 years, and after 9 years he can re-engage for 21 and a pension. These conditions are subject to certain restrictions affecting various corps, or, roughly speaking, the conditions affecting the non-commissioned officers of the corps. So that, practically speaking, any man who has good health and a good character as a non-commissioned officer, can serve for 21 years. But the point is that non-commissioned officers do not serve for 21 years, as a rule. Now, why is this? The causes are various. First of all I should put the question of the deferred pay among the principal reasons which induce the non-commissioned officers to leave the Service. They find coming to them at the expiration of a certain number of years' service a considerable sum of money, and they are desirous of obtaining this sum of money into their possession; but, as a rule, unfortunately no sooner do they obtain this money than they spend it, the result being that the country loses the services of good non-commissioned officers, and the non-commissioned officers lose their money, so that neither the country nor the non-commissioned officers are in the end benefited. Then, again, we must remember that the conditions in civil life of the class from whom these non-commissioned officers are drawn, have very much improved of late years. They receive, as a rule, greater pay, and they work shorter hours; they have far more leisure, and are in possession of greater advantages than they had in former years. This, also, is an attraction to non-commissioned officers to leave the Service and join their brothers in civil life. Of course, there are many other causes which induce non-commissioned officers to leave the Service. I will not go into them, but the fact is, that non-commissioned officers do leave the Service, and they leave it too young for the good of the Army, more especially now since the introduction of short service, when there are so very few older soldiers in the ranks to imbue the younger soldiers with ideas of discipline, and to teach them what is, perhaps, more important than anything else, reverence for the traditions of the regiment in which they serve. I should like to quote to your Lordships a few statistics as to these young soldiers. There were serving at home with the colours in 1889, 99,647 men, of whom 36,977 were under 21 years of age, and 70,380 were under 25 years of age. The question may now be asked, in view of what I have said, how does this extreme youth of so many men in the Army affect discipline. Again, I will quote a few figures. I find that Courts Martial have decreased from 16,523 in 1881 to 12,188 in 1888; but the cases of violence and disobedience to superiors tried by Courts Martial have increased from 1,650 cases in 1881 to 2,198 cases in 1888, and cases of minor insubordination, neglect of orders, have increased from 1,472 cases in 1881 to 2,106 cases in the year 1888. So that it will be seen though Court Martial cases have largely decreased in bulk, offences in relation to discipline have considerably increased. There is also another point in connection with the discipline of the Army and non-commissioned officers which is, perhaps, of importance to mention, and that is in regard to the territorial system. Now, the territorial system is taken more advantage of than it used to be by private soldiers. There are more soldiers now enlisting from any one district or village than there used to be. The consequence is that a non-commissioned officer promoted in any of these territorial regiments has a considerable number of men serving under him in the ranks who will leave the regiment probably about the same time as himself, and it is not in human nature that in those circumstances a non-commissioned officer will not think rather of the good opinion of those whom he will be with at home in the village so long in civil life than of the discipline of the Army. When at home in the Reserve there would, of course, be many chances for the private to repay any grudge he might owe his former non-commissioned officer. Of course, there are exceptional cases, and there are numbers of good non-commissioned officers who would be a credit to any Army in the world; but still, taking them in the bulk, they are liable to be influenced by those considerations. Now, undoubtedly, a non-commissioned officer should be of mature age, tact, and experience, and should be able to imbue the men under him with respect, and to administer discipline without partiality or favour. I would like to quote to your Lordships some statistics as to the conduct of non-commissioned officers. I find by the Preliminary Annual Return for the British Army for 1890 that, during the year 1889, in the Home Army only, there were 673 non-commissioned officers sentenced by Court Martial to be reduced to a lower grade or to the ranks; and, in addition, 55 more suffered imprisonment as well as reduction. Those figures indicate a percentage of offences among the non-commissioned officers which is certainly far more than is desirable. I think a considerable step towards improving the position of non-commissioned officers in the Army might be taken by eliminating from the ranks all those men who are of really bad character, and by those means inducing a better class of men to enlist, as many men of good character will not enlist to serve along with men of bad character. I will not weary your Lordships with any words or ideas of mine as to the pay or advantages which should be offered to non-commissioned officers, to induce a really good body of non-commissioned officers to serve in the Army. Any such ideas from far more experienced heads than my own would be at the disposal of any statesman who chose to grapple with this question; but I would say that when this country pays an immense sum for procuring men to fight for it, and when it arms those men with the most improved and deadly weapons of modern science, it should not grudge the money necessary to place those men who compose its Army on a sound footing. Now, stability may be obtained by making it to the self-interest of a body of men to serve the country, and to give the best years of their life in the Service; but if the country will not pay those men enough to induce them to give the best years of their life to the Service, then I see nothing for it but that we must have some modified form of conscription, and by those means—by the introduction to the ranks of all classes of the community—we shall obtain that stability which is obtained in foreign armies. We have in our Army a short service system, with only one class of men in the Service, while in foreign armies it is a short service system for all classes. I cannot help quoting to your Lordships a saying which has been attributed to the Duke of Wellington: he said that, "The non-commissioned officers of the Army are the backbone of the Service." If this was true in the days when the Duke of Wellington said it, at a time when there were many old soldiers in the ranks, how much more true must it be now, when we have the short service system of obtaining men for the Service from a single class of the community. I hope Her Majesty's Government will grant the Return I ask for, and I trust it may be found useful.

Moved, "That there be laid before this House,

"Return of the average age and service of privates in the regular army at the time of their promotion to be non-commissioned officers during the year 1889; and for a Return of the average age and service of the non-commissioned officers of each rank at present serving with the colours, excluding those who are specially employed and not doing ordinary duty with their respective batteries, troops, or companies."—(The Earl of Dundonald.)

THE UNDERSECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Earl BROWNLOW): My Lords, there is no objection whatever to granting the Return asked for by the noble Lord opposite. I would, however, point out to him that it will involve some delay to give the particulars required with regard to every unit of the British Army serving both at home and abroad.

Agreed to.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES ACTS AMENDMENT
BILL.—(No. 205.)
COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

Clause 8.

LORD THRING: I dare say that what is the obvious meaning of this clause is not intended to be its meaning, and I wish to draw your Lordships' attention particularly to this clause. It certainly would, I think, form a difficult precedent at a future time. Your Lordships will observe it provides that any person holding land for public, ecclesiastical, parochial, charitable, "or other purposes," may, in effect, grant, sell, or exchange it for the purposes of the Public Libraries Act. It then says that where land is held for ecclesiastical purposes the Ecclesiastical Commissioners shall assent; that where it is held for parochial purposes, the Guardians and Poor Law Board shall assent, and in the case of other charitable property, the Charity Commissioners shall assent. Then it provides that the money shall be applied as the Charity Commissioners shall decide. But just see what the effect of this clause would be. It enables, in effect, the Trustees of any charity to alter altogether the disposition of their trust by applying land or property which they hold, for the purpose of the Public Libraries Act. Now, I shall not be suspected of having too strong a bias in favour of pious founders, and, I believe that, after a certain time, all charities ought to be considered; but I think to put a clause of this kind in the Act, enabling persons who may hold, as the noble Earl (Lord Meath) will presently show, land for maintaining open spaces, to allow that land to be built upon for the purpose of forming a public library, is a precedent which may create difficulty in future legislation. If this provision is passed in regard to public libraries it may be passed for any other charitable object which people may think desirable, for example, for the purpose of building a chapel, or public wash-houses, or baths, and no charity will be safe for a moment. To show the carelessness, as it appears to me, with which the measure has been drawn, I wish to draw your Lordships' attention to the fact that it does not even provide that the money arising from the sale of land shall be applied for the purposes of the original Trust; on the contrary, it is to be disposed of as the Commissioners think fit. Then it is perfectly clear that the word "gift" must be struck out, for I cannot imagine that your Lordships are going to allow the Charity Trustees to give away their land as they like. There is another point. I have said nothing as to the effect in reference to private persons, but I do think it is rather a strong order to allow any owner of land to do what is here authorised. I only wish to draw your Lordships' attention to this clause.

I submit that it certainly ought, in any case, to be amended, and I doubt whether any part of it ought to be proposed.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Perhaps I may be allowed to ask the noble Lord to tell us what is the meaning of the words "any persons holding land for charitable, parochial, or other purposes." I should like to know what the words "other purposes" mean.

*LORD HOUGHTON: I am sorry, as it has turned out, that this Bill was referred to Committee of the Whole House, and not to a Standing Committee, but that was not entirely my fault. I was not aware of any objection being taken to the clause at the Second Reading of the Bill by noble Lords on this side of the House. I do not make any observation upon it whatever, but perhaps the noble Lord will allow this matter to be considered at a later stage of the Bill. With regard to the Amendment which the noble Earl will move, I shall be very glad to deal with that, but perhaps any question of construction your Lordships would be willing should be considered afterwards.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I am bound to say I think the point a somewhat serious one. My attention was not called to it, but it seems to me rather a question of principle than a mere drafting. I do not think it is a question of drafting at all.

LORD HERSCHELL: It is really both. I do not quite understand the object of putting in "other purposes." Ordinarily, you read those words ejusdem generis, but when you specify what some of the purposes are—public purposes, or charitable and parochial purposes, the words may have a very wide signification. It is difficult to understand from the language what the "other purposes" can mean, unless they are private purposes. Then there is the other point. In addition, the assent of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners is required to the alienation of land held for ecclesiastical purposes, and the assent of the Local Government Board in regard to land for parochial purposes, but it requires no assent in reference to these "other purposes," whatever they may be. I cannot help thinking those words must have got in unintentionally.

Lord Thring

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I understand the noble Lord would be willing to strike out the word "other," and in that case that the difficulty would be removed.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): How would this proviso affect land held by Universities or Colleges? It seems to me that is a rather serious question.

LORD HERSCHELL: I think myself such purposes as those would come within the word "charitable."

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: No, I think not; they are excepted under the Statute of Elizabeth.

LORD HERSCHELL: I am not sure that that would not be so. However, I should certainly think the best course would be to take the course first suggested of putting in "or" before "charitable," and leaving out the words "or other."

*LORD HOUGHTON: I should be quite prepared to accept that.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I must reserve to myself liberty to move that the word "public" be left out also. I am more afraid of that word than of the others.

LORD HERSCHELL: I am a little doubtful, I confess, about the whole clause. It seems to me, unless there is some precedent for it, it is rather an innovation to allow property held in trust for a charity of one kind, to be applied for a charity of a different kind, even with the consent of the Charity Commissioners.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: That is exactly what I meant.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I think, at all events, there ought to be reciprocity, and that the Public Libraries Trustees ought to be allowed to alienate their land for the benefit of other charities.

*THE EARL OF MEATH: I had given notice of an Amendment to this clause, but I do not quite understand whether the Motion before the House is to strike out the whole clause or not. My point is with regard to the preservation of open spaces.

Amendment proposed, in line 5, to insert the word "or" before "parochial," and to omit the words "or other."—

(The Lord Herschell.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: As at present advised, I do not propose to take any part in the discussion upon this portion of the clause, because I shall be very much disposed, when the Question is put by the Chairman "That this clause stand part of the Bill," to meet it with a negative.

LORD HERSCHELL: I do not know that there would be any harm in allowing Trustees to do it by way of sale or exchange, because then they would get the full value of the land. I should content myself with taking out the word "gift."

THE EARL OF MEATH: I cannot agree to the point as to sale. It appears to me that is a very important matter. How this clause got in is difficult to understand. It was not in the original Bill, and was only put in at the last moment on Third Reading. I do not know who is the author of this clause. It is in this connection a somewhat peculiar circumstance that in this Metropolis one very populous district, Bethnal Green, has been for the last 12 months in the throes of an agitation for this very purpose—that is, to get land which was conveyed 200 years ago for charitable purposes, and in regard to which there is a Trust to keep it as an open space, built over. There is an agitation going on as to whether some of the land could not be used for other purposes than that of an open space, and there are three distinct purposes put forward, one to erect a library upon it, another to erect a vestry hall, and another to build an infirmary. There has been a division of opinion on the subject, and there have been about 70 public meetings held in the district. Public opinion is greatly divided upon it. There are a certain number of ratepayers who are anxious to utilise the ground for these purposes. It is a terrible temptation to them to save money by building upon public land. On the other hand, there are a large number of ratepayers who wish the Trust to be maintained. I must adhere, I think, to the Amendment which I have moved, which is—

"Provided also that land held on trust to be preserved as an open space, or on trust which prohibit building thereon, shall not be granted or conveyed for the purposes of this Act."

LORD HOUGHTON: I should have been very glad if I could have accepted the noble Earl's Amendment, sympathising as I do with his object—

THE EARL OF MORLEY: I would point out that the Amendment before the House is the insertion of "or" before "charitable."

Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My noble Friend behind me has requested me to move an Amendment in the 18th line. You will there find the words—

"And the said Board and Commissioners respectively may provide for the application of the moneys which may be derived from the sale of any land."

It seems to me the money ought to be held for the purposes of the charity. I think, as suggested, the words should be—

"The moneys arising from any sale or exchange of such land shall be applied for the same purposes as the land exchanged or sold."

LORD HOUGHTON: I think I have some right to complain that a considerable number of Amendments should have been brought forward upon this clause, of which I have received no notice. However, as they all come from this side of the House I suppose I cannot say very much about them. I think it is quite obvious that the sense of the House is with the noble Earl who has just sat down, and I, therefore, do not know that there would be any great object in my attempting to evade the proposal. Still I was anxious on other grounds that the Bill might have passed without any Amendment at all.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Upon that appeal for some addition in the way of amendment from this side of the House I rise to gratify the noble Lord, and I think the best amendment is that we should say "No" to the question that this clause stand part of the Bill. It really requires very careful looking into. I want to know who "any person holding land for public purposes" is? Does that mean Ministers of the Crown? Does it mean every person who has a fiduciary interest of a limited and temporary character in land applied for public purposes? I think, considering the enormous importance of the interests involved, these words need to be very fully considered.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: The unfortunate thing is that this was not observed when the Bill was under consideration before. This is eminently a matter which should have been considered in Standing Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Quite so.

*LORD HOUGHTON: I will accept the suggestion of the noble Marquess. I need not say I am hardly, at this moment, prepared to argue intricate questions of the kind raised, and I reserve to myself liberty to bring the matter forward at a later stage of the Bill.

THE EARL OF MEATH: I withdraw my Amendment.

Clause 8 omitted.

Report of Amendments to be received on Friday next.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE (PROCEDURE) BILL

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE BILL.—(No. 215.)

Amendments reported (according to order).

LORD HERSCHELL: I have to propose an Amendment at the end of the 1st clause, which transfers the hearing of Motions for new trials from the Divisional Court to the Court of Appeal. My attention has been called to the fact that when this Bill comes into operation there will be a certain number of cases standing for hearing in the Divisional Court, and that those ought to be transferred for hearing to the Court of Appeal. The Master of the Rolls has called my attention to that circumstance, and I think it is desirable it should be provided for. Therefore, I propose to add—

"This section shall extend to every Motion of which notice may have been given, whether before or after the passing of this Act, but which has not been heard before the commencement of this Act."

Amendment agreed to,

Other Amendments made; Bill to be read 3^a to-morrow; and to be printed as amended. (No. 231.)

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a."

*THE EARL OF POWIS: Your Lordships may remember a day or two ago when I brought forward the question whether provision should be made as to whether the Sheriffs should appear in uniform or not, the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack considered it was too trifling a question for legislation. I am well aware that there is a legal maxim de minimis non curat lex, but I have again to urge that I hope the noble and learned Lord will not think this too small a matter to take notice of, because I then mentioned that, on that account, a Judge had actually threatened to heavily fine a Sheriff for not appearing in uniform, and since that Debate, I have received a copy of a letter in which a learned Judge, in 1873, distinctly ordered all the Sheriffs on the Oxford Circuit to appear in uniform. I mentioned that in former years no such custom had prevailed in Shropshire or Montgomeryshire. This custom was not introduced into Shropshire until 1873, when the Judge of Assize directed the Clerk of Assize to write to all the Under Sheriffs on the Oxford Circuit in these words—

"I am directed by Mr. Justice Quin to inform the Sheriff through you that the Judge will expect that high official to appear either in full dress or in uniform, the proper costume of a High Sheriff in attendance on Her Majesty's Judges, being, in his Lordship's opinion, such as would be justifiable and admissible only at one of Her Majesty's levees."

Now, that is a very distinct order, upon the subject, although it is a subject upon which the Committee over which my hon. and learned Friend presided, and the two noble and learned Lords who spoke the other day, agreed that it was not within the province of the Judge to give such an order. I think this letter shows there was quite sufficient justification for me in bringing the matter forward, and in the circumstances I do not suppose your Lordships, or my noble and learned Friend, will now think the matter too small to be considered.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I will only say a few words further upon this point. I do not blame the noble Lord in the least for bringing it forward. I only protested against this House being engaged in legislation as to the particular form of garment to be worn by an official in the position of a High Sheriff. I think the House will still consider there is scarcely a necessity for an Act of Parliament to be passed in regard to the kind of coat the Sheriff should wear. I said so on the last occasion, and I am still of that opinion. I would merely now observe that the only case brought forward by the noble Lord is as old as 1873, and I am not quite certain that I do not take the same view of the orders issued on that occasion as the noble Lord. There may have been requests at one time relating to matters of etiquette issued by learned Judges which were certainly not conformable to the law. But that learned Judge only stated what he expected as to the form of dress as a matter of etiquette; the learned Judge may have been right or wrong in his opinion, but he certainly did not threaten to fine the Sheriff £500 on that account, as was stated the other night. I then said that, in my opinion, it would have been exceeding his power for him to do so, and I ventured then to express my incredulity as to such an occurrence ever having taken place. I cannot find that the noble Lord has now obtained, as he supposes, the particulars of that circumstance, and I can only call his attention to the fact that I have received a letter referring to that particular case. As I pointed out the other night, no such rule as my noble Friend imagines was laid down, but the matter to which the threat to fine the Sheriff £500 applied was one of gross contempt of one of Her Majesty's Judges, an intentional deliberate act of contempt, and it was punished accordingly. The matter had no reference whatever to the question of the dress of the High Sheriff. I still entertain the view that, whatever may be done in this matter, it would be undignified for Parliament, and I hope Parliament will not be asked, to prescribe what particular kind of dress any public official shall wear.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, at the previous stage of this Bill, I alluded to one of its provisions, and intimated that on the present occasion I should propose an Amendment, namely, to substitute the Home Secretary for the County Councils acting with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor for the purpose of framing regulations in relation to the accommodation of and reception of Her Majesty's Judges. Since I made that statement, I have considered the matter, and I have come to the conclusion that in reality my objection goes deeper, and would not be met completely by the alteration of that proviso; that, in truth, my objection is to this Bill altogether, and, therefore, I shall move the rejection of the Bill; but inasmuch as I have given no notice of my intention to do so, I shall, of course, not press it to a Division, but merely make that Motion for the purpose of explaining the position which I take in regard to it. The object of this Bill is simply to relieve the gentleman who will hereafter be called upon to fill the office of High Sheriff from expenses to which the High Sheriffs have hitherto been put. To that I have no kind of objection whatever. But that is the only object which will be attained by the Bill. It is only a public object in the sense that it is a right thing to enact that public officials shall not be put to expense which ought not properly to fall upon them. As regards the public, the only effect of the Bill will be to transfer certain expenses from the shoulders of the Sheriffs hereafter to the County Councils, and thus to put upon the rates the expenses which have hitherto been borne by those individuals. I think this is really a step in the right direction, but that evil ought to be met in another way. I will shortly tell your Lordships the way in which I think it ought to be met. Let me say at once that I am not desirous of putting any obstacle in the way of removing this burden from individual shoulders. I certainly do not intend to cast any reflections upon the County Councils in the observations which I make. I have no doubt, and I thoroughly believe, they are admirable bodies, doing good work. At the same time, like some of my noble Friends, not being myself a County Councillor, it is not a necessary part of my creed to believe that all County Councils, under all circumstances, and at all times, will act with unimpeachable wisdom, and I cannot think it an expedient thing to initiate in every County Council in England and Wales, as this measure would do, a discussion as to the proper mode in which Her Majesty's Judges should be received and accommodated, and to make regulations differing, perhaps, in all the counties in that respect. Now, this is really only part of a far larger subject. The view which I take is this, that the Sheriff's expenses are part of the expenses of the administration of Justice, which is not really a local matter at all, and ought not to be treated as a local matter. The truth is, that a large portion of these charges is now met by the Treasury. Another large portion of the expenses is met by fees. If you add together the fees and the proportion paid by the Treasury it will be found that the larger portion of the expenses of this department of the administration of justice is met now, and will in future be met without any call upon the rates. The view which I venture to submit to your Lordships is this, that the whole of those expenses ought to be dealt with as part of the expenses of the administration of justice, in the same way as the greater portion of them are now met, and that the provision made with regard to this matter should not be dependent upon the view taken in this county or in that county, but that it should be a uniform system applicable to the whole country which, therefore, should be provided for by the same Central Authority. I quite feel that if you put the burden of this upon the several counties, it is only natural they should desire to have a voice in the matter; this Bill gives them the exclusive voice, although the burden only falls partially upon them. That is natural enough, and it is, in my view, extremely undesirable that the matter should be thus dealt with piecemeal in the different counties throughout the country. What appears to me to have been lost sight of is this, that at the present time the great part of the expense of enforcing judgments and the other duties of the Sheriffs is covered by fees, and the practice has been for each Sheriff to agree with his Under-Sheriff to receive the fees, and out of the fees to bear what I may call the ordinary expenses of this part of the administration of justice, leaving to the Sheriff himself certain of the expenses connected with his attendance upon the Judges. The agreements thus made vary, even as between county and county; that is to say, in some counties it has been the practice for the Sheriff to receive in relief of the expenses, or as a portion of the expenditure, some of the money coming from the Treasury which is not received in other counties. My belief is this, that if you had the whole of this matter placed in the hands of a central authority, so that you had a permanent official in each county appointed by the Crown, and if you had the whole of the fees which are now received by the Under-Sheriff, received by the Crown, it would be found that all the legitimate and proper expenses of the Shrievalty, including those proposed to be transferred to the County Council, might be met without any demand being made either upon the County Rates or any further demand than that which is now made upon the Treasury. If that were done, and I may say that I have gone to a considerable extent into the matter, my strong conviction is that that would be the result. The expenses are now larger than they would be if a permanent official had been appointed to act. For instance, in the county of Durham, the total average of the Sheriff's expenses is now about £400. I have made some little investigation into the question of what it would be likely to be if the thing were put on a permanent basis, and I do not think it would exceed a half—I doubt if it would be much more than £200. I might illustrate the matter in the same way as regards other counties in England. My belief is that, if the whole matter were gone into throughout the counties of England, it would be possible to initiate a new system by which, without any additional burden being cast upon either the Treasury or the rates, you might have the whole matter put on a satisfactory basis, and uniformly dealt with throughout England and Wales. I do not think anybody can doubt that that would be a much more satisfactory system than the scheme which is proposed by the present Bill. My Lords, it is not likely that this Bill will pass the other House in the present Session. I do not understand that even its promoters anticipate that, but I would urge that Her Majesty's Government should in the Recess inquire into this matter, with the view of ascertaining the facts—which certainly were not fully ascertained by the Committee of this House which inquired into the subject—as to the fees which are received in the different counties, and the surplus over expenditure which remains in the hands of those who now receive the fees. I think if that were done it would be found that, very likely, without any additional payment by the Treasury, or, at all events, with a very trifling addition, you would be able to deal with this important department of the administration of justice throughout the country on a uniform and satisfactory footing. If that is true it certainly would be inexpedient to commence by throwing this burden upon the rates in the way proposed by the present Bill. It is because, I so believe that I have felt it necessary to explain my views, and I, therefore, formally move that the Bill be read a second time this day three months.

Amendment moved, To leave out (“now”) and add at the end of the Motion (“this day three months”).—(The Lord Herschell.)

LORD BRAMWELL: My Lords, I cannot help expressing my regret at what I suppose I must call the necessity for this Bill. I do not agree with my noble and learned Friend. I think the system in this country is, that public duties are to be performed gratuitously by those who are fit for them. No Member of either House of Parliament is paid as such; Magistrates are not paid; jury-men are not paid; they perform their duties gratuitously, as also do Guardians of the Poor, Churchwardens, and Constables, who are all unpaid. But I am afraid it is a necessity that these gentlemen upon whom the duty of filling the office of High Sheriff ordinarily falls should be relieved from the expense of it. I do object to the clause which makes a special provision for the arrangement being made by the County Councils, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, as to the way in which the Judges shall be received. I believe the proceedings at County Councils are attended by reporters, and a very pretty discussion will occasionally take place as to the mode in which his Lordship shall be received. I cannot think that it will contribute very much to the respect which is at present paid to the learned Judges when people read the uncivil remarks which many people will, undoubtedly, take the opportunity of making. The majority of the County Councils may think otherwise, but those who are for cutting down the observances which have always been shown to the Judges will be sure to give expression to their opinions, and to express their reasons in a very unsatisfactory way. I would infinitely prefer that there should be no provision in the Bill as to the County Councils making any arrangements, either with or without the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor for the time being, as to the way in which the Judges shall be received, or that it should be simply left in the condition in which it is now, because I protest again, as I told your Lordships on the last occasion, that there is no power for any Judge to do what it has been stated was done by the learned Judge whom the noble Lord referred to. He was a popular man among his brother Judges, but he had a peculiar sobriquet among us on account of his liability to do just such a singular thing as he did on this occasion. When you come to consider it, the very fact of his issuing this general notice is a proof that it was an entirely original proceeding on his part, because, if it had not been the practice to do otherwise, why should he have given this special notice on the Oxford Circuit? For my own part, I most heartily wish that any High Sheriff who should be treated in this very erroneous way would try the question, for I am sure he would get the best of it. It seems to me it would be very much better, indeed, if there were not this provision, which would give rise to discussions of a most unpleasant character, as I have had an intimation from one who is not at all hostile to the Bill, but, on the contrary, friendly to it, would be the case. There is just one clause in the Bill to which I should like to call your Lordships' attention. It is that

“The expenses of the High Sheriff of a county in receiving and protecting the Judges and so forth, and in keeping order within the precincts of the Court of Assize shall so far as they are not expenses which had before the passing of this Act been customarily defrayed by the Treasury or out of the County Rate.”

Well, it may possibly be said that by implication what was formerly paid out of the County Rate shall not in future be so paid. I do not know whether my noble and learned Friend sees the point; but I have no doubt how the Judges would construe it, because when Judges have to construe an Act of Parliament they make sense of it, and they make sense of it by interpreting it to say what it ought to say, and very often they have no other reason for their construction. I have no doubt they would hold that what was formerly paid out of the County Rate should continue to be so paid, and that it should not be otherwise paid; although, of course, a question might be raised about it under this clause. As I have often said in the Standing Committee on Law that when we have to construe an Act of Parliament, "We must do our best with it as it stands; but in making one, we should take care there is no ambiguity about it." I do not know whether the noble Lord who has charge of this Bill thinks that worth his attention in any way, but I can assure him it is not a captious objection on my part at all.

*THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, with regard to the objection which has been taken to the words in the 2nd clause of the Bill, I think the noble Lord will see, at all events I think myself, there is not really any force in his objection. The words are that—

"The expenses so far as they have hitherto been defrayed by the Treasury or out of the County Rate shall be defrayed out of the County Rate."

Of course, the meaning of that is, that the Treasury will continue to pay any portion that it has hitherto paid, and the County Rate will continue to pay any portion that it has hitherto paid, and the surplus, if any, shall be provided out of the County Rate. I think that seems pretty clear; at all events, it is so to me. I am very glad, at the same time, to hear that whether that be accurately expressed in the Bill or not there is no possibility of the Act going wrong, because, when it is placed in the hands of the Judges, they will interpret it in the way it should be interpreted. As this Motion, which is nominally hostile to the Bill, is not going to be pressed, I do not think I need detain your Lordships by making any lengthened remarks upon the Bill itself. It is perfectly true that the Bill is a small Bill, and deals with a small portion of the question only. I mentioned that to your Lordships when I introduced the Bill. The reason why it is a partial measure is because it would have been impossible for me, a private Member of your Lordships' House, to deal with the whole question; and, as the Government have not found themselves able to introduce a measure dealing with the whole subject, I thought it was better, at all events, to treat a portion of the question than not to do anything with it at all. For this reason: because the Committee upon this subject sat two years ago, and I have myself received a great many letters with regard to the matter, which is felt to be a very great hardship in many parts of the country. I have been asked frequently whether Parliament was going to do anything with regard to the Report of this Committee. It is quite possible, as has been said, I have begun at the wrong end. Perhaps I did; but it is better to begin at the wrong end than not to begin at all, and I think your Lordships will see that if this Bill passes into law, on which point I am a little more sanguine than the noble and learned Lord on the Front Opposition Bench, it will at all events, relieve the persons, who are in future to be appointed as High Sheriffs, to a not inconsiderable degree. If in a future Session of Parliament it may be found possible to go a great deal further I shall be glad. The proposal made by the noble and learned Lord is a proposal which I think deserves serious consideration. The proposal, as I understand it, is this: that in future the fees received by the Under Sheriffs shall be received by the Treasury; that the whole legal business for which the High Sheriff is at present nominally responsible, but of which he knows nothing, and can know nothing, and with regard to the carrying out of which he is perfectly unable himself to act, shall be dealt with by the Treasury also. Of course, the Sheriff has to leave everything to his Under Sheriff. Now, in future, the proposal is that those fees shall be transferred to the Treasury, and that the whole of this large legal business shall be carried on as a matter of national concern, and through the agency of the Treasury; and then that all the expenses of the Shrievalty shall be borne by the Treasury. No doubt the noble and learned Lord is quite right in saying that if the fees received by the Under Sheriff at present were received by the Treasury, and if they were calculated on a proper scale, the whole expenses of the Shrievalty could be borne by the county, without any cost to the High Sheriff or charge upon the County Rate. If any proposal is brought forward hereafter, I shall give it the best support I can, and I think, in all probability, it is the very best way of dealing with this question. But up to the present time we have found that the Treasury has not shown any particular desire to move in this direction, and of course in the present Session of Parliament it would have been quite impossible to carry out such a proposal. However, I hope the Government will bear in mind what the noble and learned Lord has said, and will give it their best consideration.

On Question, whether ("now") shall stand part of the Motion, resolved in the affirmative; Bill read 3^a accordingly: Amendments made: Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

THE OFFICES OF THE PRIME MINISTER AND FOREIGN SECRETARY.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL, in rising to call attention to results which have followed the connection of the duties belonging to the First Minister with those belonging to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and move for precedents upon it, said: My Lords, the notice has been put upon the Paper only to repent or follow up what I have urged before upon the subject both in Parliament and elsewhere. The last time I addressed your Lordships I alluded to it briefly. Recent circumstances have, however, given a fresh importance to the topic. Embarrassments have happened attributable fairly to the union of two functions I have indicated, but which, unless their origin is traced, may lead to violent conclusions. In the few remarks I have to make nothing will fall from me—at least intentionally—which is opposed to the general idea of Lord Hartington and his supporters, in whom alone I recognise a guarantee of national security. So far am I from being alone among men friendly to the Government that only on the Thursday before last, the 17th of July, one of their organs anticipated nearly all that has occurred to me. On that account, I am more inclined to abridge or hurry over what I wish to bring before your Lordships. To specify that organ might produce misapprehension, or be against the usages of Parliament. It showed, however, clearly that the regular supporters of the Government are far from easy at the situation which exists. The journal went even beyond the view I have arrived at. I hold that in two cases the union of the functions is desirable; one when a particular emergency requires unusual concentration; the other when, at the beginning of a Government, the First Minister has never been conversant with the Foreign Office and feels the want of being conversant with it. Such a rule would have applied to Lord Melbourne, Sir Robert Peel, Lord Derby, Mr. Disraeli, and others. But it is obvious to the House that neither of these cases is before us. There is no great international emergency to traverse at this moment. The noble Marquess opposite was enabled to learn the business of the Foreign Office between 1878 and 1880. My Lords, it may appear presumptuous in anyone to enter on a problem of this nature unless he has a long experience at Downing Street to back him or instruct him. But during the past autumn much light has been thrown on the mechanism of government, and distribution of employment by the Papers of Lord Melbourne, by the life of Lord John Russell, by the correspondence of the late Earl Grey with Princess Lieven, which are accessible to everyone. The first result of the connection—as it now subsists, at least—is that the Treasury is violently dislocated or divided from the power which for many generations has supported it. The experience of two centuries has led to the convention, or one might say, the conviction that the First Lord of the Treasury and the First Minister of the Crown ought to be identified. Since the time of Lord Chatham, who formed a Government in 1766 and took the post of Privy Seal, the practice I refer to seems to have been constant. However scattered in the House, there may be noble Lords who know that kind of history much better than I do. The system, so long matured and suddenly renounced, had grounds which are intelligible. The Treasury is constantly refusing money. To-night an instance was alluded to. Refusal to be tolerable must be based on policy, and no one but the head of the Government can urge with prudence and authority that such and such demands ought not to be complied with. The Treasury is also like the Supreme Court of the United States, enabled from time to time to keep Acts of Parliament suspended by withholding funds, without which they are unexecuted. There is a late example in the Public Offices Site Act. Now, such a power of revising Acts of Parliament can hardly be entrusted to an ordinary Member of the Cabinet, although it may be to the Leader, who reflects its general sagacity. But I attach no great degree of weight to the consideration of the Treasury. It is far more serious to recollect that the First Minister, according to all antecedent probability, must be overburdened, when he unites the general direction of affairs with the minute, far-reaching, and inexorable labours of the Foreign Office. I will not dwell on antecedent probability, although the topic is a fertile one. But what has been, my Lords, the recent observation of the country? Departments have appeared to reach a perilous autonomy. Bills have been improvised which might have been retarded with advantage. Things urgent and required have seemed to be obstructed or blocked up by things uncalled for and superfluous. Schemes based on prudence and necessity have been thought to yield to schemes whose parentage is doubtful, but which have been often traced to fanciful ambition and to impetuous philanthropy. Confusion must arise in Parliament when the First Minister, absorbed by diplomatic correspondence, has neither time nor energy to obviate it. The country has next observed the foundations of society impaired; the Constabulary and the military power shaken in allegiance. No doubt the danger is exaggerated, and must be till its latent cause is properly appreciated. But it might be thought at first that while the First Minister is decidedly a loser, the Secretary of State may be a gainer in proportion; that while at home there is a semblance of anarchy, there may be abroad a growth in energy or in efficiency. It is against all reason that it should be so. Foreign policy demands a great deal more, but yet I venture to submit that it demands in limine and as an indispensable preliminary strength in the Executive. It cannot flourish when all the world remark that the Executive is crumbling or weakened. Foreign policy, when ably conducted, is no doubt a bar to war, but the ability to go to war must yet be its foundation. No country is prepared for war when its police is undermined, and when the garrison of its metropolis, even to a limited extent, partakes of the infection. But on a general position of this kind men often differ in opinion. I am more inclined to look to circumstances which surround us. When there is a controversy with the United States as to the Behring Sea, with France as to Newfoundland, each tending to the chance of possible hostilities; when it is necessary to give up Heligoland, which could not but enhance our negotiating influence at Berlin; when nothing has been done to remove the danger long inherent in Bulgaria, or to revive the Ottoman assemblies, or to repair the Treaties of 1856, so vital to the Eastern Question, although we may acquit the Foreign Office of any strong reproach, although deficiency, much more than error, is imputable, although these difficulties may all have a happy settlement, it is impossible to urge that the union of the functions has led in that Department to any visible advantages. But if my estimate or survey is disputed, I retire from a strong to an impregnable position. The present union has one inevitable consequence, which, duly weighed, at least suffices as a reason for avoiding it as permanent or final. If anyone has meditated long enough on foreign policy he will arrive at the conclusion that two spheres of operation are related to it. One evidently is that of arrangement and adjustment in order to compose the differences, minute or large, which have sprung up between Great Britain and other independent Powers, such as a question on an Afghan frontier, or a parallel of latitude in Africa, or how far lobsters fall under the provisions of a celebrated Treaty. In that sphere—if I could judge at all—the noble

Marquess is a considerable master. But even there he cannot do so much as if the general direction of affairs was not absorbing and distracting him. The other sphere appears to be that of prosecuting, after deep reflection, changes, combinations which are good both for the honour of Great Britain and the tranquillity of Europe. Such was the Quadruple Alliance of Lord Palmerston, which required originating faculty to plan and to effect it. It would be easy, although it would not be desirable, to point out a series of measures not entirely dissimilar which merit grave consideration at this moment. In that higher sphere a Secretary of State, who, as First Minister, is responsible for every Department, every proposal, every appointment, it might, indeed, be said for every event, must be, no matter what his talent, helpless and incapable. It would be folly—with a mind so harassed and divided—to approach it. The utmost he can aim at is to put an end to complications of to-day, and to prepare for complications of to-morrow. He may be a plasterer, but he can never be an architect in Europe. However, granting, for a time, that arrangement and adjustment are the only business of the Foreign Office, that it ought not to aim at any objects more enduring, there is a practical objection to the present union which seems to me to be unanswerable. In these days it is essential that the Secretary of State should be at liberty, when an occasion calls for it, to visit capitals in which his influence is wanted. Since 1870, the Government would probably admit it, foreign policy has been to a great extent a struggle at Berlin between the counsels of St. Petersburg on one side, the influence of London on the other. Although to carry on that struggle we have had, in Lord Ampthill and Sir Edward Malet, two invaluable agents, it is important that the Secretary of State should throw his weight sometimes into the balance. M. de Giers, on the part of Russia, often does so. But it is not only at Berlin that the Secretary of State, in rare conjunctures, might exert a critical authority. Now, if he is first Minister, his duty to the Sovereign, the Cabinet, and public must retain him in this country, except when need for rest induces him to quit it. He cannot ever do so for exertion and activity. On the whole, therefore, it seems to be apparent that either function suffers by the union, when it is protracted. It is quite consistent with our general experience of human effort that it should be so. The sound direction of the whole, and the exact manipulation of a part, are seldom found together. The man who guides a helm can hardly labour as a stoker in the engine room. A general, directing armies, can seldom lead a charge of cavalry with profit. The bandmaster, who by the movement of a wand gives harmony to an orchestra would not succeed in doing so if he performed himself upon the kettledrum or trombone. At the same time I readily admit that the first Minister is bound to exercise a great control over the Foreign Office, although not technically leading it. We know from Mr. Lecky, the historian, who has investigated records, that Mr. Pitt composed a number of Despatches for the Foreign Office when his Ministry began. We know from the private secretary of Mr. Canning—and the fact is most impressive—that the last production of his mind was a State Paper upon Portugal, which he drew up while First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer. Unless I have been much deceived by statements current in political society, Lord Palmerston was ready as First Minister at given times to labour for the Foreign Office as he had done when connected with it. The noble Marquess has, indeed, sometimes, in a few words, defended the new system by pointing to inconveniences which showed themselves under the normal one. I readily admit them. They are patent to all who have been ever versed in the career and correspondence of the very statesmen I have mentioned. But it does not follow that because one method is imperfect, another may not be attended with hazards less to be endured. It might also be pointed out that the deficiencies of the established form admit of mitigation by safeguards easy to advert to. If the first Minister and Secretary of State approximate in views to one another; if they deliberately settle how to act in every probable contingency; if the First Minister is accessible at all times to any difficulties which the Foreign Office may present to him; if the Foreign Office never enter upon any new departure until the Sovereign and first Minister have previously endorsed it, the former system may do well—as it has under many Governments—down to the period when some transition in the country leads us to improve upon it. On the other hand, it would be difficult to mention any safeguards or conditions by which the [lasting] union of the offices would not continue, as it is at present, weakening to both of them. I have proposed to move for precedents, but doubt much whether any can be found since 1688 for such a combination. When Mr. Pitt came back to power in 1804 he may be thought to have united the two functions down to 1806, under the pressure of the war, although nominally First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer. With what deplorable results and tragic fate he did so, the pages of Lord Stanhope have explained, and it would well become the friends or colleagues of the noble Marquess to remember. Nothing which comes from me, nothing which transpires in the House, is likely to have much influence upon the Government. It ought not to be assumed that, because the present union has worked badly, a prompt or a precipitate correction of it would be useful. The good which I may partially effect, or have been led at least to contemplate, is that of drawing some attention, either here or out of doors, to the real origin of much which causes general disquietude. If men perceive that what has lately happened may be traced to a political experiment which ought not to be deeply blamed, however unsuccessful, they may recover equanimity and firmness, instead of looking to subversive remedies and revolutionary antidotes. The illustrious Duke, who often sits on the cross Benches, has frequently explained, in reference to military projects that “everything is tentative.” We are familiar with the maxim. The noble Marquess may have been fully justified in initiating such a change as he has hazarded, although it has not borne the fruit which he anticipated. An eminent authority, while leading in the other House of Parliament, once stated—

“The misfortunes of individuals and of kingdoms that are laid open and examined with true wisdom are more than half redressed, and to this great point should be directed all the virtue and all the talent of the House.”

Although the phrase may go too far, although the task it recommends may be too difficult, or little suited to the lassitude which marks the Session as it closes, we ought, I think, in some degree, to act upon the lesson it conveys to us. I, therefore, move according to the notice on the Paper.

Moved—

“That there be laid before the House any precedents that there may have been for the connection of the duties belonging to the First Minister with those belonging to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.”—(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell.)

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I think the noble Lord has undertaken a task which in itself is rather difficult. He obviously does not approve of the course which the Government has followed, and he has little confidence in us. That is a very proper and constitutional position, and I have no wish to complain of it. He thinks that I am guilty of many things: I am guilty of the mutiny of the Grenadier Guards or their insubordination; I am guilty of the fact that lobsters are not recognised as fish under the Treaty of Utrecht; and I am also guilty of not going circuit among the capitals of Europe in order to influence the various statesmen at the head of affairs in those countries. I do not think that the noble Lord opposite, my predecessor, did any better in that respect; but the noble Lord, while blaming me for those faults—and I have not enumerated one-tenth part of those which he has detailed—was kind enough to provide an excuse, and said that if only I had been Prime Minister without being Foreign Minister, or Foreign Minister without being Prime Minister, I should have committed none of these blunders. Well, it is very difficult for him to prove that. It is very difficult for him to prove that my blunders are not the result of my own innate incapacity and folly. And especially will he find it difficult when he finds that I am on the other side, and when I assure the noble Lord that, however difficult I find the two offices, if the two offices had been separated I should have done just as badly as I have done. That is the result of my own introspection, and I must entreat the noble Lord to abandon that kind effort to cloak my shortcomings which he has been good enough to invent. The consequence I quite admit, though I entirely demur to his mode of proving it. I say it is quite impossible for the noble Lord to indicate how much of my failings come from one cause, and how much from another. Still the question raised by the noble Lord is one of considerable constitutional interest, and I observed that it was raised in the other House by no less a person than the leader of the Opposition. I think Mr. Gladstone was equally in error. He stated that it was impossible for anybody to do the duties of the two offices unless he was possessed of almost superhuman energy and skill. I think he did what is very natural to do; he contemplated the situation from the position which he himself occupied. If he had said that it was impossible for any man to be Prime Minister, leader of the House of Commons, and Foreign Minister as well, I should have absolutely agreed with him. There is no doubt that it would be too much for any man; it would crush even a Napoleon or an Oliver Cromwell. But the matter is very different when the Minister sits in the House of Lords. I am not prescribing the arrangement as one for universal adoption, but it seems to me a very fair thing to do when it is convenient to do it. But the noble Lord appeals for precedents in the matter. It is not for me to decry Conservatism wherever I find it; but I confess that, while I have a deep respect for Conservatism in matters of substance, my respect for Conservatism in matters of form is very small indeed; and if a thing is more convenient now it does not matter two straws whether or not it was found more convenient to Prime Ministers 20, 30, or 40 years ago. In considering it I think a mistake is made in talking of the offices of Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary being united as though that was an extraordinary combination of offices. The office of Prime Minister is never held alone; it is always united with some additional office or another. The question is, what office should be united with it; whether it is more convenient to unite with it the office of First Lord of the Treasury or some other office? My Lords, that seems to me to depend very much upon the question whether the Prime Minister is in this House or the other. I am not disputing that there are many reasons why it is more convenient that the Prime Ministership should be held by a Member of the House of Commons; but, on the other hand, the labour of that House is increasing so enormously that I have my doubts whether, unless some change which we cannot forecast takes place, it will be always easy to find a man of that surprising vigour of body and intellect, combined the great knowledge of which Mr. Gladstone speaks and of which he has been an example. For an ordinary man I think the labour of leading the House of Commons and being Prime Minister at the same time is a very overwhelming task. But if you pass by that question, and assume that it is settled by events whether the Prime Minister is to be in this House or the other, I should say that, on the whole, it is less convenient that he should hold here the office of First Lord of the Treasury. If he takes no part in the duties of the Treasury, then he has really very little as First Lord to do; if he does take part in them, he divides the Treasury into two halves, and is probably a serious impediment to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In fact, so much has it been found a matter of difficulty to work those two offices separately, if the holders of them both take part in Treasury business, that it has constantly been the practice, as noble Lords will recollect, to unite the two offices of First Lord of the Treasury and Chancellor of the Exchequer. I confess from the little insight I had into the work that I do not think the tenure of the office of First Lord of the Treasury by a Member of your Lordships' House is very convenient; it is much better that the office should be held by a Member of that House in which Treasury questions constantly come up for discussion and are principally dealt with. Then as to the question, what advantage is derived with respect to foreign affairs from the Prime Minister not being Foreign Minister, I had the honour to serve under Lord Beaconsfield as Foreign Minister, and I occupied the inverse position towards my lamented Friend Lord Iddesleigh when he was Foreign Minister. My experience of that relation is, having been at both ends of it, that the Prime Minister interferes extremely little in the conduct of foreign affairs. Of course, he has to deal with those great questions which come before the Cabinet and are decided by it; but outside the class of Cabinet questions he has not that daily familiarity with what is said and done which enables him to interfere with advantage in the conduct of foreign affairs. I can imagine a Prime Minister—I have heard rumours of such—interfering a great deal in the conduct of foreign affairs, but, if it has ever been so, I am quite sure that whatever the ability of that Prime Minister may have been, he could have done nothing but harm, because no good can be done in the management of complicated affairs when the same string is pulled by two people who are differently qualified for the duty of pulling it by the amount of experience, knowledge, and daily information which they possess. I can quite imagine that if a Prime Minister thought it his duty to interfere too much with foreign affairs, it would cause confusion rather than advantage. These things must be matters of estimate rather than of judgment. My impression is, that the shortcomings which the noble Lord finds, and which I do not wish to deny, are shortcomings personal to myself and in no degree arising from the combination of the two offices; and that if it is otherwise convenient for the Government, it is a combination which may be wisely permitted, and which affects injuriously neither the general conduct of the business of the Government nor the conduct of foreign affairs in particular.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I have grave doubts whether any practical advantage would result from continuing this discussion, but, at the same time, I am the last person who would have the right to complain of the noble Lord's bringing it forward, because some years ago I dwelt upon the subject at considerable length, and gave a good many reasons, and went into considerable detail. My complaint at that time, I am bound to say, fell absolutely flat, but that complaint has now become more general; it is not confined to the noble Lord, but has taken a considerable hold of the public mind. There was one thing in which I was perfectly wrong, though I deemed it very likely at the time; my own conviction was that it would be impossible for the noble Marquess's physical strength to stand the great strain which filling the two offices would entail upon him. I am happy to say that I was completely wrong in that conviction, and nobody is more pleased that it is so than I am myself. With regard to the answer of the noble Marquess as to precedents, he said that he was not much of a Conservative as regards matter of form. Now, I must confess that, although I think that he is in some ways a strong Conservative, I have always thought there was a slight flavour of Radicalism about him. I have never concealed that from myself, and I rather think there is a disposition on the part of the present Government to throw aside, as matters of form, matters which have very often a great deal of substance in them. But when the noble Marquess says he doubts the usefulness, as a rule, of Prime Ministers taking a very great part in foreign policy, I am obliged to say, partly from my own experience and partly from what I have read, that Mr. Canning, Lord John Russell, Lord Palmerston, Sir Robert Peel, and Mr. Gladstone, all took the deepest and most constant interest in the supervision of foreign affairs when they were Prime Ministers, so that my experience and what I have heard is entirely opposed to that of the noble Marquess. I really cannot see the strength of the argument of the noble Marquess with regard to the position of the First Lord of the Treasury when he talks of the inconveniences of uniting the two offices of First Lord of the Treasury and Prime Minister, because really the work of the First Lord of the Treasury is very little more than a sinecure. He is the head of the hierarchy with regard to the national expenditure; he is in a position in which appeals are necessarily made to him. But as to the daily working of it really the office of First Lord of the Treasury is one which would not interfere in the slightest degree either with the other duties of the Prime Minister or with the duties of leading in the other House of Parliament. I quite admit that there is a great distinction between the offices being held by the Prime Minister in this House and being held by one who, at the same time, is leading in the House of Commons. I do not mean in the slightest degree to diminish the enormous difference; but I think there is so much that requires constant attention, and that the drudgery of the Foreign Office is so great, that there are great objections to this union of offices. Quite beyond the important questions to be settled, there are many things in which the Foreign Minister must take part, and with which he must show acquaintance when addressing Ambassadors and Ministers of Foreign Powers. He must be able to talk on the subjects of which they talk, though they may not be of vital importance, and the numbers of hours constantly occupied by any Foreign Minister in his work is enough to incapacitate him from undertaking the heavy duties of another office, too. I am unwilling to prolong this discussion, because, as I have said, I think it can lead to no practical result; but I do differ from the noble Marquess, and I adhere to my former opinion, not only with regard to the strength and powers of the individual who holds both offices, but I believe there is a very grave objection to having the two offices in one, because there is no longer the advantage of having a certain amount of check from one to the other.

*LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: I have no wish, my Lords, to prolong discussion by an answer, but am contented to leave to the general arbitrament what has fallen from myself, the noble Marquess, and the noble Earl who has just spoken. As the Government appear to be unable to furnish any precedents such as the Motion would require, I feel entitled to withdraw it.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILL.

(No. 203.)

Commons Amendments considered (according to order.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Perhaps, with regard to these Amendments, I may be allowed to say that I see no very great difference exhibited between those proposed in the other House and those to which I ask your Lordships to agree to. Mainly, the question has been with regard to the omission of Preambles of certain Acts of Parliament, and wherever it has been considered undesirable to omit the Preambles from the Acts of Parliament by reason of showing their purpose and object, I must advise your Lordships' House to disagree with the Commons Amendments; but in the greater proportion of the cases, I think we may safely agree to the Commons Amendments as made. One great distinction has been made, and I think wisely, by those who have had the consideration of these matters, that instead of an actual repeal of those portions of the Acts of Parliament consisting of Preambles and so on, there has been a reference made to them for the purposes of the authorised version of the Statutes. The effect will be that, should any question arise as to the existence or non-existence of those Preambles, or should any question arise as to the real meaning of those Acts of Parliament, they will still remain for purposes of reference, and they need not be printed again in the Revised Statutes. With that short explanation, I think it will not be necessary to do more than take the Amendments seriatim.

LORD THRING: It is a very great satisfaction to the Committee, of which I happened to be Chairman, that the House of Commons have taken up the question of the revision of the Statutes as they have done. That Committee recommended that the Statute Law Revision Bill should go further than my Committee ventured to propose without the authority of the other House. They have gone even further: they have made omissions of some very valuable Preambles. They have also, as stated by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, recommended the course of cutting out the Preambles; not that they should be repealed, but that a provision should be inserted in the Bill stating that in future editions those parts might be excised. A Committee consisting of Lord Herschell, the Solicitor General, Mr. Price, and several Members of my own old Committee, including myself, have gone carefully through the Commons Amendments, and we have acceded to all of them, as the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has stated. If your Lordships will accept that statement on my authority, I believe the preparation of the revised edition will progress very quickly.

Some of the Commons Amendments agreed to; some agreed to with Amendments; and consequential Amendments made to the Bill; some disagreed to; and a Committee appointed to prepare reasons to be offered to the Commons for the Lords disagreeing to some of the said Amendments: The Committee to meet forthwith.

REMOVAL TERMS (SCOTLAND) ACT
1886 AMENDMENT BILL, —(No. 206.)

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to order): Bill reported without further Amendment; and to be read 3^d to-morrow.

ELECTIONS SCOTLAND (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL, —(No. 158.)

Read 3^d (according to order) with the Amendments, and passed, and returned to the Commons.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION FOR STANDING COMMITTEES.

Report from. That the Committee have added to the Standing Committee for General Bills the Lord Chancellor and the Marquess of Salisbury for the consideration of the Marriages in British Embassies, &c., Bill, and to the Standing Committee for Bill relating to Law, &c., the Lord Ashford (V. Bury) for the consideration of the Directors' Liability Bill, and the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury for the Housing of the Working Classes Bill, read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILL
[No. 203.]

Report from the Committee of the reasons to be offered to the Commons for the Lords disagreeing to certain of the Amendments made by the Commons to the Bill; read, and agreed to; and a message sent to the Commons to return the said Bill, with Amendments and reasons.

STATUTE LAW REVISION (No. 2) BILL.

A Bill for further promoting the revision of the Statute Law by repealing enactments which have ceased to be in force or have become unnecessary—Was presented by the Lord Chancellor; read 1st; to be printed; and to be read 2^d to-morrow.—[No. 230.]

House adjourned at half past Six o'clock,

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 23rd July, 1890.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

BOILER EXPLOSIONS ACT (1882)
AMENDMENT BILL, —(No. 329.)

*SIR W. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I beg to move that the Lords' Amendments to this Bill be considered forthwith.

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I have no desire to prevent an agreement with the Lords in these Amendments; but I wish to point out that they are taken without notice, and that hon. Members know nothing of them.

*MR. SPEAKER: I felt that objection myself, and it is only in consequence of the hon. Member in charge of the Bill having given public notice that the Amendments would be considered to-day at this time that I have allowed them to be brought on.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Lords' Amendments be considered forthwith."

*MR. BRADLAUGH: My difficulty is this, that I do not know what the Amendments are.

*SIR W. HOULDSWORTH: The object of the Bill is to transfer investigations into explosions of boilers connected with mines from the Home Office to the Board of Trade. The Amendments are of a most formal and technical character.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I will not stop the Bill as I have really no knowledge of the subject; but I think it ought to be on record that the taking of Amendments without notice did not pass unchallenged.

*MR. SPEAKER: I only allowed the Bill to be brought forward without notice when I found that the Amendments were not such as to call for the attention of the House.

Question put, and agreed to.

Lords' Amendments considered, and agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

OPEN AIR PREACHING IN CALCUTTA.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that a bye-law has been just passed by the Calcutta Municipality, at the instigation of its Chairman, Sir Henry Harrison, prohibiting preaching in the open squares of Calcutta; whether he is aware that a similar attempt was made nine years ago and failed, being then declared a violation of Common Law; that Hindoos, Brahmists, as well as Christians, have long been in the habit of preaching in the open air, without let or hindrance; and that perfect quiet and order has prevailed at their assemblies; whether this prohibition, if not repealed, may be extended all over India, and would virtually prohibit the preaching of Christianity over a great part of the country, as much of the work is done in the open air; and whether he will call the attention of the Government of India to the subject?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of State has no official information on this subject, which is one of Local Government, but he understands that the bye-law in question is now under the consideration of the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, with whom the allowance or dis-allowance in the first instance rests.

EMPLOYMENT OF LABOUR IN INDIA.

MR. HOYLE (Lancashire, S.E., Heywood): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if the Government of India accepts, and will enforce in respect to the employment of labour in mines and in factories, the humane decisions to which Her Majesty's Government agreed at the International Conference recently held in Berlin?

*SIR J. GORST: The Report and proceedings of the Berlin International Conference have been sent to the Government of India for consideration with the Factory Bill now before the Indian Legislature. The Secretary of State cannot say how far the detailed recommendations will be applied to India, until the Government of India report their views.

MR. HOYLE: Does the right hon. Gentleman expect an answer soon?

*SIR J. GORST: No, Sir; from my experience of the Government of India some time will elapse before an answer is received.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): As we are now arriving at the close of the Session, may I ask the First Lord of the Treasury when we are to have the Indian Budget?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am unable to say. I wish it was in my power to say when the close of the Session would arrive.

SLAVERY IN THE SOUTH SEAS.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the attention of the Government has been called to a statement recently made by the Reverend John G. Paton, Missionary, regarding slavery in the South Seas, wherein he states that the Presbyterian Mission Synod at Kwamera, Tanna, New Hebrides, unanimously resolved that the Kanaka labour traffic has

"To a large extent depopulated the New Hebrides and adjoining islands, upset family relations among the natives, and has been, and is, the cause of much sorrow, suffering, and bloodshed among them on the islands;"

that he has himself seen white men in their boats taking Kanakas to a labour vessel, and by force lifting them on board, and when they tried to leap overboard to swim ashore, they were knocked down again and again on deck until they lay stupefied, and were so taken out to sea; and that he had been on board a labour vessel which had all the stout Kanakas that were likely to escape or give any trouble fastened under irons, and that the crew of the vessel had shot an Errumangan Chief dead while binding and taking his daughter away by force, they also shot one of his men who attempted to protect her, after which they took her on board the ship, and afterwards they shot dead one of the native Christian teachers; whether he is aware that this labour traffic, which was for a time suspended, has now been resumed, with a probability of the recurrence of similar treatment; and whether, under the circumstances, the Government will endeavour to put an entire stop to this labour traffic, in the interests of humanity?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): I have been furnished by the hon. Member with a copy of the newspaper containing Mr. Paton's statement, but it is not possible to take action upon it unless Her Majesty's Government can be furnished with the names of the vessels, and the colony from which they came (if they were British ships), together with the dates of these occurrences. If these particulars can be supplied, the fullest inquiry shall be made, with the view of bringing the perpetrators to justice if possible. I am not aware that the traffic had been suspended, but by a law of 1885 it is provided that Polynesian labourers shall not be introduced into Queensland after the end of this year. As regards Fiji, which is understood to be the only other colony where this kind of labour is employed, no complaints of ill-treatment have reached the Colonial Office, and I do not see that Her Majesty's Government are called upon to interfere.

WIRE-FENCING.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the finding of the Coroner's Court in an inquest on the body of Mr. John Dutton, of Davenham, Cheshire, to the effect that the cause of death was "blood-poisoning, the result of severe injuries to his arm caused by being dragged against a barbed wire fencing by a pony," and to the observations of the Medical Officer of Health at the meeting of the Rural Sanitary Authority of the district on the danger of wounds caused by barbed wire fencing; and whether he will take steps to amend the law so as to render illegal this description of fencing at the side of a footpath or a public highway?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): My attention has been called to a newspaper report of the proceedings at the Coroner's Inquest in the case of Mr. Dutton, of Davenham, and [also to the proceedings at the meeting of the Rural Sanitary Authority with regard to the case. As I understand, the injury which led to the blood-poisoning, which was the cause of the death, was the result of an accident. Mr. Dutton was leading a pony and the animal made a spring and knocked him into the hedge, and, in consequence of his finger being fixed in the halter, he was dragged along the wire of the fence. It appears from the evidence that the barbed wire was not immediately adjoining the foot-path, but there was a sort of gutter between the foot-path and the hedge. I cannot give any promise to propose legislation with regard to fencing of the character referred to.

INCOME TAX ON LODGING HOUSE OWNERS.

LORD HENRY BRUCE (Wilts, Chippenham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether houses which were not originally erected for letting as tenement dwellings, but which are now arranged and let as such, are held to be within the definition given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as being—"Constructed for the sole purpose of providing separate dwellings at rents not exceeding 7s. 6d. a week and approved by the Medical Officer of Health;"

whether houses let in apartments and boarding houses are to be treated as places of business in the same way as lodging houses; and what is the proper definition of lodging houses, and the correct method to be pursued to obtain registration or otherwise in order to obtain the benefits conceded to them in the present Session?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The answer to the first question of the noble Lord is, Yes. The proper definition of a lodging house is a house used for the main purpose of letting furnished lodgings as a means of livelihood, and the actual name employed to describe such houses is immaterial. In order to secure the benefits of the recent concession notice should be given to the clerk to the Income Tax Commissioners for the division in which the house is situated, and in case the application is disallowed there lies an appeal to the District Commissioners.

SALMON FISHERIES IN SCOTLAND.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate what are the intentions of the Government in regard to the Report and Recommendations of the Committee appointed to inquire into the Crown rights in salmon fishings in Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone the question.

CENTRAL FOREIGN PARCELS POST DEPOT.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether parcels reaching the Central Foreign Parcels Post Depot at Clerkenwell, for transmission to foreign countries and the colonies, are acknowledged by a sorter held responsible for their future safe custody, although his duty is fulfilled by placing the parcels in an open rack or basket, accessible to every person entering the department; whether such parcels, though in many instances of a valuable character, nevertheless remain for hours, and in some cases days, in such rack or basket, until actually required by the despatching officer when making up the foreign mails; and whether this officer has any check upon the number of parcels which should be in such rack or basket when making up his despatch?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): Foreign and colonial parcels are transferred from one part of the office at Mount Pleasant to another in sealed baskets, and whilst awaiting despatch are packed in sealed boxes or baskets, or locked cupboards. Only such persons as are employed in the foreign and colonial branch have access to them. Unless a system of registration were introduced it would be contrary to practice to keep a numerical check on foreign or colonial parcels.

DEBATES IN THE JERSEY STATES.

MR. F. W. MACLEAN (Oxford, Woodstock): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the Lieutenant Governor of Jersey claims a right to interfere with the freedom of debate in the "States," or Parliament, of that island; and, if so, whether the Lieutenant Governor has any such right?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have referred this question to the Governor, and he informs me that he has had no intention to claim, and does not consider himself entitled to claim, the right to interfere with the freedom of debate in the States of Jersey. The Governor has a negative voice or veto in the making of ordinances, but he has no right to interfere with the freedom of debate.

THE GOVERNMENT DOCKYARDS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, as skilled workmen are unable to ascertain on what principle they are paid, he would permit the posting of a scale of pay per week in Government dockyards?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The rates of pay per week are generally known to the workmen in the dockyards, and if there is anything with regard to his pay which a workman does not understand, he has only to ask his foreman or leading man. In the case of job and task or tonnage work the schemes of prices are not open to the inspection of the workmen, but any of the leading men or workmen, with the sanction of the principal officer of the department to which they belong, and in the presence of the measurer, are permitted to examine the measurer's account of their work, in order to satisfy themselves that such work has been accurately brought to account.

In reply to Mr. WOODALL (Hanley),

*LORD G. HAMILTON said: The difficulty of laying down a stereotyped schedule as regards piecework in the dockyards is that it cannot be applicable unless all the ships are also stereotyped as regards classification and internal arrangement. Therefore, as the introduction of piecework is not on a great scale, it has not been possible in advance to publish a schedule of the price. I will do all in my power to meet the views of the men.

NIGHT MAILS BETWEEN LONDON AND PLYMOUTH.

MR. WILLIAM M'ARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will re-consider the facts and arguments repeatedly laid before him by influentially-supported Memorials from upwards of 200 Public Bodies under seal or resolution, in favour of contributing towards the establishment of additional night mail trains between London and Plymouth; whether the proposed trains would very materially improve the postal inter-communication between almost every town west of Basingstoke as far as Penzance and the Scilly Isles, as well as to and from London, and especially between the Naval Establishments of Portsmouth and Devonport; whether he will consider the advisability of improving the existing postal arrangements between many of the towns in the five south-western counties by utilising the railways now traversing them, the mails now being conveyed by mail carts during the night for many miles; whether the proposed improved service has been approved by Her Majesty's Postmaster General; and whether the expenditure asked is small for the services to be rendered?

MR. JACKSON: In the absence of my right hon. Friend, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be good enough to postpone the question until to-morrow or next day.

BERMUDA.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary for War whether his attention has been called to a letter of Mr. Clarke, late of the Medical Staff Corps, in the Daily News, of 25th July, as to the military stations in Bermuda, stating.

"Last year we had a very bad epidemic of enteric (typhoid) fever, there being 139 cases and 22 deaths amongst the young soldiers of the Leicestershire Regiment. I sincerely hope the Guards will be more fortunate."

and what is the present information as to the sanitary condition of these stations?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY FOR WAR (MR. BRODBICK, Surrey, Guildford): It is true that there was an epidemic of fever in Bermuda from October, 1888, to February, 1889. Since then the health of the troops has been very good, the annual ratios of admissions to hospital and of deaths comparing very favourably with those of other stations. But I regret to say that a telegram has been received this morning stating that six men have been admitted into hospital suffering from enteric fever. The sanitary condition of the barracks is stated to be satisfactory, and every precaution will be taken as to the health of the troops.

LOCAL TAXATION BILL—POLICE BURGHS.

MR. HUGH ELLIOT (Ayrshire, N.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, having regard to the fact that police burghs do not fall under the administration of County Councils, it is intended to give them a share of the residue grant provided by the Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Duties Bill; and, if so, in what manner it is proposed to allocate the grant?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: My hon. Friend was good enough to direct my attention to the position of police burghs in regard to this grant, and he will see from the Notice Paper that the Amendment of my right hon. Friend is altered in such a manner as to give effect to his representation.

NAVAL ORDNANCE ADMINISTRATION.

MR. DUFF (Banffshire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the Inter-Departmental Committee on Naval Ordnance Administration which he recently referred to?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The Report has not been received by the Admiralty, and when received will require careful investigation as to the ultimate effect of its proposals. I cannot at present state when the Report will be made public.

MISSION STATIONS IN AFRICA.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what are the two British Mission Stations within the German sphere of influence in Africa; and whether, in the final delimitation of the boundary between the British and German spheres between Lakes Nyassa and Tanganyika, he will endeavour by friendly arrangement with the German Government to have included within the British boundary the Nyassa Mission Sanatorium at Kararamuka?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The two stations referred to are the Free Church Station of Ukukwe, to the west of the Songwe River, and the sanatorium mentioned, which is in the Livingstone Mountains, on the north-east of Lake Nyassa. The final delimitation is nothing more than a rectification in accordance with local requirements, and could not be made to include a transfer of the sanatorium to the British sphere; but its position in the German sphere will not in any way interfere with its usefulness. Some of us hope to visit German sanatoria shortly, and I do not think that we shall benefit by them the less on account of their not being under the British flag.

HORSE BREEDING.

MR. ALFRED PEASE (York): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can announce the intention of the Government to give effect to the recommendation of the Royal Commission on Horse Breeding in their Third Report, advising that the amount disposable for Queen's Premiums should be raised from £5,000 to £10,000?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir; it is not our intention to give effect to this recommendation.

CIVIL SERVICE COPYISTS.

MR. TUIITE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in the interests of the Public Service, the Government will consent to heads of Departments granting the writers a half-holiday on every Saturday in those Departments where such privilege is allowed to the Upper and Lower Division clerks; and whether in those Departments where the half-holiday is allowed on every Saturday to Upper and Lower Division clerks, it is the wish of the Government that the writers engaged in such Department shall have the half-holiday granted to them only on alternate Saturdays, although in most cases the writers have rendered longer service than the Lower Division clerks, and were for 14 or 15 years in some Departments allowed such half-holiday on every Saturday?

MR. JACKSON: The Order in Council of March 21, 1890, only authorises heads of Departments to allow Second Division clerks of half-holidays on alternate Saturdays provided that public business will permit; and heads of Departments have, as far as I know, no authority to go out outside the Order in Council. In these circumstances, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is unable to make any further concession to copyists in respect of Saturday half-holidays.

GWYLLWYR SETT QUARRY.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury the name of the person with whom negotiations are pending for a lease of the Gwyllwyr Sett Quarry, Pistyll, Carnarvonshire, when those negotiations commenced, and why they have not been brought to a termination; what are the terms demanded by the Commissioners of Wood and Forests as to dead rent and royalties, and what is the minimum with regard to time and number of men which they insist upon including in the proviso for re-entry; whether the Commissioners have received applications from more than one person or party for a lease; and, if so, in what order of date they received such applications; and when the last lease expired?

MR. JACKSON: I am not able to answer the question, because the negotiations are not complete; and it would be unusual to make a statement until they are complete.

NIGER TERRITORIES.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can yet state the purport of Major Macdonald's Report regarding the Niger territories, and whether it has or has not justified what has been done; and whether the Report, or the substance of it, will be communicated to the House before they are asked to pass the Votes in Supply for the offices dealing with this subject?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Major Macdonald's Report was intended to be confidential. It is of a very detailed character, and cannot be communicated. Indeed, it will receive further and more particular consideration. A principal object of his work was to furnish Her Majesty's Government with materials for considering the question of extending the charter over adjacent districts. He was further to inquire into certain points under discussion with Germany, with the result that satisfactory explanations have been exchanged during the recent negotiations at Berlin. In addition, he was to examine the administration of the Royal Niger Company, with regard to which, while pointing out certain imperfections, he describes it as in the main highly satisfactory as to progress, system, and observance of the charter.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES.

MR. J. M. MACLEAN (Oldham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will endeavour, before the Vote for the Stationery Office is taken, to procure from the Hansard contractors particulars of the cost of furnishing reports of the proceedings of the Standing Committees, similar to the report contained in the experimental number of Hansard of the 8th instant?

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question, I wish to ask whether he will ascertain at the same time what would be the cost of extending the reports of the proceedings of this House and of supplying a copy of Hansard to each Member of the House?

MR. JACKSON: The question asked by the hon. Member opposite was carefully considered by the Committee before the recent arrangement was made, and the Committee were practically unanimous upon the subject. There was one Member who took a different view; but with that exception, the Committee were unanimously against the proposal. With regard to the question of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Maclean), it relates to a subject which has not been brought under my notice; but I need not say that it is a matter that would require very careful consideration.

ABINGER GLEBE.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether, now that Abinger Glebe has been sold, he will lay upon the Table the Correspondence with the Land Commission on the subject, and especially the letters of Sir T. H. Farrer?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I am not aware of any grounds on which it would be desirable, in the public interest, that the Correspondence with the Board of Agriculture on this subject should be laid upon the Table. I am afraid it would tend to destroy that free communication with the Board which it is desirable to maintain in these cases.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Will the right hon. Gentleman lay on the Table a copy of the letters in question?

MR. CHAPLIN: I am not sure what letters the right hon. Gentleman refers to. Some of Sir T. Farrer's letters are marked private I know, but there is nothing in the correspondence which I should desire to withhold, and, subject to his consent, I shall be very glad to show the letters to the right hon. Gentleman if he desires it.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND REVENUES.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Return of the revenues of the Church of England, which was expected in June, will be laid upon the Table of the House before the end of the Session?

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member is aware that this Return was formally presented to Parliament at the end of last month. The proofs are still with the printers, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners inform me that it will take a week at least to check the proofs, owing to the great mass of figures that have to be corrected. I hope, however, that it will be found possible to place the Return in the hands of Members before the end of the Session.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will now state under what Law of the Imperial Parliament, or the Newfoundland Legislature, or in virtue of what prerogative of the Crown, the instructions to Naval Officers on the Newfoundland Coast have been framed; and whether a copy of these instructions will be laid upon the Table of the House?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: As it is believed that the legality of the action taken under instructions will be brought before a Court of Law it is undesirable to reply to this question. The tenor of the instructions to the Naval Officers will be found at page 384 of the correspondence respecting the Newfoundland Fisheries lately issued.

COMPOUNDING FOR RATES.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he will inquire if it is the fact that towns in Scotland which are counties in themselves do by special Acts compound with landlords for rates on rentals of £4 and under?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: None of the Scotch towns are counties in themselves, except in so far as Edinburgh is styled the County of the City of Edinburgh. In several of the burghs there are special Acts having clauses to the effect stated.

COURT OF SESSION.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he will state the effect of the recent Act of Sederunt in reducing the arrears of cases in the Court of Session; and whether counsel and agents have given the assistance that might be expected in attending when cases have been called?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I am glad to be in a position to inform the hon. Member that the business of the Court of Session as regards the amount of arrears is in a satisfactory state, due no doubt to the effect of the recent Act of Sederunt and general assistance given by counsel and agents.

PERPETUAL PENSIONS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury on what date he will, in fulfilment of the undertaking given on 16th May last, afford the House the opportunity of passing its opinion upon the Motion, of which notice has been placed on the Paper, disapproving the Treasury Minute of 15th July relating to perpetual pensions?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I hold to the undertaking given on this subject

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

MR. BRADLAUGH: We are getting on close to the end of the Session, and no date has yet been fixed for the Indian Budget.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I am aware of that; I wish we were closer.

TITHES IN WALES.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the renewal of organised resistance to the payment of tithe rent-charge in Montgomeryshire, and to the riot which occurred on the 12th of July at Llanfihangel, in that county, in which Major Godfrey, the Chief Constable, was struck, and Mr. Craft, the auctioneer, repeatedly kicked by the mob; and whether the Government will take steps to ensure the punishment of those who enter into illegal combinations to defeat the law?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The Secretary of State has received a Report from the Chief Constable, who states that there was no organised resistance to the payment of tithe on the occasion in question, nor has there been in that county for the last three years. It is not the fact that the Chief Constable was struck. The auctioneer was once kicked, but not seriously. In each case the amount distrained for was recovered, and the Chief Constable attributes what slight disturbance there was to the fact that insufficient notice was given to him of the levying of distraint, and time did not allow of the adoption of those conciliatory measures which have hitherto been successful in securing the due enforcement of the law without disturbance. The Chief Constable states that there is no evidence whatever of any illegal combinations to defeat the law. Were such evidence forthcoming in this or in any other county, the Government are prepared to take steps to bring to punishment any such offenders against the law.

CONSTABLE OF CARNARVON CASTLE.

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury upon whose recommendation the senior Member for Devonport (Sir J. Puleston) has been appointed to the constableness of Carnarvon Castle, as successor to the late Lord Canarvon; and whether he is in a position to state the grounds which led to a disregard of the expressed wish of the Carnarvon Town Council in the matter? I would also ask whether it is the fact that the hon. Member (Sir J. Puleston) has appointed the Conservative agent as Deputy Constable?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The appointment of the senior Member for Devonport as Constable of Carnarvon Castle was made by the Crown on the recommendation of the Prime Minister, to whom questions of this nature should be addressed in another place.

SIR J. PULESTON (Devonport): There is no foundation for the statement made by the hon. Gentleman, who has made me the subject of a question without precedent in this House.

TREASURER OF MIDDLESEX.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Treasury have decided that the late Treasurer of the County of Middlesex, who had held that appointment for 18 years until the office became abolished on the London County Council coming into existence, is not entitled to any compensation, notwithstanding that he was, in the words of the Local Government Act, Section 120—

"An existing officer who by virtue of this Act, or anything done in pursuance of or in consequence of this Act, suffers direct pecuniary loss by abolition of office or by diminution or loss of fees or salary;"

if so, on what grounds was such decision arrived at; whether the opinion of the Law Officers was taken upon the question; and, if so, whether the Government would allow such opinions to be perused by the late Treasurer; whether the following grounds, to which among others the above-quoted section directed that regard should be had, namely, the nature of his office (virtually a life appointment), the duration of his service (18 years), and all other circumstances of the case, were duly considered by the Treasury before arriving at their decision; and if the Government consider for any technical reason that the case is not within the Act, will the Government in any future Bill propose enactments to remedy the omission?

Mr. David Thomas

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The office of Treasurer of the County of Middlesex has not been abolished, but Mr. Allen has been removed from it. He held the office under the provisions of the Act 12 George II., cap. 29, and the 11th section of that Act gives power to the Court of Quarter Sessions to remove the Treasurer at pleasure. This power is, by the Local Government Act, transferred to the County Council, whose officer the Treasurer had become. The exercise of the power of removal given by the earlier Statute was not anything done in pursuance of the Local Government Act, and that Act, therefore, did not give the Treasury any power to award compensation to Mr. Allen. The Law Officers of the Crown were consulted in the matter, but their opinions are confidential documents, and I cannot undertake to present them. Nor am I prepared to introduce a Bill to extend the power of compensation given to the Treasury by the 120th section of the Local Government Act.

MALTA.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that an Ordinance was passed by the Council of Government in Malta in 1867, "to amend the laws relative to the rights and duties emanating from marriage and the separation of married persons;" whether his attention has been called to the fact that this Ordinance refers to the "Codice de Rohan," certain provisions of which it repeals and amends; whether the said Ordinance provides that a separation pronounced by any other Court than the Civil Court, produces no civil effect, and likewise "repeals and abrogates any other law or custom contrary to or incompatible with the provisions of this Ordinance;" and whether he will cause a copy of this Ordinance to be laid upon the Table of the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The answer is in the affirmative to the first three parts of the hon. Member's question. A copy of the Ordinance will be laid on the Table, if desired, but the Ordinance does not affect the law regulating the celebration of marriage.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that the "Codice de Rohan," which was the main body of law in force in Malta at the time of the British occupation of the island, treats of the subject of marriage (Dritto Municipale di Malta, Libro Terzo); and whether he will cause a copy of this Code to be placed in the Library of the House.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The "Codice de Rohan" treats of the subject of marriage as regards the effect upon property, but not as regards the mode of celebration. I do not know whether a copy of the Code can be procured for the library of the House, but I will inquire.

BIRMINGHAM MINT COMPANY.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask whether the two officials of the Mint who acknowledged holding shares in the Birmingham Mint Company are still holding appointments in the Company?

MR. JACKSON: The two officials in the Royal Mint who held shares in "The Mint, Birmingham (Limited)," never held appointments under that company, and parted with their shares as soon as they were called upon to do so.

THE CASE OF MR. BERNARD DUNN.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if Mr. Bernard Dunn has been discharged from Woolwich Arsenal; whether he can state the reason for Mr. Dunn's dismissal; whether Mr. Dunn supplied a great deal of the information which enabled the Government to hold the inquiry in 1887 with regard to the "inspection and reception of leather, &c.;" and how many of the Inspectors and Viewers who were proved before the Judge Advocate General to have passed in bad material are still in Government employment, and how many of them have since been promoted?

MR. BRODRICK: Mr. Bernard Dunn was dismissed from the collarmakers' shop, Royal Dockyard, Woolwich, on March 29 last. The reasons for his dismissal were insubordination, he having published a pamphlet containing false statements about superior officers, and about the department in which he served. Dunn did give evidence before the Judge Advocate General as to the inspection and reception of leather, and his evidence was stated to have "more or less" corroborated that given by Mr. Moody, the principal complainant, who has since been promoted. No particular case was sustained against the Inspector or Viewer, and no man known to have passed in bad material has been promoted.

IRELAND—LORD MASSEREENE'S TENANTS.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether his attention has been called to an agreement alleged to have been made between Messrs. Emerson & Dudgeon, solicitors and emergency agents, and Lord Massereene, by which Messrs. Emerson & Dudgeon agreed to charge only costs out of pocket in the case of proceeding against tenants which were unsuccessful, and, in the case of proceedings which were successful, to look only to the tenants for payment, being equivalent to an agreement to indemnify a party to an action against the greater part of the ordinary costs of the action, not from charity, but with a view to profit, and a stipulation for payment of the full costs only in the event of success in the action and out of the sum to be recovered therein; whether Messrs. Emerson & Dudgeon, in making such an agreement and acting in accordance therewith, were guilty of champerty and maintenance; how many of Lord Massereene's tenants were proceeded against in the High Court at dates subsequent to the making of the agreement; whether, having regard to the large number of persons who have suffered, or who, owing to their poverty, are unable to avail themselves of their civil remedy, he will consider the advisability of resorting to the old Common Law process of indictment for champerty and maintenance; and whether he will call the attention of the Law Society to the matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I must ask the hon. Gentleman to defer the question.

THE BARONY CONSTABLE OF KERRY.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how much of the £2,484 5s. due by Arthur Hutchins, barony constable in Kerry, when he ceased to hold that office, was collected, how much was collected in the baronies of Glanerought and South Dunkerron respectively, and for how much were the landlords, as occupiers or otherwise, and the tenants liable respectively; whether the amount of defalcations was re-apploited, and thus paid twice by the cesspayers; whether Stokes, one of Hutchins' sureties, was in receipt of retiring pension from Grand Jury, and for what amount; whether Grand Jury appropriated part of said pension to meet Hutchins' defalcations; whether he can state what was the nature of the proceedings instituted by the Grand Jury, on the advice of counsel, against Hutchins' securities for recovery of his defalcations; whether it is the intention of the Grand Jury to proceed to recover interest as well as principal from the sureties; and who was responsible for the fact that Hutchins was allowed to retain so much money in his possession in contravention of the Act of Parliament, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 32?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As already stated, I have no official knowledge in regard to the subject-matter of this question, which is not a matter under the control of the Government. The secretary to the Grand Jury, however, reports to the effect that—1. There are no means of ascertaining the information sought in the first paragraph; 2. The amount of defalcation has not been re-apploited, as it is hoped that it will be recovered from the sureties; 3. Mr. Stokes was in receipt of £400 a year retiring allowance; 4. 5. 6. The Solicitor to the Grand Jury reports that, acting on counsel's advice, they did not proceed for an attachment against Mr. Stokes' pension. The defalcation was at July Assizes, 1884. Judgment was entered up against Mr. Hutchins and each of his sureties on the 10th December following, and legal mortgages got in 1885. It is stated not to be practicable at present to realise the amount, mainly owing to the fact that the interest of one of the mortgagors is one expectant on the termination of a life now at 77 years. These mortgages, as a matter of course, bear interest. 7. I am not in a position to state whether or not responsibility attaches to any person for allowing the money collected to be retained in contravention of the Statute quoted.

Mr. Kilbride

MR. PERCY MAGAN, J.P.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the charge against Mr. Percy Magan, J.P., of having obtained money by false representations, made publicly nine months ago, and to the promise of Mr. Magan to the Land Commissioners immediately to forward an explanation, has Magan taken any steps towards its fulfilment; with reference to the statement that Magan's solicitor has died, would he ascertain the name of the solicitor, in what case in connection with the tenants named has he acted at Quarter Sessions or otherwise, and when he died; what length of additional time will the Land Commission give to Magan to make out his explanation, having regard to the fact that, with the lapse of time, proof of guilt may get more difficult; and whether, in the event of the Land Commission being of opinion that there is a prima facie case on which Magan may be proceeded against for the recovery of the money alleged to have been fraudulently obtained, steps will be taken to bring the matter before the Lord Chancellor?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The matter is at present under consideration.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES.

MR. TUIE (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now state when the £10,000 to be allotted to Ireland for the erection of labourers' cottages will be apportioned among the different Poor Law Unions; and can he state the rule by which the contribution to each Union will be fixed; and, if so, what are the amounts to which the Mullingar and Delvin Unions will be entitled?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to defer the question until the matter comes before the House in the ordinary course.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): When will the Supplementary Estimate be brought in?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will put that question to the Secretary to the Treasury at the end of the questions.

FALSE ARREST BY IRISH CONSTABLES.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government intend to pay the expense of defending the constables against whom Mr. Fahy and Morrissey obtained decrees for £5 and £2 at last Quarter Sessions held at Gort for false arrest; also the cost of appeal which was heard before Judge O'Brien at Galway Assizes, he confirming the County Court Judge's decree, with costs; and whether he will state what course he will adopt in reference to the conduct of the constables?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The facts of the case are as follow:—Morrissey is a bad character who has been convicted of assaults on the police, of drunkenness, and of boycotting. Both he and Fahy are, on their own evidence, energetic agents of the Plan of Campaign in a district where that illegal conspiracy has been specially prolific in outrage. They were found together about 10 p.m., and it appears that Fahy was going home with Morrissey, whom the Chief Justice truly described as a bad character. They were arrested by the police under the Peace Preservation Act of 1881 of being illegally possessed of arms. Fahy, it appears, had a licence to carry arms; but he thought fit not to produce it, and the Chief Justice stated that he brought all the trouble that afterwards befel him upon himself. There can be no doubt that the police acted in bonâ fide discharge of their duty, and, therefore, their expenses will be paid.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is aware that an appeal was taken to the Galway Assizes, and that Mr. Justice O'Brien confirmed the decree of the County Court Judge, with costs against the police? Yet the right hon. Gentleman now states that the police acted strictly according to their duty.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I did not say the police acted rightly, but that they acted bonâ fide, and that the mistake was not of such a kind as would justify the Government placing the costs upon them.

MR. DILLON: Are we to understand that the police against whom decrees have been given for false arrest and imprisonment are not to be punished, but are to be defended in their action by the whole support of the Executive Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is not to deduce any general rule. It must depend on the circumstances of the case. The Chief Justice positively refused the request of the solicitor for the plaintiffs to increase the amount of damages.

MR. SEXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that these men were arrested and detained in custody all night, and that no charge was made against them?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The charge upon which they were arrested was that of the illegal possession of arms.

MR. DILLON: These men were arrested on a charge of illegal carrying of arms, and were kept in gaol all night. Why did not the police search the men?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The police, under the Act in question, had no power of search.

PROSECUTIONS AT BANTRY.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the prosecutions at Bantry, on Tuesday, 22nd instant, in which nine men were sentenced by Captain Welch and Mr. Cecil Roche, Resident Magistrates, to one month's imprisonment each, at hard labour, and at the expiration of the month's imprisonment to find sureties for good behaviour for a further period of six months; is he aware that defendants' counsel applied the sentences should be increased, to enable the defendants to appeal, but the Magistrates refused the application, and that counsel thereupon asked the Magistrates to state a case for the Superior Courts, on the ground that the facts proved did not amount to an unlawful assembly, but this application was also refused; and, if the facts be as above stated, whether he will explain why the defendants' right of appeal was thus denied to them?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe that eight men were sentenced on the occasion referred to. The Magistrates proposed to deal leniently with the cases if the men would promise not to offend again, but this they refused to do.

MR. SEXTON: Is it not the invariable practice in the English Courts to grant an appeal in the event of a prisoner desiring to have the case considered by a Superior Court?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am under the impression that an appeal would not be granted as a matter of course.

MR. MC CARTAN (Down, S.): Every prisoner in England is entitled to an appeal under the Summary Jurisdiction Act. Will the right hon. Gentleman direct the Magistrates to increase the sentence, so as to afford an appeal?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should not like to answer that question offhand, without notice.

LIGHTKEEPERS.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I had intended to ask the President of the Board of Trade what period of leave is annually allowed to lightkeepers in Great Britain; whether the practice in Ireland is not to allow any leave; and if there is any sufficient reason why the Irish and British lightkeepers should not be treated alike in this respect. But I will postpone the question until to-morrow.

SOLICITORS' INDENTURE FEES.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, although in 1866 the Solicitors of Ireland were entirely separated from the Benchers, a sum of £14 in respect of each indenture of a Solicitor's apprentice has since been, and still is, appropriated by the Benchers; whether the sums so appropriated by the Benchers, from 1866 to the present time, amounts to £22,876; whether the body of Solicitors have derived any sort of advantage from this money; whether the Benchers have now accumulated to their credit a fund of over £50,000; whether a copy of the correspondence on this subject between the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland, the Benchers, and the Treasury, will be laid upon the Table; and whether the Government will take any steps to institute a reform of the system?

MR. JACKSON: A sum of £14 in respect of each indenture of a Solicitor's apprentice has been assigned since 1791, and still is assigned by Act of Parliament, to the Benchers. I am not aware what sum has been received by the Benchers since 1866, or how they have applied it. The case presented by the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland to the Treasury has been submitted to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and is now under his Lordship's consideration, and it does not appear necessary to lay the correspondence on the Table.

MR. SEXTON: When will a decision be announced?

MR. JACKSON: It does not rest with the Treasury, but I shall be happy to make inquiry.

DUBLIN PORT AND DOCKS BOARD.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, at the meeting of the Dublin Port and Docks Board on the 19th ultimo, Alderman Kiernan, who attended as the duly constituted locum tenens for the Lord Mayor of Dublin, a Member of the Board, was obliged by the majority of the members to retire without taking part in the business of the meeting, although he produced his letter of appointment?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no information. The proceedings of the Dublin Port and Docks Board do not come under the cognisance of the Government.

MR. SEXTON: Is not the Docks Board nominated by the Corporation of Dublin?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know that that is so. I believe it is constituted under a local Act.

THE IRISH POLICE AND EVICTED FARMS.

MR. FINUCANE (Limerick, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mrs. Mullally, who was evicted from her holding on the Modeshill property, Mullinahone, County Tipperary, about three years ago, was re-instated about four months since at a rent fixed by arbitration; whether her house has been and is occupied by policemen since her eviction, who have refused to leave though often asked by Mr. Hartford, the agent; whether he is aware that Mrs. Mullally's farm is about three miles from her present residence, to which she is obliged to bring the milk of her dairy cattle twice a day; and whether, as the object of the Government in sending policemen to the Modeshill Estate was to protect the emergency men who were herding 30 evicted farms, to which all the former tenants have been restored, the policemen will now be ordered to leave immediately?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that the evicted tenant referred to was re-instated about 10 weeks ago. The house has been occupied as a temporary police barrack, under agreement, since 13th December, 1889. Possession does not appear to have been ever demanded by Mr. Hartford. The tenant's present residence is three miles from the farm, but it is not the case that she has cattle on the farm, nor does she carry milk to and from it daily. The caretakers were caring not 30 but 20 evicted farms. Consequent upon the former tenants being re-instated necessity no longer exists for affording personal protection to the caretakers, and steps are accordingly being taken to abolish the temporary police station in question.

EMERGENCY MEN.

MR. FINUCANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether on 23rd July two emergency caretakers, named respectively Johnston and Thompson, were fined five shillings at New Pallas Petty Sessions, County Limerick, by Major Roleston, R.M., for firing four revolver shots in the village of Pallas on 5th July; and whether these men had a licence to have and carry arms; and, if so, will their licences be revoked?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is the case that the two men referred to were fined as stated in the question. The matter of revoking their licences is at present under consideration.

EVICITION OF TENANTS ON THE COAST OF CORK.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government intend to supply Mr. Marmion with a gunboat or with the boats of the Coastguard to aid him in evicting tenants on the Middle Calf or West Calf Islands, off the West Coast of Cork?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No such application has been made so far to the Government. A gun might be given to enable the Sheriff to carry out a decree, but it would not be lent to a landlord for eviction purposes.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Will the Government employ gunboats in protecting the Irish fisheries?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not able to answer that question.

MR. FLYNN: Are the Government bound to provide gunboats for the Sheriffs in order to enable the Sheriff's officers to visit remote islands, and in that case would it not be right to make the landlord pay the expenses?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should be sorry to lay down any general principle without having time to inquire into the matter.

MR. JUSTICE HARRISON.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In reference to the notice of Motion which has been given by the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), I wish to read the following letter which I have received from Mr. Justice Harrison:—

“ Newtown Park House, Blackrock, County Dublin, July 26.

“ Sir,—I observe in the report of yesterday's proceedings in the House of Commons that Mr. Dillon gave notice of a Motion impugning my conduct and the language of the charge recently delivered by me at the Galway Assizes. Of the terms of that notice I am not as yet aware, but, whatever be its character, I have no reason to shrink from Parliamentary inquiry into this or any other action of mine as a Judge of the High Court in Ireland. The meaning in which I used the words to which exception has been taken—a meaning which I believe was placed upon them by those who heard them—has been fully explained in my letter to you of the 23rd inst. To this explanation I can add nothing. It is to me a matter of deep regret that an error, even though it be only an error in language, should lay my observations open to a construction which assuredly was as remote from my thoughts when I spoke as it is in contradiction to every principle of law which for almost 23 years I have endeavoured to lay down from the Bench. I think I may say with confidence that no member, either of the Bench or Bar, would for a moment entertain the idea that I had directly or indirectly advocated the use of illegal methods for the redress of private wrongs, however intolerable those wrongs might be, and if among the general public there be (as I think there are not) any who hold a contrary opinion, I trust this letter, which I authorise you to use in any manner which you think right, may dissipate an impression not less unjust to me than injurious to the administration of justice.

“ I remain, Sir,

“ Your obedient servant,

“ MICHL. HARRISON.”

MR. DILLON: I think the opportunity is favourable for asking the leader of the House when I shall be able to bring forward my Motion on this important subject. I may mention that the construction which I put on the learned Judge's charge has been put upon it by several newspapers in Ireland which advise that it should be carried out by the people of Eastern Galway.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): While thinking that the question should come most appropriately from my hon. Friend, in the absence of any one else, I shall be glad to put the question to the right hon. Gentleman.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am exceedingly sorry to be compelled to refuse anything in the shape of a request from the right hon. Gentleman, who has had such great experience in the practice of this House. I do not think I should be doing justice to the House or to the learned Judge if I were to afford the opportunity which the hon. Member now desires after the full and complete explanation which has been given. I have referred to precedents, and I find that a Motion was made in 1834 impugning the conduct of Mr. Baron Smith, and a Committee was granted; but immediately after it was granted Sir R. Peel rose in his place in the House, and moved to rescind the Motion on the ground that—

“To appoint a Committee was evading the law, which required an Address from both Houses of Parliament to authorise the removal of a Judge; because if that Judge were a man of honour, and if the House implied the slightest censure against him, his own sense of propriety would tell him that he could no longer remain effective as a Judge.”—(Hansard, Third Series, vol. xxi., p. 745.)

I am of opinion, and I say it with great respect to the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Gentleman, that the learned Judge has given a full explanation, and that if a Committee were appointed, as the hon. Gentleman desires, to inquire into the conduct of the learned Judge, and into the step which should be taken by this House, those consequences must follow which Sir R. Peel indicated in 1834. I cannot think it possible that the House would appoint or entertain the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, after the full and complete explanation which has been given. I think, therefore, I must ask the hon. Gentleman, if he desires to persevere, to find for himself an opportunity at a later period of the Session, as I should not feel justified in interrupting the business of the House.

Mr. Dillon

MR. DILLON: I am astonished at the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, who has made a reply of a very argumentative character. In my opinion, and in that of many others, the learned Judge has given no explanation whatever. On the contrary, the learned Judge has accepted the language imputed to him, and has simply said that the interpretation put upon it is not that which I have put upon it in this House, and which is put upon it also by the great mass of the Irish people. I think I have an indefeasible claim to bring this question to a discussion. The right hon. Gentleman has quoted the opinion of Sir R. Peel, but he forgot to quote the opinion of Lord Althorp, of Lord J. Russell, of Lord Palmerston, and of the Irish Secretary, Mr. Littleton, on the other side. Under these circumstances, and with these precedents, I am entitled to ask the right hon. Gentleman to reconsider his decision. The right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that it is impossible for us to bring this question to an issue without the co-operation of the Government, and that a refusal to grant me the permission, without which I cannot bring the subject to a discussion, amounts to an inducement to Irish Judges of that character to use what language they choose.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Allow me to point out, in supporting this appeal for re-consideration, that there is this additional reason for it: that since the question was addressed to the right hon. Gentleman he has not merely refused the application, but he has made a speech in which he has given, as he thinks, conclusive reasons against it. That is a position in which any fair-minded person would not leave the question.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I did not make any speech, but I thought it only courteous to the hon. Gentleman and to the right hon. Gentleman to give some explanation. The House is in possession of the whole of the facts which by any possibility could be elicited.

*MR. LEVESON-GOWER (Stoke-upon-Trent), who was received with loud and repeated cries of “Order,” asked to be allowed to point out that the learned Judge had himself admitted that he had used the language, and courted an inquiry.

THE REVOLUTION AT BUENOS AYRES.

MR. J. MACLEAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs a question of which I have given him private notice—whether he can give the House any information as to the revolution at Buenos Ayres?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I do not know that I can add anything to what has previously appeared in the public papers, but this telegram was received to-day. It is dated Buenos Ayres, 6.45 p.m., July 27:—

"Revolution still proceeding. Heavy firing this morning. Four men-of-war declared for insurgents, and bombarded position belonging to Government troops. President left Buenos Ayres yesterday. Vice President remains. Hostilities have temporarily ceased, armistice until 10 to-morrow morning having been agreed to. Her Majesty's ships Beagle and Bramble here. Town tolerably quiet for the moment."

CHARGES AGAINST MINISTERS.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) what he intends to do with respect to the Motion which stands on the Paper in his name under the head "Charges against Ministers"? [The Motion was as follows:—

"That this House deems it necessary to declare that when a Member of this House prefers a charge against a Minister of the Crown, which charge is denied on behalf of the Minister, such Member ought not to be restrained from refusing to accept such denial and persisting in his charge by reason that the Minister is a Member of the House of Lords."]

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: With respect to this notice, which has remained on the Paper longer than I intended, I have to say that the notice was given under the impression that there was some difference of opinion on the subject, which it would be desirable to clear up. A subsequent communication left upon my mind very distinctly the conviction that there is no difference on the subject, and that being so I desire to withdraw the Motion.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: In consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to give notice that I will move—

VOL. CCCXLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

"That, in the opinion of this House, the Rules of Debate ought not to discriminate (except so far as is now the practice with regard to proceedings in the House of Lords) between Peers and other persons not being Members of this House."

In a day or two I will ask whether the First Lord of the Treasury will be disposed to state what view Her Majesty's Government may take on the subject.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. SEXTON: When will the Supplementary Estimates be brought on?

MR. JACKSON: In the course of a day or two.

MR. BRYCE: Can the First Lord of the Treasury name a day for taking the Foreign Office Vote?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sorry to say that I am unable to do so at present.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD: Will the Irish Census Bill be taken to-night, and will the right hon. Gentleman indicate an hour after which it will not be taken?

MR. HANBURY: Is it intended to take the Committee on the Scotch Police Bill before the Report stage on the English measure?

*CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): Can the right hon. Gentleman hold out any hope as to when the Navy Estimates will be taken. And will an opportunity be then afforded for the discussion of the Report of the Royal Commission from a Naval point of view?

MR. ESSLEMONT: And when will the Committee on the Education of the Blind and Deaf Mute Children (Scotland) Bill be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Irish Census Bill will not be taken this evening, unless we get through the Local Taxation Bill before 11 o'clock. The Education of the Blind and Deaf Mute Children Bill will not be taken to-day, and I am unable to say when it will. In regard to the Scotch Police Bill, I am afraid we must adhere to the Order of Business as it is now laid down. We propose to proceed with the English Bill first, and then to take the Scotch measure. As to the Navy Estimates, I hope it will be in our power to reach them early. The Post Office Estimates and the Foreign Office Vote will be taken first, and then we propose to proceed with the Navy Estimates.

DACOITY IN BURMA.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermonth): I beg to ask the Under Secretary for India as to statements which appear in the newspapers this morning, that a certain dacoit taken in Burma had been promised that if he surrendered he would not be executed, but, notwithstanding that promise, he is now to be executed by the authorities. Is there any truth in the statement?

SIR J. GORST: I must ask for notice of the question.

SIR W. LAWSON: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will promptly inquire into it.

THE ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT BILL—A PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I ask permission of the House to make a short personal explanation as to an incident which appears to have occurred in the Debate on the Heligoland Bill on Thursday, when I was not in the House, and which affects me personally. I am glad to see that the Attorney General has just entered the House, because, although I have no reflection to make upon him, he is concerned in the statement I have to make. I, having contended very strongly in that Debate that the question of cession lay entirely with the Crown, the hon. and learned Gentleman is reported to have made a citation from an answer made by me to a question in 1870, put to me by Sir John Hay, as to the cession of Gambia. I replied that, according to my belief and impression, the Crown had no power to make that cession. I was not surprised to see in the report that the statement drew forth loud cheers. It would have been most disrespectful to the House if I, having made such a contention, had passed over the fact that I had declared a contrary opinion. The fact is, that the hon. and learned Gentleman is entirely mistaken. He cited a portion of the question put to me by Sir John Hay, not the whole of it.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon; I read the whole of it.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I think that the hon. and learned Member was not reported as having read the whole of it, but I am glad to hear that he did. He supposed that my statement about the power of the Crown related to the cession of Gambia. But Sir John Hay's question referred to two matters, and not one. It did include the question of cession, but it likewise included an arrangement with France, giving to France the great arterial communication with Africa—that is to say, making an arrangement with France which would have been compulsory, as I understood, on the subjects of Her Majesty with regard to territory which was no part of the territory of the Queen. As to the right of cession, I may observe that in 1843 and 1854 and 1863 I had, as a Cabinet Minister, been a party in two cases to direct cession by the Crown, and in the third case to the cession of a Protectorate of the Ionian Islands, which included many of the same elements, but had no reference at all to the question of cession. The answer I made, and the declaration of my belief and impression, that the Queen did not possess the power had reference exclusively to that portion of Sir John Hay's question which referred to territory not within the dominions of Her Majesty. I quite understand that the hon. and learned Member may have felt that that part of the question was immaterial, but whether it was, or not, it was to that question I replied—Sir John Hay's question embraced both points—that I did not believe such an arrangement could be made without the assent of Parliament, because it contained one portion to which the Crown could not give effect without the assent of Parliament. It was, perhaps, bold of me to give that opinion, but the reason was that I had been studying an important question of the same kind with regard to the Hudson's Bay Company's charter, which was a charter granting rights to British subjects outside the British dominions; and I had arrived at a very strong conviction that such a right was not in the power of the Crown. It was to that I referred in the answer I gave.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I claim permission to explain to the House how the matter stands. The House is aware that Her Majesty's Government had not the slightest notice, direct or indirect, that the question was going to be raised. I obtained by accident, by communication with the Foreign Office, after the "right hon. Gentleman's speech, information which led me to suppose that the question had been raised in connection with Gambia; and without going further than I am entitled to do—I will show the right hon. Gentleman the Papers, if he desires to see them—I was perfectly justified in coming to the conclusion that the question had been raised and discussed distinctly with reference to Gambia. After the right hon. Gentleman had left the House I had no means of communicating with him, and having to reply to the right hon. Member for Derby I, with the assistance of the Solicitor General, found out this reference in Hansard. I will read the question and the answer as I read them the other night; and although I accept, as I am bound to do, the explanation given by the right hon. Gentleman, as to what he had in his mind, there is not a single word in that Report which could possibly lead any one to the conclusion which he now asks the House to come to. Let the House be the judge. Neither am I aware of any Report that puts upon the question and the answer the construction, which I understand the right hon. Gentleman wishes it to bear. The first question was put by Mr. Robert Fowler (now Sir R. Fowler) to Mr. Monsell, who was then the Under Secretary for the Colonies—

"West Coast of Africa—The Gambia Question.

"Mr. R. Fowler said he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is true that negotiations have taken place with the view of the transfer of the settlement of the Gambia to the Emperor of the French.

"Mr. Monsell: In answer to the question of the hon. Gentleman, I beg to inform him that communications have passed between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of France, having for their object the determining the limit of English and French influence on the West Coast of Africa, and that the transfer of Gambia to France is one of the steps under consideration as part of that arrangement. It may be well to state that in 1868 the European population in Gambia numbered 39 males and eight females.

"Afterwards—

"Sir John Hay said he would beg to ask the head of the Government whether it is possible that the settlement of Gambia and the great arterial communication of Africa can be conveyed to France without the consent of Parliament.

"Mr. Gladstone said that though he was taken by surprise by this question being put, still he might say that his impression was that such an arrangement could not be carried out without the consent of Parliament. He could not answer positively, but that was his impression and belief.

"A little later in the afternoon the right hon. Gentleman added that what he had already said had reference to the power of the Government—to the question whether there was power in the Government or not. He added that there never had been the slightest intimation of taking any proceedings of the kind without the consent of Parliament."

I have read every word, and I am perfectly certain that no one reading that answer could possibly come to the conclusion that the right hon. Gentleman, in answering the question, specifically referred to the great arterial communication of Africa, and had not referred to the cession of Gambia. The question is distinct; there is no reservation in the question, and the answer is categorical. Of course, I was not in the House in the year 1870, but I went to the only possible authority, and I read verbatim the other night the Report from Hansard. If the right hon. Gentleman wishes it I shall be glad to show him privately the document to which I have referred.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: Of course, I make no charge against the hon. and learned Gentleman. I by no means undertake to say, for I do not recollect, what exactly may have taken place in the Colonial Office or the Foreign Office; but the hon. and learned Gentleman argues very illegitimately that my answer must be taken as referring to everything that Sir John Hay's question contained. No; Sir John Hay asked whether Her Majesty's Government intended to do two things, one within the power, and the other entirely beyond the power, of the Crown. I answered that no such step could be taken without the consent of Parliament, having reference to that which was beyond the power of the Crown.

ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT BILL

[LORDS].—(No. 393.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

Clause 1.

(4.45.) MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I desire to move an Amendment to provide that the proposed cession of Heligoland shall be subject to the consent of a majority of the male inhabitants of the island, such consent to be obtained in the manner hereinafter described. As long as I have the honour of a seat in this House I shall do my best to protect the interests of the people. The cession of this island may be a small thing; of course, we know only 2,000 souls live on it; but, so far as we know, the cession has been rashly agreed to, and in no way—either directly or indirectly—has the consent of the inhabitants been asked. The island has been in our possession 83 years; three generations of the inhabitants have been loyal to us, and yet this cession was made in a rash and hasty manner, without their feelings being consulted. So recently as the 2nd June a Cabinet Minister pronounced against the cession, yet on the 1st July we have the Agreement produced. I look on this as a matter of vital importance, and I warn the Government that one result will be to excite a dangerous feeling in the colonies if you once let it be supposed that they are held simply for the benefit of a class or a Minister in England. We are in the position of Trustees to these islanders, and we have no right to do anything which is not for their benefit. I think there were ample means of obtaining a fair index of the opinions of the people, as they have for four or five years had a Constitutional Government. On the occasion of the cession of the Ionian Islands the opinions of the people were consulted. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 14, before the first word "the," to insert the words "subject to the consent of the majority of the male inhabitants of Heligoland as hereinafter provided."—(Mr. Mac Neill.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(4.53.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): It has been admitted from the first that the people of Heligoland were not formally consulted. It would be extremely difficult, if not practically impossible, to submit for the decision of the inhabitants a great Agreement with the German Empire, of which the cession of Heligoland is an essential part, and the Government cannot assent to the Amendment. The Constitutional Government to which the hon. Member has referred consisted of a Governor, assisted by a Council of paid officials.

MR. MACNEILL: Yes, I know that a few years since the island was made a Crown Colony.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Well, 'we could not set up a new constitution ad hoc. The hon. Member also said something in the nature of a general proposition as to the action of the Government towards the colonies being entirely dependent on the necessities of the moment. But I laid down no such general rule. As cases arise they must be judged upon their merits. We cannot accept this Amendment, because it is utterly impossible for Her Majesty's Government to consent to any modification of the terms of the Bill, which is destined, I hope, to be productive of great good to the British Empire.

(4.56.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton): I think my hon. Friend was amply justified in moving the Amendment, because the Debate on the Second Reading hardly touched the great constitutional question whether the inhabitants of any portion of the Empire can or ought to be handed over to another Power without some consultation of their wishes. It is quite absurd of the right hon. Gentleman to contend that this proposal would mean referring the whole Agreement to the inhabitants of Heligoland. It does not follow that, as a result of the consultation, the views of the majority should determine the policy of the Empire, but that they should be heard before their destiny is decided. The case of the Ionian Islands has been referred to as constituting a precedent. That was merely the cession of a Protectorate, and not a cession of territory. But that only makes the argument stronger. What was Lord Palmerston's answer when questioned on the course to be taken as to the Ionian Islands? He said that the first thing to do was to ascertain the wishes of the inhabitants, and the next thing was to obtain the consent of the other parties to the Treaty. When it was asked how the wishes of the people were to be ascertained, Mr. Chichester Fortescue said the obvious course was to have a new Parliament elected in the Ionian Islands and to refer the question to that Parliament by proclamation. In regard to the Island of Heligoland, we have seen exactly the opposite policy adopted. Obviously, the Prime Minister considers these people of no consequence whatever, except as mere objects of barter, in order to purchase certain privileges in Africa. This question is mixed up with other questions that I may not, perhaps, be free to discuss on this Vote, but I do urge on the House the necessity of recognising this great and noble tradition of Great Britain in dealing with populations under our rule. I look on this Bill as one of the cardinal errors of Her Majesty's Government in their foreign policy, and I regard it in that light on wider Imperial grounds besides this simple ground to which my hon. Friend has referred. But this ground touches the traditions and constitutional order of proceeding of Great Britain in parting with subjects under her rule in a way so important, and raises so serious an issue that I sincerely hope the hon. Member will proceed to a Division.

(5.4.) MR. W. A. MCARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell): I do not know whether it is of any use to further protest against this arrangement. We, at any rate, have cleared our consciences of what we consider the shame of this barter of British subjects, for all we know, against their will. But the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs opens up a vista of still further cases of this kind, for he has told us that each case as it arises will be treated on its merits. I must say our opposition would be very different—would, in fact, be one of strenuous resistance and obstruction—if we thought the case of the cession of Heligoland was to be made a precedent; and if we thought that this Government had any idea of making other changes of this kind in order to conciliate other powers than Germany, I can understand that the case of Heligoland is a case quite by itself—that it is unique—but if there was any idea of proceeding on this policy for the sake of making things pleasant for our diplomacy in Europe, I confess our feelings as to this Bill would be completely changed. I would ask an explanation from the right hon. Gentleman of that ominous sentence to which I have referred, namely, that all cases as they arise will be treated on their merits.

(5.7.) MR. ATKINSON (Boston): I see no shame whatever in what has been proposed in connection with these people, but, on the contrary, I think it is a proposition which recommends itself to all who understand it. I may say that if I had been in the House the other night I should have voted for the proposal of the hon. Member for the St. Austell Division, not on the ground he put forward, but on the ground that I always expected that partition of the British Empire if it came at all would come from the hon. Member and his Party. I intended to vote against the present Government doing it, as I know very well that if the hon. Member and his Party came into power they might propose to give up Gibraltar, Malta, and a few other inconsiderable portions of the Empire. That would be "shameful." I see no shame in giving up Heligoland. I have been 30 or 40 years connected with shipping in Hull, which port has done the greatest business with the Elbe—

THE CHAIRMAN: The question before the Committee is not the cession of Heligoland, but as to requiring the consent of the inhabitants.

MR. ATKINSON: I went into this simply because the hon. Member opposite was allowed to do so. I would call attention to paragraph No. 4 of the Treaty.

THE CHAIRMAN: There is an Amendment before the House, and that must be first disposed of.

MR. ATKINSON: Very well, Sir. Then I will sit still until the proper time arrives.

(5.9.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I may say I voted for the Bill, but no one has taken more strongly than I have the view that populations ought not to be voted over to alien powers like so many sheep. The present is a peculiar case, however. Provision is made for the inhabitants of the island, and we have reason to believe that opinion is not unanimous, or, at least, that it is divided, on the subject, and that there is no general resistance to the proposal on the part of the inhabitants. I do not agree that a plebiscite should be taken, and that the majority should decide; neither do I regard the Agreement as handing over the island to an alien power. Formerly the island belonged to Schleswig, and it will again form part of Schleswig. It was only occupied by this country for military purposes, and to take a plebiscite here would hamper the Government in its dealings with other places only occupied for military purposes. Gibraltar is nothing more than a nest of smugglers, who make a living by getting contraband goods into Spain. I do not think we should take a plebiscite in a place like that. An enterprising newspaper, which I do not admire, despatched a Commissioner to Heligoland to obtain the views of the inhabitants. From the boatmen, who form the majority of the inhabitants, the Commissioner learnt that they are opposed to the transfer of the island to Germany, because they fear Germany will make a steamboat pier and a way to the bathing island, which will deprive them of the charge of 1s. per head they make for every passenger landed in the island. I must say that a consideration of this kind does not form a sufficient reason why England should retain possession of an island which it is inconvenient she should keep.

*(5.14.) MR. CHANNING: As the hon. Member has not proposed a practical method of obtaining the opinion of the people of Heligoland, I would suggest that the Government might very well have sent the amiable and accomplished Under Secretary for the Colonies or some other Delegate acquainted with the language to visit Heligoland, in order to ascertain the feelings of the inhabitants. His recent expression of opinion would have given them confidence in stating their views. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) the other night reminded us that during the Franco-German War the Heligolandians declared that they did not wish to do an ill turn to Germany. That was perfectly natural, seeing that the islanders depended then just as they do now on German visitors for their livelihood. However, in reply to the argument of the senior Member for Northampton, I would point to a letter written to the Times in 1876 by a Prussian, who stated that he had been some years in Heligoland, and that, while sympathising with the desire of his countrymen to possess the island, there was not the remotest desire on the part of the islanders to leave English for German rule, and that this absence of sympathy with Germany was proved in the Wars of 1866 and 1871. It is obvious, therefore, that the Heligolandians dislike the transfer. Only a year or two ago they got the Governor to pass a law preventing the Germans from acquiring the land in Heligoland. Their whole wish is to continue free.

*(5.18.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): Although there may be only 2,000 inhabitants in Heligoland, they are human beings, and human beings, whatever their numbers, have individual rights. You may do as much wrong by ignoring the rights of a dozen people as you could by ignoring the rights of a thousand. I do not think numbers should form an element of consideration. We have heard how some of our leading statesmen have held that the transfer of British subjects to an alien Power should not take place without the consent of the people affected, and I would remind the Committee that we have even the example of foreign countries to guide us in this matter. In the case of the transfer of Savoy to France, a plebiscite of the inhabitants was taken, and I very much regret that in the present case Her Majesty's Government have acted contrary to that principle. I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but having voted for the cession of Heligoland on a former occasion, I wish to explain how it is that I shall vote for this Amendment now.

(5.20.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): If my hon. Friend goes to a Division in this matter I shall certainly follow him into the Lobby. If the Government wish to be at all fair I think they have an opportunity open to them in connection with this Amendment. It would certainly go far to satisfy my mind if the hon. Gentleman could satisfactorily answer this question: Is it a fact that one of the reasons why Heligoland is to be given up is that, in the event of a war with Germany, Great Britain would not be able to protect the island? If that is the case it would be better to give Heligoland up, and so perhaps save the people from the horrors of war. It seems to me to be a bad mess altogether. It is a case of swap. The Heligolanders have certainly got the worst of it, and some concession ought to be made to their feelings.

(5.23.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I think it very doubtful whether we ought to make this agreement dependent upon the assent of the Heligolanders. Heligoland did certainly form part of Germany. [Cries of "Denmark."] Hon. Gentlemen do not seem to remember that there was a union between Holstein, Schleswig, and Denmark. Schleswig, with the full assent of its people, is now a portion of Germany. I really do not see why, in the case of a great Treaty like this, the people should be consulted, or why they should wish to remain British when they are only British by conquest. If they are not a very contemptible set of people, they will certainly wish again to become Germans. We have been told that Mr. This and Mr. That have gone over to Heligoland and whispered to some of the people, and have learnt that they are ready to die rather than desert the British flag. I attach no importance to that sort of thing. If a man's patriotism is of such a character that he dare not come forward and state his views, because he is afraid if he does so he will be unable to let his lodgings to Germans, I do not think we need pay much attention to what he says. I believe these people will be much happier as Germans than as Englishmen. The newspapers tell us that land in Heligoland is going up considerably in price in consequence of this agreement. I have no doubt the people will be able to let their lodgings, or sell their land.

An hon. MEMBER: And go away.

MR. LABOUCHERE: No; they need not go away. They will take in lodgers. They will stay and prey upon those lodgers. Germany could in a moment oblige these people to declare that they are in favour of belonging to Germany by simply boycotting the island, and declaring they are not going to it in summer. The island absolutely depends on summer visitors there, the fishing amounting really to nothing. These people understand how their bread is buttered. They were afraid at first they would have to pay higher taxes, or be subject to conscription. Directly it became clear to them that neither of these things would happen, as far as I can gather from the public press, and the statements of the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, they became anxious to join the German Fatherland. In point of fact, during the Debate on the Second Reading, I cited a very interesting document signed by these British patriots in 1871, in which they declared they would not supply pilots to the French fleet, and said their sympathies were German.

(5.28.) SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): The answer to my hon. Friend is this. If these people are so full of sympathy for Germany, why not let them say so?

MR. W. A. M'ARTHUR: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will reply to the question I put to him.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Surely the hon. Gentleman cannot suppose that there is any intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government to cede any other British possessions?

(5.29.) MR. W. A. M'ARTHUR: I supposed it possible, because to-night for the first time it has been laid down as a principle that cessions of territory are to be made. We have previously been told that the cession of Heligoland was an exceptional thing.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I was asked whether the principle was to be of universal application, and I said no one ever heard of a British Colony wishing to be separated, but that every case must be dealt with on its merits.

MR. MAC NEILL: Most distinctly these people wished to remain with us, and a more shameful betrayal of the rights of people who have been associated with the British Empire for years can scarcely be recorded. It is not the less a shameful instance because a small one.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I do not support this proposition, because I do not see that we should care any more for the interests of the Heligolandians than we do for the interests of the people of Bechuanaland, and of other South African territory which you are now handing over to Germany.

Ayes 56; Noes 172.—(Div. List, No. 205.)

(5.45.) MR. ATKINSON: I have an Amendment to propose, which may perhaps occupy only a few minutes. When we conquered Heligoland we made an arrangement that the privileges of the inhabitants should be continued, and one of those privileges was that they should not be called upon to serve in the King's Ships. The clause now before us does not give quite as good terms to them, now that they are transferred to another Protectorate, without any conquering having taken place. The clause is—

"All persons natives of the territory thus ceded, and their children born before the date of the signature of the present Agreement, are free from the obligation of service in the Military and Naval forces of Germany."

I wish to add—

"Service in the Naval forces of Germany shall never become obligatory on persons natives of the territories thus ceded, or their descendants."

My argument is that you should give them as good terms as they had from us when we conquered the territory. I am perfectly certain, from what I know, that the Emperor of Germany is very much delighted with his bargain. I know that he considers that he has proved to the world that he has done as clever a thing without Bismarck as could have been done if we still had Bismarck. I know that from the attitude he has taken, and from the meteor-like shower of stars and decorations that has taken place since he made this bargain. I believe it is our duty to insist upon the terms we propose, because up to the present time we have had to take care of the interests of the natives of Heligoland.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have to point out that this cannot be moved as an Amendment to the Agreement entered into, and which is contained in the Schedule. It may, however, be moved as a proviso to this clause.

MR. ATKINSON: I do not object so long as it is moved.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 14, after the word "Germany," to add the words—

"Service in the Naval forces of Germany shall never become obligatory on persons natives of the territories thus ceded, or their descendants."—(Mr. Atkinson.)

*(5.50.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I fully appreciate the feeling of my hon. Friend which has induced him to make this proposal, but I must remind him that Her Majesty has entered into an Agreement with the Emperor of Germany, and that it is not possible for us now to insert these conditions. We will do what we can to represent to the Emperor of Germany the desirableness of exempting these persons from Naval Service. I have no doubt that the consideration which has been promised for the native laws and customs will have the effect which the hon. Member desires. My hon. Friend will see that one of the conditions is that native laws and customs now existing will, as far as possible, remain undisturbed. And I should certainly imagine that these laws and customs would prevent the Heligolandiers for Naval Service under the German Crown. One point my hon. Friend has failed to observe, that every person at present in Heligoland may opt for British nationality, and if he exercise that option he and his children and his grandchildren will be exempt from Naval or Military Service under the Crown. The greatest possible care has been taken to preserve to every person now living in the island the rights which they at present enjoy under the British Crown. I trust, therefore, my hon. Friend will accept the assurance that we will do everything in our power to secure the continuance of those privileges. The inhabitants of Heligoland should take what we have done as some evidence of our concern and desire to secure these privileges for the inhabitants. I hope my hon. Friend will not press his Amendment to a Division.

MR. ATKINSON: I wish to point out that what has been done is subject to the assent of Parliament. I, as one Member of Parliament, should not give my assent were I not certain that the Government will do their utmost in the matter.

(5.54.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I confess I cannot understand how the right hon. Gentleman can think that a provision with regard to usages and customs is capable of preventing the imposition of the obligation to Military Service. The provision seems to me clearly intended to apply to usages and customs in the nature of local customary law, and not to the Military and Naval Service to which other German subjects are liable. When the right hon. Gentleman speaks of the rights of a person to opt, a term which I confess I regret to see used, as it is not English, does he mean that the children of that person, born after the signature of the Agreement, will remain of British nationality, their father having elected to remain a British subject? If we are assured that this is so—and no doubt such would be the rule under English law—it will, I think, make a good deal of difference in the opinion of the Committee, and we shall feel less anxiety with regard to Heligoland than we do now.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: There is no doubt at all about the matter. I am perfectly correct in the statement I made in answer to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. We now know by the opinion of German prints that a child born in the German Empire of alien parents is not a German subject, nor, again, his children, though the rights of German nationality may afterwards be acquired. Therefore, the children and grandchildren of those who opt remain British subjects.

(5.56.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I think this Amendment is a move in the right direction; but it should apply both to Military and Naval Service. If the Amendment of the hon. Member were not accepted, I should move that the children of the Heligolandiers for 20 years should not be liable to Military Service. I am putting the limit at 20 years. I do not go so far as the hon. Member for Boston. I would like to point out that the whole contingent from Heligoland for the German Army would, at the rate of one out of every 200 of the population, be only 10 men a year. That is the whole number the German Emperor would lose, if this Amendment were carried, and then the inhabitants of dependencies of the British Crown would know in future that they were not liable to be handed over to compulsory Military Service, which is not in accordance with the spirit of the British nationality, excepting in the very last resort.

(5.57.) MR. ATKINSON: My reply is simply this. I go by the original Agreement in which there is no mention of the Military Service, and, therefore, I could not accept the suggested Amendment to my Amendment.

DR. CLARK: The Amendment is totally unnecessary. The third clause really gives the Heligolandiers everything they could possibly ask, and had they remained Schleswigiers they would have been required to give both Military and Naval Service. If these people go back to the Fatherland, they ought to bear the burdens which are imposed on all the other subjects of the German Empire. I shall vote in this case, also, with the Government, if they determine to keep the Agreement as it stands.

*(5.58.) MR. CHANNING: My hon. Friend is quite mistaken as to the position of the Heligolandiers. It is perfectly clear that they had a traditional privilege, and that privilege was laid before the English Commanders in 1807, when the island was taken. The evidence in favour of that privilege was so strong, that in the Articles of Capitulation it was agreed that the privilege should be maintained in perpetuity to the population. It is obviously useless to labour the point. I think the matter has been managed in the pettiest and most pusillanimous way by Her Majesty's Government. It would have been far better had they dealt with the matter boldly. We have given Germany an enormous boon in handing over to her this island of immense strategic value, and we might at least have asked that those traditional privileges should be maintained. Are any effective means whatever being taken to make known to this population, which is evidently somewhat behind the times—I am told that there is no current newspaper circulated in the island—as by notices the steps which they ought to take in order to retain British nationality?

(6.0.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am in a position to say that the fullest information has been given to the people of Heligoland of the conditions attached to the Agreement in their favour. I have had separate and independent testimony that, generally speaking, the Heligolanders have expressed themselves thoroughly satisfied; and when there was reason to believe that they were dissatisfied before they were totally unaware of the liberties secured to them.

MR. MAC NEILL: Satisfied! They had only Hobson's choice. In reference to the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Boston, I say that the people of Heligoland are entitled to total exemption from Naval Service. By the 10th Article of the Treaty under which Heligoland was capitulated, they had full privilege of exemption; indeed, they enjoyed at that time higher privileges than Englishmen, who were subject to the press gang system. The Heligolanders have behaved well towards us during the interval, and their vested interests and rights should be now guarded to them under this Agreement, unless we are entirely under the thumb of the Germans—perhaps we are.

(6.2.) MR. BRYCE: I hope the Committee will not divide on this Amendment. We have made our protest, and it seems unnecessary to divide.

MR. ATKINSON: My Amendment was moved with the object of carrying out the Agreement, but having regard to the assurance of the First Lord of the Treasury that the Government will do all they can, I beg to withdraw that Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

COLONEL NOLAN: I wish now to move my Amendment—

"Provided Clause 3 be so amended as to include exemption from Naval and Military Service, children born of native Heligolanders within 20 years after the cession of the island."

Though a more moderate Amendment, it is more substantial than that of the hon. Member for Boston, because the natives would now be more liable to Military than Naval Service. I do not say that we are bound to keep the Heligolanders for ever from the German Empire, but I think the limit of 20 years, which I propose, is a reasonable time. When the German Emperor sees that such a mild Amendment has passed through the House of Commons, and when he remembers that he only loses about 10 men a year, I have no doubt he will accept the proposition.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 15, after the word "Act," to insert the words "Provided that clause three of article twelve set forth in the Schedule be so amended as to include in the exemption from military and naval service the children born of native Heligolanders within twenty years after the cession of the island."—(Colonel Nolan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(6.5.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I think the hon. Gentleman will see that it is absolutely impossible for Her Majesty's Government to accept this Amendment. Very large privileges have been secured to the people of Heligoland, and these conditions have been guaranteed to the German Government. Let us consider what they are. Every person now in Heligoland will be exempted from compulsory service, and he may also, if he chooses, opt for British nationality, which would extend to his children and his grand children. I venture to think that the House does not wish to put the Government in such an unworthy position as to go back to the German Emperor to ask for this consideration.

COLONEL NOLAN: I am perfectly astonished to hear the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs talking about what is unworthy. It would be most unworthy not to ask for this condition in the Agreement, and the whole of Europe and America would think it very shameful on our part if we did not ask for it. On what authority does the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs say that the Heligolandiers are satisfied? Though he speaks truthfully, yet he is liable to commit a great inaccuracy on the present occasion, and I believe he would find evidence not so absolutely affirmative as he thinks.

MR. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets): The law has been that children born in a country that has been ceded after the signature to the Treaty, are not entitled to the nationality of their parents. That was laid down some years ago in a case in which I was very much interested, and where the children, born of English parents in Hanover, were not, after the signature to the Treaty of cession, allowed to vote at elections in this country.

DE. CLARK: I take my standpoint on common sense. The Heligolandiers have 18 months further to choose, and if they elect to become German subjects, they have a right to bear the burdens which are imposed on other German subjects. If they desire to be English subjects, then before the 1st January, 1892, they can choose to be British subjects. Everything the Government could ask has been asked, and they ought not to ask for any further privileges.

MR. MAC NEILL: I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the tone he has adopted does not tend to facilitate discussion, that we are making a disgraceful bargain, and that the right hon. Gentleman makes no reference to that fact. We are giving up everything for nothing, so let us not hear that this is an Imperial bargain.

(6.10.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 68; Noes 191.—(Div. List, No. 206.)

(6.20.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): Mr. Courtney, I wish to move an Amendment, which I venture to think will be accepted by Her Majesty's Government. The Amendment I wish to move is, in line 17, to leave out the words "that appears to Her Majesty." I think that all the words after the word "Act," in line 15, are really unnecessary on the theory of the Bill which was laid before the House the other night by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, who gave to my mind the best explanation that has been afforded of this Agreement. It is really a conveyance, and nothing but a conveyance, of this island to the Emperor of Germany. The Emperor of Germany is advised by very able jurists, who know that the Sovereign power in England is not Her Majesty the Queen but the Imperial Parliament, of which Her Majesty is the head. I can conceive that it has been said to the German Emperor that the reserved power of the British Parliament cast a sort of cloud upon his title to Heligoland, and that it was prudent for him to ask that the assent of Parliament be specifically given to this Instrument. That, I think, to be in substance the view of the Attorney General. I must say it is a very tenable view, and one which removes all constitutional objections which have been taken to it. If that is the real purport of this Agreement, I venture to think that the Act itself ought to be restricted to this specific purpose of the conveyance. If I am right the Act is a mere instrument by which Parliament is co-proprietor of this island; and, therefore, it seems to me that these words, although unnecessary, from my point of view, are harmless. But there is one phrase which appears to me distinctly objectionable, and that is the phrase "that appears to Her Majesty." As a matter of law there can be no doubt that Her Majesty has power to direct that which is necessary for the proper carrying out of this provision. But I submit that the subsection goes further than that, and that it gives to Her Majesty the power to do everything that seems to Her Majesty to be necessary. Now, that is a different thing. Of course, I am entitled to take extreme cases in arguing against those words, and although I do not suppose for a moment that the power would be in any way abused, nevertheless the words, literally construed, would grant powers which this House could not for one moment sanction. I mean that the discretionary power contained in this phrase would make it legal for Her Majesty to do that which would otherwise be illegal.
Sir J. Ferguson

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 17, to leave out the words "that appears to Her Majesty."—(Mr. E. Robertson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*(6.27.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I think the hon. and learned Gentleman will see that the words are necessary in order to give Her Majesty a certain amount of discretion in carrying out the provisions of the Act of Parliament. Her Majesty takes such steps as may be advised to be necessary by the Law Officers of the Crown, upon whose discretion the responsibility rests. It is a common form, and not mere surplusage. It does no more than leave with the Executive Government the discretion and responsibility.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries): I do not know that it is a very important point that my hon. and learned Friend has raised, though it seems to me that he is right. I am not aware that it is a common form, though the right hon. Gentleman may be more familiar with the subject than I am. The point is a very short one. It is, whether Parliament has the right to give the Crown a discretionary power. It appears to me that Parliament might take a very different view to the Crown of what is necessary and proper. Unless the phrase is a common form, I do not think it will do any harm to eliminate it.

MR. MAC NEILL: In what Statute or series of Statutes does this common form appear? I am not aware of it.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): These words leave it to the Crown to judge what is necessary and proper. If they were omitted, the Treaty would have to be carried out under the Courts of Law—a course which would be rather inconvenient.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: The right hon. Gentleman—he will excuse me if I say and "learned Gentleman,"—has really given a reason why the Amendment should be accepted. The test to be applied now would be the Common Law. Under the Bill as it is drawn it would be a complete answer to an action to produce a declaration from Her Majesty's Government that it appeared to them to be necessary or proper. I apprehend that the right hon. Gentleman has conceded all the substance of our contention.

(6.31.) SIR J. GORST: Formerly the doctrine was that the Crown could do no wrong. According to the hon. and learned Gentleman, the Crown can be sued, and therefore can do wrong. The words imply no doubt that the Crown must be the judge of what is right in carrying out the Act.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I have not the same implicit faith in the lawyers as my hon. Friend has, and I think it would be very objectionable indeed to throw the whole matter into the crucible of the Law Courts. I feel bound to vote against the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That Clause I stand part of the Bill."

(6.34.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I am very glad indeed that the clause stands as it does, and that due consideration has been given to the inhabitants. But Heligoland is not the only island whose wishes and feelings should be consulted. There is another island which ought to be consulted, and that is the island of Great Britain. We are not bound to keep an inconvenient and dangerous possession if there are good reasons for giving it up. We, who advocated the cession of Heligoland earlier in the Session, have been accused of desiring to give it up for sentimental reasons. Nothing of the kind. We desire to give it up because it will be better for the country to be without it. Much has been said about the constitutional argument. I am one of those sacrilegious persons who do not care much about the Constitution, and I am glad to have this thing done in any way in which it can be done.

(6.36.) MR. MAC NEILL: I move to reject the clause altogether. We have not got the consent of the people to this cession. That consent would be usual. We have been acting on the consent of Parliament in a case in which the consent of Parliament was never asked before. We say this is an invasion of the prerogative, and that it is also an invasion of the just rights of the people. This clause is vicious, because, in the first place the executive and legislative functions are jumbled up, and executive functions are, for the first time, given to the House of Commons. Another objection is that you are entering upon this matter hap-hazard. On the 4th of June the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies (Baron H. de Worms) asked why we should cede Heligoland to Germany, and said 'we might as well cede Gibraltar to Spain and the Channel Islands to France. How have matters altered since then? They have not altered at all except that, through the working of some power with which we are not acquainted, the Government have completely reversed their position on the question. We get no consideration for this cession. This Agreement, from beginning to end, is illusory. The main features have been fully discussed, but it is well allusion should be made to the words "the native laws and customs now existing will, as far as possible, remain undisturbed." That shows—I scarcely like to say the mala fides—the insincerity of the Agreement. Who is to judge whether the laws shall remain in force? The Germans are to be the judges, and the words "as far as possible" are introduced simply to blind the people of England when giving up to the German Government full jurisdiction over the rights and privileges of the Heligolanders. You are doing an act of injustice to the poor and defenceless, while you are truckling to the great. You have no right to surrender this island as long as the islanders, who have grown up under your protection, do not choose to surrender it, or have not given their consent.

(6.42.) MR. R. T. REID: It seems to me that the Government have done one good thing, and that is they have introduced a Bill for the purpose of carrying out this cession. I cannot at all assent to the view that it is to the interest of Parliament that these transactions should be carried through by the use of the prerogative of the Crown without consulting Parliament. I hope there will not always be the difficulty in one branch of the Legislature which Liberals have always had to encounter, and I am sure that it is to the interest of the freedom of the country at large that such measures as this should be embodied in an Act of Parliament. I am sorry, on other grounds, the leaders of the Liberal Party have not seen their way to take any part in opposition to this Bill. I believe it will be found that this Bill is objectionable in many ways. Certainly, to my mind, it is objectionable in two ways. When this subject was discussed in June last the Ministers representing the Crown got up in this House and used very strong language indeed against the suggestion that Heligoland should be given up to Germany. That took place at the very time that Her Majesty's Government were actually intriguing for the purpose of ceding Heligoland to the German Emperor. It is a piece of gross indignity to the House of Commons that we should be treated with such an entire want of consideration. I also think that the matter itself of the Treaty is not so light as some hon. Gentlemen appear to think. We are surrendering territory in Europe. Often hitherto we have surrendered territory in India; but India stands on its own basis. But we are curiously situated all over the world with regard to territory. There are islands and provinces belonging to this country all over the world, where we have contracts with various foreign Powers. Hitherto no foreign Power has endeavoured to make the cession of territory by us to them the basis of any transactions between us. I do not know how long that state of things will continue when it is seen that the cession of European territory can be made the subject of a bargain in the time of profound peace. I am afraid the precedent will not be useful to the interests of the country. We may have serious difficulties with France that may raise the question of the possession of the Channel Islands. Spain may raise a question with regard to Gibraltar. I might amplify this argument, but it is unnecessary to do so. But I feel it is difficult to blame the Government when those whom I had hoped would have assisted us in this matter have not been able to see their way to do so. I must assume that Statesmen of experience are likely to take a different view to myself, but as I entertain the views I have expressed,

Mr. Mac Neill

I thought it only right that I should state them temperately to the Committee.

(6.47.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I cannot understand why several of my hon. Friends should be so enthusiastic as to the right of the Heligolanders to belong to this country, and as to their allegiance not being passed from one country to another without their absolute assent, while they welcome all the annexations that take place in Africa. It seems to me the men of Africa and Europe stand precisely in the same position. By this Treaty we get certain possessions in Africa, we practically annex them without in any way asking for a plébiscite of the Africans, without asking for their consent. What right have we to do this, and why do not hon. Gentlemen complain of it or protest against it? Why are they so exceedingly zealous with regard to the aspirations, or the supposed aspirations, of the inhabitants of Heligoland to remain British subjects? Upon one point I entirely agree with my hon. and learned Friend, and that is the monstrous character of the action of Her Majesty's Government. The First Lord of the Treasury smiles; he is so accustomed to treat us in this monstrous fashion that he laughs if we protest. I cannot help pointing out how monstrous is the conduct of the Government in this case. In June last we took the liberty to suggest that we should not be exceedingly sorry if we parted company with Heligoland, ceased to pay a Governor of the island, and ceased to incur the liability of being obliged to defend Heligoland in the case of a European war. Hon. Gentlemen denounced us as unpatriotic and revolutionary. What is remarkable is that at that very moment Lord Salisbury was treating with a Foreign Power for the cession of Heligoland. What does all this disclose? Why the great evil of the Prime Minister not being a Member of this House, and the still greater evil of a noble Peer, not a Member of this House, being not only Prime Minister but Minister for Foreign Affairs. Under present circumstances it is impossible that we can have any reasonable control over the action of Her Majesty's Government. [The CHAIRMAN: Order!] I gather you think I am travelling beyond the question, therefore I will not pursue the matter. But I hope my words will weigh with Her Majesty's Government, that they will consider well and ponder over any future arrangements, and that they will let us have the Prime Minister in this House, and the Prime Minister and Minister for Foreign Affairs separate individualities.

*(6.52.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hon. Members for Dumfries and Northampton have spoken of the gross inconsistency of the Government resisting in June last the proposed cession of Heligoland, and in now submitting a Bill to sanction the cession. The difference between the position at that time and the present position is so obvious that it is quite unnecessary for me to explain it.

MR. R. T. REID: The Government not only resisted the Motion, but denounced the injustice and folly of surrendering Heligoland under any circumstances.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: This is not a matter raised for the first time. This matter was brought forward some years ago, when the present Secretary of State for the Colonies pointed out how unjust it would be to hand over the people to another State where they would be subject to onerous obligations from which they were then free. It would have been a strong ground of attack and complaint against Her Majesty's Government if provisions had not been introduced into the Treaty to give relief to the Heligolanders. The hon. Member for Northampton was willing to give over Heligoland, and without an equivalent.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I never said so.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: There was clearly no question last June of an equivalent for the cession of Heligoland, and there was then no question of immunities for the Heligolanders. Even if at that time the cession had been determined upon—and it had not—is it not evident that it would have been in the highest degree impolitic to have acceded to such a Motion in the midst of pending negotiations.

(6.56.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I am totally unable to understand why the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs says that in June it was proposed to give up Heligoland without an equivalent. I had the honour of raising the question in June, and I alluded to the fact that negotiations regarding Africa were then going on, and I suggested that Heligoland might be traded away in those negotiations. Later on in the Debate the hon. and gallant Member for Galway emphasised that view. No doubt, negotiations were necessary, but if the right hon. Baronet was a responsible man of the Government, we should complain that he not only refused to accept our Motion, but used the strongest language in regard to the utter folly and absurdity of people who made any such proposal.

*(6.57.) MR. CHANNING: My hon. Friend has established his case and clearly shown that the Ministry and the Tory Party in this transaction have walked humbly and meekly under the Caudine Forks in adopting the suggestion made by the hon. Members for Kirkcaldy and Mid Cork. We can trace plainly enough what has been the origin of this proposal. If we look back we find that the Ionian Islands cession was due to the fact that the English Government wished to strengthen, and strengthen in a righteous way, the power of the young King of Greece, but I venture to say that when the historian records these events, he will say that the feeblest and flabbiest Foreign Minister who has ever held power in this country deliberately handed over one of the European possessions of the Crown, to gratify the vanity and increase the pride of the young German Emperor. Resistance to this Bill is not merely due to the fact that the wish of the Heligolanders should be respected, but I do think that the important opinions which have been expressed by the highest authorities on the strategic value of the island to Germany deserve fuller consideration from Her Majesty's Government than they have received. Admiral Von Werner, one of the greatest naval authorities in Germany, has said recently in an article in the German Press that the cession of Heligoland amounts to a subsidy of more than 10 or 12 million marks a year to Germany, and will enable Germany to set free 10 to 15 battleships for operations elsewhere. If that is the measure of the gift which has been given to the German Emperor, for dynastic and not Imperial reasons, I might almost say for family reasons, history will record that the Prime Minister has not been the happiest and the most firm of Foreign Ministers. I am reminded of the remark Prince Bismarck once made of the Prime Minister—"Lord Salisbury is a bending reed, painted to look like a bar of iron"—and I think these events prove the correctness of the opinion of Prince Bismarck.

Sir G. Campbell

(7.3.) DR. TANNER: I desire to point out that the Motion of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy to refuse the salary of the Governor of Heligoland was upon the Paper some time before the Vote came up in Supply on the 4th June. Why was not the right hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs prepared to do his duty to the House? He was the Representative of the Foreign Office, and, presumably, was in communication with the Premier. He had ample opportunity of going to the Premier, and of finding out what was being done with regard to Heligoland. I feel for the right hon. Baronet in the humiliating position the Premier put the right hon. Baronet. Personally, I am delighted that Heligoland is going to be given up. I tried on two or three occasions to bring the matter forward, and I am glad to see that the present Premier, although not always of our way of thinking, has, at least, adopted the suggestion of a humble Irish Nationalist. I shall certainly give my vote most heartily in support of Her Majesty's Government.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 2.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I have put down an Amendment to this clause, and also to the Preamble, with the object of limiting the Bill to a cognisance of the Heligoland cession, but, on consideration, I think it is a good thing that Agreements like the Anglo-German Agreement should be brought within the cognisance of Parliament. I will not move the Amendment, but will take the opportunity of the Motion for the Third Reading to make some general observations.

DR. CLARK: The Amendment referred to is one I am able to support; and if my hon. Friend does not move it, I will. If the Amendment is accepted, I shall not be compelled to vote against the Third Reading of the Bill. I thoroughly approve of the Heligoland cession, but I very strongly disapprove of the Anglo-German Agreement. As to South Africa, the Government have been humbugged by the Germans.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 19, to leave out the words "Anglo-German Agreement" and insert "Heligoland Cession."—(Dr. Clark.)

Question, "That the words 'Anglo-German Agreement' stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

Schedule.

*MR BRYCE: It deserves remark that the Government have committed the strange breach of diplomatic regularity and correctness of phrase of speaking of Emperor William as the Emperor of Germany, while his proper title is the German Emperor. The title is one which was deliberately adopted, for strong, political, and historical reasons, when the present German Empire was established.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The title "Emperor of Germany" was used by the desire of the German Foreign Office. "German Emperor" is the title which will be employed in this country.

Bill reported, without Amendment.

*[7.11.] MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope the House will allow the Bill to be read a third time. The Bill has, I think, been very fully discussed, and there are very few questions that can be left to be raised upon it.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a third time."

[7.12.] SIR G. CAMPBELL: I have no objection to the Bill being read a third time; but when the right hon. Gentleman says the Bill has been fully discussed in all its aspects, I must differ from him entirely. For the first two days almost the whole of our time was devoted, not to the merits or demerits of the Bill, but to a high constitutional question connected with the Bill, and raised by a great authority in this House, and those of us who took an interest in the matters in the Bill itself had no opportunity of speaking. On the second night of Debate, when we were approaching the Bill itself, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby again raised the constitutional question. Although I do not wish to detain the House at length, I wish to make a few observations, not in reference to Heligoland, which has been well discussed, but upon those matters which you, Sir, have ruled to be in order, the equivalent for Heligoland in Africa. I am not altogether satisfied with the bargain Her Majesty's Government have made, for I think they have got too much for Heligoland, too large a slice of Africa. It seems to me that our position with Heligoland is something like that of a man who has a horse in his stable—absolutely useless to him—"eating his head off," and he puts him in the market, willing to take a few shillings from a knacker, and with the chance of somebody taking a fancy to the animal and giving a good price for him, and is fortunate to secure this purchaser. I am not going to find fault with the Agreement. I regret the observations which have tended to encourage the impression that in this matter we have tried to enter into a special alliance with Germany to conciliate the German Emperor. In my view, it would be most undesirable to do anything of the kind. I wish for amicable arrangements, not only with Germany, but with France, and with all other nations. In justice to the Foreign Secretary and Under Secretary, I do not think that they are open to the accusation that they have at all truckled to Germany; they have not got into trouble with their own Jingo followers as in reference to the New Hebrides. I think we have, to a certain extent, got too much of Africa, more than is good for us. In exchange for a useless horse we have got a sort of elephant, as it were, not a white one exactly, but a wild one, and which requires catching. I am a little uneasy about this huge tract of Africa in exchange for a little island we were ready enough to get rid of at any price. I am somewhat uneasy, too, not as regards the actual delimitation made by the Agreement, but in regard to special words used that carry our minds down to the confines of Egypt. We thought the limit of Egypt was Wady Halfa, but a dangerous question is suggested by the words and raised already by the African Company, whether they mean we are to extend our influence all round and take in not only the equatorial provinces of Emin Pasha, but even Khartoum. I have heard that Nubar Pasha has expressed his surprise that we should be seeking to come from the South-East to occupy that very equatorial country we formerly divested ourselves of. I do hope that Her Majesty's Government will give us to understand that we are not going to take under our control the whole of these vast provinces of Africa which we are at liberty to control, so far as Germany is concerned, under this Agreement. I think we ought to have some consideration for that noble ally of ours—Italy—and come to an agreement with Italy which will leave ample scope for Italian energy and genius in Africa. I do hope that the desire to conciliate Jingo votes will not lead Her Majesty's Government into imprudence. I am afraid the wording of the Agreement will be construed into support of the extravagant claims of those Jingo gentlemen who think enormous additions of African territory are given to the Chartered Companies. I see the advocates of the East African Company claim that 750 square miles of territory have been given to them. But who has given this to them? We have made limitations as between ourselves and Germany, but I see nothing in these limitations which gives these African Companies any right to acquire equatorial provinces and the country up to Khartoum. I see one advocate claims that the country from Wadelai up to the Congo State is thrown open to them. But licence to grab land in this way has not been confirmed by Parliament, and the consent of Parliament is surely required. No doubt we shall be told that certain territories have been acquired by Mr. Stanley, who has made over certain Treaties. In this respect, I think, when the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian come to be studied in the interior of Africa, as I am sure they are in all civilised and uncivilised countries, they may cause great alarm. I understand that African lawyers have an opinion that their chiefs have not the power to make away with territories for a few bottles of rum or gin. I am given to understand that under the Constitutional Law of Africa, those who have acquired territory under Treaties with pretended chiefs have no real title until the Treaty is confirmed by an African Parliament of the representatives of the African people. I have not the least doubt that the constitutional doctrine of this country may be misconstrued as applied to Africa, and that force and significance are given to Treaties which are utter trash without the consent of this African Parliament. The East African Company makes claim to enormous territory and hopes to get enormous dividend but have they sufficient force to occupy the country and maintain dominion? Is there not fear of their being dragged into too great responsibilities? We know they have a subscribed capital, £180,000, the dividend upon which they are going for the present to take out in philanthropy, and I do not doubt that much of the capital was subscribed from motives into which philanthropy entered considerably; but to command and develop these immense regions, millions of money are required. Where is the money to be found? I am alarmed at the manner in which the East African Company rejoice over these great possessions and boast of their own concessions, and at once suggestions are made that Her Majesty's Government should help them to construct a railway. But who knows the physical difficulties in the way? It is very easy to take a small map of Africa and say we will make a railway from that point to this but the character of the country is almost unknown. This East African Company have not reached Lake Victoria from the coast, and do not know what the country is. One gentleman, I understand, has found his way to Lake Victoria; but as he has not come back yet, we do not know the result of his journey. At the meeting of the company the other day it was announced that he had to cross passes 9,000 feet high, a greater height than the Alpine railways have had to traverse. If I remember rightly, the St. Gothard and Mont Cenis passes are somewhere about 7,000 feet high, and this railway talk of with a light heart presents enormous difficulties in a mountainous region. I am alarmed, I say, when I hear the company suggest pecuniary assistance from Her Majesty's Government to assist their operations in these vast regions. There is another view of the case some of my hon. Friends take very strongly; and I think there is no doubt that, in order to acquire, I will not say the right to territory, but between ourselves and Germany large hunting grounds in the North-Eastern portion of Africa, we have made perhaps less valuable terms in South Africa. To a certain extent, the interests of the South African people have been sacrificed. I do not sympathise with the Jingo aspirations of Cape Colony or any South African Colony. I entirely subscribe to what was said by the Under Secretary in this respect. I think that our colonies there have quite enough to do to look after their own, and that we are not called upon to make large acquisitions of territory for their gratification; but I must say I should very much prefer, looking at our direct route to India, that if any African Empire is to be constituted it should be in the South rather than that we should enter into the dangers connected with the Northern regions. I should be satisfied with a desire to establish in the South an Imperial dominion such as that in India. I am led to take that view by the perusal of the small book in regard to Basutoland. We know that Cape Colony undertook to manage the territory and failed, and got defeated by the Basutos; but now we have the Report showing the success of Imperial management. I believe if we established an Imperial dominion in the South it would be a success, but, at the same time, I admit there are very grave reasons to doubt if Her Majesty's Government would have had the courage, and, therefore, I am content that our delimitation in South Africa should remain what it is. Just a word more on the question of Zanzibar. I believe a mistake has been made in the wording of the Treaty, and that not sufficient regard has been had to the sensitiveness of France in connection with the Treaty of 1862. I hope it may be merely a matter of wording, but I could have wished it had been made clear that our arrangement with Germany does not shut out an arrangement with France. I confess it seems to me that the position of England and Germany towards Zanzibar is akin to that of two robbers, who, having stripped a man of all that belongs to him, discuss who shall protect him. We have allowed Germany the most valuable part of the dominions of the Sultan of Zanzibar, and we take the remainder.

As a matter of fact, the Protectorate of Zanzibar resolves itself into nothing more than a Protectorate of those two islands. What I object to is that the arrangement which has been made is one which will entail upon this country enormous responsibilities fraught with much trouble and difficulty, and from which we shall derive little or no advantage. I think, Sir, that this Bill has within it dangerous responsibilities, and I, for one, do not feel at all easy with regard to the bargain which has been made.

*(7.31.) MR. BRYCE: I do not intend on this occasion to repeat the observations that I have made upon the policy of this Agreement in the Debate on the Second Reading of the Bill. But I desire to ask Her Majesty's Government a question of practical importance with regard to the steps that have been taken to preserve Free Trade on the Zanzibar Coast. By the Act of Berlin of 1885 a considerable area, not only on the West side of Africa, but also on the East, extending from lat. 5° N., to the mouth of the Zambesi in lat. 18° S., was declared to be open to the trade of all nations. And the 8th Article of the present Agreement constitutes an engagement as between England and Germany in their respective spheres to promote complete free trade as contemplated by the Act of Berlin in all those parts of Africa to which the Agreement applies and to which the Berlin Act applies. It is within the knowledge of the House that there is a very large trade between Zanzibar and British India, and there has been considerable alarm among our British subjects in India as regards the effect of the cession of the coast line by the Sultan of Zanzibar to Germany. The idea entertained among the British India merchants, and also among merchants here, is that it will be in the power of the German Government, notwithstanding what would seem to be the obvious meaning of the present Agreement, to establish Customs Houses on the East Coast and so stop freedom of trade on the mainland of Africa. Her Majesty's Government have not made any declaration on this subject. The question I put to them on the Second Reading of the Bill has not been answered by them. I trust we shall, on this occasion, receive a satisfactory answer on this point. It is a matter of the utmost consequence to Englishmen and to our fellow-subjects in India that there should be the fullest freedom of trade on the East Coast of Africa, all protective tariffs, and especially all differential rates, being forbidden; and if we can only obtain from the Government an absolute guarantee on this point, we shall probably be less disposed to criticise the other points of the Agreement.

(7.36.) MR. LABOUCHERE: The right hon. Gentleman in the earlier part of the evening distinctly stated that the German Foreign Office had expressly stipulated that in the English translation of the Agreement the German Emperor should be called the Emperor of Germany. The right hon. Gentleman must have been under some mistake in the matter, because I have never yet heard of a potentate who was not recognised by a particular title in his own country assuming that title in his diplomatic relations with foreign countries. In the German version of the Agreement the Emperor is called "Der Deutscher Kaiser," which means the German Emperor, and he is not the Emperor of Germany. I think that a Treaty submitted to the English Parliament for its approval ought to be an exact translation of the original. We might as well call him the Emperor of Timbuctoo as the Emperor of Germany, and I submit that we ought not to be called upon to use a phrase which is simply due to a mistranslation which has taken place in the Foreign Office.

*(7.41.) SIR J. FERGUSSON: I assure the hon. Member for Northampton that I have been perfectly right in what I have stated; that it was at the request of the German Foreign Office that the phrase has been translated "the Emperor of Germany." In all future documents, as far as this country is concerned, the term "German Emperor" will be used. As to freedom of trade, no doubt, under the new arrangements, some of the existing mainland commerce will be diverted through the German ports; but Her Majesty's Government are assured that the Germans will gladly welcome the presence of British Indians in those ports. There are remarkable facilities for trade in that part of the country, and it would be in the highest degree unwise, and very unlike the Germans, if they were to discourage trade coming from any legitimate source. I hope that the East Africa Company will have a great future before them, and that they will not risk their prosperity by offending against the prejudices or the customs of the native population.

*(7.45.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): It has been stated that Free Trade through the German sphere of influence has not been obtained, and apparently it will not be possible to send goods from Lake Tanganyika to the Victoria Nyanza without their having to pass through German territory, and being subject to whatever dues the Germans may impose.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: There will be absolute Free Trade between Tanganyika and the Victoria Nyanza.

*MR. F. S. STEVENSON: I am very glad to hear that that is the case; but I think that in addition to that the Government ought to endeavour, as far as possible, to secure that Free Trade should generally prevail throughout the German sphere of influence.

(7.47.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I am afraid the House does not fully appreciate the observations that have fallen from the hon. Member for Aberdeen with regard to the modification of the Berlin Act. It turns out that one of the results of the Agreement is that we are practically shutting up a large portion of the interior of Africa, which was supposed to be insured to English trade, from anything in the shape of Free Trade in the future. We have obtained a most important port on the East Coast with which our Indian trade is principally connected, but the value of that acquisition will be materially affected if we are to be deprived of the opportunity of Free Trade with the interior of Africa. I think it unfortunate that this point did not crop up much earlier in this discussion, because we should have elicited fuller and more complete explanations than we are likely to obtain at the present moment.

EXCISE) DUTIES BILL.—(No. 244.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

*(7.51.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I beg to move the omission from Clause 2, page 2, line 8, of Sub-section 2.—Agreed to.

*MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I beg to move the omission from Clause 2, page 2, line 11, of the words "a sum not exceeding 40" in order to insert the words "the sum of 90." I hope the Committee will extend its indulgence to me, because it is impossible that this Amendment can be adequately discussed unless it is placed in clear contrast with an Amendment which stands lower down in the Paper, in the name of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The situation, in fact, is this—the ingenious financial schemes of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, tempered and modified by the hazards of the legislative Session, have resulted in placing before us the sum of £50,000, which has to be expended somehow or other in Scotland, and our business is to find not only a good and beneficial object for its expenditure, but the object which shall be the most beneficial and the most agreeable to the wishes of the Scottish people. I, therefore, have to show that my proposal is better than that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I hope that the Chairman will turn a blind eye on any references which it may be necessary to make to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman. I have, however, first of all to make out a case for my own proposal, which is that the sum now available should be devoted to freeing from payment of fees the entire system of primary education in Scotland. It is a proposal that has been standing on the Paper in the name of several of my hon. Friends, to whose courtesy I am indebted for allowing me to come before them—a proposal put forward as an alternative to what was originally intended by Her Majesty's Government. It is, in fact, but the development, and the necessary development, of the principle for which many of us have contended ever since this question of Local Government and Local Finance has come under the review of Parliament. But in order that the Committee, and especially such Members as may not have followed the course of Scottish affairs, may understand the precise present position of this question, I should like to make a brief reference to the facts of its history during the last Session of Parliament. The moment it became known that a large sum from the Probate Duty was available for the relief of local burdens in Scotland, several of my hon. Friends put forward free education as the first demand to be satisfied. My hon. Friend the Member for North Aberdeen issued a statement of the case, formed a Committee, and did all he could to concentrate public opinion upon the question; and it soon became apparent that there was a strong current of opinion in Scotland in favour of the abolition of school fees, and that any other proposal had no chance of public favour. And this need not surprise us, because while the pressure of this burden is more irksome and more widely spread among the poorest classes of the community than that of any other local burden, we must, at the same time, remember that there has always been a traditional sentiment in Scotland in favour of a widely diffused system of education, and especially of primary education, and that sentiment strongly and very obviously accepted this destination of the money as the best that could be adopted. This current of feeling was in no sense of a political character. Members on the other side of the House fell in with it, and we were all gratified to find when the Local Government Bill was introduced that the Government had recognised the sentiment, and proposed to meet it by a considerable relief of school fees. But the Government proposed to go only to a very modest and timid extent. They proposed to confine the relief to the lowest three standards. It was generally felt that such a concession would be altogether inadequate, and that it would probably do more harm than good. It was thought it would do substantial injury to the interests of education, because it would throw on the whole of the advanced standards a great degree of prejudice and discouragement, and, therefore, last Session the whole machinery of Parliament pressure was brought to bear on the Government to egg them on to grant as large an amount of money for the purpose of free education as they had at their disposal. These efforts were successful. In fact, we succeeded in getting transferred to the purpose of free education a large sum of money which was intended for the very object of direct relief of rates, to which this money is now proposed to be devoted. In the end a Minute of the Scotch Education Department was issued, abolishing fees for the three lower standards, and for as much of the 4th and 5th standards as the money available would be sufficient for. This is, I believe, an accurate and impartial account of what occurred; but what was our surprise when we went down to the country after the Session was over, and the severities of the Autumn campaign commenced—a campaign which turns what is still by convention called a holiday into the most hard-working portion of the whole year for the unfortunate Member of Parliament—to discover that we had been entirely mistaken, that the activity of the hon. Member for North Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) and his friends was nothing but a dream, and that it was not the case that the Scottish people, and still less the Scottish Members, had forced Her Majesty's Government step by step to enter upon and develop this policy. We were assured, on the platforms and in the Press, by the supporters of the Government, that they were the true authors of the policy of free education, and that any apparent reluctance they had shown in making these advances was only their way of dissembling their zeal, and this view was confirmed when the Prime Minister said that he was in a state of impatient expectation for the time when if the Budget was favourable and the Chancellor of the Exchequer was good-natured, he would extend to benighted England those blessings of free education which he and his Colleagues had already spontaneously given to Scotland. I am not concerned to inquire into the question, interesting as it may be, to whom credit is due for this thing, but I want the thing to be done, and I want it to be done thoroughly and at once, and that is why I move this Amendment. I am glad, at the same time, in moving it, to afford an opportunity to the Government and their friends, which, no doubt, they have been longing for, of justifying and confirming all those fine phrases and declarations which they made so freely last Recess. I have stated how Parliament left this question. But what have the School Boards of Scotland done? They were obliged, as I have said, to abolish all fees in Standards I., II., and III., and more or less in Standards IV. and V., and they were free in the matter of remitting the rest. What has happened is this: In 2,265 schools, fees have been abolished up to and including Standard V., in 100 schools up to and including Standard VI., and in 674 schools the fees have been abolished for all scholars. I would ask, Can anyone conversant with Scotland doubt that the 674 schools in which all fees have been abolished have the sympathy and approval of the great mass of the people in that country? Can anyone doubt that the 2,265 other schools would have followed that good example if it had not been that they were timid as to the financial result? And they were timid with good reason, because, unfortunately, many of the schools which were bold enough to abolish fees altogether, with the full approval and consent of the School Board constituents, found that they could not make both ends meet, and the Boards were compelled to impose a rate. Now, that is the position of things at present in Scotland. There are some, of course, who will say that we should stop short in this matter at the compulsory standards, and that there is no need to dispense with fees where attendance is voluntary. I do not know whether that is the line which the Government propose to take. Of course, everyone can see that there exists, in the one case, an argument that does not exist in the other. The argument is this—you compel a man to send his child to school, and it is too bad to impose on him the burden of a fee, but when he has an option in the matter, as in the case of the voluntary standards, it may be asked, Where is the hardship of a fee. My answer to that is, that, although there is a necessary limit to the compulsion exercised by the State, there is no limit whatever to the encouragement that ought to be given by the State, and that if at a certain period of a child's school career there is introduced the new element of a fee, you may depend upon it that you at once indicate discouragement even if you do not actually discourage from further attendance. Let the Committee consider for a moment how this works and what it involves. A child, I presume, when it has passed the fifth standard may be 10 years old. If it is discharged at that age from further attendance, not only is it debarred from the higher and further branches of learning, but by the lack of exercise it loses to a great extent all it has learned. We in Scotland are not, and have never been, devotees of the three R's. We have never believed that reading, writing, and ciphering are the whole educational duty of man. We have never feared to spoil our people with over knowledge. We have in our mind the traditional idea so often quoted of the ladder with its feet in the parish school and its upper steps in the University. That is the reason why we refuse to stop short at the compulsory standards, and why we will never rest until the scheme is complete. Now, I proceed to ask, "Can we do this?" The total amount sacrificed by the extinction of fees in these standards may be put at from £330,000 to £340,000. The amount available last year was £250,000, so that there is a deficit of £80,000 or £90,000. The Government, under this Bill, propose to give £40,000. The Committee will see, then, that here is a gap in our educational system crying aloud to be filled up. Here is a great national purpose, a beneficent, necessary, and even vital purpose, waiting for a windfall of money to meet it, and here is a windfall of the exact sum required tumbling accidentally into the hands of Her Majesty's Government, and which we ask them to devote for this purpose. We have, let me say, no Party, or sinister, or selfish motive in moving this Amendment or making this recommendation. It is odd that I should have to say this, but we constantly are accused to have imputed to us the worst Parliamentary and political vices. We are supposed to be degrading Parliament, and to be anxious to bring about the dismemberment of the Empire, and I do not know what. This view of our conduct could not be better expressed than it was by the Home Secretary, on Saturday last, in Birmingham. The right hon. Gentleman, who seems to be much more triumphant in Birmingham than he has ever been in this House, had the audacity to say of us, amongst many other complimentary things:—

"I ask you, if ever you meet those who differ with you in political opinion, to contrast the condition of Her Majesty's Government and Her Majesty's Opposition, and to challenge them to tell you what their Party have done except obstruct. What measure have they ever improved? What useful suggestion have they ever made? Their function has been to delay all useful legislation, to hamper the action both of the Government and the law, to waste the public time, to degrade Parliament."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Hear, hear!

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That is the opinion of the Home Secretary. Why, there is not one of his Bills which is not made up of the suggestions he has received from this side of the House. He goes down into the country and boasts of the Bills he has passed, but he cannot point to one as to which he has not received a useful suggestion from this side of the House. Having been challenged in this way, and told that we never make useful suggestions, I think I am in order in pointing out that here at least is one. The Chancellor of the Exchequer knows that no secret had been made on this side of the House of the object to which we think this money ought to be applied. We have told the Government that in this way they can gain credit and popularity, and make capital, if you like, if they choose to do so. They have not acted on that hint or advice, and it seems to me to be somewhat strange conduct for right hon. Gentlemen, who a few months ago expressed themselves as eaten up with a burning zeal in the cause of free education, to be obstinately resolved that whatever else is done, this is a thing they will not do. Now I come to the other part of the question, and I wish to point out that it is not as if there were a great many other national purposes in Scotland to which this money could at present be devoted. Free education is not surrounded by a great number of competing attractions. I know, in fact, of no other subject fulfilling the conditions of the case. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not been troubled, like Paris, with the beauties of contending goddesses. His choice is rather Hobson's choice. This is the only thing he can reasonably do with the money. The right hon. Gentleman has been for some weeks engaged in trying to find some other purpose to which to devote the money. It was shortly after Whitsuntide that the Licensing Clauses were withdrawn, and it was only on Monday that he could tell us what he is going to do with this money. And what is he going to do with it? He has ransacked Scotland from one end to the other to find some purpose to which he can devote the money, and although here before him is this great national purpose, he thrusts this £50,000 literally into the waste basket.

*MR. GOSCHEN: It goes in relief of local taxation.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: In relief of local taxation! I have this personal advantage, that I have sat at the feet of the right hon. Gentleman in this very matter of the relations between Imperial and local finance. I was an inexperienced Member of the House of Commons during the years from 1868 to 1871, when the right hon. Gentleman was President of the Local Government Board—or, as it was then called, the Poor Law Board—and I listened with reverential awe to the doctrines he propounded, and absorbed his financial doctrines into my political fibre. One of the right hon. Gentleman's canons consisted in pointing out the evil effects of general subsidies in aid of local taxation. He urged that they led to extravagance and mal-administration; that a definite object ought to be kept in view in giving such grants; and that it should be a definite single tax which should be so devoted, and not a haphazard sum of money out of the general taxation fund.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman is really not representing my views. These are not propositions I laid down.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am representing my recollection of them. If he repudiates these principles I shall be very much astonished to hear him do so. Another point of the right hon. Gentleman's was that the money in relief of local taxation ought to be derived from the owners, if possible.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

*MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman's recollection is again wrong. That is an entire, involuntary misrepresentation of my views. The right hon. Gentleman said he absorbed my canons; he seems to have exuded them.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not know whether I acquired these views by endosmosis or by ecidosmosis; but these were the general lines of financial doctrine that the right hon. Gentleman then propounded. They are in my very distinct recollection. The right hon. Gentleman now proposes to do that which conflicts with everyone of the principles I have alluded to. He takes a part of tax which is paid by the consumer, instead of taking a totally definite and distinct tax; and besides that he does not devote the money to any definite purpose, but merely hands it over to the County Councils and Town Councils that they may do with it what they like.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Can the right hon. Gentleman point to any passage in which I said that these contributions from new taxes ought to be devoted to a particular object, and not to the relief of general rates?

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That is my impression. I confess I am speaking from recollection, and if the right hon. Gentleman repudiates that doctrine, I will admit that he never propounded it. What I wish to submit to the right hon. Gentleman is whether, in proposing to hand over this money in this loose and slovenly fashion to the County Councils and Town Councils in Scotland, he is not really handing it in the main to the landowners, and not to the great body of the ratepayers. At any rate that is so in the counties. The right hon. Gentleman is probably not aware that the general county rate is a consolidated rate—a stereotyped rate, and so long as the expenditure does not exceed the stereotyped limit the whole of that expenditure is paid by the owners. Therefore, the whole of the relief will be given to the owners, if the County Councils choose so to apply the money. I do not say they will do so in all cases. It may be asked, "Why should you object to relieving the ratepayers?" Well, I do not object to relieving the ratepayers on the principles laid down by the right hon. Gentleman, but I do object to it in this loose fashion. Last year the Scotch Members deliberately and almost unanimously urged the Committee, and the Committee agreed, to transfer to remission of school fees large sums of money originally intended to go in relief of rates, and that was done with the entire approval of the country. And this is the very proceeding, the freeing of education, for which the Government took so much credit during the autumn of last year. I have little more to say. I appeal to the Committee to deal with this question as a Scotch question, and in accordance with the views of the Scottish people, and with the circumstances and necessities of Scotland. My proposal will not be questioned or objected to in any part of Scotland. I will not do the English people the discredit of saying that even they would not prefer to the mere naked brutal relief of rates in the indiscriminate fashion which is proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, a definite relief given to the heavy burden of school fees with all the educational impulses which would necessarily follow. I am well content to set the two objects clearly before the Committee and the country and to leave it to their judgment. These are the two alternative purposes to which the money can be applied. The application of the money proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer sins, as I think, and as I think he himself would have admitted 20 years ago, against sound principles of finance. The relief afforded will be inappreciable, and it is not asked for by the very bodies who will receive it. It will benefit most the class which least requires it. On the other hand, the destination of the money which I ask the Committee to approve is eagerly desired by the Public Bodies who will have the distribution of the money. It will benefit the most hardly pressed class in the community, it will save many a poor man from the temptation of failing to do justice to the capacity of his children, and, at the same time, it will maintain and vindicate that faith in the widest diffusion of learning which has been long a happy characteristic of the Scottish people. (8.35.)

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 11, to leave out the words "a sum not exceeding forty," and insert the words "the sum of ninety,"—(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'a sum not exceeding forty' stand part of the Clause."

(9.5.) MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I have no desire to traverse the ground so ably traversed by my right hon. Friend who moved this Amendment, but I do desire to express sympathy with that Amendment on general terms, while indicating one or two reasons for its acceptance. In their own interests I think it is desirable the Government should accept the Amendment. They have already dealt, to the great satisfaction of the people of Scotland, with this question of the abolition of school fees, and it would greatly redound to their credit if they would complete the good work to which they have set their hand, and earn the gratitude of the people of Scotland to the full extent as they already have to a certain degree. This proposition is put before the Chancellor of the Exchequer as an alternative, and surely it is a great pity that he should propose to fritter away this money by handing it over to Local Authorities, while the work commenced stands in need of completion. I think we have the sympathy of the Lord Advocate in this matter. I do him the justice of assuming that, if he had his own free way, he would be glad to support this Amendment, but, owing to the exigencies of office, he has to support the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I will not do him the injustice to suppose that he is not in sympathy with the desire to confer this boon upon the people of Scotland. I may urge the proposal on Conservative grounds. We wish to look back to a state of matters such as existed in Scotland in days long gone past. We have heard from right hon. Gentlemen glorifications of John Knox, and here is an opportunity to carry out, on Conservative grounds, with application to modern interests and requirements, the grand doctrine of John Knox, that education in Scotland should be free. The Government should think themselves fortunate in having this £90,000 available for the purpose, and devote it to the completion of the work they have begun. It would be a graceful thing to do, and would be in accordance with the principles they professed. I need scarcely insist upon how much this is wished for by the people of Scotland. I think it has been sufficiently shown that these school fees are exigible from poor parents just at the time when they are least able to bear the payment, and no relief of taxation will give relief when it is so much needed. I will not retort upon the Government the adaptability to circumstances they have exhibited in regard to this money. I shall be perfectly content to forego all such remarks if they will only accept the Amendment. Let them complete this work, with the commencement of which their administration is already connected, and the Government will leave an excellent monument behind them to declare that, whatever their short-comings in other respects, at least, they did this good thing for Scotland, and to meet the clear wish of the Scotch people. As regards the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that this money should be given to County Councils, Town Councils, and Police Burghs, I think the amount is so infinitesimal, when it comes to be divided, that really I may say it will have no effect at all in giving relief to localities. It has also been pointed out by my right hon. Friend that the rate that has to be paid now to County Councils, and I refer particularly to County Councils, the effect being very small in burghs, that the rate is a Consolidated Rate, and the money going to the reduction of this would relieve the landlords and larger ratepayers, and would not reach the poorer ratepayers at all. Give it to the relief of school fees, and you apply direct relief to the poorer classes. I think this has not been sufficiently taken into account, for I am sure it is the poorer ratepayers the Government would desire to relieve. I also appeal to the Chancellor of the Exchequer not to stand too much upon his dignity in this matter, now that it has been made clear to him what the motives of the people of Scotland really are. It was due to him that this should be made clear, and I appeal to him on the broad ground that he should assist the Scotch people to maintain their educational position in the world. The Government proposition is that the distribution of this money should be according to valuation, and that, of course, means that the locality showing the larger valuation gets the larger share, and it is obvious that on this principle the apportionment will not be according to needs. Speaking for my own constituency, the part of the country with which I am best acquainted, I am certain, from the expressions of opinion at the time of the passing of the Local Government Act, that the feeling of the people is heartily in favour of free education not only for compulsory standards, but in the rural districts there is a strong desire for the application of the principle to higher education, that they may have a share in secondary education, such as is within reach of the inhabitants of burghs. I have still a hope the Government may accept the Amendment, but if not I shall have great pleasure in giving it the support of my vote.

*(9.15). MR. M. J. STEWART (Kirkcubright): There can be no question that the Conservative and Unionist Party were quite agreed in giving free education to the people of Scotland, and the statements made by right hon. Gentlemen opposite that every conceivable piece of legislation should be thrown to the winds until the Irish Home Rule Bill was carried show that we should have heard nothing about free education if a Liberal Government had been elected on the last occasion. I must say, therefore, I am surprised to hear the vaunting statements of the right hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) to the effect that free education was forced from the Government by Gentlemen opposite. The hon. Member who has just sat down appears to distrust the County Councils and the Local Councils in the burghs. One would imagine, after listening to many platform speeches in Scotland, that Gentlemen opposite were willing to trust the County Councils with anything; but I hold that we on this side of the House are really more anxious to show our trust in them than they are. We wish to say to the County Councils, "You know your districts: We give you

*MR. A. SUTHERLAND: I make no complaint about the impartiality of the County Councils. What I complained of was that they were tied down to the Consolidated Rate.

*MR. M. J. STEWART: I maintain that my argument is strictly correct. I think we ought not to stint our trust in the County Councils in this House. We have given them very large powers already, and we wish to increase these powers, step by step. The hon. Member said the Lord Advocate had given way on this question, and then he made an appeal to him to give way further. I maintain that my right hon. and learned Friend has taken the proper course on this question. He is not going to consider one class only, but to give the money to the County Councils, for the benefit of all classes. There are many questions in the counties which require money in order that they may be properly dealt with, such as the parochial rates and the rates for roads, which press hardly upon tenant farmers and small proprietors. There is a tendency in many counties to expend more than has been spent, and if that expenditure can be reduced by £50,000, proposed to be devoted to the ratepayers, so much the better, not only for the proprietors but for every other class in the counties. This is just one of those questions where, when one class benefits, all classes benefit. There has been no strong expression of opinion in Scotland in favour of getting this money for education, whereas there have been strong representations on the other side, and I, therefore, think the Government are taking the right course. I have not received a single letter in favour of handing over the £50,000 for free education. I hope the Government will stand by the proposals, and will not be led away by any specious arguments on the other side.

*(9.24.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): The hon. Member has talked about trusting the County Councils. Will he and the Government agree to let the County Councils expend this £50,000 on any good purpose they, in their discretion, think wise? If not, what becomes of the hon. Member's argument about trusting the County Councils? The fact is, that the hon. Member, with his Conservative views, wishes that this money should be tied down for distribution by the wealthier part of the ratepayers, as a relief fund for themselves. That is really what it comes to, and the people of Scotland will be able to judge respecting the views the hon. Member entertains as to the discretion of the County Councils. I am obliged to the Lord Advocate for the courteous assistance he has given me in seeking to obtain information as to the destiny of this £50,000. The right hon. Gentleman has been clear and courteous in the answers he has given to my questions on the subject, and has, thereby, I think, enabled us to obtain a clearer issue than would otherwise have been the case before the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman has admitted that it is within the discretion of the County Councils to apply the whole of this £50,000 to relieve the landlords and proprietors of Scotland from the obligations they took up last year in regard to the Consolidated Rate. There are very few purposes to which, under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, it is possible to apply this money. There is the improvement of public health to which the money can be applied, I admit, for the benefit of the whole community; but, after all, public health lies at the doors of the proprietors. It is the duty of every proprietor to make the dwelling he owns healthy and fit for his tenants to live in. Therefore, we can dispense with the question of sanitation. Then we are induced to look at the Road Rate. That rate has never fallen at all heavily upon the great masses of the population in Scotland; it has fallen largely, and very properly so, upon the landed proprietors and tenant farmers. The obligation to keep up the roads has rested hitherto upon those who use the roads for the purpose of carrying on their business. We are consequently reduced to the old Consolidated Rate, which includes payment for police and other purposes in the counties, of a very light kind indeed. The obligations which are heavy in Scotland are the obligations in respect to the relief of the poor and the education of the people. The County Councils have no power to apply a single penny of this £50,000 to the people in these respects. Originally the Government proposed to apply the money to the promotion of temperance, but, at the request of the Scotch Members, they withdrew their proposal, and now we have to apply the money to some better purpose. In making their original proposal, the Government had the good of the people at heart; will they, and my hon. Friend who has just spoken, accept the decision of the Representatives of the people of Scotland on this subject? My hon. Friend says he has not received a single communication from his constituents in favour of applying the money to the completion of the scheme of free education in Scotland. I have had many communications, and I have had none from Scotland which has not been in favour of applying this money to the completion of the scheme of free education. I believe the landed proprietors and large farmers, who will be benefited to some slight extent by this £50,000, will feel more pride and satisfaction by far in having the system of free education made complete, than in receiving the relief at present proposed. But we are not confined to free education. It has been a matter of great regret to every educationalist in Scotland that while we have got the great boon of free education up to Standard V., we suffer greatly from the want of opportunities for secondary and higher education. Here young people are forced through Standard V. at a very early age—often at 11 years of age, and certainly in all cases at 12 years of age. These young people, on account of the necessities of the families, are sent out to work. They have no chance of receiving secondary, or higher education, and, to a large extent, they lose the education they acquired in their young days. The people of Scotland have long desired the establishment of technical and evening schools. Such schools exist in large industrial centres, owing to endowments which have been wisely given by the Endowed Schools' Commissioners; but they are entirely wanting in the counties of Scotland. Not only do the people want evening schools and schools for technical and higher education, but they feel that if no other purpose could be found to which to devote this £50,000, the money might be usefully employed in establishing free libraries in large centres of population. I hope the Lord Advocate who, on several occasions, has taken a liberal view of

Scotch affairs will not take the retrograde step of relieving the landed and wealthier classes at the expense of damping the aspirations of the people of Scotland in respect to secondary and higher education. If a poll of the Scottish people were taken, I do not think there would be half-a-dozen Scotch Members who could come to the House and say that the landed proprietors and the larger farmers are desirous of absorbing the whole of this £50,000. If the money is applied as now proposed, it will do no good to any large class of the community, and it will be received with no thankfulness by the County Councils.

*(9.38.) MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): During his political career hitherto, I venture to think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs has only been celebrated for one magnificent phrase, the phrase of his "having found salvation," but to-night he has used another phrase which will become celebrated, and which I trust every ratepayer in the country will carefully note, namely, "the naked and brutal relief of rates." Surely that is a form of nakedness and that is a form of brutality of which no Government need be ashamed. Undoubtedly, from every point of view, this is a question of rates. According to the plan of the Government it is proposed to hand this money over to the County Councils, and a considerable portion of the money will probably go to the relief of the Road Rate. That rate is paid half by the occupier and half by the owner, and relief to that rate will be warmly welcomed by too long suffering ratepayers. I think I have some right to speak on this subject, because it was actually on my Amendment that the Government were run so close last year, that they gave way upon the question of the large additional grant for free education. I acted with the hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) as teller in the memorable Division in which the Government majority was reduced to 13. The object we had in view last year was to secure the entire freedom of the compulsory standards in Scotland. With the addition of the £40,000 already allocated, the compulsory standards will, according to the proposals of the Government, be set perfectly free. But the right hon. Gentleman says that he would put no limit to the freeing of education. Does this mean that the Universities are also to be free? ["Hear, hear!"] I congratulate hon. Members opposite on having the courage of their convictions, because I do not think that the ratepayers of Scotland will support them in that proposition. I am myself in favour of all the standards in primary schools in Scotland being free; but where, at present, is the money to come from? The sum now allotted to the relief of rates was never meant for education. Next year we have every reason to hope that free education will be granted to England out of Imperial funds, and, of course, Scotland will then receive her share from the same source. The people of Scotland will then be able to free all the standards in the primary schools, and will also have a very considerable sum for the relief of rates; but, in the meantime, let the Committee be just before it is generous.

(9.44.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I am glad to take part in this Debate before it partakes in any sense of a Party character, because I want to lay before the Committee a practical argument which I think is unanswerable. I recognise the practical interest the hon. Member for South Lanarkshire (Mr. Hozier) has shown in freeing education in Scotland. He says that he and we last year did not go further than urging the Government to set free the compulsory standards. That is quite true, because the money which we were dealing with last year was not sufficient even to free the compulsory standards. But now Providence, in the shape of this distribution of the Spirit and Beer Duty, has placed before us this sum of money we never expected, and now we make a further demand. The hon. Member for South Lanarkshire asks whether we put any limit to free education, whether we desire to set free the high schools and the universities. I reply that we want to make elementary education free in Scotland; we wish to set free all the standards in the elementary schools. Do hon. Members know what the state of elementary education in Scotland is at this moment? It is free in the lower standards, but parents have to pay in the higher standards, in almost all cases, and so the higher standards are omitted. At present the parents of children in the Sixth Standard pay fees in 2,310 schools in Scotland. And what, after all, is the Sixth Standard? It consists of reading aloud with appropriate expression, writing a short letter on a given subject, and working out some extremely simple questions in arithmetic. In addition there are what are called class subjects, which consist of intelligent explanation of passages in English read by students, learning by heart 150 lines of poetry, and answering a few questions on the geography of the world and British colonies and dependencies. In addition, there are certain special subjects which may be taken up in a very humble and elementary manner by children in the Sixth Standard. Now, I ask hon. Members, and Scotch Members particularly, whether this presents such an extended system of education that we should be satisfied if only a few children reach it? Out of 648,000 children on the register, and 510,000 in average attendance, less than 30,000 attain the Sixth Standard. The main cause of this is that parents of the working classes are tempted and induced to take their children away from school because, after a certain point, the fees increase with the standard reached, until the amount becomes considerable to the poorer class of people. I have a paper here which gives the highest and the lowest fees charged in the different standards. The minimum fee rises from 2d. to 3d. and from 4d. to 4½d. in the Sixth Standard, and the maximum from 6d. to 9d. and from 1s. to 1s. 6d. I maintain, therefore, that this increase of fees is the reason why so many children in Scotland are removed from school before they reach the higher standards. I hope the Government will not yet commit themselves to a proposal that will perpetuate this system. I may remind the Committee of the Report of that important Commission upon educational results in England, and I may quote a few lines from the minority Report of that Commission, to which great weight will be given, as being the Report of very eminent, practical educationalists, and which cannot be considered prejudiced, as my right hon. Friend (Sir W. Hart Dyke) will agree. The Report says—

"We think that in no case should fees be raised with the standard in which the children are being educated. The increase of fees as the children get higher, has had an increasing tendency to drive the children prematurely to work."

Now, I would ask hon. Members to consider, if this is the effect of raising the fees, how much more is the effect of driving children prematurely from school likely to be brought about when it is not a question of raising fees merely, but of instituting fees for the first time on entrance to the Sixth Standard? Yet the Government, by the course they propose to adopt, would help to perpetuate this unsatisfactory state of things, and I venture to say that their action will cause much disappointment in Scotland. There are 44 schools in Scotland where fees are paid in all standards. In Glasgow, 10 schools have been picked out, and in these fees are paid, and from these schools children of poorer parents have been evicted by the hundred, and are obliged to walk past the doors of these schools to some distant and less efficient schools where fees are not charged. In good faith the Glasgow School Board have made this arrangement; they have not money enough to free all the schools, but the result is that the attention of people interested in education is concentrated upon these 10 schools, and diverted from the other schools. The poorer children, the ragged children, the waifs and strays, are concentrated in the free schools, and socially and morally there is a tendency in these schools for the tone to deteriorate, they having no proportion of the better class poor children among them. The hon. Member for Kirkcubright (Mr. Stewart) says it is necessary to be just before we are generous, and we should give relief to the ordinary ratepayers, but just see what the relief would be to Glasgow. A sum of £7,000 falls to the share of Glasgow, and at the very outside that is a relief of $\frac{1}{4}$ d. in the £1. On the other hand, concentrate the relief upon education, and you assist people at the very moment when they want it most, when their children are young. A good deal has been said about the wish of Scotland in this matter. I will not refer, as others have done, to coming elections, but I will simply direct the attention of the Government to the coming Division of the Committee to-night as an indication of the feeling of Scotch Members, and of Scotland, on the question. Let this be the test. Let me remind the right hon.

Sir G. Trevelyan

Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury of the very effective speech he made in St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow, last year, when he said that in the carrying out of these financial proposals for the assistance of local rates, deference had been paid by the Government, deference which it was their duty to pay, to the expression of Scotch opinion. Let him pay that deference now to that opinion as it will be expressed to-night. The Division will show that Scotland unquestionably desires that this £90,000 should be given to free elementary education, and the amount is just sufficient to enable the much-desired object to be carried out, with a few thousands on the right side. It has been said that we have been trying this Session to legislate for classes, and not for the benefit of the people as a whole. Each side has been charged with this by the other; but here, at all events, is an opportunity to do something for the benefit of an entire community, something for which they will be grateful; and I appeal especially to those who are in favour of free education not to let this opportunity pass. Here we have an opportunity to accomplish an object thoroughly and completely. To those who are nervous about free education, I would direct attention to the present state of things in Scotland. They will see that all the harm that could happen from free education in Scotland has been done already. If free education makes men dependent, and robs them of self-reliance, that has been done already, because all the dependent and non-self-reliant classes already get their children paid for. But you have stopped exactly at that point, and I say, if the system be left as it now exists, there will be an immense temptation to parents to remove their children from school before reaching those subjects which have been the glory of Scotland in the past. The Amendment, if adopted, will avert a great blow to all that is best in Scotch education. I have not discussed the matter from a Party point of view, and I hope the Government will agree to do that which will be so much to the benefit of Scotland. If they do, the House will never have done a better day's work, nor will the Government have ever made a more gracious concession.

(10.2.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The right hon. Gentleman felicitated himself upon rising at that opportune moment in the Debate, up to which no Party element had been introduced. He has qualified himself for making that observation by having studiously absented himself from listening to the speech of his right hon. Friend the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman). That speech was conceived in such a tone that even the speech of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary at Birmingham must be made the subject of his comment—not because it was relevant to the subject, but merely because it was made by an opposing partisan. The right hon. Gentleman dilated with eagerness upon the ferocious attacks made by my right hon. Friend upon the dilatory tactics of the Opposition, but he failed to convince anyone of the relevancy of his arguments. Accordingly, I must congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton upon the judicious method by which, when he has got points which he considers, with some justice, to be fair points, and points which are ad rem, he abstains from listening to the intemperate utterances of some of the more furious and violent spirits of his Party. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs rose to heroics such as we are not accustomed to from that quarter. I am sorry to observe that they have deserted him now, because I do not see him in his place. But in filling up the canvas with a very broad brush, he said the option presented to the Committee on the present Amendment was that, on the one hand, we might choose mere naked brutal relief of the rates, and, on the other hand, what he described, in what I observed to be written and deliberate language, as the widest diffusion of knowledge. This is a monetary question. We have to determine the allocation of £50,000, and the question is whether we are to descend into the abyss of political degradation involved in the handing over of this £50,000 to the naked and brutal relief of the rates, or whether we are going to offer up the £50,000 towards some evanescent wave in favour of “the widest diffusion of knowledge.” The right hon. Gentleman pointed out that if we adopted the naked and brutal plan our money was not worth having. Yes, but rates sound in money, because they are made up of nothing else. Well, the right hon. Gentleman goes on in the strain the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan) warns us against. He wanted to inquire whether we would discard an opportunity of showing our zeal for a policy to which he considers we are committed. If he means the policy which he most inaccurately described as free education—if that is the policy for which we are invited to show our zeal, may I retort with the very apposite question: “When did he begin to show his zeal?” He has been a Member of this House, and a responsible Minister for a number of years, but I cannot recall, and if he had been here I should have asked him to aid my recollection, any occasion on which he showed any such zeal. [At this point Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN re-entered the House.] I am asking when the right hon. Gentleman showed his zeal for free education, until free education had been introduced from another political quarter into the arena. It is not a question which has risen into existence or into prominence since 1885. It has been a standing problem for years, and therefore I think that before the right hon. Gentleman charges us with lack of zeal, he ought to look a little at his own record, and show that he was of the regenerate when we were of the unregenerate. I might further remind him that the essential ground of his politics, and the ground upon which he stands now, was only discovered by him to be essential in the year 1886. The right hon. Gentleman asks what I am talking about. If he makes an observation in a tone accessible to this side of the House, he must take the consequences; but this new apostle of free education transcends the limits not only of moderation, but of discretion, in describing the scope of his ambition. He tells us what he aims at is the widest diffusion of knowledge. But when he descends to more specific terms what is it I find? His spirit rises above even relevancy, and he has, in the most apposite and convincing, against himself, illustration, pointed to what he revels in describing as the old Scottish system of education. It certainly was a most admirable system in one respect. A lad went to a parish school. He found that he got from the schoolmaster instruction in Greek and in Latin, and he went straight from the parish school to the University. Does the right hon. Gentleman propose that we should complete the scheme of last year by carrying this lad into his studies of Latin and Greek at the school?

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): No, no.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: But the right hon. Gentleman does not say no. That is left to his inconsequent supporter behind him. Well, the right hon. Gentleman does not propose that. No, but I do not think his theory or principles or aspirations will permit him to stop short of voting money out of the Local Taxation Account towards carrying enterprising boys into and through the University. The right hon. Gentleman assents to that. Well, then, let me put this question to him. What is your tariff? Would £50,000 suit you? Would £100,000 suit you?

SIR G. CAMPBELL: It might.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The hon. Member who interrupts me has spoken on such a variety of subjects during the evening that I think he had better reserve his energies. I should like to ask any reasonable Member of the House this question: Is the demand made upon us—is the Amendment we are now considering an Amendment which implies that the House of Commons is to be asked to vote moneys arising from taxation to the purpose of educating boys at college? If so, let the ratepayers of Scotland know it, and let them know it over and over again. I cannot understand this new-born enthusiasm on such a large scale, because we are now rising, I am afraid, out of the region of the masses, and are following the classes into their ignominious and academic seclusion. You would really be subsidising the apostates from the cause of freedom, because you would be conferring a bonus on every one who leaves the elementary school and seeks a refuge among that class, which is the most widely denounced of all the others that are now proscribed, namely, the educated class. Therefore, I rejoice that I have drawn an exposition of policy from the Front Bench opposite. We now understand that the proposal is not merely to get to the Sixth Standard or to the specific subjects in the schools, but that you are going to carry boys through the course of training usually found in intermediate schools, and you are going to carry them through the Universities, and all at the expense of the ratepayers. No limit was prescribed. The only limit pointed out was that alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs when he said he went in for "the wide diffusion of knowledge." "The knowable," then, is the limit for education at the expense of the ratepayers. If we are going to descend from the elevation to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division aspires, and if we are going into the question of Party politics, then I will gladly undertake to discuss the question in any constituency in Scotland whether the money of the ratepayers is going to be spent on academic and on intermediate education. The right hon. Gentleman has thought that it would promote general political interests, because he avowed that political interests was what he was speaking for. The right hon. Gentleman must pardon me for turning to the question of what is the alternative plan proposed by the Government. Now, he has resorted to a method which is the most crude that I have ever discovered in the demagogic party. I listened with some surprise to the right hon. Gentleman upon this account. He thinks, apparently, that it is a good plan to call attention to the amount of rates which are paid in the counties by landlords, and he deduces from that that we are making an attempt to give money to the landlords. There is a large amount of uninstructed sympathy with that statement among hon. Members opposite. How does the case stand? We are proposing to give money for distribution by the County Councils and the Town Councils throughout Scotland, and the right hon. Gentleman says we are proposing to give it to the landlords.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I did not say you were proposing to give it to the landlords. I said, if the money was devoted as the Government propose, there is a chance of a large part of it going to landlords owing to the system of rating.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Yes; but I think the right hon. Gentleman will grant me this—and, if he does not grant it the House knows it—that in describing our alternative scheme of relieving the rate-payers, he presented it as conferring a boon on the landlords. I want to show how the fact stands. We are giving this money equally between counties and burghs.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): No, no.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The hon. and learned Member for Aberdeen speaks a great deal more frequently in the House than I do, and I really think when I am speaking I might be conceded a freedom from listening to him. I say we are giving this money between the counties and burghs of Scotland, and in what proportion between the two? The counties are about £13,500,000 of valuation, and the burghs are about £12,000,000. Accordingly, they are very nearly equal. In the burghs the rating is wholly upon the occupiers; and accordingly, in the burghs you are conferring it on the occupiers, to the exclusion of the landlords. I turn to the counties; and the right hon. Gentleman, who, by-the-bye, is a Scottish landlord, apparently is so ignorant of his own affairs that he does not know that of rates administered by the County Councils, the greater part falls, not upon the landlords alone, but half on landlords and half on occupiers. The rates levied by the Commissioners of Supply according to the last Local Taxation Accounts were £187,000, which fell on owners alone, and the road rates in counties were £255,000. I think I must say that liberties are being taken with this Committee when assertions are made by the right hon. Gentleman, who I do not say consciously misleads the Committee on the subject, when he leaves out of account the half of that which fell on the occupiers only, and then, turning to the other half, misrepresents it to this extent, that of the half he selects the greater part is a divided rate. Accordingly, I say, to represent the proposals of the Government as being an attempt to favour the class of landlords, is one of the wildest and most desperate attempts that has come from a quarter in which, I am afraid, such attempts are not infrequent. The right hon. Gentleman's proposal is marked by this characteristic at the outset, that, if such a proposal is carried out to its results, and unlimited by figures—and the right hon. Gentleman gave no figures—it carries with it consequences which are absolutely untenable if you have the slightest regard to the interests of the ratepayers. There are some Members who may be anxious to know how the facts stand about our educational scheme. Is there a necessity for a larger grant than £40,000? That is the question which is primarily before the Committee, but which has been voluntarily altered by the right hon. Gentleman. He has indulged in a long historical narrative, mostly entirely inaccurate, as to what took place only so lately as last year. Parliament is not committed in any sense or degree to the wild scheme of enfranchising or freeing education in Scotland. Nothing of the kind. When the Local Government Bill was introduced, the giving of the money to the relief of fees was an integral part of our scheme. Speaking with the special instructions of the Government, I said, in introducing the Local Government Bill, that we thought ourselves justified in proposing relief to fees, because, inasmuch as parents were compelled to pay fees for the compulsory standards, there was at least an opening given for the approval of Parliament to relief by the payment of these fees. I made no limitation on the subject. Our proposal related to the lower standards, but the principle we have asserted as regards the compulsory standards is irrespective of the number. Is there the smallest warrant for saying that we have gone beyond that? I do not remember, except in the speeches or lectures of the hon. Member for East Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) that there was on the part of hon. Gentlemen any recommendation of the wider scheme which is now enunciated. Most certainly, among the cautious utterances which came from that quarter, I do not think there was much said about the "wide diffusion of knowledge," spoken of by the right hon. Member for Stirling. Our proposals being thus limited, what I am concerned to show is, that we are now completing them by the grant of £40,000. In the first place, I want to ask this: To what extent is it that our present supply of money falls short of freeing the five compulsory standards in State-aided schools? Here is the answer. There are 3,134 State-aided schools. 2,981 have no fees in compulsory standards; that leaves only 153 in which there are some fees; but of these 13 are voluntary schools, which lie outside our scheme and do not take the grant. Forty-two are fee-paying schools in the large towns, where, I think, it would be preposterous to force people to go free when they want to pay, leaving only 98 schools in which the state of matters is this: that they come under the second alternative of our regulations and provide the first three standards absolutely free and only a proportion free in the Fourth and Fifth Standards. Therefore, the problem before us in order to confer free education in the State-aided schools in Scotland is merely to get rid of the payment of fees in 98 schools.

MR. HUNTER: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman how these figures are to be reconciled with the Return presented to the House on the 16th March, from which it appears that there are 25 schools only which are under the five standards, 16 where the grant is not claimed, and 42 where it is claimed.

but the increase to 98 has arisen from the fact that the School Boards found that they had outrun their funds, and accordingly they were reducing these School Boards which accepted freedom in the Fourth and Fifth Standard absolutely to School Boards in which freedom was only accepted for a proportion of places. Before leaving this subject, let me point out that, so far as the mere problem of dealing with free education in the State-aided schools within the five compulsory standards is concerned, we are limited to 98 schools alone requiring aid, but I see, and we have always seen, the force of the indication given by the increase from 25 to 98. Some of the School Boards have gone too far for their means, and they have enfranchised the standards without attending to their resources. If we were to stand by the 98—and I do not see any reason why it should be much increased—if we were to look a little ahead, we should have to regard the financial position of the School Boards generally, in order to conjecture whether more might come into the 98, so as to increase the number. And this leads me to consider the question of how stands the balance between the financial state of the school managers before our system was introduced and after. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stirling gave figures which, I think, he will find are not quite accurate. I will state what I believe are the accurate figures as regards, in the first place, the receipts of the School Boards and school managers when the system of fees for the five standards was permitted. They amounted to £315,000, of which £295,000 was paid primarily by parents, and about £20,000 by Parochial Boards as standing in loco parentis to poor children. I want to make this quite clear. In striking a balance sheet, of course, you take into account what is the alteration of the scheme as affected by your plan of last year. £315,000 is the sum we start from. But part of that is covered by the Sixth Standard and the extra standards. Therefore, to compare what the School Boards got as compared with what they gave up, you must reduce the total receipts by the amount of the higher standards, which we do not touch. I do not know what hon. Gentlemen opposite consider to be the cost of the Sixth Standard and the special subjects, but they will not quarrel if I put it at as low a figure as possible—say 10 per cent. I understand that is a very low estimate. That leaves £283,000 as the amount of fees which we may ascribe to the five compulsory standards. Now, we already give £250,000, and we propose to give £40,000 more. Thus the Committee will see that while it requires £33,000 we give £40,000. Accordingly, I do think that we make adequately fair provision. The margin between £33,000, and £40,000 is on the footing that fees were probably rising when we did away with them. If a defect can be pointed out in this calculation it is on the side of our being more than liberal. Now, in what I say I am addressing myself to the Committee upon the footing that you are not going to adopt the mere general diffusion of knowledge, but stick to the compulsory standards. I pursue this because I think the point is important. It has been suggested, and I have not the least doubt that the reflection occurs to many hon. Gentlemen, that, after all, one can name places where there is greater deficiency in the rate than will be made up by the grant we propose. I conceive that to be the case, but every effort to equalise payments by a grant of this kind must necessarily regard the aggregate and not individual cases. I will tell the Committee why. Because the scale of fees varies to a very great extent. There are some places, which I could name if it were not invidious, where there is a heavy deficit. But these places are the rich and not the poor places. The reason of the deficit is a simple one: that in these places they have fixed high fees, that being merely an indication of their wealth, and it is in consequence of that that our grant, which is distributed according to the average attendance, is inadequate to fill up the gap made by the withdrawal of fees which are only calculated on their own affluent abilities. Therefore, it is in vain to pursue any plan for filling up gaps and holes in the finances of School Boards. If we do that, the result will be either that we shall give the money entirely over to those large and rich places, and give nothing to the poorer districts, or that we shall have to increase our additions enormously and give to the poor districts pari passu according to the emergencies of the richer districts created by requirements of which the poorer districts are entirely ignorant. I venture to think the Committee will appreciate the justness of the standard I suggested, and if that is so, is not the conclusive reason this: that in the bottom of their hearts and minds they know that the fair principle of distribution of this money ought to be, education or no education, the relief of the people who have to pay rates. There is, however, one point which I ought not to omit. I included 2,981 as the number of school managers who have no fees in the compulsory standards, but in that there are degrees of liberality. Of these 2,247 have abolished fees up to and including the Fifth Standard, but 734 have outstripped Parliament's notions of liberality and abolished fees altogether. Then there comes the question which has been boldly mooted by the right hon. Gentleman in his adventurous speech. I quite understand that if School Boards are so constituted that Members can retain their seats after having voted in favour of a wide diffusion of knowledge, Parliament cannot control them. That is quite a matter for them to determine, and if a programme of that kind finds acceptance in the arena of School Boards, good and well; but the question we have to consider is whether it is permissible to us to take money which in the first view belongs to the ratepayers, and apply it to those elevated and expensive notions. I think the Committee will decline to agree with them. I fully believe that education in Scotland is extremely popular. I am entirely in favour of giving all proper facilities for that purpose, but I do not think there would be any justification for Parliament to take away money which primarily belongs to the larger class of the ratepayers, and limiting the gift. [Cries of "No, no!"] Certainly the larger classes. Does any hon. Gentleman opposite pretend to such statistical knowledge as to believe that all people who pay rates have children at the Board or elementary schools?

That is putting an exception in favour of unmarried and childless people which is not to be found in Statutes. Is this the proper moment to make the present proposal? Why, of all others, it seems the very moment when it would be very unwise to make any fresh departure, to encourage any fresh unrecognised liabilities on the part of the rates or ratepayers towards the cost of education. It is an open secret that there are proposals in contemplation as regards England for assisting education by grants from public moneys. If so, it will be borne in mind when that method is applied to Scotland that the transaction of last year was not a vote of Imperial money to Scotch education, but was a surrender, an assignation from the Scotch ratepayers towards free education. Would it not be well to wait, leaving our hands free, having nearly completed the system to which Parliament is already committed, and enter upon the consideration of what is to be done for Scotland then, with all the fresh ideas furnished by the aspirations of Scotch opinion, and also enlightened by the experience of the last experimental year. I think the Committee would do wisely to adopt the proposal of the Government, and I cannot believe any defeat will be encountered by Scotch education if we do not limit our aspirations by what would be merely a tentative and somewhat limited plan.

(10.40.) MR. HUNTER: With one statement we shall all agree, that the policy of Her Majesty's Government was most incorrectly described as a policy of free education. I thank the right hon. Gentleman for the admission, because some of his friends in Scotland have been posing as advocates of free education, and have claimed credit to the Government for this policy. One point, then, is cleared up. I would remind the Committee that in endeavouring to extort from the Tory Party free education for Scotland, we have been engaged in a very difficult and arduous task. The policy of Her Majesty's Government has never been a policy of free education; it has been entirely opposed to free education, and they have never budged one inch, or made the slightest concession, except under terror of losing all Tory representation in Scotland. On December 21st, 1888, the application of the Probate Duty in Scotland to free education was suggested by myself about half-past 2 in the morning. I did not want a patent for the idea; I presented it as a free gift to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because it appeared not to have occurred to him, and I told him he would make himself most popular if, instead of foolishly squandering the money on what he was pleased to call the rates, he devoted it to freeing education. I might as well have appealed to a stone wall. The right hon. Gentleman would not listen to me, and then, for once in my life, I made a great mistake. I allowed him to take the Second Reading of his Bill after 12 o'clock, when a simple objection would have stayed its progress. That was on Tuesday. On the next morning I repented of my error, and arranged with the late Mr. Biggar, the Whip of the Irish Party, that on the Wednesday his friends of the Irish Party should discuss those grievances which afflicted them until half-past 4, by which time I hoped I might bring the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Her Majesty's Government to reason. Sir, sweet are the uses of obstruction! Before 3 o'clock the Chancellor of the Exchequer surrendered to force majeure and consented to confine his Bill to the then coming year. The fact was, he had an engagement at dinner that evening; he had to meet the Civil servants at the Hôtel Métropole, and make what we all recognised as an important speech; so between the Irish Members in the earlier part of the day, and the coming dinner, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, much against his will, saw reason and consented to make his Bill applicable to the current year. That gave us an opportunity to test the opinion of Scotland in regard to the application of the Probate Duty. It happened that on this side there was exhibited an unanimous opinion in favour of education. What did the Government do? After they were made acquainted with this unanimous opinion, they introduced a Bill which limited the application of the principle of free education to Standards I., II., and III. That was what we met with in the beginning of the Session of 1889, and that concession was made, but, I agree with the Lord Advocate, not because they hold the slightest possible inclination in favour of free education—I am sure they have not—but solely and simply to stave off the demand for free education and to defeat the purpose of those who are in favour of that proposal. What did the Government do after they had introduced their Bill in 1889? They stood to it in the firmest possible manner. I remember going with a deputation to meet the Secretary for Scotland, and it was very near the time when the Government Bill would be going into Committee, and the Secretary for Scotland put down his foot in the firmest manner and said he would have nothing to do with free education, and would not go an inch beyond the Third Standard. Well, we are familiar with the causes that induced the Government to go beyond that, and make another concession. We had a Division in Committee, and 52 Scotch Members voted against the Government, and only 10 in their favour. The next day the Government came down and announced another surrender. Therefore, I cheerfully recognise the claim of the Lord Advocate to be an enemy of free education and one who has not taken any steps towards it, except under external compulsion. The right hon. Gentleman is in this dilemma: As a matter of fact, at the present time very nearly a fourth of the schools in Scotland have adopted the principle of free education through all the standards—700 out of nearly 3,000. The argument upon principle is, therefore, not now an open one, because these schools which have abolished fees could not have done so without the express consent of the Education Department, which includes, of course, the right hon. Gentleman himself.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Permit me to explain. The consent of the Scotch Education Department was limited only to certifying that certain conditions were fulfilled; assent was given to nothing beyond.

MR. HUNTER: That is open to another difficulty; that the Scotch Department, for what reason I do not know, sanctioned that relief in the case of 25 per cent. of the schools, and now they refuse it.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Certainly, because the question was whether they came under conditions of which the Education Department was especially seized, and on this the Department assented to the arrangement.

MR. HUNTER: Well, in 700 odd schools the Department have sanctioned free education.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Assent was limited to those considerations with which the Department are conversant, the first five standards.

MR. HUNTER: Well, the fact is they did it.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: It is inconvenient to continue interrupting the hon. Gentleman, and if he continues repeating his statement, he must consider me as giving the most emphatic denial that courtesy will allow.

MR. HUNTER: Well, it is not denied that 734 schools have abolished fees in all standards. Now, I wish to say a word in regard to the alternative proposal, to which the Lord Advocate alluded. I should greatly regret if there should be any mistake or exaggeration on this point. The Government divide the £50,000 between the counties and the burghs, not according to the amount of the rates which are payable by them respectively, but according to their wealth, which is a totally irrelevant consideration. The result is, that for every 6d. given for the relief of rates in burghs, 1s. 6d. is given for the relief of rates in counties. That is a fact not capable of serious denial, because you find in burghs, rates are, roughly speaking, three times what they are in counties. You have adopted not the standard of burden of rates, which would be relevant, but the standard of wealth, which is wholly irrelevant. It is in the power of the County Councils to apply the money in relief of the rates that are paid by landlords only. In Aberdeen 75 per cent. of the houses are under £10 rental; and the benefit would be 5d. to a man at £10, 3d. to a man at £6. For these ridiculous benefits the people of Scotland are to be denied the dearest wish of their hearts—the completion of the scheme of free education. I ask the Government to make this concession, because, in the first place, it is obvious that if we have a system of free education for the lower standards and begin school fees for the higher, we deal a deadly blow at these higher standards. But another reason for the concession is, that it is demanded by the almost universal opinion of Scotland. The distinction between non-compulsory and compulsory standards does not commend itself to the people of Scotland. Why should the Government, having swallowed the camel, now strain at the gnat? The total amount required is very small compared with what has been already given, and their refusal is viewed by the people of Scotland, not with amazement, but with absolute stupefaction. I ask the Government to remember that the tax out of which this money comes was imposed against the wishes of two to one of the Scottish Members. That taxation produces £200,000 a year, equal to 1s. per head of the population of Scotland, or an average of 5s. per family. When the working man is told that a fifth of that goes to the provision of pensions for the police, he will not unnaturally say, I would rather the 1s. went towards a pension for myself. Then another 1s. is to be expended on the extension of free education. That the people of Scotland are not only prepared to assent to, but they enthusiastically welcome it. What becomes of the other 3s.? You propose to give 1s. 3d. to the rates. But this will scarcely benefit the poorer ratepayer; he will only benefit to the extent of the 3d., while the richer ratepayer will not only get all the 1s. 3d. which is intended to go to him, but also the 1s. which is withdrawn from the poorer ratepayer. Still you have 1s. 9d. left, and what does the Chancellor of the Exchequer say about that? He says "I cannot give that to you; I must give that to England." And thus the whole of the 5s. is disposed of, and a more outrageous or more iniquitous financial proceeding it would be difficult to imagine. Out of the £200,000 you are giving the working man only a paltry 3d. or 4d., a result that is at once ludicrous and scandalous. All I can say is that the Scotch Members will not consent to this waste of money, and that they are determined that their schools shall be free from top to bottom. There are magnificent palaces of education in Scotland, but over their portals is written "The sons of working men not admitted here." I hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will reconsider the matter, that he will compare the advantages to be gained by concession with those likely to result from resistance, and that he will make provision out of this Fund to abolish all school fees in Scotland.

(11.5.) Mr. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I think the appeal of the hon. Member is not likely to be successful by reason of the manner in which he has treated the concessions made last year to those who, in the course of the Debates on the Local Government Bill, demanded Free Education for Scotland, I do not think it was fair for the hon. Member for Aberdeen to claim for himself and his friends the credit for the concessions granted last year by the Unionist Government. But I am sorry that the hon. Member was not the only speaker to introduce Party considerations into this Debate. I think the Lord Advocate would have been better advised had he not taunted the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stirling Burghs with the introduction of Party politics into to-night's Debate. He taunted him with a new born zeal for free education, and said his only limit was the widest diffusion of knowledge that can be given. I venture to say that the Scotch people care very little as to when the right hon. Gentleman first came to the conclusion he now seems to hold, that education throughout the elementary schools of Scotland should be free. This is absolutely a non-party question in Scotland, and I say that the opinion of the people, so far as I have been able to gather it, is that, as far as possible, elementary education should be free. I represent not a rich city like Edinburgh, or a rich burgh like Glasgow, but comparatively poor districts, and on their behalf I can only express regret that the Government have not seen their way to giving a larger sum than they propose for educational purposes. To carry free education from the elementary schools to the higher schools, and from the higher schools to the University, may be a dream of the future, but it is not desired at the present time by the Scotch people; at this moment they only desire to see elementary education absolutely free, and that is the reason why we ask the Government to grant a further sum. I appreciate the difficulty in which Her Majesty's Government find themselves. Of course they do not know if the extra duty on spirits and beer will be imposed for a longer period than one year, and if they freed all the standards now they would be committing themselves to the proposition that the standards other than the compulsory ones should be free in the future. I admit that it is not unreasonable for the Government to say that, at any rate for this Session, all they can do is to free the compulsory standards. But why should the Government refuse the suggestion that has been made to them, that they should give the County Councils the right, if they deem it advisable, to apply some portion of this money to the purposes of education, so that the County Councils may hand some part of the money over to the School Boards to lessen the burden of fees? The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated, in answer to a question I put to him the other day, that it was not in the power of the County Councils to give grants for educational purposes, as they had no control over such matters.

But if he will not go so far as is suggested in the Amendment of my right hon. Friend, he surely might make some concession, and allow County and Town Councils to grant for educational purposes some portion of this money if they so decide, so as to lessen the burden of school fees. It must be remembered that in the Debate last year, some of us protested strongly against the proposals of the Government to free the lower standards. We felt that if anything was to be done for the relief of education, it should be rather by abolishing the fees in the higher standards. During the whole of last year's Debate there was an Amendment on the Paper in my name which suggested that. The Amendment we are now discussing is a step in the same direction, and unless Her Majesty's Government modify their scheme by accepting the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs, or by adopting the suggestion I have mentioned, very few of the Scottish Members will support Her Majesty's Government on this matter. The Scottish people are anxious to see elementary education entirely freed from school fees, and I hope Her Majesty's Government will meet this widespread feeling, and the all but unanimous wish of the Scotch Members.

(11.16.) SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): When we discussed in this House the proposal to appoint a Minister for Scotland, I expressed my fear that the Lord Advocate would be the Minister for Education in this House, and that the real Minister would be in the other House. The speech of the Lord Advocate to-night has confirmed my worst apprehensions as to the manner in which Scottish education would be dealt with. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of the "wild scheme" of free education for Scotland. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman hold that language in the constituencies at the next General Election?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Certainly, sir; and I shall state the matter exactly as I did to-night—the "wild language of the scheme as stated by the right hon. Gentleman opposite."

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Yes, the word "the" being demonstrative of the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman, including free University education.

*SIR L. PLAYFAIR: The whole of the right hon. Gentleman's speech was against free education in Scotland in the upper standards, though the principle of the Scotch system is to encourage higher education in public schools. The right hon. Gentleman appears to have wholly mistaken the principles which have ruled Scotch education in the past. I should not have objected if the right hon. Gentleman had done for Scotland what the Chancellor of the Exchequer has done for Wales in the matter of intermediate education. On the contrary, I should have been exceedingly pleased. What we ask is that the Government should free the upper standards as they had freed the lower. The great bulk of the Scottish Members request that the money shall be applied to that purpose. Why should not the Government be gracious and carry out the work they have begun? The right hon. Gentleman, whose speeches I always read with interest, took much credit at Inverness last year to the Government for having freed education in Scotland. But, if he wishes the Government to retain that credit, if he wishes them to hold a position in Scotch politics in the future, I would advise them not to apply this money to a mere reduction of the rates, but to accede to the wishes of the Scotch people and free the upper standards.

*(11.36.) MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): I hope that the Government, after the Division just taken, will be open to argument. I think that the Lord Advocate will not find it easy to defend in Scotland the language he has uttered in this House. It is the general wish of Scotland that education in all the standards should be free; it is not a wild scheme which is entertained either by my right hon. Friend the Member for the Stirling Burghs, or by anyone else. It is the deliberate conviction of teachers, of School Boards, and of others who best understand the question, that it is not well to confine freedom from fees to the compulsory standards. I hope that the Government will re-consider the position, and will not limit the application of this money, so cut down as it now is to £40,000. There are many School Boards in Scotland which have freed all the compulsory standards, and in their case if this money may not be applied to the higher standards it will become simply a grant in relief of the rates. Why should not the Government leave it open to School Boards to use the money at their discretion, subject to the approval of Dover House? I have only one other remark to make. Whereas the Lord Advocate seemed to put his foot down firmly against going beyond abolishing the fees for the compulsory standards, yet, afterwards, he seemed to forget that principle when he dwelt on what might be done for Scotch education next year, and agreed that whenever England got money from National Funds for purposes of free elementary education, Scotland should insist on having a corresponding sum for higher instruction.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, lines 13 and 14, to leave out the words "of children in the compulsory standards of the Scotch Code."—(Mr. Charles Parker.)

(11.43.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I can hardly suppose that the Committee will expect any formal reply from me on the Amendment moved by the hon. Member, which is manifestly within the scope of the Debate which has just closed. The question between the compulsory and non-compulsory standards was the gist and essence of that debate. The hon. Member has totally misconceived what I have said. I have not indicated, and did not intend to indicate, that in future years the non-compulsory standard will be the subject of any grant by Parliament.

(11.44.) MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I think we have reason to complain of the manner in which this important subject has been treated by the Lord Advocate. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs as if it was a wild and vague proposition for the diffusion of useful knowledge. The Lord Advocate evidently spoke under great excitement in the greater part of his speech, which must have been intended as a reply to some castigation which he had previously received from my right hon. Friend, because the speech of the Lord Advocate was in no way relevant to the speech of my right hon. Friend. If my right hon. Friend feels that he has been extinguished by the exuberant eloquence of the Lord Advocate, he must feel he is buried in flowers, because such an accumulation of flowers of rhetoric as the right hon. and learned Gentleman presented to the House we have rarely had the advantage of hearing. Indeed, I was glad when at last the right hon. Gentleman came to figures, and returned to his accustomed clear style of oratory. This question of devoting the money to freeing non-compulsory standards is a very important one for Scotland. I for one disapprove altogether of this system of grants in aid by which one interest after another is sought to be bribed. We have some reason to complain, when we have a useful object on which almost all the Representatives of Scotland are at one, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer takes no pains to ascertain what the wishes of the Scottish people are; and when they are forced on his attention, he attempts some means for the disposal of the money which will go contrary to our wishes. There is no object of legislation which Scotland cares for that the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not find some opportunity of flouting and thwarting, and though I believe there is just reason to complain of the manner in which Scottish business is neglected in this House, it is with regret that I observe when proposals about Scottish Home Rule are mooted, which we think extreme, the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes it impossible for us to give an answer to them to our constituents. From the point of view of Party, the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer will do the Opposition nothing but good, but I would rather see the people get this boon than secure a Party advantage, and I therefore appeal to the Government at the eleventh hour to assent to the Amendment.

(11.52.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): According to this clause, the £40,000 can only be applied for the purpose of freeing education in the compulsory standards. Yet the statistics quoted by the Lord Advocate shew that these standards are already free in all the elementary schools, and that more money is not required. You are dealing with Imperial money, and I maintain that every portion of Scotland is entitled to a share of it, and that it is wrong to impose a restriction that the money shall be applied to freeing education in the compulsory standards. I contend that the money could not be better spent than in freeing the higher standards, and in that way, you will be placing all your schools in the same position as the 734 schools which charge no fee whatever. I hope that the Amendment will be carried.

(11.55.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): In Caithness all the compulsory standards in the schools are free. The rates in that county are high, varying from 2s. to 4s. 6d. in the £1, and the fees low, and I am anxious to know whether we are to lose our share of this money.

(11.56.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: No, Sir. The schools indicated by the hon. Member will participate in the grant just as the others would.

*(11.57.) MR. C. S. PARKER: If the Clause passes in its present form, will a School Board be able to pay the fees in the compulsory standards out of this grant of £40,000, and then apply money from the Probate Duty to the sixth standard?

(11.58.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Yes, Sir. The condition of the payment will be, that the Boards shall free the compulsory standards. When that is done, they may deal with the rest of the money as they please.

(11.59.) MR. HUNTER: I cannot agree with that construction of the clause. It is distinctly stated that the £40,000 shall be applied for the compulsory standards, and the effect of that will be that those schools which provide for more than the five standards must necessarily be deprived of any share of this grant.

FISHERIES REGULATIONS (SCOTLAND)

BILL.—(No. 53.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): In moving the discharge of this Order I claim the indulgence of this House while I say a very few words. Six years ago I was asked by the then Government to preside over a Committee appointed to inquire into the question of the Scotch Fisheries. I was asked to state what were my views upon the subject, and to put them in the form of a Bill, which I did. That Bill, however, was not passed. I subsequently re-introduced the measure with certain Amendments, but the Government said they would themselves take up the matter. They did so, but their measure was nothing but an emasculated edition of my Bill. The matter is one of very great importance to the fishing interests of Scotland, but the Government have not been able to see their way to obtaining a full consideration of the measure this Session. It would have been perfectly possible for them, at any rate, to have passed a simple measure dealing with the important matter of the mussel fisheries. I beg to enter my strongest and most indignant protest against the way in which the Government have neglected the Scotch fishery interests, and having done that I move that the Order be discharged and the Bill withdrawn.

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION (BLIND AND DEAF) BILL.—(No. 155.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to order).

Clause 1.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK) : I have an Amendment in Clause 1. My noble Friend opposite, who takes an interest in this question, was anxious that deaf mutes should have at least eight years of compulsory education. In Committee that proposal was considered, on the footing that they should stay where they were being educated until they were 16 years of age. By the Bill they are made children up to the age of 16, but the compulsory attendance was only up to 14. In order to ensure that there shall, if possible, be the eight years' compulsory education, I propose, and my noble Friend assents, to leave out in line 7 the words "except in the case of a deaf child under seven years of age."

EARL GRANVILLE: I certainly regret to find that in the Standing Committee the general sense of the Committee was against the proposal which I made. The proposal was in accordance with the recommendations of the Commissioners; but as that was the case I regretfully acquiesced that the course of education should take eight years. The Committee recommended that the age should be 16, and I myself think that best. I accept the proposal which the noble Viscount has made.

Amendment moved, in line 7, to leave out the words "except in the case of a deaf child under seven years of age."

Agreed to.

Clause 12.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I have given notice of an Amendment for the purpose of being able to make some remarks upon this clause of the Bill. It is the clause which provides that the County Councils are to pay half the expense which has been incurred under this Bill.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: Half of the net expense.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Exactly so. The question how to provide for the expense incurred under this Bill seems, I fully admit, to be one of some difficulty. At first it certainly occurred to me that a better arrangement would have been that any relief to be given to particular School Authorities should be in the form of a contribution from the whole Union; but I quite saw, when I endeavoured to frame such an Amendment, that there are great difficulties in making such a provision, because the School Authorities are of two kinds under this Bill: there is the School Authority represented by the School Board, and there is the School Authority which is represented by the Attendance Committee appointed by the Board of Guardians. Of course, if you provide that a Union rate should be levied, then it must be levied by the Board of Guardians, and that would place them in some sort over the School Board. I do not quite see, I freely admit, how to frame such an Amendment. It is quite possible an Amendment of that kind might be framed, but I have not that minute acquaintance with such matters which would justify me in making such a proposal. To give the reason why I think on consideration it would be better that this clause should be struck out, my objection is a general one. I do not like the idea of making the County Councils mere conduit pipes for making payments to other bodies. A County Council is a body which ought to exercise an intelligent control over all matters where money is to be paid out of the County Rate; and, as I understand this Bill, all the County Council would have to do would be simply to supply so much money towards the expenses of these various School Authorities; it would have really no voice in the matter, except possibly to say that a particular expense would be a reasonable one. My own impression is that the proper course would be that each School Authority should provide for its own deaf-mutes and blind. If there are any deaf-mutes and blind children in a district, why should not that district provide for them in the same way as it provides for the ordinary unaffected children who have to be provided for in the district? In large parishes, I do not think there would be any real objection. The only difficulty which I see is in the cases which I fully admit may exist where there are very small parishes, having to provide for such children. But I do not suppose the number of deaf-mutes and blind children would be considerable in any one of those parishes, and therefore I do not see that the burden would be very serious. What I contend is that if it is necessary there should be an additional grant made towards those particular parishes or School Boards, for the purpose of enabling these particular children to be educated. It would be far more reasonable that that should be a grant made by the Education Department than by the County Council. This is a matter of education. This Bill provides that the blind and deaf-mutes should be educated. Their education will necessarily, I apprehend, cost more than the education of ordinary children. If that is so, as it is a matter of national importance that these children should be educated, if any additional expense is incurred thereby, I do not see why there should not be a special grant made in that way, and I do not see why it would not be possible then to leave the various parishes to make their own arrangements. It would be entirely a matter of contribution towards the maintenance of larger establishments. Of course, I need hardly say that I do not intend to press the matter to a Division. My object is to draw attention generally to the nature of the clause, and specially to say what I think will be found to be the case, that there will probably be very considerable objections put forward throughout the country to making this provision by way of a rate to be paid by the County Council. I am not inclined to push the objection which I am going to mention very far, but the noble Viscount knows as well as I do what jealousy is felt in regard to the application of money derived from the rates for voluntary schools. Of course, these grants from the rates will be, in reality, applied for the maintenance of these poor children. But, as I have said, I am not inclined to press the objection on that ground very strongly; still, as it is an objection which obtains very strongly throughout the country I cannot help feeling that there will on that account be a great deal of opposition to this Bill, which everyone must, I think, desire to see passed.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I am very much indebted to the noble Earl and to the Committee for the way in which they have received the Bill and discussed it. I quite admit there are great difficulties in dealing with this question in England which would not exist in Scotland, because there they have schools where one system could be adopted throughout. Then with regard to the expense, I called the noble Earl Lord Kimberley's attention to the fact that it is the net expense that has to be dealt with, because under this Bill it will be observed that nothing is laid down as to the amount which the State will give for the purpose of this education, and, therefore, whatever it is the net expense will be whatever has to be provided beyond that. It may be according to the grant which will be given through the Education Department that the necessity for any large expenditure may be obviated. But I thought that was entirely a question for the other House, and, therefore, I have only put in that there should be that power through the Education Department to make a Parliamentary grant for this purpose. Then with regard to the Voluntary School question I think the noble Earl will see there is not much risk on that head in this case. For the blind and the deaf-mutes the amount of expense will be different. The expense of educating the blind will be much less than that of educating deaf-mutes, because, with the exception of the necessary embossed books and means of that kind for teaching them, there is nothing very exceptional in their case as regards expenditure. It is nothing like so great in regard to the numbers of teachers required, and so on, as in the case of the deaf-mutes. I believe the noble Earl opposite, who has acquainted himself so thoroughly with the subject, knows how few deaf-mutes can be taught by a single person. But with the blind that is different. Perhaps I may be permitted to say for a moment that there is a good deal of misconception entertained as to the duties of the Department with which I am connected. People write as if its duties were not merely to see to elementary education, but to continue the manual and technical instruction up to the age of 21. That, of course, is quite beyond the purview of the Department over which I have the honour to preside, at all events at present. That duty may be cast upon it hereafter, but at present it is not. Therefore, this Bill is confined to what I may call the "child age." It is only that with which we have to deal. In these cases the question of rates I quite admit is very important. I may recall the fact that I showed the noble Earl opposite and others a card which I had received, giving particulars of one case where a marriage between deaf-mutes produced five deaf-mute children, all practically falling upon the rates, that is to say, looking to charity in order to get their education. The Guardians in all cases have to find whatever money is found, except where the parents are in good circumstances and can contribute towards the cost; and I find the amount is as much as £18 per head. So that in that case of five children in one family there is a sum of £90 to be found for that purpose by one small parish which might not, in fact, be able to raise much more than that sum even if it had a 2d. rate. My idea was, as far as possible, to spread the burden of these children as has been done in other cases—diseased, sick, and others—so that they might be provided for in degree. Formerly, as your Lordships know, everything was charged upon each parish in London, but now all such charges are thrown on the Common Fund. And so with regard to the County Councils; the County Councils have at present, by the 24th section of the Local Government Act, to provide, in a great many instances, money very much in the same way as this. This, of course, will be a much smaller sum, one which will not press very heavily upon the Councils, or, indeed, upon the Unions. But there is one fact which the noble Earl has omitted to mention. In the case of a School Attendance Committee, the power belongs, of course, to the Guardians; but there may be a very large part of the Union under the School Boards, and there may be only a small part without the School Boards, and having Voluntary Schools. Therefore, the area would be a very limited one, as it is under the School Attendance Committee. That part which is outside the School Boards' districts forms an important part, because there the School Attendance Committee would, of course, have no power of interference with the School Boards. Well, that being so, the noble Earl will see how very difficult it is to lay down any rule as to fixing the charge upon the Guardians. The subject has been most carefully considered. The Local Government Board was so extremely hostile to putting it upon the Guardians, and they made so many real bond fide objections upon the subject, that we thought that was the best way—though I do not myself think it a very good way—that was open to us to keep the expense within bounds. Those who have to provide for these children will have such help from the State as the House of Commons think fit to grant; and, in addition to that, the local bodies will contribute. I am much obliged to the noble Earl for letting me send down the Bill in that shape to the House of Commons, where it is much more fitting to be discussed than here. I do not think there is anything more that I need add with regard to this clause.

Report of Amendment to be received on Thursday next.

SETTLED LAND BILL.—(No. 185.)

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Bill read 3^a (according to order.)

LORD HERSCHELL: There is one Amendment which I have to move. It is really to carry out what the House decided. The Amendment was introduced by the noble Lord, Lord Feverham, in line 15, with regard to the restoration and re-building of the mansion house. The word "re-building" does not appear in the Bill as printed, and "restoration" does. I move, therefore, to leave out the word "restoration" and to insert "re-building."

Amendment agreed to.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

FLASHING SIGNALS—ADMIRAL COLOMB'S INVENTION.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD SUDELEY: I beg to ask Her Majesty's Government whether Admiral Colomb has accepted the offer of £2,000, which my noble Friend who represents the Admiralty stated was to be made to him in a letter which was to be sent to him?

Viscount Cranbrook

LORD ELPHINSTONE: In answer to my noble Friend's question, I can only say that there has been a quite unavoidable delay in sending the letter I mentioned to Admiral Colomb. That letter has now gone to him, and until we receive his reply I am unable to give the noble Lord the answer he desires.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 29th July, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

TONGA.

MR. ATKINSON (Boston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he is aware that King George of Tonga has not carried out his promise to Her Majesty's Commissioner as to religious liberty and freedom of worship; and whether any steps are to be taken?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The reports we have received on the subject are unsatisfactory, and Sir J. Thurston started last May for Tonga in order to make representations to the King with a view of bringing about a better state of things. We have not yet received his Report, and have no confirmation of the telegrams which have appeared in the Press in the course of the last few days.

THE FACTORY AND WORKSHOPS ACT.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the decision of the Judges in the High Court at Edinburgh on the 14th instant, in the case of an appeal from the Court of the Sheriff Substitute at Dundee, under "The Factory and Workshops Act, 1878," and to the opinion expressed thereon by the Lord Justice Clerk that the fact that the woman alleged to have been illegally employed in a workshop having remained at work of her own "free will" and without the knowledge of the occupier, exonerates the latter from responsibility for the offence; and whether he will take the necessary steps to obtain from the High Court at Edinburgh a declaration of the legal construction to be put upon Sections 83, 86, and 87 of "The Factory and Workshops Act, 1878?"

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; my attention has been drawn to the decision of the Justiciary Court of Appeal at Edinburgh in the case in question. I have consulted the Lord Advocate, and am advised that there is no procedure by which the decision in this particular case can be brought under review. In view, however, of the importance of the question at issue, I have given instructions to the Chief Inspector, in the event of a similar case recurring, to take steps to bring the point of law involved again before the High Court of Justiciary for further consideration.

BURIAL GROUND AT WOOLER.

SIR EDWARD GREY (Northumberland, Berwick): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a new burial ground has been recently sanctioned at Wooler, which is to be held as an extension of the old churchyard; and whether 18 & 19 Vic. s. 3, which enacts that this can only be done by a unanimous vote of the ratepayers, has been complied with in this case?

MR. MATTHEWS: There has been at Wooler an extension of the old churchyard not provided under the Burial Acts or at the expense of the rates, but provided by private munificence and deed of gift under the 30 & 31 Vict., c. 133. No consent of ratepayers is required for the acquisition of a burial ground under that Statute, and neither Section 3 nor Section 10 of the 18 & 19 Vict., c. 128, is applicable to the case.

THE STEAMSHIP BALLA.

MR. J. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the case of "Jones v. George" which was tried before Mr. Burchell and a jury in the London Sheriffs Court on the 17th instant, in which the plaintiff was a boatman and a member of the lifeboat crew at Margate, and the defendant the captain of the steamship Balla which on 17th May last had stranded on the Goodwin Sands; whether, in view of the fact that the plaintiff testified on oath that when he went in the lifeboat to the rescue of the Balla and boarded her alone, the defendant struck him a violent blow and further caused or permitted the mate to cut through one of the ropes of the ship's ladder, so that the plaintiff's life was placed in danger as he was leaving the ship, he will cause such further inquiries as he may think desirable to be made into the facts of the case; and whether, if the evidence given on oath by the plaintiff in the case of "Jones v. George" be corroborated, he will consider the desirability of directing a Board of Trade inquiry to be held into the case with a view of considering the conduct of the captain and of the mate of the Balla?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): My attention has been called to this case, and I have ordered an investigation before a Local Marine Board into the conduct of the master and mate of the Balla.

DAIRY EDUCATION.

MR. ATKINSON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if he is willing to encourage donations towards establishing butter making classes by grants of donations of a similar amount from his Department?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I am exceedingly anxious to promote dairy education in the country, in which direction there appears to be room for considerable improvement in many districts, so far as the funds at my disposal admit of it. But before the Board makes any grant, it is necessary they should have a specific scheme before them; and any such scheme, I can assure my hon. Friend, coming either from himself or any other quarter, will have my careful consideration.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): Has the right hon. Gentleman any objection to consider the matter with the view of facilitating dairy education in the country? Will not the Department over which he has control undertake to facilitate some such scheme?

MR. CHAPLIN: I am considering the whole subject now; but the hon. Member will recollect that the sum at my disposal is extremely limited, and the Board is only able, under its existing powers, to act upon the principle of helping those who help themselves. I have done everything in my power to promote and stimulate interest in the subject, but I am afraid that the development of any general scheme upon the subject can only be very gradual in character.

ISSUE OF SCOTCH RAILWAY TICKETS.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that it is the custom at many of the railway stations in the North of Scotland to issue passenger tickets only two or three minutes before trains are due, thus putting passengers to great inconvenience, and some danger, when they have to cross the railway to catch trains; whether the law requires that ample time should be given for procuring passenger tickets; and whether Railway Companies incur any penalties for not issuing tickets to passengers in reasonable time before the departure of trains?

Mr. Atkinson

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have no official information on this subject. I have no reason to doubt that if too short a time is allowed for the issue of tickets at stations it would be productive of inconvenience, and might lead to some danger. The matter is not one in which I have any statutory power to interfere. The issue of tickets is in the hands of the Railway Companies, who are not under any legal obligations in respect to the time allotted for the purchase.

ZULULAND.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, with reference to statements in "Further Correspondence respecting the Affairs of Zululand," Parliamentary Paper 6,070, has the Chief Yamela, mentioned on page 44, been, or will he be, rewarded with Usutu cattle for his exertions in putting down the disturbances; and at what time and place did Sir A. Havelock promise him a reward for his exertions?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Secretary of State has no information on this point beyond the passage in the Blue Book, not having yet received the further Despatch from Mr. Osborn therein promised.

THE POSTAGE RATES BILL.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he can explain to the House why the Postage Rates Bill, which was read the first time and ordered to be printed on 22nd May, and the Order for the Second Reading of which was read and discharged on Thursday last, has not been printed and distributed to Members?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): It would, of course, have been necessary to print and distribute the Postage Rates Bill to which the hon. Member refers before I could have asked the House to read it a second time. But as at this period of the Session there did not appear to be any reasonable prospect of bringing the Bill on at a time when it could be fairly discussed, it appeared to me the best course to move to discharge the Order.

DUTIES OF WATER COMPANIES.

MR. TATTON EGERTON (Cheshire. Knutsford): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the quality of the water supplied by the Grand Junction Water Company, which contained on 24th July 33 per cent. more organic ammonia than the sample taken on 23rd July, 1889, and nearly double the amount of that contained in the Chelsea Water Company's water, namely, 16·4, as against 9·2, per 100 mil.; also the solids, on heating, showed a marked blackening, and the colour was of a marked yellow colour; whether this all indicates bad filtration; and what penalty attaches to supplying water of such an inferior character?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): My attention had not been called to the subject before the question appeared. I will make inquiries.

MR. T. EGERTON: I hope my right hon. Friend will recognise the urgency of this matter. There is now a large increase of enteric fever in the Metropolis, and this water is nothing but diluted sewage. I hope that a searching inquiry will be made without delay.

METROPOLITAN FIRE BRIGADE STATIONS.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has considered a letter from the London County Council, of 26th April, showing cause for exempting the Fire Brigade Stations throughout London from liability to Inhabited House Duty; whether about 60 stations are maintained at a large annual outlay exclusively for public services; and whether, in order to increase the protection from fire thereby afforded to the population of the Metropolis, he will take any steps to meet their views?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Yes, Sir; and I have instructed the Board of Inland Revenue to do all that is legally possible in the direction of exempting the London Fire Brigade Stations, and I believe that the result will be satisfactory to the London County Council.

BECHUANALAND.

MR. ALEXANDER M'ARTHUR (Leicester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the land settlement which took place in British Bechuanaland after the extension to that country of the Queen's sovereignty, which received, at the time the approval of the High Commissioner and of Her Majesty's Government, secured to the various tribes or clans of the Natives of the country certain tracts of land as an inalienable possession; whether the Administrator of British Bechuanaland has recently issued a legislative proclamation to determine the tenure of Native reserves, and to vest the title thereto in trustees, one of whom may be the Native Chief, thus more or less closely following the course recommended in the Cape Colony; whether this change has ever been requested by the Natives; whether they were consulted before the proclamation was issued; and whether it was made at the instance of Her Majesty's Secretary of State.

BARON H. DE WORMS: The answer to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question is in the affirmative. Such a legislative proclamation as that mentioned in the second paragraph was issued 14 months ago. The land remains inalienable, except that provision is made for granting individual titles to natives in certain cases. There is nothing in the correspondence to show whether the natives requested that the proclamation might be issued, or were consulted about it previously. It was not issued at the instance of the Secretary of State, but has been approved by him.

THE INDIGO RYOTS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether any reply has been received to the Despatch sent to the Government of India as to the Indigo ryots; and whether he can now consent to the Return asked for?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GOSST, Chatham): The Despatch was sent out on June 19th, and no reply has yet been received. The Secretary of State cannot tell whether the Return can be given till he is informed by the Government of India.

THE BURMESE DACOIT BOH YAN MYUN.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cocker-mouth): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he has inquired into and can give any information regarding the statement of the Times correspondent at Rangoon, to the effect that a notorious Dacoit leader, having surrendered on a promise of pardon given him, has nevertheless been "sentenced to death after a trial conducted in an unsatisfactory manner?"

SIR J. GORST: The statements of the Times correspondent at Rangoon do not generally commend themselves for accuracy to the Secretary of State, but in this case he has inquired by telegraph whether there is any truth in the statement.

THE AMEER OF AFGHANISTAN.

MR. KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether any engagement has been entered into by Her Majesty's Government, or by the Government of India, with the Ameer of Afghanistan, guaranteeing the integrity of his north-western frontier as delimited in accordance with the Protocol between Russia and this country of 10th September, 1885; and whether any further undertaking has been added to that contained in a Letter delivered to the Ameer on 20th July, 1880, the terms of which were repeated to him by the Government of India on 22nd February and 16th June, 1883, whereby the British Government reserved to itself the right to be the sole judge as to the occasion, nature, and extent of any military aid which it might grant to him in repelling foreign invasion?

SIR J. GORST: The engagements of the British Government with the present Ameer of Afghanistan will be found recorded at page 40 of the Return, Afghanistan No. 1, of 1881. They have not undergone any modification since that date.

THE NEW MAGAZINE RIFLE.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the report in the Times of the practice with the new magazine rifle at Bisley:—

"Even in so short an exhibition the new service rifle was found wanting. Several men were obliged to fall out of the ranks because their rifles became jammed. I myself saw two men of the Royal Scots and one other man in this position. We have been shooting with Martinis for a fortnight, and there has been no jamming. We have seen the magazine rifle used for an afternoon, and there has been jamming:"

and whether this is due to defects in the rifle itself or in the cartridge?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): My attention has been drawn to the statements in the Times to which my hon. Friend refers, and I have called for a Report on the subject.

THE SOUTHAM MAGISTRATES.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will take steps to ascertain from the Clerk to the Magistrates at Southam, in Warwickshire, upon how many occasions, during the last five years, the business of the Bench has had to be adjourned in consequence of the non-attendance of a quorum of Magistrates; whether he is aware that, notwithstanding that the Lord Lieutenant of the county has done everything in his power to secure a sufficient attendance, serious inconvenience and loss of time have been caused to the public by these adjournments, and that attention has frequently been and is now being called to this in the public Press; and whether any steps can be taken to ensure in the future a proper attendance of Magistrates?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have to-day written to the Clerk to the Justices to ask for information on this matter, and will in due course acquaint the hon. Member with the result of my inquiries.

POSTCARDS.

MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, as there seems to be a misunderstanding on the subject, he will definitely state whether ordinary correspondence cards with a halfpenny stamp affixed can be used instead of official postcards?

*MR. RAIKES: My answer to the question of the hon. Member must be in the negative. No cards but postcards can bear communications of the nature of a letter without becoming liable to letter postage.

DUDDON ELEMENTARY SCHOOL.

MR. WALTER M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that the Duddon Elementary School, in the Parish of Tarvin, Cheshire, which was erected by a voluntary rate over the townships of Duddon, Burton, Clotton, and Stapleford, has had less than seven scholars in attendance at any time for the last two years; that the mistress and about 120 scholars, all except three, left the school in consequence of the action of the clergyman; that these 120 children are now being taught in a room which is so inadequate to the requirements of the Department that for two years it has declined to examine the school or to make any grant; and that the ratepayers generally wished the mistress to be retained, while the clergyman insisted on her dismissal; can he state what was the cause of the dismissal of the mistress; whether he will cause an inquiry to be made by the Department, with a view to the school being handed over to the ratepayers, who are willing to support it, or whether he will order a fresh election of school managers; and what steps he is prepared to take to see that the children of the township are taught in a school recognised by the Department?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I am informed that the facts of the case are, in the main, as stated in the first part of the question. The managers appear to have been dissatisfied with the teacher's manner, and the Department had no right to interfere with their discretion in dismissing her. I have no power to order an inquiry for the purpose suggested, nor to cause a fresh election of school managers, but I will see what can be done to bring the present unsatisfactory state of things to an end.

COMPOSITION FOR SHIPS.

SIR WILLIAM PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether any instructions for guidance in the application of compositions have been drawn up by Commander Pitt; whether he will lay these upon the Table of the House; whether the experts on the late Committee, or the technical dockyard officers, have been consulted as to the efficacy of these instructions as applicable to the various compositions used upon the bottoms of Her Majesty's ships; whether any of those supplying compositions to the Admiralty have been consulted by Commander Pitt with reference to these instructions, and, if so, what firms or agents; and what are the names of "the more costly and less durable compositions" reported against by Commander Pitt?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): My answer to the first two questions is in the affirmative. As regards the next two questions, I am unable, in the absence of Commander Pitt from London, to give the information required. As regards the last question, the least invidious and simplest method of answering it is to state that at the present moment the Admiralty have only standing contracts for four compositions, namely, Hay's, Peacock's, Crease's, and Rahetgin's.

THE MASTER OF THE HAWKS.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury how much of the annual sum of £965, about to be commuted and paid in full to the Master of the Hawks for his sole use, was set apart for the employment of servants who are not now employed, and for the keep of hawks which are not kept; when such payments ceased to be applied to the purposes for which they were so set apart; whether these payments have since been applied by the Master of the Hawks to his own use, and what is the total amount of these payments so appropriated; at what rate the salary of the Master of the Hawks is to be commuted; and at what rate the payments for servants not employed and birds not kept are to be commuted?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The emoluments attaching to the Mastership of the Hawks as granted by the original patent were given in the Appendix to the Report of the Select Committee of 1887, according to which they consisted of—salary of the master, £391 1s. 5d.; four falconers, at £50 per annum each, £200; allowance for hawks, &c., £782 10s.—total, £1,373 11s. 5d. These payments were subject to deductions in respect of land tax and fees, reducing to £965 the total sum payable to the Duke of St. Albans. It is not precisely known how these deductions were made, and therefore it is only possible to assume that they were made rateably from the salary and the allowances. On this assumption, £275 would represent the salary of the master, and £690 allowances. It is not on record when the allowances ceased to be applied for the purposes for which they were originally intended. The Treasury have no cognisance of the application of these allowances, but they have been advised by the Law Officers on more than one occasion that the payment of the allowances as well as of the salary is binding on the State. The Treasury, in the offer which they have made to the Duke, had in mind the recommendation of the Select Committee, that payments to holders of hereditary offices where no service is rendered should cease with the life of the present holder.

MR. HANBURY: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the Treasury have made no inquiry?

MR. JACKSON: I did not say that the Treasury have made no inquiry. I said the Treasury have been unable to ascertain.

UNSKILLED MINERS.

MR. PICKARD (York, W.R., Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a statement made by Mr. Martin, Inspector of Mines for the Western Division, to the effect that although "The Mines Act, 1887," prohibits unskilled persons working at the working face of the mine unless they have worked two years at the working face of the mine under the supervision of a skilled workman, four unskilled workmen may so work at the working face of the mine without having worked two years under the supervision of a skilled workman; and, considering the effect such an interpretation (if correct) of this section of the Act may have upon managers of mines, what instructions he will give to the Mines

Mr. Jackson

Inspectors generally on a matter involving the safety of mines and the lives of the miners?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am unable to trace in the Inspector's Report any passage bearing out the suggestion of the hon. Member, neither am I disposed to concur in the construction of General Rule 39 mentioned in the question. As I informed the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil in May last, I have no reason to believe that the Inspectors are unmindful of the rule or of the importance of enforcing it; and if any cases of a breach of the rule are brought to my notice I shall certainly take the necessary steps to secure its proper observance.

THE LLANERCH COLLIERY EXPLOSION.

MR. PICKARD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a verbatim copy of the shorthand notes taken at the Coroner's inquest on the 176 bodies killed by the explosion at the Llanerch Colliery, Monmouth, on 6th February, 1890; whether he will give instructions to prosecute the manager and firemen for having violated General Rules 4, 8, and 12 of "The Mines Act, 1887"; and whether, having regard to the safety and well-being of our miners generally, and the Llanerch miners in particular, he will institute a special inquiry into the cause or causes of the explosion at this colliery, as provided in Section 45 of "The Mines Act, 1887"?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no reason to believe that there is any widespread demand for these notes, which are voluminous, and I am therefore unwilling to sanction the expense of laying them upon the Table, which would be considerable; but I shall be happy to show them to any hon. Member who is interested in the subject. Having regard to the opinion expressed in page 12 of the Report of the learned counsel, I do not propose to give instructions that a prosecution shall be instituted. I consider that the able and exhaustive Report already made has rendered unnecessary a special inquiry under Section 45, which would not, in my opinion, be likely to tend to any further elucidation of the facts, or throw more light on the actual causes of the explosion.

MR. FENWICK: May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman, after reading the rules, admits that there was any violation of Rules 4, 8, and 12; and may I also ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will undertake to lay on the Table the Minutes of the evidence taken at the inquiry?

MR. MATTHEWS: If there is any general desire, I would have them printed. Generally speaking, there are not more than half a dozen Members who desire to see such Papers. On a former occasion I found extremely few copies were asked for. The able gentleman who conducted the inquiry was of opinion that there was not sufficient evidence to justify a prosecution.

THE HOME OFFICE VOTE.

MR. PICKARD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can state to the House when the Home Office Vote will be taken?

MR. MATTHEWS: My right hon. Friend the leader of the House informs me that he cannot yet fix the day when this Vote will be taken.

CYPRUS.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Her Majesty's Government are aware that in the Ottoman Empire it is the practice, as required by law, for the election of Bishops by the various Christian communities to be ratified by the Sultan, and Letters of Investiture (Berat) granted to the chosen Prelates by His Imperial Majesty; whether a request for this recognition by Her Majesty the Queen has already been made on behalf of the Cypriote Bishops by His Beatitude the Archbishop of Cyprus; and whether the Secretary of State will consider the advisability of recommending Her Majesty to grant to each of the Greek Orthodox Bishops of Kition, Kyrenia, and Paphos a Warrant under the Royal Sign Manual, confirming these dignitaries in the temporalities of their respective sees, to which they have been elected since the British occupation of Cyprus in July, 1878?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The answer to the first two paragraphs of the hon. Member's question is in the affirmative. With regard to the third, I would refer him to the concluding portion of the Secretary of State's Despatch of March 22 last (on pages 40 and 41 of Blue Book C. 6,003), in which it was explained that in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government the subject of episcopal dues was one which ought to be dealt with by the Local Legislature.

EXCESSIVE MORTALITY AMONG CORNISH MINERS.

MR. CONYBEARE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will grant the Return relating to the excessive mortality of the Cornish miners, which stands in his name upon the Orders of the Day?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I am prepared to grant this Return.

ERZEROUM.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can now give the House any fuller information as to the deplorable conflict which took place in the end of June at Erzeroum, in Armenia, due to the desecration of a church by the Local Turkish Authorities, a conflict in which a very large number of Christians are reported to have been slaughtered by a mob composed in large part of Turkish soldiers; and whether any Report, and of what date, has been received from Her Majesty's Consul at Erzeroum upon this subject?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Later Reports have been received up to July 5 from Her Majesty's Consul at Erzeroum, but not differing as to the occurrences of June 20 and following days from those to which I referred in my answer to the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent. Those Reports do not warrant the view of those occurrences taken in this question, but there was a lamentable loss of life and subsequent rioting. Order is stated to have been restored. A Court was inquiring into the occurrences, and when the reinforcements, which were near at hand, should arrive it was expected that the apprehensions which were still felt would be allayed. As I have already stated, Papers will be presented, when they will afford a satisfactory account of what has taken place.

MR. BRYCE: When will these Papers be presented?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: These matters are still under inquiry, and it is impossible to say when the Papers will be ready.

PRISONERS' VISITORS.

MR. J. BARRY (Wexford, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has received direct information to the effect that at the request of James Egan, a prisoner in the Convict Prison at Chatham, a Member of this House had an interview with him yesterday (28th July,) when the prisoner wished to make a statement respecting a special grievance connected with his treatment in prison, that the warder who was present said he had special instructions not to allow any reference to prison treatment, or any allusion to be made to the recent inquiry held as to the treatment of certain prisoners in Chatham Prison; whether this action is in accordance with ordinary usage; and whether as the prisoner declares the question is one of life and death to him, he will grant a special visit to two Members of this House, at which the prisoner shall be permitted to make a statement on the subject?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I understand the facts to be as stated. The action of the officer present was in accordance with the ordinary usage. Ample provision is made by the standing orders that prisoners shall have opportunities of making complaints, or any application to superior authority, by means of interviews with the Governor or Deputy Governor, or Visiting Director, or by Memorial to the Board of Directors, or to the Secretary of State. They may also make any complaint to the Prison Visitors. I have before stated in this House that neither Members of Parliament nor any other persons can be allowed access to a prisoner for the purpose of investigating a matter of prison discipline.

MR. MAC NEILL: Does not the right hon. Gentleman remember informing me across the floor of the House that Mr. Soames and Pigott had an interview with a prisoner in the interest of the Times, and why is the privilege accorded to them denied to Members of the House?

MR. MATTHEWS: I do not think the hon. Member is accurately representing the point of my answer. The point of my present answer is that an interview for the purpose of investigating a matter of prison discipline has never been allowed. If the hon. Member wishes for further information he had better give notice of a question.

MR. MAC NEILL: I will repeat it on Thursday.

MR. J. BARRY: It is a matter of life and death in this case, and I will therefore ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will not consent to allow this man to see two Members of the House so that he may make a statement as to his special grievance?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir; I cannot accede to that application. I am myself perfectly prepared to receive any complaints.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Did not the right hon. Gentleman allow a doctor from outside to visit Daly?

MR. MATTHEWS: This case is entirely different from that of the prisoner Daly. I did allow a doctor to visit Daly, because fears were expressed that the prison doctor had not taken a right view of his case. That was a totally different matter to allowing any two Members of the House to visit a prisoner for the purpose of inquiring into prison discipline.

MR. J. BARRY: Some time ago I addressed two applications for leave to visit this man to the right hon. Gentleman, and both were refused in discourteous terms.

RAILWAY RATES.

MR. WALTER M'LAREN: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that in the draft classification of merchandise traffic with proposed maximum rates, just issued by the Board of Trade for the Great Western and London and North-Western Railway Companies, the rate of conveyance for milk, including station and service terminals, and charges for empty cans, averages about twice the rate which these companies now charge, and more than double the rates which the Midland and Great Eastern charge; what is the reason for this great rise in the rates for the carriage of milk over existing rates, when there has been a reduction in the rates for many other commodities; why the return of empty cans is liable to a charge varying from 4d. to 8d. when at present the Great Western only charges 2d. and the London and North-Western charges nothing; and what opportunities the representatives of dairy farmers will have of objecting to these rates before they become law?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I cannot accept the statements contained in the first and third paragraphs of this question as either accurate or complete; but at the present time it would be premature to enter into the details of the subject, because the Statutory Report to Parliament has not yet been made. When that Report is made, the representatives of dairy farmers will see precisely how the matter stands; and in the event of a Provisional Order being brought before Parliament next Session containing rates which are not satisfactory to them, they would have full opportunity of opposing those rates in the House, or before the Committee to which the Bill would be referred. But I would point out to the hon. Member that any rates proposed will be maximum rates, and that their allowance by no means necessarily involves any increase in the rates at present actually charged.

CULTIVATION OF SUGAR BEET.

MR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether his attention has been drawn to the suitability of large tracts of land in Great Britain and Ireland to the growth of sugar beet; whether he is aware that the necessary capital for promoting the establishment of such an industry would be immediately forthcoming upon the ratification of the Sugar Convention, and the consequent abolition of bounties; and whether, in view of the existing agricultural depression and the fact that few crops would give so large a profit per acre, and open up such extensive employment to the agricultural population, as sugar beet, Her Majesty's Government would give the matter their serious consideration?

MR. CHAPLIN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone the question until Thursday. It only appeared on the Paper this morning, and I have not had time to obtain information.

THE PAY OF THE POLICE.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the Corporation of London have raised the pay of the City Police Force, and if he proposes to take similar action, and to what extent with regard to the Metropolitan Force?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no information on the subject alluded to in the question beyond newspaper reports. The Corporation of London have resources which will enable them always to keep the pay of the City Police above that of the Metropolitan Force. I cannot admit that this example should serve as a guide for the Metropolis, nor am I in a position to state that I shall take any action of the kind indicated.

THE FOOT GUARDS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is correct, as stated by the military correspondent of the Times, that at the inspection on Saturday of four battalions of the Foot Guards the aggregate of all ranks was "considerably under 2,000;" and what is the establishment strength of these four battalions?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The total number of all ranks of the four battalions which paraded for inspection on the 26th inst. was 2,387, out of 3,172 effectives, including recruits, men in hospital, &c. The establishment of these four battalions is 3,362. The recruiting for the Brigade of Foot Guards compares favourably with former years. The waste this year has been abnormally large, as all the men enlisted under the old rule of seven years with the colours go to the Reserve as well as the usual annual proportion of men enlisted for three years' service with the colours; but, in spite of this double drain, the Brigade is only slightly under its establishment.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

MR. BARCLAY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he proposes to take steps to verify the statement recently made by the Agricultural Department of the United States that pleuro-pneumonia no longer exists in that country, with the view of determining whether cattle may now be freely imported from the United States?

MR. CHAPLIN: I am not aware of any statement made by the Agricultural Department of the United States that pleuro-pneumonia no longer exists in that country, in any public document or otherwise. The hon. Member was good enough to send me a communication on the 10th of this month from the Agricultural Department of the United States addressed to himself, in which it is stated "that pleuro-pneumonia is not known to exist in the United States at the present time," which is a very different matter. I have not thought it necessary to endeavour to verify the statement, seeing that within a comparatively short time animals undoubtedly suffering from that disease, within the knowledge of the Board of Agriculture, have been landed at Liverpool from the United States.

NIGHT MAILS BETWEEN LONDON AND PLYMOUTH.

MR. WILLIAM M'ARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid., St. Austell): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will reconsider the facts and arguments repeatedly laid before him by influentially supported Memorials from upwards of 200 public bodies under seal or resolution, in favour of contributing towards the establishment of additional night mail trains between London and Plymouth; whether the proposed trains would very materially improve the postal inter-communication between almost every town west of Basingstoke as far as Penzance and the Scilly Isles, as well as to and from London, and especially between the Naval Establishments of Portsmouth and Devonport; whether he will consider the advisability of improving the existing postal arrangements between many of the towns in the five south-western counties by utilising the railways now traversing them, the mails now being conveyed by mail carts during the night for many miles; whether the proposed improved service has been approved by Her Majesty's Postmaster General; and whether the expenditure asked is small for the services to be rendered?

MR. GOSCHEN: I will consider what decision ought to be arrived at.

Mr. Barclay

COUNTY COURT JUDGE OF RIPON.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Attorney General if he can state to the House whether any complaint has reached the Lord Chancellor with reference to language used towards witnesses by the County Court Judge of Ripon; and whether any inquiry will be made in the matter?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): In answer to the question of the hon. Member, I am informed that a complaint of the kind referred to has reached the Lord Chancellor, and that inquiry is being made into the matter.

ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether the Government will consider the advisability of entering into negotiations with the German Emperor, providing for the submission to arbitration of any question or dispute that may hereafter arise in connection with the Anglo-German Agreement; whether the Government will consider the advisability of inserting an arbitration clause in the proposed Anglo-French Agreement; and whether the Government will consider the advisability of inserting an arbitration clause in the proposed Anglo-Portuguese Agreement?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: In answer to these questions, I have to say that Her Majesty's Government cannot undertake such general engagements. They have shown in recent instances their readiness to refer to arbitration special and defined cases, fit subjects for reference to arbitration. But there might be cases of difference in which our indefeasible rights might be challenged, and which we could not submit as open questions.

PUBLIC BILLS.

MR. LENG: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that 21 Bills appeared yesterday in the Government Orders of the Day, besides the Orders of Supply and a Committee of Ways and Means, he will consult the convenience of the House by placing on the Orders such a number of Bills as there is reasonable expectation may be dealt with during the sitting of the House?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I am afraid it would not be practicable, nor for the convenience of the House, that Orders should be postponed to a late day at this period of the Session, and no other course is open, according to practice, but to place them on the Paper, in order that they may be disposed of if they are reached.

CONSTABLE OF CARNARVON CASTLE.

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether in past times the offices of Constable of Carnarvon Castle and Mayor of Carnarvon were vested in the same person; and if he can give any reason why the repeatedly expressed wish of the Town Council of Carnarvon was disregarded in making the recent appointment to the constablenesship?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have no knowledge of the past history of the Constables of Carnarvon Castle, but I would suggest that if more information as to the present appointment is wanted, it would be desirable that future questions should be addressed to the Prime Minister in another place.

THE ARGENTINE REVOLUTION.

MR. HOZIER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give the House any news from Buenos Ayres?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The following telegram has been received from Buenos Ayres, dated 2.30 p.m., July 28:—

"Armistice prolonged till 2 this afternoon. President returned to capital. Government forces said to be strongly reinforced. 6.5 p.m. —Hostilities not renewed. Negotiations for capitulation of insurgents proceeding. Terms of Government not yet accepted."

FREE EDUCATION IN SCOTLAND.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the Division on Monday, in which 56 Scotch Members took part, 14 voting in favour of the Government, and 42 in favour of the Amendment of the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), the Government will re-consider before the Report whether they cannot apply the money available in consequence of the withdrawal of the proposals referring to licences in Scotland towards promoting free education in that country in accordance with the wishes of the Scotch Members?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Of course, the Government will seriously consider everything connected with the business of this House; but I cannot hold out any prospect of a change in the views of the Government, based as they are upon a full regard to all the circumstances of the case so far as Scotland is concerned, and as regards the legislation for next year.

EMPLOYMENT OF TROOPS AT EVICTIONS.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I wish to know whether the Attorney General for Ireland has seen a paragraph in the newspapers of this morning stating that a force of marines have been embarked from a gunboat on one of the islands on the coast of Kerry for the purpose of aiding in carrying out evictions?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I must ask the hon. Gentleman to give notice of the question.

THE IRISH MAILS.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if arrangements could be made to ship and land the mails and luggage at Holyhead and Kingstown by mechanical means, so as to avoid the delay that is occasioned by the present system?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am not surprised that my hon. Friend should have called attention to this subject. The present system of shipping and landing the mails and baggage at Holyhead and Kingstown by hand must cause great delay, and is a terrible blot on a service which is, in all other respects, perhaps the best of its kind in the world. I have been in communication with the Post Office, the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company, and the London and North-Western Railway Company, in the hope of effecting an improvement of the kind suggested by my hon. Friend. The City of Dublin Company were willing to incur considerable expense for this purpose, but I find the Post Office obstinately determined to adhere to the present system, and the Railway Company would do nothing to assist in a change.

I am unable to do more, as it is not in my power to insist on an improvement in the matter.

In reply to Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W.),

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH said: I do not think that I can lay the correspondence between two Departments of the Government upon the Table of the House.

Mr. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman give the correspondence between the Railway Company and the Steam Packet Company?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I will see what I can do.

THE CLERK OF THE BANDON UNION.

Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether complaints have reached him that Mr. Haynes, Clerk of the Bandon (County Cork) Poor Law Union, resides five miles from the offices of the Union, with his brothers, who are under police protection, and that he there keeps, during several days of the week, the rate books and other books belonging to the Union, to the inconvenience of the ratepayers; and whether he will be compelled to attend at his office daily for the prescribed number of hours, as laid down by the Local Government Board?

Mr. MADDEN: The Clerk of the Bandon Union reports that it is the case that he resides about five miles from the workhouse, at his mother's house, with his brothers, who are not under police protection. He states that it is not the case that he has kept the rate books or any other books of the Union at his residence to the inconvenience of the ratepayers. The general regulations of the Local Government Board defining the duties of the clerk of a Union do not prescribe any hours during which he must attend at his office, but he is bound under Section 9 of 6 & 7 Vict., c. 92, to permit persons affected by any rate in the Union to have access to the valuation whereon it was based, at all times between 10 o'clock in the forenoon on every day except Sundays. No complaints have been made to the Local Government Board as to inconvenience resulting from the situation of the clerk's present residence.

Sir M. Hicks Beach

Mr. FLYNN: The right hon. Gentleman says that no complaint has been made. I make a complaint now, and I ask him to ascertain whether it is not the fact that a number of ratepayers went to the office and requested to see the rate books, and that the Clerk declined to show them?

Mr. MADDEN: I have no doubt that if any new matter is brought before the Local Government Board it will be inquired into.

Mr. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the action of Mr. Haynes, clerk of the Bandon (County Cork) Poor Law Union; whether he is aware that at a recent contest for the Guardianship of one of the Electoral Divisions, Mr. Haynes, acting as Returning Officer, refused to issue voting papers in connection with a number of claims appointing proxies by the nuns of the convent, though these were accurately signed and lodged in due course; also that he similarly refused to issue voting papers in the case of John Cummins & Sons, joint owners, though he issued them to Robinson & Sons, who are similarly circumstanced; and whether he will call upon Mr. Haynes for an explanation of the alleged circumstances?

Mr. MADDEN: The Returning Officer reports to the effect that, having doubts as to the ownership of the property out of which the nuns claim to vote, he took the steps required by the 26th Section of 6 and 7 Vict., c. 92, and the nuns, not having produced the necessary evidence, he was debarred from admitting them to vote. With regard to the case of John Cummins & Sons, they, as being a joint business company, were disqualified to vote themselves, and they had not qualified any officer on their behalf in the manner required by Section 86 of 1 & 2 Vict., c. 56. With respect to John and William Robinson, the Returning Officer states that he had no reason to doubt the legality of their claims.

Mr. FLYNN: Is it necessary to produce evidence, or is not the rate book sufficient evidence?

Mr. MADDEN: No, Sir; it is not necessary to produce evidence.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. NOLAN (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether two members of the Royal Irish Constabulary attended a meeting of tradesmen and labourers held in Drogheda, County Louth, Ireland, for trades union purposes on 9th July, and took notes of the proceedings; and, if so, by whose orders, on what authority, and with what object they did so?

MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that the meeting referred to was a public one, held in the open air, and convened by placard. It was organised in connection with an existing strike among the employés of a local Steamship Company, and the Local Officer directed two policemen to attend and take notes, which was accordingly done.

SPIRIT LICENCES.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that a man named Charles Mitchel, residing at Shantonagh, County Monaghan, recently obtained a temporary retail spirit licence for consumption on the premises; and if so, by whose authority, and on what grounds; whether his attention has been called to the fact that Mitchel's applications repeatedly made at Quarter Sessions for several years were always opposed by the landlord of the place, the clergy of all denominations, and the inhabitants generally, on the grounds that the place being a thinly populated country district, a public house was not required, and, if allowed, would be a source of demoralisation amongst the people, and that the Magistrates of the district, with the concurrence of the County Court Judge, unanimously refused the application on every occasion; but that on the 20th inst., at the Castleblaney Quarter Sessions, when Mitchel again applied to have his temporary retail licence made permanent, of the 18 Magistrates on the Bench, three were Resident Magistrates, two of whom came from other counties, and three others of the number came from other districts to support Mitchel's claim; whether his attention has been called to the expression of opinion by the Chairman that the Bench was packed in Mitchel's interest; and to the fact that he ordered the application to stand over till October next; whether he can say by whose authority, and for what reason, Resident Magistrates from other counties attended the hearing of this case; and whether the attention of the Lord Chancellor will be called to the conduct of the other Justices who attended from other districts?

MR. MADDEN: It is the case that Mr. Charles Mitchel was recently, on the recommendation of the Lord Lieutenant, allowed by the Board of Inland Revenue to sell excisable liquors for consumption on his premises pending his application to Quarter Sessions on 20th June last, on which date this permission to sell expired. I am informed that the facts are not accurately represented in the second paragraph. The application was not opposed by the inhabitants generally. It was opposed by the landlord and two local clergymen of different denominations, but was favoured by another local clergyman. The place is a leading highway, and the applicant is a shopkeeper, doing a very large trade in the locality, which is represented to have a good average country population, and many of his customers were anxious that he should get the more extended licence. He holds already a spirit, grocer's, and beer retailer's licence. The application has not been refused on the previous occasions unanimously. On the contrary, it was carried by only very small majorities. Of the three Resident Magistrates present, one belonged to the district, the second had been recently in charge of it, and belonged to an adjoining district, and the third belonged to another adjoining district, in part of the police district of which the premises in question are situate. All the Magistrates who attend the Quarter Sessions were Magistrates for the County Longford, and had a right to do so. The Chairman is reported to have made use of no such expression as that attributed to him, but upon a point of law he decided that the licence could only be granted at the Annual (October) Licensing Sessions. The Resident Magistrates who attended are Magistrates for the County Monaghan, and therefore had a right to be present.

MR. FLYNN: Is it usual for Resident Magistrates to attend Licensing Sessions?

MR. MADDEN: Yes, Sir, it is usual.

MR. FLYNN: Has not the Lord Chancellor laid down the dictum that it is wrong for a Resident Magistrate to attend a Licensing Session outside his own district?

MR. MADDEN: The ordinary Magistrates are assigned to particular districts, but a Resident Magistrate may attend generally.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Did not two of these Magistrates come from a distance to ratify the decision of the Magistrates at the Sessions, and is he aware that the Lord Chancellor dismissed from the Commission of the Peace, Mr. James Byrne, because he went from Mallow to another district for the hearing of a case in which an appeal was granted. Why then, in this case, were two Resident Magistrates allowed to travel from one part of the county to another in order to decide a case in which the Crown was concerned?

MR. MADDEN: The Resident Magistrates are all Magistrates for the whole of the county. There is no analogy between the position of an ordinary Magistrate and that of a Resident Magistrate. The latter can attend all Licensing Sessions in the county.

In reply to a further Question by Mr. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.),

MR. MADDEN said: I have given all the information in my possession.

MR. MAC NEILL: Were not two Resident Magistrates imported into this county specially for the purpose?

MR. MADDEN: Certainly not.

LIGHTKEEPERS.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what period of leave is annually allowed to lightkeepers in Great Britain; whether the practice in Ireland is not to allow any leave; and if there is any sufficient reason why the Irish and British lightkeepers should not be treated alike in this respect?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The grant of annual leave to lightkeepers is essentially a question within the discretion of the Lighthouse Authorities, and one in which I cannot interfere. I have asked the English, Scotch, and Irish Boards for their regulations on the subject, and if he desires it I shall be ready to send the information to the hon. Member when I receive it.

MR. SEXTON: I shall be glad if the right hon. Member will follow the matter up.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I am not at present aware what the regulations are.

THE SUMMARY JURISDICTION ACT.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether, in view of the fact that "The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879," provides the right of appeal to Quarter Sessions to any person who is adjudged by a conviction or order of a Summary Court of Jurisdiction in England to be imprisoned without the option of a fine, even in cases where the term of imprisonment is less than one month, whereas in Ireland there is no such appeal to Quarter Sessions from the Petty Sessions, unless the term of imprisonment exceeds one month, the Government will extend to Irishmen the same right of appeal which is now afforded to persons in England?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The law in England is correctly stated in the question of the hon. Member, subject to certain exceptions, which are not material. I need scarcely say that it is quite beyond my province to express any opinion upon questions of legislation for Ireland.

In reply to Mr. SEXTON,

MR. MADDEN said: A person sentenced in Ireland to less than a month's imprisonment has no right of appeal. To issue instructions sanctioning an appeal would in the first case necessitate the repeal of the Act.

MR. SEXTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman forget that there was a promise that there should be an appeal in all cases. Will he not give to an Irishman the same right that an English subject now enjoys?

MR. MADDEN: If the hon. Member desires an alteration of the law he had better put a Question on the Paper.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): If the Local Taxation Bill passes through Committee to-night what will be the first business to-morrow?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Post Office Estimates.

In reply to Mr. BAYCE,

*MR. W. H. SMITH said: It will be necessary to proceed with the English Police Bill first, and then to take the Scotch Bill.

ADJOURNMENT MOTIONS UNDER STANDING ORDER No. IX.

Return ordered—

"Of Motions for Adjournment under Standing Order No. IX., showing the date of such Motion, the name of the Member proposing, the definite matter of urgent public importance, and the result of any Division taken therein in the Session 1890 (in the same form as, and in continuation of, Parliamentary Paper, No. 30, of the present Session)."—(Mr. Arthur Elliot.)

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to Elections (Scotland) (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill, with Amendments; that they have passed a Bill, intituled "An Act respecting the expenses of High Sheriffs in connection with the Assizes." [Sheriffs (Assizes Expenses) Bill [Lords]; Statute Law Revision Bill,—That they have agreed to some of the Amendments made by this House to Statute Law Revision Bill, with Amendments; and have disagreed to others of the said Amendments, for which they assigned their reasons; and have made consequential Amendments to the Bill.

MOTION.

PUBLIC MUSEUMS AND GYMNASIUMS.

On Motion of Mr. Powell, Bill to enable Urban Sanitary Authorities to provide and maintain Museums and Gymnasiums, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Powell, Dr. Farquharson, Mr. Edward Hardcastle, Mr. Kenrick, Mr. Mallock, and Mr. Samuel Smith.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 400.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

FOREIGN JURISDICTION (CONSOLIDATION) BILL [LORDS].—(No. 383)

SECOND READING.

(4.20.) Order for Second Reading read.

SIR R. WEBSTER: In moving the Second Reading of this Bill I wish to explain that it makes no alteration in the law on the subject of foreign jurisdiction, but only consolidates it.

Question, "That the Bill be now read a second time," put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL.—(No. 241.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

Amendment again proposed, in page 2, lines 13 and 14, to leave out the words "Of children in the compulsory standards of the Scotch Code."—(Mr. Charles Parker.)

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

(4.24.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): When the Debate was adjourned last night I was venturing to suggest why these words should be omitted from the clause. In the first place I may point out that the clause is entirely inconsistent with the practice of the Scotch Educational Department, which has already sanctioned, in the case of 700 schools, relief from the payment of fees for the highest standard. In the Division which occurred last night the Government were supported only by 14 out of 56 Scotch Members, 42, or a majority of three to one, having voted against them. Last year the highest watermark against the Government was five to one. Are they going to tell the people of Scotland that they will yield to a majority of five to one, but not to a majority of three to one? It may be said that the Government cannot afford to give money to the Sixth Standard, because the Sixth Standard is not compulsory; but I meet that argument by the assertion that if it is made complete it will in every sense become compulsory. At present we are in this dilemma, that if we are to have a compulsory Sixth Standard we must have such an extension of grant as will bear the charge. I believe I am within the mark when I say that every School Board and everyone who has given attention to the question of education in Scotland are unanimous, or all but unanimous, in favour of the necessity of making the Sixth Standard compulsory. Children pass the Sixth Standard, some at the age of 10 years, nearly all at 11 years. Children in Scotland, who at 11 years of age are withdrawn from school and at once sent to work, labour under two disadvantages. In the first place the severity of their work makes it impossible for them to pursue in any serious degree their school studies, and in the second place, after they leave school at that tender age, they forget in no long time much of what they had learnt there. Anyone of experience who has studied the question will say that an additional year in the Sixth Standard would be precious beyond anything, both for making permanent the impressions a boy has already received and as a beginning of implanting in his mind a notion of the higher subjects which he may pursue in later life. As far as the educated opinion of Scotland is concerned, there are no two views as to the propriety of making the Sixth Standard compulsory. I believe that the working classes in Scotland are grateful for the boon conferred upon them last year, and if the House were to go further and make the Sixth Standard free, parents would be glad to make a sacrifice, and would accept with cheerfulness the extension of the compulsory standards so as to include the Sixth. That, I think, is a complete answer to the view which the Lord Advocate put forward. Why should not the Government accept this Motion? The opinion of Scotland has been manifested in the Division very clearly and distinctly, and I believe it is much stronger in Scotland itself than among the Representatives of Scotland in this House. Why not accept the view of Scotland on the point, which is a very small one? Before free education was introduced in Scotland, four out of five parts of the cost of education were borne by the State, and the difficulty of raising the remaining fifth by fees was so great that it was not thought worth while to stand out against its remission. At present the total amount raised by fees is about 1-35th of the whole. We spend £1,320,000 on education, and are the Government to stand out now on account of a paltry £40,000? I believe the real reason which influences the Government is that they think if they were to yield it might tie their hands when they come next year to deal with the question of free education in England. I certainly am in favour of free education in the higher schools, by competition for a limited number of places. That is the system on which we have proceeded in Aberdeen for many years, and it has worked extremely well. But I wish to point out that Scotland needs a considerable sum of money, both to complete and perfect her university system, and for technical and secondary education, and I think it is hopeless to obtain popular support for spending money on higher education until you have completely freed the elementary schools, because money so spent would be absorbed mainly by the middle and wealthy classes.

(432.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): Yesterday we were beaten—but not with very much slaughter—on an Amendment in which we took very deep interest. Now, the Lord Advocate has put what I may call a moral censure on us by not taking part in this Debate. I submit that the Amendment is a reasonable one, because it would bridge over what is felt to be an awkward gap in the education system of Scotland. At present, the education given to the Scotch people is a bare minimum; it is a rough framework with a thin veneer which rapidly wears off later in life. We know it is a great temptation to poor parents suffering from the agricultural depression not to keep their children at school when they have passed the compulsory standards, and I think we should do all we can to encourage children passing into the voluntary standards, in which they would take a more sincere interest in their educational work. I see no reason, also, why the Education Department of Scotland should not be trusted to allocate the money, as heretofore, for the benefit of the Scottish people. Children ought to be encouraged, by rewards of some kind, to enter the voluntary standards. This is done already in some cases by means of bursaries and other pecuniary assistance. The idea of compulsion is apt to raise a feeling of antagonism, whereas, in the case I have indicated, children would carry on their educational work with a feeling akin to enthusiasm, thus enabling them to continue their progress in the higher walks of education. I believe that it would be good policy on the part of the Government to yield on this point, and not to make two bites at a cherry.

(4.40.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I think that some hon. Members from Scotland have done scant justice to the feeling of the Scottish people in favour of education. I may point out that the arguments brought forward with reference to the attitude of the working classes in Scotland regarding education above the compulsory standards are not in accord with the history of the Scottish people as regards education generally. Though many hon. Members may find fault with the financial proposals I have submitted, it will not be denied that I, too, have some feeling in favour of education. I think that I may claim to have been what is called an educationalist for many years. Hon. Members have urged that this is but a small matter; but I think the decision whether or not the standards above the compulsory standards, as well as the compulsory standards themselves, shall be freed, is by no means a very small question. The argument has been put forward that the Government would be justified in freeing parents from the duty (which hon. Members now entirely discard), of educating or contributing to the education of their children. We have relieved parents from that duty where the State has enacted compulsion, but the Government are not prepared to sanction the principle that beyond the compulsory standards education must necessarily be free. The hon. Member for North Aberdeen has remarked that, with the views which I hold with regard to free education, I should not be able to show my face in any part of Scotland without being metaphorically torn to pieces. But I have appeared before Scottish audiences, and have spoken on this question of free education. In Edinburgh, during my first candidature, I dealt with this subject, and I asked my audience, which was largely composed of the working classes, whether it was or was not right that parents should be entirely freed from the duty of educating their children. I appealed to them for their votes, and though I had declared my opposition to this promiscuous free education, I was successful. I was able to secure the suffrages of an important section of the working classes of Edinburgh without having pronounced in favour of free education, but rather the reverse; and, therefore, I cannot refrain from asking myself whether hon. Members opposite so entirely represent the feeling of the bulk of the people of Scotland when they say that parents are not prepared to incur some sacrifice for the education of their children. The arguments of hon. Members, however, are not only in favour of the application of this system to Scotland, but they argue as if it were discouraging to education generally to place fees upon any of the higher standards in the school. The argument is that if a working man has been freed from the payment of fees in the lower standards, he will be certain to withdraw his children from school when they reach the upper standards, if he has to pay anything. But what is the amount of the fee as compared to the value of the child's labour? When the compulsory standards are passed, the child has arrived at an age when he can earn a few shillings a week, and if the parent values the child's labour, which represents a few shillings a week, is it to be believed he will withdraw because of the few pence he may have to pay? I do not think the argument holds water for a moment, especially as regards Scotland, and hon. Members from Scotland do injustice to their fellow-countrymen. The Government do not say this is a large matter, but a large principle is involved. If they could meet the views of hon. Members from Scotland they would be extremely glad, but they cannot do so without assenting to a principle to which they are opposed. The hon. Member from Aberdeen urged the claims of the working classes, but the hon. Member must bear in mind that while in England large sums have been employed for the "brutal and naked" relief of local taxation, in Scotland we have given £250,000 and now £40,000 more by this Bill to primary education, so that altogether no less than £290,000 is going to the benefit of the working classes and their children. No other members of the community have so far benefited by the application of any portion of this money.

MR. HUNTER: That is not so, because in Scotland there is a very large proportion of what may be called the lower middle class, who habitually send their children to Board schools.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I think that rather expands the argument when Parliament is asked to give free education above the compulsory standards to the lower middle class as well as the working class at the expense of the State. Have those classes no duties to their children in the direction of education? I can fancy that there are many others representing what might be called the poorer middle class who have difficulty enough to scrape together the money paid for the education of their children, who do not go to elementary schools, yet that class is to be taxed, and not to be relieved of any portion of the rates, because the whole of the money is to go to one particular class of school. The Government, having dealt so largely with Scotch opinion in this matter, are scarcely open to the reproaches which hon. Members have levelled at them, that they are putting this money to an unfair use, or are checking education by the proposals they have made.

*(4.50.) MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): As a Scotchman, although not a Scotch Member, I should like to say a word or two in regard to this Amendment. I have not been convinced by the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I believe that if this matter were referred to the Scotch people, the vast majority would be found to disagree with the right hon. Gentleman. The great defect in the educational system of Scotland, as of England, is that the average school age is far too short. In Germany the average school age is 14 in the day schools and 17 in the evening continuation schools; in Switzerland it is 15 and 17 or 18 respectively; but in England and Scotland the average age for leaving the day schools is only 12, and not more than 4 per cent. of the scholars pass into any kind of continuation schools. Yet from 12 to 16 years of age is the period at which a child's character is formed either for good or bad. I think that every encouragement should be offered to lengthen the school age, but the effect of the Government's proposal is to penalise the Sixth Standard. The Government have got the gratitude of the Scotch people by what they have already done for free education; let them do the thing thoroughly and completely. If the Government wish to stave off Scotch Home Rule they must pay heed to the wishes of the Parliamentary Representatives of the people, because in Scotland a strong feeling is growing up that those wishes do not receive sufficient attention in the British Parliament, and that the voices of the Scottish Representatives are too often voted down. I regret that feeling, and I hope the Government will do their best to lessen it.

(4.55.) MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): I wish to know whether the insertion of the Amendment will have the effect of preventing School Boards abolishing fees in the Sixth Standard if they are so disposed.

(4.56.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): No embargo will be laid on the proceeding of School Boards in the direction my hon. Friend points at. That will be just as free as they were before. These words are merely indicative of our wish, in making the grant, as to how the money shall be expended.

(4.57.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): As an English Member, I claim to take an interest in this subject, because of the necessary effect of the education proposals with regard to Scotland when free schools are extended to England, as we hope they will be, next year. We have already stated that we object to the system of freeing education in Scotland by means of grants from the rates, which we hope will not be done in England, and we object also to the plan of freeing the lower and not the higher standards. I cannot conceive any system more anti-educationalist than that of freeing the lower standards in the Elementary Schools and charging fees in the higher standards. Our object ought to be to endeavour to keep the children at school as long as possible. It may be contended in opposition to the view urged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it will be a great temptation to the parent to withdraw his children from school at an earlier age when, by keeping them at school, he will have to begin to pay fees. No doubt the parent has the inducement of the child's wages to withdraw the child from school, but it is the duty of Parliament not to add to that temptation by charging a fee after children have passed the Fifth Standard. Personally, I would rather see the higher than the lower standards free. It seems to me that the very reason that the higher standards are not compulsory is the greatest argument for making them free, because if you cannot force a parent to send his child of 12 or 13 years to school, you ought to do your best to encourage him to keep his child at school. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has said that this is a matter of principle; that it is not a small matter at all. But I think he forgets that already this principle has been admitted, inasmuch as already in Scotland there are something like 730 schools in which no fees are charged in the higher standards, in the non-compulsory standards. As far as I know, no evil results have ensued. What we propose is that the parents of the children in the other 2,000 and odd schools should have the same advantages as the parents whose children go to the 730 schools.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated very truly that the Scotch have always been great educationalists, and it is most satisfactory to know there are no less than 30,000 children in the higher standards in the Scottish schools. This is a small matter as regards money. The Government have already spent a very large sum indeed in freeing schools, and it certainly is very regrettable that for the last halfporth of far the system should be spoiled. I, as an English Member, very sincerely hope the Government may see their way to accept this Amendment, because when the system of free education is extended to England we, at all events, shall insist that everyone of the standards in our elementary schools shall be free, and we are afraid that unless the principle is accepted in Scotland, we may have greater difficulty in introducing it in England.

(5.3.) MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): The Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated that there is a very large principle involved in paying the fees of a child beyond the compulsory standard. What will the right hon. Gentleman do when he comes to deal with free education in England, where the compulsory standard varies from the third to the sixth, according to the will of the Educational Authorities in the locality? The standard in Scotland was fixed 20 years ago, and it was fixed as a minimum standard to which every child must attain before it can accept any employment; it was fixed to give the child the minimum of an elementary education. What the right hon. Gentleman proposes to do is to stereotype that minimum, and, practically, in a vast number of cases, make it the maximum of education. The complaint of the Scotch Education Department has been for years that the number of children who pass the Fifth Standard at the age of 10 to 12 is increasing every year, in consequence of improved teaching, better methods, and better average attendance. Every year a larger number of children are passing out of school at these early ages. If the right hon. Gentleman acquaints himself with the practice in other countries he will find that the standard is not one of class, but of age. It is a standard varying from 13 to 16 years of age. But in Scotland there are numbers of children who are passing the Fifth Standard at as low an age as 10 and 11. Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to say that a poor working man who wants to keep his child at school until it is 12 or 13 years of age must be fined 6d. a week if he does so?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I did not say that at all.

*MR. MUNDELLA: That is the practical effect of the proposal.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman wishes to put it into my mouth that this is a fine upon parents. That a fee should be called a fine is most extraordinary.

*MR. MUNDELLA: The right hon. Gentleman may call it by any name he pleases, but that is the practical result. In England it will be regarded as a fine. In nearly all of our colonies, in every country in Europe where there is a good system of education, the education of a child is continued until he has passed completely through the school, and if he does not pass through the school before a certain age—14 or 15 years—he must compulsorily attend a night school until he has passed through the whole of the school curriculum. Why are we dealing with the fee question at all? Because the payment of fees has been a great hindrance to the attendance of children at school. The first effect in Scotland of making education free to the extent it has been made free, was a large increase in the attendance of children at school. Children have been kept back, on one pretext or another, but the hindrance was generally poverty. When the fees were abolished, the children who had been kept back were at once sent to school, children were sent at an earlier age than they had ever been sent before, and there were demands for increased accommodation. The wages children can earn are a great temptation to parents to withdraw their children from school, but what is now proposed is that a parent, in addition to forfeiting the wages of his children if he keeps them at school until they are 12 or 13, shall put his hand in his pocket and pay, say 6d. a week. I am afraid the right hon. Gentleman has hardly considered how important sixpences are to rural labourers, and poor working men.

Mr. Mundella

*MR. GOSCHEN: I know it well. In Sussex, where I live, the labourers are quite as poor as those in Scotland.

*MR. MUNDELLA: In Sussex, where the right hon. Gentleman lives, the children do not attend school after they have passed the Fourth Standard. In Sussex, and, indeed, throughout the whole of the rural districts of England, the working man has to pay heavy school fees, with the result that he is obliged to withdraw his children from school as early as he can; he has often to put one in the field to pay the fees for the education of the others. Now, a precocious child can pass Standard V. at ten or ten-and-a-half. If the parent keeps the child at school until he is 13, he must pay fees for the three years. Some children cannot pass Standard V. until they are 13, and in their cases there will be no fines. There is no inducement to withdraw backward children from school, the inducement is to withdraw the clever children. That is not in harmony with the traditions of Scotland, although I am sorry the Scotch people are beginning to keep their children at school for too short a time, as the hon. Member who preceded me said this has an important bearing on the English question. There are towns in England where no child is allowed to leave school until he has passed the Sixth Standard. Under the right hon. Gentleman's system the children in such towns will have their fees paid up to the Sixth Standard, because that is the compulsory standard; but there are rural districts where the third or the fourth is the compulsory standard. Where there is the most need of help, the least help will be given in accordance with the right hon. Gentleman's plan.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Gentleman must not anticipate the Government's plan.

*MR. MUNDELLA: I am not anticipating the right hon. Gentleman's plan, but I am fixing him to his principle, and his principle is that we must not go beyond the compulsory requirements of the State. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer lays that down in regard to Scotland, there will be a very poor chance of going beyond it in England. It will be a burning shame if, in this House, the will of the Scotch Members does not prevail with respect to the education of Scottish children. It will be discreditable to us English Members, on whatever side of the House we sit, if we do not allow the Scotch people to distribute this money in the way they wish. The right hon. Gentleman opposite referred to his having been elected for Edinburgh. He was so elected when under the ægis of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, but he was not so successful when he deserted that right hon. Gentleman's standard. There has been a great march forward in this question of education, and every one interested in education is thankful for the movement. If the right hon. hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to enunciate to-day in Scotland the principles he has enunciated in this House, I am quite sure that no constituency in Scotland would elect him. I appeal to English County Members not to be tied down in this matter to the compulsory standards, and I would remind English Members generally that the principle of this proposal will affect England as well as Scotland, and I maintain that it is a very pernicious one.

(5.17.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I will not stand between the Committee and a Division many moments, but I should like to put to the Government one proposal. Will it be denied that public opinion throughout Scotland is universally in favour of freeing the high standards rather than the lower ones? If anything came out of the discussion last year, and has come out this year, it is that the educationalist in Scotland would rather free the higher standards than the lower. It is no great burden to the parent to keep a child in the early standards. Its food and clothes cost less, and there is no temptation to send it to labour, but when a parent has a clever child of 10 or 11, the temptation to take it away from school is very great. We did not want this extra 6d. on whisky. We opposed it; but now that we have to pay the money, we ask the Scotch Representatives in this House to say to what the money is to be applied. The Government desire to tie us down so that the County Councils can only apply it to a limited number of taxes. They make a suggestion—and I admit it is no more than a suggestion—that parents should only be relieved of school fees up to the Fifth Standard, but will anyone deny that this will be a hint to every School Board not to relieve parents above the Fifth Standard, and a rebuke to those School Boards who hitherto have been giving relief up to the Sixth Standard? In all common sense I ask, Are we Scotch Members of Parliament to be expected to come here and give such votes as those we have recorded only to be voted down by the brute force of numbers? Are we to be expected to pay these taxes without a voice in their distribution? I hope the Government will re-consider this matter. Nothing more disappointed me than the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate last night. He is going against the strong sentiment of the people of Scotland, and against three to one of the Scotch Representatives. He is discouraging the poor man from conferring a high-class education on his children. At present the nobleman's son pays the same price for the education of his son at the University as the poor man. Is there any degradation in that? Not at all; and it is because we want to see the poor man's son stand side by side with the children of the upper classes without there being degradation anywhere that we urge the Government to re-consider this matter. It is a pernicious doctrine that the son of the poor man should have his fees paid for him by the State, while the son of the rich man should pay his own fees. To tie us down to the Fifth Standard is to put a disparity or degradation on State-aided education which ought to be removed.

(5.24.) MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): I shall go to a Division on this Amendment; but before we divide, I desire to say that the omission of these words will simply put the clause on the same footing as last year's Act. The Government are granting a further sum of money, and all we ask is that it should be voted on precisely the same conditions as the money last year. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite have obscured that issue. They have spoken of it as a sacred principle that we should not go beyond the compulsory standards. Where did they get that principle? Last year their declarations were all the other way, for they contested the principle that the compulsory standards should be freed, holding that relief should only be given in the case of the first five standards. The Lord Advocate addresses us in three capacities—first, as Minister for Education, in which role he is at his weakest; secondly, as a partisan, in which character he is undeniably a success, making a brilliant attack, and, for a Minister in charge, setting an entirely new precedent of liveliness in an educational Debate; but he comes to us in a third capacity, namely, as an interpreter of law. We ask him in that capacity what is the reason for this Bill, and he tells us that these words will practically not have the effect of excluding the higher standards after the compulsory standards have first been provided for. He says that money is already contributed to the higher standards under the Act of last year, and that the Bill only contains a friendly invitation. Then, if that is so, why not take out these words and put the clause exactly on the footing of last year's Act? Why not vote the money on precisely the same conditions, subject, of course, to the discretion of the Education Department? We should expect to hear from the Lord Advocate how that discretion would be used. I hold that the omission of these words will make the issue perfectly clear.

(5.28.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I have listened with great attention to the Debate, and I do not think I ever heard in the House of Commons a discussion so absolutely one-sided—on which no answer, or nothing deserving the name of an answer, has been given to the case presented. This is not to be solely a Scotch Debate. We have received clear warning that the principles laid down here are to be the principles to govern education in England. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has laid down as a principle, from which there is to be no deviation, that in Scotland and in England education is not to be assisted above the compulsory standards. The right hon. Gentleman appeals to his Edinburgh experience; but we are a long way from the year 1885. The right hon. Gentleman has advanced since then—he has advanced to the other side of the House. But what was the position taken by him then? We all remember his fervid orations against free education altogether. His great antagonist was the right hon.

Mr. C. S. Parker

Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham—whom we do not see here to-day—and it was against the “unauthorised programme” that these Edinburgh speeches were made. Well, unfortunately, we have the antagonist of free education here to-night, but not its great advocate. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has been forced by degrees, unwillingly, in the direction of free education. First, he was against it altogether. He thought it a bad principle and resisted it in 1885. Now, circumstances have changed, and he is compelled more or less to accept it—less rather than more always. What attempt has there been made to answer the powerful argument of my right hon. Friend, who understands this subject better than any man in this House? I dare say that to make this distinction as to the compulsory standards is to discourage keeping the children at school. Everybody knows that is the shame of this country. I have heard it over and over again observed that a country like Switzerland can keep children at school two or three years longer than we do here, and with very great advantage to the condition of the Swiss people. You are passing children at an early age through the compulsory standards, and you are discouraging keeping them at school till a more advanced age. How is the Chancellor of the Exchequer treating the subject? It is the minimum that can be given, and it is to be given as though it were a pauper dole, and to be treated as the limit of our contributions, beyond which the bounty of the State shall not go. I think that is a very narrow view. It is a very un-Scotch view; and when we are as advanced in this country, and the subject is thoroughly understood, it will be a very un-English view of the question. Now that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been obliged to leave his anchorage, he had better set sail and go into the port of complete free education. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has money at his disposal. What do sensible people do? They try to distribute in the manner most agreeable and consonant to the wishes of the people who are to receive it. Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer believe that what he is doing now is most consonant to the wishes of the people of Scotland? He knows that it is in no Party spirit that the enormous majority of Scotch Members vote for this. It is no mere Party cry at all. He knows perfectly well that if he had consulted the Scotch Members or the Scotch people, they would have told him that he has not given enough. What they want is a liberal treatment of the whole question of education. Why, then, these pedantic views with reference to the fixed standards, and refusing to give the Scotch people what they wish? You will, of course, carry this by the majority you control. It will not be the majority of the Scotch people. I consider it most unfair and unjust to Scotland that you should call in the aid of the English majority on such a question. I do not think it is a thing which will redound to your advantage or to your popularity in Scotland. However, the Lord Advocate must be the judge of that. He has no doubt advised that this course will suit your book best. I do not dispute his judgment upon that subject. We shall see. But I rest the matter upon this point. It is contrary to the expressed wish of the Representatives of Scotland, and to the reason of the thing, and you have attempted no answer whatever to the arguments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, or to the overwhelming arguments of the Scotch Members. While I admit the rhetoric of the Lord Advocate, even he has not attempted to meet the arguments. Whatever may be the result of this Division, I am quite certain that the result will be to convince everyone that in their decision the Government are wrong, and that the majority of Scotch Members are right in their demands.

(5.36.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I should like to submit one consideration which I do not think has yet been brought forward, that is, the relations which the proposals of the Government bear to the professional and personal interests of the schoolmasters. Two or three months ago I had the honour of meeting a deputation representative of the public schoolmasters of the East of Scotland. They said that in the present transition state of things the fee system cannot last. They said that the people of Scotland, having tasted blood in the matter of free education, will not be content to pay fees any more. They added that it would affect their pockets very seriously, because the Local Authorities would give free education without increasing the rates, and they would begin by lowering the salaries of the schoolmasters. My hon. Friend mentioned yesterday that in the parochial schools if a promising lad desired higher education his poverty was no bar to his acquiring it, and he was educated, if necessary, at the expense of the schoolmaster. Knowing that, I recognise the reasonableness and force of the representation made by the schoolmasters of the East of Scotland. I think they are right in saying that the people of Scotland will not be content to pay fees at all, seeing that five-sixths of the school children are already provided for free. Scotland has not treated generously the men who promoted her public school system, and who rendered her such a splendid service. The point taken by the representatives of the schoolmasters, I think, touches the kernel of the question. At present the Lord Advocate is in the half-way house. The half-way house is a very convenient thing, but people do not like to stay there all their lives. But that, apparently, is what is proposed with regard to public education in Scotland. Now, the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to-night was an example of his very worst style of Parliamentary manner. He made the complaint that all the money has been given to one class, the working or poorer class; and when my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberdeen relieved his ignorance by reminding him that the public education system of Scotland was never confined to the poorest class, instead of meeting that objection, he merely founded upon it a new objection, and said it deepened the difficulty. That is a rhetorical artifice, a trick of debate, and we do not want these fireworks in a serious Debate. How does this money come? Simply because Providence in its wisdom and kindness has bestowed upon us what we scarcely expected, a blundering Chancellor of the Exchequer. He comes with a sum of money, the result of his miscalculated schemes. He begins by setting aside a portion of this money for the use of the Scotch people; and when it comes to a question of what they are to do with that money, he denies to the Representatives of Scotland the right to say what use they shall make of it. It seems to me that the refusal of the Government to entertain this Amendment is in direct contradiction to the ear-marking of this money for national purposes which stands on the face of their Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has spoken of the duty of parents to provide education for their children, and the Debate has proceeded very much on that basis. So far as the educational opinion of Scotland is concerned, that is an entirely false basis. We look upon it not as a parents' but a citizens' question. We consider it is the duty of citizens to provide the best education possible for the children of the community. We do not narrowly inquire into the parents' duty in the matter. We say that the remnant of the fee system which is still remaining under the law is deleterious and harmful. I do not think the explanation of the Lord Advocate makes the case any better. The words introduced are most awkward and embarrassing; and if they stand, we shall, no doubt, two or three years' hence, have to take the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman when he occupies another and more dignified position, from which he will be entitled to speak with authority as to the meaning of these words. At present he is no more an authority on the meaning of these words than any other Member of this House, lay or legal. The words do limit this gift to the compulsory standards, and it is against that limitation that the whole body of Scotch Members have entered their strong and unanimous protest.

(5.45.) MR. M. J. STEWART (Kirkcudbright): After what we have heard with regard to the universal view of Scotland, I may, perhaps, be permitted to say that free education in Scotland has not at all proved so satisfactory as was expected. It is not only my experience as the chairman of a large school, but the experience of other chairmen of School Boards in the two southern counties of Scotland, that there is difficulty in getting the children to go to school. I think the Government are perfectly right in taking up their present attitude. You cannot dissociate the parents' duty from their children; and I object to the parents being put aside. I maintain that Scotland is thoroughly satisfied with the £40,000, and we ought not to rush into the matter of free education in the belief that that opinion is such as hon. Members opposite have represented. It is not. There is a strong body of opinion as favourable to the Government on this question as hon. Members opposite can possibly claim for themselves.

(5.48.) MR. HUNTER: I think it is most desirable that the House should understand what the Government really mean by this clause. By the Returns we have 674 schools, in all of which fees are abolished not only in the compulsory, but all the standards. I wish to know whether any portion of the money will go to these schools?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I think that very fairly raises the question. It will.

MR. HUNTER: If this money is given to the Board Schools it must necessarily be given in addition to the school fees, and, therefore, is not in aid of the rate. If you limit the application, I do not see how you can, consistently with law, give money to that class of schools. If you do, then the argument of principle falls to the ground. You are going to aid a large number of schools in Scotland. There are 2,267 schools in which the compulsory standards are free. According to the latest figures which the Lord Advocate gave, there are only 98 schools in the whole of Scotland which fall short of entire freedom in the higher standards. What I want to know is, how this £40,000 is to apply to the 98 schools? It is obvious that these words are a mere blind, because, in point of fact, you are not going to confine this money to the compulsory standards; you are going to give it to schools generally for all purposes. It is necessary that we should clearly understand the meaning of the clause.

(5.51.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: There seems to be a great deal of feeling about what I said last night; but hon. Members do not realise the method of the distribution of the money under last year's Act. We prescribed certain conditions, and stated that free places were to be provided in certain standards. We said, "If you like to take the responsibility of paying the fees, we shall give you a grant." In many cases where they accepted the condition, they interpreted it imprudently, and they were not able to meet out of our grants the deficit which they created. The consequence was, that they had to impose rates. We have never taken any responsibility for that; and so far as the higher standards were concerned, we said it was entirely a matter of domestic economy. We simply gave the money according to the average attendance at the school, and in some cases the Local Authority made a good bargain and in others a bad bargain. The hon. Gentleman said I might state my opinion of the law; but the Courts would determine otherwise, and I could not enforce my opinion. I am willing to back my opinion; and I will undertake, on the part of the Government, that the Minute under which the money is to be allocated shall be on the same footing as that of last year.

(5.55.) MR. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I would point out, in reply to the hon. Member (Mr. M. Stewart), that if there be any reason for the difficulty in obtaining the attendance of children in the counties of which he speaks, it arises from the fact that competition for existence is becoming keener and keener, and that poor parents rely on the small sums, the odd sixpences, earned by their children. It is unfair, therefore, to lay the entire blame upon the parents, when we know that it is the state of society which compels them to send their children to work.

(5.56.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): After the speech we have heard from the Lord Advocate, it is hardly worth while for the Government to continue to adhere to the conclusion at which they have arrived. We are still absolutely at a loss to understand why these words have been inserted in the Bill this year. Of the £190,000 given for the payment of school fees, £150,000 we thought was available for payment of fees in the old standards, and £40,000 only is for payment of fees in Standard V. Apparently, that is not the case; and according to the statement of the Lord Advocate, it is to be made available in whatever standard the fees are remitted. Is it worth while to stand out for the insertion of these words, which will only prove a great difficulty to School Boards, and to all Educational Authorities in Scotland? We have heard that the Minute which is to be issued by the Scotch Education Department is to be in accordance with the terms of the Minute of last year. The money was given for the remission of fees in all the standards according to the discretion of the School Boards, yet you assume that the money this year shall only be available for the abolition of fees in the compulsory standards. It is a most pernicious system to introduce, and will, if carried out, do a great deal of damage to the cause of free elementary education in Scotland.

*(6.0.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): My hon. Friend the Member for West Edinburgh has just asked what possible reason the Government can have for retaining these words after the avowal of the Lord Advocate. I think the reason must be that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is looking forward to, and preparing to deal with, the case of England. Since last year the Government have made up their minds to introduce free education into England, and, therefore, they are anxious not to lay down a precedent which shall be appealed to in the case of England next year. The Lord Advocate has said that the Minute of the Scotch Education Department will be the same as that of last year. If that is so, what reason can there be, so far as Scotland alone is concerned, for putting a clause into the Bill now which was not in the Bill last year? We protest against determining purely Scottish questions by reference to English questions which have not yet arisen.

(6.3.) MR. G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I think it is very much to be regretted that the First Lord of the Treasury should have left just at the very moment when we are appealing to him, with a view to avoiding a Division. The Lord Advocate has just told us, in so many words, that, in defiance of these very words which are pressed into the Bill, the Minute to be issued will be the same as that of last year. The simple solution of the matter would be for the Lord Advocate to vote for the Amendment. I am sure the First Lord of the Treasury does not know what has happened, or he would have been here. The Lord Advocate has made an aggressive and offensive speech, which will certainly do harm to the Party of the First Lord, who, having thrown up the sponge, desires the Session to be brought to a speedy close. I think it most imprudent and unfortunate that the First Lord should have withdrawn without taking the matter out of the hands of the imprudent Lord Advocate. My hon. Friend suggests that we should move to report Progress. It may be possible that the First Lord has withdrawn to consider this matter in coolness, and that he will shortly re-appear. The Lord Advocate, having delivered an aggressive and imprudent speech on the previous Amendment, declines to give any answer whatever to the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Perth. I beg to move, Mr. Courtney, that you report Progress.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Sir G. Campbell),—put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*(6.5.) SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): I make one appeal before we go to a Division. I think, now that the discussion has taken place, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer must feel that he is tying his hands with regard to England, and making a precedent which is perfectly inapplicable to the education of England as well as to Scotland, and that will injure the consideration of the question when he comes to deal with free education in England. By the Act of 1872, Scotch education is a complete exception to that of England. It was not, according to the Preamble of the Act, for the workmen or the poor of Scotland, but for the people of Scotland. In other words, it meant that the higher subjects were to be a part of the education given in the parish school, according to old usage. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might, as he has done with regard to Wales and Ireland, in which the money is given to intermediary education, have left the question open in Scotland; but what has he done? He has set the precedent that the money shall only be applied to the compulsory standards in Scotland. How will that work in the case of England? It will hamper the Chancellor of the Exchequer most thoroughly. Take the town of Bradford, for instance, where the compulsory standard was until recently only Standard II. Is he going to make the minimum down to such a miserable standard as two, or is he going to make it up to Standard V., as in Scotland? If he does either one or the other he puts himself into most serious difficulties in the agricultural districts, where the higher standards will be resisted, and in the towns, where the lower standards will be resisted. He will find it perfectly impossible to apply this principle introduced into a Scotch Bill to England. The whole of the Scotch Members on this side are against it, and his own supporters are only lukewarm. I have some experience in educational subjects, and I can assure the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he is making infinite difficulty for himself when he comes to consider the English question. He will do a most gracious act by allowing the people of Scotland to educate their children in the way they wish. By insisting on this provision he is offending them and creating a difficulty for himself, which he will not get over when he comes to deal with the question in England.

(6.10.) SIR W. HARCOURT: The justification of my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy, in moving to report Progress, was that we desire to appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who really are the financial masters of this question, as to the statement of the Lord Advocate made in their absence. That statement must have struck everyone as having a most serious bearing upon this Amendment. Hitherto, the discussion has been on the principle of the question. When the Lord Advocate says that principle will not be enforced at all, what becomes of these words? Why are they put in? The Lord Advocate says he leaves the practice with regard to the compulsory and non-compulsory standards exactly as it was last year. The Minute is to be the same. Then, why in the name of common sense is the legislation not to be the same? I do not wish to be offensive, and I will not use the word obstinacy, but why this persistence?

man has appealed to me and my Colleague the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as if these words were introduced on the Motion of my right hon. Friend and the First Lord of the Treasury. They are the words of the Government. They express the view of the Government that, as far as Imperial funds are concerned, it is not desirable that Parliament should pledge itself to free those standards beyond the present compulsory standards. The Lord Advocate has explained clearly enough that the Minute of the Scotch Education Department provides that the funds should be applied to freeing the compulsory standards, and he has undertaken that the words of the Minute for the application of the further sum to be granted under the Bill shall be substantially the same as the words of the previous Minute. No restriction will be placed upon School Boards in the application of the fees. I trust there will not be a prolonged Debate, and that the House will understand that we are not pressing the matter in a spirit of obstinacy, but because we regard the principle as one of some importance in the application of Imperial funds.

(6.14.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I am very sorry to find that the amiable reply the right hon. Gentleman has made—amiable because to be brought back to the House on a Motion to report Progress is scarcely a proceeding to pass without leaving some trace of resentment on the mind of the right hon. Gentleman—is unsatisfactory. We must go over the facts again. The words confining the benefit of the money to the compulsory standards mean that the money is not to be expended for the relief of fees in the voluntary standards. The First Lord of the Treasury laid down the principle that if fees are abolished in the voluntary standards, it must not be done with Imperial funds, but out of the rates. But under the Bill of last year fees have been abolished altogether in 700 or 800 schools in Scotland. Where, then, is the principle of the right hon. Gentleman? I can only see two possible motives for the Government's tenacity to the words. Either the words possess some secret virtue, as affecting the proposals which may be made next year with regard to England; or else the Government, in their desire to snub the Scotch Members, have actually put in words which they admit to be unnecessary, in order to emphasise the fact that they do not intend to go beyond the compulsory standards. Really, I do not believe that can be the motive, but it is difficult upon any other interpretation than this to explain the introduction of the words now that the hollowness of the whole position has been exposed. But even now, after—or rather in consequence of—this long Debate, the right hon. Gentleman may see his way to yield.

(6.20.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I wish to put this clearly before the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In the northern counties of Scotland we have got absolutely free education in every standard, compulsory and non-compulsory. More than that; we have reduced the rates. What I want to know from the Lord Advocate is whether we will be in a position in the northern counties to apply this money to all the standards? In some cases we have increased the salaries of the schoolmasters, and taken 6d. in the £1 off the rates. With this money and the grants earned, the probability is we shall be able to reduce the education rate by one-half. Notwithstanding the words inserted here, I am glad to learn that we are going to get the money; still, if they insist upon these words, they will not command the confidence of the Scotch people nor of business men, as practical statesmen.

(6.22.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I wish to put a case which is absolutely unanswerable according to the principle laid down by the Lord Advocate. It is true that the fees of all standards have been abolished in a large number of schools. But there is a much more serious state of things. There are 2,300 schools in Scotland in which the money paid from Imperial funds hitherto had been just enough to abolish fees in the compulsory standards. If any use is to be made of the £40,000 now to be given, it must be for the abolition of fees in the non-compulsory standards. It is clear to me that under the present Bill the Scotch Education Department is legally prohibited from giving any of the money for the purpose of abolishing fees in the non-compulsory standards. What is the case in the great City of Glasgow, which represents a very large part of Scotch urban life? In that city all the Schools except 10 have abolished fees in the compulsory standards. Out of this £40,000 Glasgow gets £7,000. What is she to do with the £7,000? I maintain that if these words have any meaning whatsoever Glasgow will be unable to apply that money to freeing the Sixth Standard in any of her elementary schools. I think we ought to have a clear answer from the Lord Advocate. It is absolutely certain that in a school where the compulsory standards are already free, these Imperial funds may be used to free the non-compulsory standards.

(6.29.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON : The answer is quite simple. I showed last night that the amount we are going to give to the managers of schools in Scotland amounted to £250,000 last year and £40,000 this year—in the aggregate £290,000, while the total amount of fees paid in the compulsory standards might be estimated at £283,000. The result is, that the money to be given a little more than meets the necessities for freeing the compulsory standards. The right hon. Gentleman would be perfectly right in saying that there are cases in which the ratepayers would have a good bargain, but not in saying that the bargain is good for the non-compulsory standards. It is a good bargain for the ratepayers. The result in cases where there is an excessive sum will be that the excess will go to reduce the amount of the rates. If the ratepayers like to extend the freedom, that is their affair, and we take no responsibility in the matter.

(6.31.) SIR G. TREVELYAN : I understand from the right hon. Gentleman's answer that the words have only a general signification as regards the whole of Scotland, but are not in any way legally binding on the Department or on the use to which the money is put. In that case the words are absolutely and perfectly useless, because they only repeat what is laid down by the fact that only enough money is given to free the compulsory standards over the whole of Scotland. I understand the right hon. Gentleman says that in the case of the Glasgow School Board, for instance, the money will be paid over, though it can only be used for the purpose of freeing the non-compulsory standards. Is that the right hon. Gentleman's opinion?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON : The right hon. Gentleman seems to be under a misapprehension as to the mode in which we deal with the fund. We do not pay the money over to a particular class or standard. We simply say, "Free the five standards; here is the money." The right hon. Gentleman omits to notice that in all the cases he puts there are rates.

(6.34.) MR. W. P. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.) : I do not approve of the proposal of the Government to include these words and intend to vote against it; but I can quite see that, from their point of view, they are reasonable in wishing that the funds provided should be limited to the compulsory standards.

(6.35.) SIR W. HARCOURT : I wish to put one question in the case of a school where at present the grants just free the compulsory standards: Will or will not any more money be given under this Bill? If such a school is to get anything under the Bill, what is it to do with it? Is it, or is it not, to be allowed to apply the money it will get under the Bill to the standards above those which are compulsory?

(6.36.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON : I am sorry to intrude on the Committee again, because I have already answered that question over and over again. I will answer it again out of respect for the right hon. Gentleman. In the case he puts, where the fees have been abolished and there is no deficit, the School Board will still receive the grant. The money will go to those who manage the school for the ratepayers, and, accordingly, the ratepayers will take the benefit.

(6.37.) MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.) : There is a flaw in the Lord Advocate's explanation. He says if a school receives more money than is required for freeing the compulsory standards it will go to the relief of the rates, and then he says if the ratepayers choose to be generous they are at liberty, if they please, to free the non-compulsory standards. I would point out that under the law of the land the managers are not entitled to have free schools at all except so far as that has been restricted by the grants made last year, and consequently if the managers are in future to be able to free the non-compulsory standards the word "compulsory" is not in accord with the facts of the case.

(6.38.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: The situation becomes more and more unintelligible. The Lord Advocate says, "We propose to give money to the School Boards for a certain purpose, but if the School Boards choose to set the law at defiance and apply it to other purposes we will not ask any questions." That simply means that the Government give up the substance as far as Scotland is concerned, but they do not want the English to understand that they have done so, and, therefore, they put in words that mean nothing at all. I wish to apologise to the First Lord of the Treasury. I am quite sure his absence was accidental, and I only moved the adjournment in order that he might know what was being done by the Lord Advocate.

(6.40.) MR. ILLINGWORTH (Bradford, W): Last year I impressed on the Scotch Members the importance of their standing firm and doing all they could to complete the system of free education in Scotland, and I gave as my reason that ere long we should be called on in England to deal with the question, and the better and simpler the Scotch measure was the more likely it would be that the English measure would be framed on reasonable lines. The English Members, for the same reason, have a great interest in the way in which this measure is drawn. There is, no doubt, an underlying motive for the action of the Government in this matter. The fact is that the Government is tied by the leg to the least progressive Party on the other side of the House in educational matters, namely, the clerical section of the Church of England. All Scotland ought to know it. The Scotch education system is being injured at this final stage, in order that some paltry and some nominal satisfaction may be given to the Church of England Party. I believe the words we are now seeking to expunge will have no practical legislative effect whatever, and, indeed, the Lord Advocate has given us to understand that Scotland will get what she wants by a side-wind. I think it is a melancholy thing that England cannot fight her own battles, and that, in order to secure some advantage for an English Party, an educational system in which Scotland alone is interested should be interfered with.

(6.43.) MR. ASQUITH (Fife, East): I hardly think even now that the Government and hon. Gentlemen behind them realise the position in which we are placed. The history of this Bill has been a long and melancholy series of blunders and surprises, but I do not think the Government have ever, even on this Bill, placed themselves in such a position of paradoxical and gratuitous folly as on the present occasion. The question about to be put is whether the money to be given by Parliament is to be applied in relief of the compulsory standards. The Lord Advocate knows that there are many schools in Scotland in which the whole of the compulsory standards are free, and yet the managers of those schools will receive part of the fund which, according to the Bill, is to be applied to the freeing of the compulsory standards. What is to be done with the money in such cases? The Lord Advocate says it is to be applied either in reducing the rates or in freeing the higher standards. [The LORD ADVOCATE dissented.] In whichever of these ways it is applied, if these words stand part of the clause it will be used in violation of the Act. The Government actually invite us to vote for the retention of certain words in the clause, with the express and declared intention that those words are to be rendered of no effect in the practical carrying out of the Act. I invite them once more, in the interest of common sense, to recede from a position which is so grotesquely untenable and absurd.

Ayes 197; Noes 158.—(Div. List, No. 208.)

(6.58.) MR. E. ROBERTSON: I rise to move an Amendment which, though not directly suggested by the Debate that has just taken place, is immensely affected by the considerations that have come to the surface in that Debate. The Amendment, or rather the series of Amendments, that I propose to move, strike at the remaining portion of this clause. The Committee will see that the last three or four lines of the subsection are really the operative portion. It is provided that the sum which is to be appropriated for the payment of fees in the compulsory standards of the Scotch Code shall be distributed in such a manner and in accordance with such conditions as may be set forth in the Minute of the Scotch Education Department, to be forthwith laid before Parliament. These words are important enough in themselves, but they become immensely more important in consequence of the statements which have come from the Treasury Bench, in particular from the Lord Advocate. To show the full significance of these words I will revert to the right hon. Gentleman's explanation of the last words in question. Those words were objected to by us as being ambiguous and open to an interpretation against which we on this side of the House strenuously protested. We were assured by the Lord Advocate that, in his opinion, the words were not open to the interpretation. Again, it was objected that in this question the Lord Advocate did not speak with judicial authority, or any more authority than that possessed by ordinary Members of the House, but the right hon. Gentleman said—

"I can do no more than say that this is my opinion, for, speaking as a Member of the Government, I promise that the meaning which I now put upon these words shall be carried out in the Minute of the Scotch Education Department referred to in the last portion of this Clause."

The effect of all that is this. This Minute will define the words about which there has been so much controversy in the House; therefore the importance of the Minute, great as it would be on other grounds, is enormously greater now that it is to have the legislative effect of carrying out the meaning that the Lord Advocate, on the part of the Government, has placed upon the ambiguous words with which we have been dealing. This is a matter the House ought not to trust to the hands of the Department which draws the Minute. The Minute is to be laid before Parliament. How much opportunity Parliament will have to discuss the Minute, after it has been laid before the House, at this period of the Session, any Member may ascertain for himself. Evidently we shall have no opportunity of discussing the terms of the Minute, and that means that on this most important question the meaning and construction to be placed on these disputed words is to be left entirely with the Lord Advocate and the Gentlemen constituting the Scotch Education Department. I most emphatically object to entrust the definition of so important a phrase as this, involving so many questions as this does, to a body outside this House, whose work cannot be effectively criticised in this House. We know that if we let the question slip now it will never come back to us, and all we can rely on is a promise, not enforceable, made by the Lord Advocate across the floor of this House, the execution of which will be entrusted to others over whom we have no control. This is nothing more or less than an important question of definition. The Lord Advocate has agreed that the words are to bear a certain meaning, and we are entitled to have that assurance made good. On the faith of that assurance he won the victory in the last Division, and the House collectively is entitled to call on him to make good the assurance on the faith of which the Division went in his favour. That cannot be done if you leave the definition to be framed by a number of gentlemen who do not, however well they are acquainted with the educational system, know the opinion of this House. The Amendment I propose to move will be to this effect. I propose to strike out the words "Minute of the Scotch Education Department to be forthwith laid before Parliament," and to substitute the words "the Schedule annexed to the Act." A Schedule will then be drafted and brought under the review of this Committee. This proposed Minute will not be an ordinary Minute; it will carry out this most important pledge of the Lord Advocate, and this is a subject the House itself should deal with. We have had in this Session, and in connection with this Bill, too much of legislation by reference. We are referred from one Act to another, and, lastly, we are referred to a Member of the Education Department, and these repeated references are most objectionable. Let us take the legislative decision into our own hands. I have every confidence in the Department in reference to matters of educational administration, but I have no confidence in their legislative capacity. I have no confidence in their power or desire to carry into effect the wishes of this House, more particularly of Scotch Members of this House. What is called the Scotch Education Department, the body which will have the framing of this Minute, is really an English exorcism, owning no allegiance to Scottish opinion, and which is not in touch with Scotch Members, and it is better, where great legislative principles are concerned, for the House to take the business into its own hands, and state its own wishes in its own words.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 14, to leave out the word "such," in order to insert the word "the."—(Mr. Edmund Robertson.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'such' stand part of the Clause."

(7.10.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The course which we have indicated is precisely that which was followed in a parallel, but more important and more novel, case last year. In the Local Government Act, when the proposition was for the first time made that money should be distributed for the purpose, and before the Bill was carefully considered in Committee, the Government were, in course of discussion, asked to indicate the nature of the rules which would be put into the Minute. This was done, and the Minute was issued, and upon it I have never heard any adverse criticism. We have, accordingly, followed that satisfactory precedent. The effect of inserting a Schedule will be to carry this matter out of the region of annual discussion when the Code is laid upon the Table, and this is an objectionable principle to those who desire a discussion of the proceedings of the Department. It is one of those things upon which experience is desirable, and the opportunity should be left open for modification, should such be thought desirable. I hope the Committee will decide in favour of the Government proposal.

(7.11.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): It was all very well at first, when the matter was taken up for the first time, to relegate it to the Education Department. It was a novelty in regard to the first £250,000, but now we are dealing with a supplemental £40,000, and there is no reason why we should not deal with it in the ordinary and legitimate manner in the Bill. We are not now determining how these £40,000 are to be applied. Then, with regard to taking this matter out of the region of annual discussion, I may say, speaking from recollection, that in the Local Government Act there was to be a Minute of the Education Department first, and then it was to take its place annually in the Code hereafter, and so it appears this year; but if you look at this clause, you will find no reference whatever to the Code for the future, and this is significant. There is a provision in reference to these £40,000 as set forth in the Minute of the Scotch Education Department, to be forthwith laid before Parliament. There is no reference to an insertion in the Code, which, if it is intended this should be subject to annual revision, there should be. I cannot see any reason why Parliament should not fix the terms in the Bill, and I support the Amendment.

(7.13.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I do not think there is much force in the objection to the Amendment, that we ought to follow the precedent in the last Act, from which we have already departed. There is force in the argument in favour of a Minute rather than a Schedule, inasmuch as the first can be made the subject of annual revision, while an alteration in the Schedule would require the introduction of an amending Bill. Further, I think, if we may judge from the speech of the Lord Advocate on the last Amendment, the Department is likely to be more liberal in the interpretation of the clause than the House of Commons. The Lord Advocate said that, although the words "compulsory standards" appear, practically the Department would not pay much attention to this point, and the money might be applied to compulsory and non-compulsory standards. I think there is likely to be a more liberal interpretation by the Department than if a Schedule were drawn up under the construction of the Lord Advocate and the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

(7.14.) MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): The Lord Advocate is not correct in stating that the circumstances under which the present proposition is made are the same as when the Act of last year was passed. The Act of last year provided that the balance should be applied towards relieving the payment of school fees in State-aided schools, distributed in such manner and under such conditions as were set forth in a Minute of the Scotch Education Department, to be forthwith issued and to be annually submitted to Parliament. There is risk in entrusting to the Department the interpretation of the intention of Parliament. In the first instance, there was not the difficulty and ambiguity of language that there now is; there was not the limitation there is in the present Bill.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The first amount of money was distributed in accordance with the Minute. I have no objection to insert words to provide that the distribution shall be in accordance with terms from time to time set forth in a Minute of the Department, to be laid before Parliament.

MR. WALLACE: That gets over one difficulty of the position, but not the more important difficulty which troubles me, the difficulty of the authority to which we are to entrust the practical interpretation of the mind of Parliament in this matter. In a case such as in the Bill of last year, we might with perfect safety entrust the interpretation of our interests to the Education Authority, simply because there was no ambiguity or difficulty connected with them, but there is the utmost difficulty on the present occasion, because the language of the Bill, looked at in the light of the commentaries of its authors, amounts practically to this: we are made to say to the Education Department, "You must not employ Imperial Funds to the freeing of non-compulsory standards, but you may." That practically is the resolution we have come to. It would not be orderly for me to say that is foolish, absurd, and contradictory, but I am at liberty to say it is a difficult proposition to set forth as the practical direction for other people, and I do not think the Scotch Education Department will be equal to the task, because they are not here, they do not understand or appreciate the mind of the House, and the subtle distinctions in our meaning. The Lord Advocate, no doubt, is a prominent Member of the Department, and he has promised to procure to be concocted a Minute to express this very difficult proposition, that a thing which must not be done yet may be done. The Lord Advocate, no doubt, will make his own view clear, but I am inclined to think that the gentlemen of the Education Department, conversant with educational matters, and accustomed to think in the ordinary channels of legal sequence, will regard this proposition submitted to them as a problem which can only be solved by those who concocted it. It is only for Parliament itself to effect the practical interpretation of the resolution to which we have come, and I do not think it is fair to leave this strange and paradoxical proposition to the minds of others. I do not see that there is any objection to the Amendment of my hon. Friend, which I, therefore, shall support.

(7.22.) MR. C. S. PARKER: The proposal of the Lord Advocate, I think, affords the opportunity of arriving at a compromise that will be satisfactory. The present distribution of the money will be upon a principle that will be submitted to the criticism, and require the sanction, of Parliament, and flexibility will be secured by leaving the method open to annual revision.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: It will be necessary that the first distribution shall be in accordance with the Minute.

MR. C. S. PARKER: That affords the grounds for compromise. I think if the Lord Advocate will make it clear what are the terms of the Minute, and explain how it differs, if it does differ, from the Minute on the last occasion, there is the basis for a satisfactory compromise.

(7.23.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Yes; I suppose there is the basis of a compromise which might meet the views of hon. Members. Without pledging myself to precise phraseology, I may say that, mutatis mutandis, the Minute will be the same as that issued last year.

(7.23.) MR. E. ROBERTSON: But the right hon. Gentleman has not told us how he proposes to carry into effect the meaning placed upon the doubtful words by himself and the Chancellor of the Exchequer—a meaning which did not present itself to the minds of other Members of the House. It was on the faith of his promise that the last Division was decided—his promise that he would carry out the view he placed upon the clause, and I ask him how he proposes to do that?

(7.24.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I stated the meaning we attributed to the words, and whatever change there is from the form of last year is due to the exigencies of drafting.

MR. BARCLAY: Will the Minute be laid before us this Session? It is important that School Boards should know what money to expect.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Certainly. Just as on the last occasion, as soon as the Act receives the Royal assent, the Minute will be laid before Parliament.

(7.25). MR. HUNTER: But that does not enable us to discuss it. It is of no use simply laying it upon the Table. I entirely disagree with the Lord Advocate that last year afforded a precedent to be followed; rather it is one to be avoided. It is utterly wrong in principle on a matter of this kind to hand over the interpretation which Parliament should settle for itself. Last year, when the Government introduced a similar proposal, we readily consented to their proposal, because they did not then know how they stood in regard to this money, and could not precisely say what they would recommend to Parliament. They issued a series of questions to School Boards, in order to feel their way to some kind of decision. We, under the circumstances, did not stand upon an objection founded upon a technicality, and insist upon the insertion of a Schedule. But the reasons applicable last year are wholly inapplicable now, for there is no doubt of the amount of money available, and which the Minute will refer to. Then why not put in a Schedule, and give us an opportunity of discussing it and dealing with it? My fear is that words may be introduced suggesting to School Boards that any surplus they may get from the Imperial Exchequer should not be applied to free education in the higher standards, but in relief of the rates.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: No such words will be introduced.

MR. HUNTER: That is consolatory, and, so far, we get on our way. But still, what is more reasonable than to insert the words in a Schedule, for I presume they are ready? It is said that the words may be more easily altered if they come up for discussion with the Code, but we do not want to alter them. I see no occasion for it. There ought to be no such distribution as will require alteration, and I cannot see why the Government should not accept the Amendment.

(7.30.) MR. CALDWELL: The only point in dispute appears to me to be whether the conditions to be laid down should be inserted in the Schedule of the Bill, or set forth in a Minute of the Scotch Education Department. In the latter case there would be practically little or no opportunity afforded to the House of discussing the matter.

MR. C. S. PARKER: The matter has been reduced to a very small point. In my opinion it would be better that the conditions should be inserted in the Bill itself in the form of a Schedule, because that would afford a more convenient method for dealing with the questions that might arise.

*(7.32.) MR. ESSLEMONT: I confess that the statement which has been made by the Lord Advocate to some extent relieves my mind, but I still think that there would be a temptation to Local Government Boards, who are very much interested in economising the rates, to vote themselves more for the reduction of the rates than for the promotion of education in their several districts. I think it would be far better if, instead of giving money in this way for the purpose of reducing the rates, the Government give it for the purpose of encouraging higher education. At present the application of the grant for educational purposes does not go beyond the Fifth Standard, but I am hopeful that, at any rate, in the course of another year this restriction will be removed. It is, however, for my hon. Friend to say whether he thinks he ought to divide on this question of the Schedule. Should he divide the Committee upon his Amendment, I shall feel obliged to vote with him, but I would suggest to him to consider whether, after what has been said, he ought not to be content with putting the Government upon their honour upon this question.

*(7.34.) SIR L. PLAYFAIR: I am sorry I am unable to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee. My reason for this is that I think the whole matter has been placed on a somewhat anomalous position. We have already admitted words limiting the application of the grant to the compulsory standards, but we have been told that, practically, those words will not limit the application of the money to those standards, but that the provision will be applied in an elastic way, the responsibility being thrown upon the School Boards. Practically, that would reduce the words we have adopted to a mere Preamble rather than an enacting portion of the Bill. We are, therefore, in this anomalous position, that those words are not to be within the terms of the Enactment, but are to be carried out with the elasticity attaching to the form of the Preamble, leaving the responsibility on the Government to carry out the provision according to the interpretation they have given. That is a somewhat paradoxical way of dealing with this question, but the compromise offered by the Lord Advocate is perhaps as much as we could expect under the circumstances. I would much rather it should be left to the Government to carry out this paradox, than that the House itself should attempt to do so by inserting conditions in the Schedule.

(7.36.) MR. E. ROBERTSON: My object is to secure full legislative authority by means of words in the Bill itself, rather than that we should rely upon the dubious language used by the Lord Advocate. It is one thing to carry out a proposal such as this by means of a Schedule, which will form part of the Act of Parliament, and a totally different thing to leave it to be carried out through the action of the Executive, who would have no real legislative authority, and whose definition of the language used could not control the provisions of the Act itself. If the words were put into the Schedule they would be of equal validity with the clauses of the Act itself, and the purpose we have in view would necessarily be carried out. Under these circumstances, I am afraid I must insist on dividing the Committee upon the Amendment of which I have given notice.

(7.37.) MR. D. CRAWFORD: I would remind the Committee that, by the existing law, the School Boards are bound to charge fees. This question has already been raised, and it has been decided that they are bound to charge fees, and this remains the law upon the subject, except in so far as it may have been altered by the legislation of last year. The question has been raised as to the meaning of the words the Committee have decided to accept, and the Lord Advocate has practically said that those words are not necessarily operative, but that, in spite of them, the School Boards will have the power of affording relief in the case of the non-compulsory standards. For my part, however, I think the Amendment is one which the Committee ought to adopt, and I shall, therefore, give it my support.

(7.50.) MR. HUNTER: I have now to move an Amendment which stands on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), and which is to insert after the word "Parliament," in line 17, the words—

"Provided always that no portion of such sum shall be paid to any School Board, or to the managers of any State-aided school in which fees are charged for the teaching of any standard of the Education Code for Scotland, the passing of which may be compulsory under the provisions of the Education Acts operative from time to time."

Last year the hon. Member for the College Division made a Motion in similar terms to those which now stand on the Paper. I attempted to dissuade him from proceeding with that Amendment on that occasion, and, if I recollect aright, he did not take my advice, the result being that I then voted against him; but the circumstances are now altogether changed. We know exactly how far the grant given by Parliament last year will go in freeing education under the compulsory standards in Scotland, and we have this fact before us, that, after all, it has not been found necessary to charge fees in the majority of the schools, and that where they have been charged it has only been under financial pressure, the local payments not having been found sufficient to enable the School Board to make the remission. In some cases, indeed, they have made charges in excess of those which prevail elsewhere. Now, however, the Government have provided that relief may be given, at all events, up to the Fifth Standard, but that on the average we are not to go beyond that. But surely we ought to be able to require that in the distribution of the grant, especially in the case of the larger towns, the money should not be given unless the Local Authorities are willing to abolish fees in respect of the higher standards. One important point to be remembered is this, that in Scotland the custom has always been to have a large admixture of the children of parents of different classes in the schools, a much larger admixture than is known in England. This must necessarily occur in the rural districts, because there are no other schools but the parochial schools. These schools are, both from an architectural, sanitary, and teaching point of view, of a superior character. The School Board of Aberdeen, not having received a sufficient sum from the Exchequer to enable them to dispense with fees in all the schools, have selected three of the finest schools in the city, and put upon them the embargo of fees. The result is that in the most recently constructed of these schools, while there are places for over 1,000 children, there are no more than 600 children on the rolls. Owing to the charging of fees there is not a proper number of children in attendance, not that there is any want of children in the neighbourhood to fill the schools, but because those parents who are capable of paying fees are not sufficiently numerous to supply the number to fill the school places. From a mere economical point of view that is a considerable loss; there is a great loss in setting up what may be called genteel schools, or schools for genteel people, maintained out of the rates and taxes, the sum contributed by the parents being ridiculously small in comparison with the cost of the education. Substantially and truly the three schools are paid for by the Government and local ratepayers, to the extent of four-fifths and five-sixths of the whole cost. No one has any right to object to parents who think it is not desirable their children should be exposed to constant intercourse with children of the working classes. A man is perfectly right in bringing up his children in the way he thinks fit; but I contend that if a man adopts the view I have hinted at he ought to do so at his own expense. From the point of view of public policy it would be impossible to teach a worse lesson than is taught by the unfortunate distinction between a fee school and a free school, because it necessarily introduces a class distinction in schools where no class distinction has hitherto been known. Is it not obvious that the physical separation between the rich and the poor leads to mutual ignorance, that mutual ignorance leads to mutual misunderstanding, leads to jealousy and envy on the one side, and ill-founded contempt on the other side? Nothing can be better for taking down the conceit of a young gentleman, whose father can afford to buy him fine clothes, than to put him on the same form with a boy whose clothes have been patched and patched a dozen times, and let him find, probably, that the boy with the patched trousers can easily beat him in the educational race. On the other hand, children of the working men gain much by associating with the children of the upper classes, because they necessarily imbibe some of the refinement which the children of the upper classes are able to acquire at home. In the Scotch people there is a strong feeling in favour of equality. Distinctions of the kind I have described are invidious, they are bitterly hated and resented, and they tend to create that indescribable mental unrest and discontent upon which all the quack doctors of social science practise their nervous remedies. Not only so, but the working men in certain parts of Aberdeen entertain the very practical reason for the abolition of fees, that these schools happen to be in a district where there is a considerable number of the working classes, whose children are not allowed to go to the nearest or the best schools; they are obliged to go to more distant schools, to schools not so good sanitarily, not so fine architecturally, and not having the same distinguished class of teachers. That is a great grievance. What is the total amount that will be reserved to get rid of fees up to the Fifth Standard in all these schools? The Lord Advocate will find it is not large, and this is one of the questions which I hope the right hon. and learned Gentleman will deal with in an effective manner in the proposed Minute. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the last Amendment, to insert the words—

"Provided always, that no portion of such sum shall be paid to any School Board, or to the managers of any State-aided school in which fees are charged for the teaching of any standard of the Education Code for Scotland, the passing of which may be compulsory under the provisions of the Education Acts operative from time to time."—(Mr. Hunter.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(8.10.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: This question has been repeatedly before the House in the last two years, and I think that the merits of it must be familiar to most hon. Members. But let me very briefly state how matters stand. In certain towns of Scotland there are fee-paying schools, attended by the children of persons perfectly willing and ready to pay these fees, and, of course, the schools only exist where there is such a class. The hon. Member has advanced some abstract considerations on this subject. He says it is very undesirable there should be a separation of classes, and so on, but, as a matter of fact, we find that there exists this class of schools. They are fee-paying, simply because the elected School Boards decided that they should be so. These fees yield a profit to the Board, and benefit really, not those who are better off, but the poorer children. This is a method by which the School Board is put in funds actually for the benefit of the poorer classes. We have heard very elaborate accounts of the errors which have been made in the administration of this system, but my answer is that all these questions are local questions, and ought to be determined by Local Boards. I can understand that opinions may differ in towns like Glasgow on the question, but the School Boards, and not the Government, must settle the matter. I contend that it is fair that the School Boards who have such schools should not be discountenanced in exercising their discretion. The policy of the Government must accord with facts; they must take things as they find them, and not interfere with local discretion in matters which must be determined by the Local Authority.

Mr. Hunter

(8.15.) SIR G. TREVELLYAN: The Lord Advocate has justly said that this question has been before the House ere now, but I contend that on this occasion it is being discussed under entirely new conditions. Formerly a certain amount of money was handed over to the School Boards of Scotland, to make it go as far as they could in the abolition of fees, but now a sum of nearly £300,000 has been made up for the express purpose of abolishing fees. I maintain that when a nation has resolved that free education shall be given in the compulsory standards, that nation has a right to make conditions in the matter, and the first of those conditions in this case is that no school shall be kept up at the expense of the ratepayers, from which a great mass of the children are practically excluded. The Lord Advocate says we found this obstruction of classes. We did not find it; we made it during the last year. What did we find in towns like Glasgow, Govan, and Aberdeen? In the case of Glasgow we found ten schools, in Aberdeen, three schools, and in Govan, five schools, of great perfection, to which all classes of the population, without distinction, went. In one division of Glasgow I know well there was an admirable school called John Street. We found 1,200 children of all classes attending the school. What exists now? Half the children have been told that they must leave the school if their parents insist upon their rights as ratepayers and citizens to send them to the schools free. By the existing system, which has not been so long in operation as the Lord Advocate seems to believe, children who formerly attended good schools are practically evicted from them, because their parents cannot pay the fees, and are obliged to go to inferior free schools. Yet the fathers of these children help, through the rates, to support these fee-paying schools, and thus a great injustice is entailed upon them. The fee-paying schools naturally attract the best masters and mistresses, and are conducted on a better educational system; thus the free schools necessarily suffer, and here again an injustice is done to the children who attend those schools, and to the parents also. The excuse advanced hitherto for maintaining the fee system—namely, that there is not enough money to free the standards—will be absolutely removed.

by this Bill if the desire of the Scotch people is acceded to; and I repeat what I have said on previous occasions, that perfect equality of elementary education is thoroughly in accordance with the national ideas and aspirations of the people of Scotland.

(8.24.) DR. CLARK: I hope the Government will give way on this point. There is very great hardship. I have some right to complain because I had some shares in one of the best of these schools. It was a private adventure school, but did not pay. We handed it over cheaply to the School Board, who are now using it for a different class of children to those who formerly attended it. The poorer children are now obliged to go long distances to other schools which are free. It is very unfair to deprive the children of the working classes of the advantages the school affords; indeed, it is time this kind of snobbery was put an end to. I am sorry we have not had an opportunity of appealing to the Scottish people since this question was raised, but I have no doubt whatever that in Govan and Glasgow, and some of the other towns where this system has been adopted, whenever the people have an opportunity they will put an end to it. The School Boards who are acting in this way were, like the present Unionist majority, elected for one purpose, and are using their power for another. The system is causing a good deal of trouble and discontent wherever it has been tried.

(8.25.) MR. WALLACE: While I sympathise with the political doctrines laid down by those who have preceded me, I think the Government ought to accept this Amendment, on the ground that it is simply the carrying out of their own Bill. The proposition is to give a certain sum for the extinction of school fees in the compulsory standards. If there is a class of people, however, who want to pay fees, why should the Government insist on forcing their subsidy upon such people? I cannot see how the Government can consistently refuse this Amendment, which, to my mind, is simply the carrying out of their own proposal. I deprecate the introduction of contentious matter where a question can be settled on simple grounds of financial economy, and, as it seems to me, logical consistency. I was perfectly surprised to find there was any hesitation on the part of the Lord Advocate in at once acceding to the Amendment.

*(8.27.) MR. J. A. CAMPBELL (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities): I think the hon. Member who has just spoken has rather mistaken the scheme of the Government. The money is to be given to the School Boards and school managers, in proportion to the number of scholars in attendance in their schools; but these School Boards and managers will have to be left considerable freedom in the manner in which they carry out their operations. This Amendment proposes to make a studied interference with that which has been decided again and again to be proper liberty on the part of School Boards. The system of having one or two schools with fees, for all the scholars is not introduced by a School Board except where they believe there is a demand for it. The hon. and learned Member who introduced this discussion spoke very truly of the larger mixture of classes in Scottish schools than in schools in England. That, no doubt, is the case in rural districts; but it has never been the case in towns that there were not graded schools, and to abolish these altogether would be to do an injury to education. Why have the School Boards made some of their schools superior to others, and given them more expensive staffs of teachers? They have done so because they believed there was a demand for schools of that kind, and that they would find people willing to pay higher fees. To put an end to this distinction in schools would simply be, if the schools were to be kept up to their present standard, to throw a great additional burden on the ratepayers. That could only be avoided by lowering the quality of the schools. Should the views of my hon. Friends opposite in favour of this Amendment be carried there will be a gradual lowering of the quality of the schools of Scotland to a common level, and that not a very high one, and there will be a danger of an impetus being given to a revival of private adventure schools. We have been congratulating ourselves upon getting rid of adventure schools, which were so numerous in the towns of Scotland, and were not of a character to do the highest service to the work of education. It would be a misfortune if private adventure schools were to be revived in consequence of all the State-aided schools being required to be thrown open to all classes of scholars. Such schools as are indicated by the Amendment were established only because School Boards believed there was a demand for them, and if any Board finds it has made a mistake in retaining a school with fees, and that there is not the required attendance of scholars, then, no doubt, it will alter its arrangements. But do not let us interfere with the discretion of School Boards, especially when in doing so we run the risk of lowering the character of the education provided. (8.36.)

advantages as the elementary schools have, and then those in charge of them will be able to adopt the policy which is being advocated. Under those circumstances, I feel myself unable to support my hon. Friend's Motion. I hope that while these schools—which have diminished in number in the past, and are likely to continue to diminish accordingly as the principle of free education is more generally adopted—will continue to receive support to some extent by the payment of fees.

*(9.10.) MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars): The last speaker surprised me by expressing the hope that those schools which insist on charging fees will by-and-by enjoy the advantages which belong to other elementary schools. That is the very thing we are asking for. It is because these schools insist on charging fees that this Amendment has been brought forward. We desire to see all our schools free of fees of any kind whatever. I think the last speaker, therefore, must have misunderstood the object which we have in view. There is nothing in this Bill which is more at variance with public opinion in Scotland, with reference to education, than this permission to school managers who receive grants to charge fees, and thus to compel the parents, who are too poor to pay the fees, to send the little ones a long distance from their homes, in order to get free education. The hon. Member for the University of Glasgow stated that this question had already been decided several times by this House. It is quite true that the question was decided adversely to us last year, but it should be remembered that the decision came to was against the weight of Scotch opinion, and that the majority of the Scotch Members supported the principle of this Amendment. Since then public meetings have been held in various parts of Scotland, and at these, resolutions have been passed confirming the principle of this Amendment; therefore, Scotch public opinion on this subject is perfectly well-known, and no hon. Member can get up and say that that opinion is in favour of allowing fees to be charged in any elementary schools in Scotland. Yet the Government, by their present proposal, will allow managers of certain schools to insist on charging fees, and thereby make those schools what may be called genteel schools. That, again, is entirely at variance with public sentiment in Scotland. Social equality in educational matters has been the common feeling in Scotland, ever since the parish schools were established in the time of John Knox, or immediately afterwards. Children educated in them have belonged to all classes, and very few Scotch children indeed have found their way into other schools. It has been admitted in the course of this Debate that there has been a far greater variety of children in schools in Scotland than in schools in England. In the latter place they have been classified to a certain extent; whereas in Scotland, up to the present, there has been very little classification. We desire to avoid classification. We prefer to maintain the democratic feeling in Scotland with respect to education. The hon. Member for the University of Glasgow has suggested that in the schools in which fees are charged a superior education is given to that which will be given if the fees are abolished—that the education will then become inferior, because the masters and teachers will have to be paid lower salaries and, consequently, will not be able to keep that school up to the customary high standard. But the hon. Gentleman must have overlooked the financial position of the question. The Lord Advocate stated that it only required £33,000 to free the whole of the compulsory standards in every school in Scotland. Yet in this Bill the grant to be made amounts to £40,000, and, therefore, there is a margin of £7,000 left; and should the schools to which the discussion refers decide to take advantage of this grant, can anyone say that there is any necessity for them to be less efficiently equipped and less able to maintain the high standard of education which has hitherto characterised them? I should like to remark that only six or eight Scotch Members last year voted against the principle of this Amendment, while the enormous majority of Representatives for Scotland were in its favour.

(9.20.) MR. C. S. PARKER: I think the number of Members who voted against the principle of this Amendment last year was rather more than six or eight. I know that among the opponents of it were the hon. Member for North Aberdeen and myself. We voted against it on temporary grounds—having regard to the financial position of many of the most important School Boards in Scotland, and if the Government had been guided this year by the voice of the majority of Burgh Scotch Members, if they had been willing to give the additional £50,000 towards free education, I think there would have been an end of this difficult question, because there would have been no longer any School Board in Scotland, which would have wished to keep up fee-paying schools when their finances were in such a good condition. My difficulty is this: that we are providing now for the current year, and the money which is being voted will suffice to meet the average requirements of Scotland. But, as a matter of fact, in individual cases—in the case of several large towns and especially in the case of the City of Glasgow—it will fall considerably short of what is required. The hon. Member for North Aberdeen has in no way exaggerated the importance of the proposition which we are now advocating; but I think he made a little mistake as regards the number of schools in respect to which the difficulty exists. We have been told that there are rather over 3,000 schools in Scotland, and that only a paltry 43 come under this system of paying fees. But, Sir, what the hon. Member did not recognise, and what I think the House should distinctly bear in mind, is, that you cannot take the measure of this question by the mere number of 43 fee-paying schools. You must look to the fact that these schools do not exist in any way for themselves alone. They exist in pursuance of the policy—as in the case of Glasgow—of a great School Board which is to prevent the imposition of a heavy rate upon the citizens in order to secure the provision of adequate school accommodation in the city. I am afraid that in the case of Glasgow, the funds voted by Parliament will fall short by many thousands of pounds of the amount necessary to free the whole of the compulsory standards in all the schools. I sympathise very much with what has been said about the position in which some parents are placed. Hitherto, of course, they have been compelled to find the fees. Then they were told that the education of their children was to be free; but when they made inquiries, they discovered that, however satisfied they might be with the school in which their children had been educated in the past, that was not to be one of the free schools; and if they desired free education, their children must go further afield. I do not know that in any case it has been found necessary to send children an inconveniently long distance in order to get free education; but, still, parents who have been satisfied with one school, have felt disappointed at finding that it is to be maintained as a fee-paying school. I do not agree with the principle laid down by my right hon. Friend the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow, that there should be complete equality in educational matters—that children of different classes should sit side by side. I do not think we ought to carry that quite so far. I dare say most Members of this House send their children either to a private school or to one of the great public schools of the country. No doubt many of the wealthiest parents in England are sending their children to public schools, which live to a great degree on endowments left them in years gone by. I am not prepared to lay down the principle that no one should be allowed a share out of the public taxes, or of the public rates, unless he is prepared to send his children to an elementary school. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, that it would be a retrograde step which would tend to the revival of those private adventure schools which were so largely extinguished by the liberal conduct of the School Boards; but I would venture to put before the House an ideal of which I think we are within measureable distance and which would get rid of this difficulty. I think we are rapidly arriving at the point when schools which are ambitious in their programme should be classified differently from the ordinary public schools. I do not think it is reasonable or fair as in the case of the Glasgow Grammar School or the Aberdeen High School, that these schools should receive no assistance directly from the Imperial Exchequer; and that, at the same time, the Garnet Hill School should receive substantial assistance from that source. I think the School Boards should choose between one of two things: either they should curtail, in some degree, the programme of these schools, or they should be prepared to transfer the management of them to another Department, and have them treated as schools giving a higher education and preparing children for a higher kind of education. Even in the high schools and grammar schools there should be a percentage of free places open to these people who are willing to make educational provision for their children without taking into account their wage-earning capacity. I look forward to the time coming before long when we shall have a larger number of free secondary schools in Scotland, and also a considerable development of these quasi-secondary schools, all of them charging fees until Parliament shall more liberally provide, but all of them giving for working class children a number of free places. On the whole, I cannot take the responsibility of laying down by Act of Parliament in the case of so flourishing a School Board as that of Glasgow that they shall no longer keep schools of this kind. I think we must leave their hands free in the matter. In Glasgow they have one-tenth of the whole school population of Scotland; and if the School Board there do not see their way to dealing with this one-tenth without having a certain number of fee-paying schools, I, for one, cannot accept the responsibility of forcing them to change their system.

(9.33.) MR. CALDWELL: This question will come before the citizens of Glasgow, as well as the whole people of Scotland, in March next, and also at the next General Election. It will not be allowed to rest. It is true the Scotch Members were not very unanimous when the question was before the House on the previous occasion; but since then the circumstances have most materially changed. Previously there was not sufficient money to free education in the compulsory standards in all the schools. In fixing on the £40,000, the Government think it should be sufficient to free education in those standards. If it so happens that in the case of any School Board the grant is not sufficient to free education, the cause is that they have been charging higher fees than other Boards. To that extent they will have been saving the rates. If, as the hon. Member for Perth says, Glasgow has one-tenth of the whole school population of Scotland, she will get one-tenth of the £40,000 extra, and that will clear all the fees that are being at present paid in the compulsory standards, in the East End schools, the average school fee in Glasgow being about 16s. a head, whilst in the rest of Scotland it is 12s. The question comes to be one of principle, though hitherto it has been argued as one of money. The whole argument in Glasgow was based on the fact that they had not sufficient money, and the Board would not face the question of principle, whether it was right and proper to have fee-paying schools while the remaining schools were free. The Lord Advocate, who evidently knows little or nothing about the school question in Scotland, argued the matter as one of principle; for if he had argued it as a question of money, we should have at once said to him, "How about the £50,000 which you have in your own hands?" He argued that it was a right principle that the upper classes should be able to send their children to school without their mixing with the rabble. But in Scotland the system has always been that the public school and the State-aided school should be open to all classes of the community without distinction of rank. The Act of 1872 allowed parents to have their school fees paid by the Parochial Boards, and to select what Board Schools they pleased for their children. A parent who had the school fees paid for him could send his children to the Garnet Hill School or any other State-aided school in Glasgow; so that the child of poverty had an equal choice of school with the child of the wealthiest. It was left to a Conservative Government to draw a distinction, for the first time in Scotland, between the class of schools, and to say that some should be fee-paying, from which the children of the poor, ordinarily speaking, should be excluded. Then, in the case of the endowment schools, education was given at less than cost price. It was thought that there should be social intercourse between the classes, and that intercourse was the quid pro quo that the Endowment Commissioners considered warranted the giving of education in a charity foundation at less than cost price. The school fees paid by the parents do not represent the whole cost of the education. They do not, for instance, represent the cost of the school buildings. The School Boards take the best buildings, erected at the cost of the ratepayers, and set them aside as fee-paying schools; and I undertake to say that a careful calculation would reveal the fact that the cost to the ratepayers of these fee-paying schools is greater than that of the free schools. The payment of fees is not for the purpose of aiding the rates. The ratepayers do not get the money, but the idea is that they reap some benefit in return. The teachers are more highly paid and better qualified than those of the other schools; the children are supposed to be of a higher class; the schools are superior and also the school appliances. We often hear hon. Members opposite say that they desire to raise the working classes, but that is not what they are doing here. According to your present policy you are lowering them. Those who are down you want to keep down, and those who are up are to be kept there, and at the same time to have the benefit of the money of the State. No one objects to the upper classes having a better education if they pay for it themselves; but what we object to when you are dealing with State money is that one class should be able to enjoy it in a select and exclusive way. If they want it let them take it under the same conditions as the poorest people. These are the principles on which we join issue with the Government. It is all very well for them to think that they are raising the cry of education. It is all a question of class distinction. I shall certainly support the Amendment.

(9.45.) MR. HUNTER: Some allusion has been made to my conduct, but I do not think the hon. Member who mentioned my name informed the Committee of anything I had said that I had not informed the Committee of myself. I said last year that I opposed this principle as inexpedient and inopportune.

MR. C. S. PARKER: I did not attack the hon. Member. I said both he and I were of opinion that this was premature, and that I still regarded it as not yet ripe for Parliamentary action.

MR. HUNTER: I should not have risen on that point at all, but the case of the Glasgow School Board has been cited as an example in the course of the Debate. I maintain, however, that this Board is the worst sinner in all Scotland in respect of one cardinal duty of a School Board—to distribute its burdens fairly and honestly between the parents and the ratepayers. I think that we may take it that the general practice throughout Scotland is a fair indication of what is reasonable treatment as between the parents and the ratepayers. Those who have taken the trouble to study the figures from 1872 up to the present time will find one very interesting and consoling fact; and that is, that the School Boards in Scotland, as a whole, have not spared the rates at the expense of the parents. The Glasgow School Board, however, has systematically overcharged the parents in order to save the pockets of the ratepayers. Whilst the average school fee in Edinburgh is 10s. per head, and the average fee throughout the whole of Scotland is 13s., in Glasgow it goes up as high as 16s. Three-fourths of the people who send their children to the Board Schools in Glasgow live in houses of not exceeding £10 a year, and they consequently pay 13 per cent. of the rates. Those who are richer pay 87 per cent.; therefore, the reason why the parents are overcharged is not far to seek. So far from regarding the School Board of Glasgow as an authority to be relied on here as an example, I think the contrary is the case. That Board represents a congeries of sectaries of various kinds, and does not represent the people of Glasgow. In other parts of Scotland, no doubt we have suffered from the cumulative Vote, but in no part of the country has that suffering been so acute and sectarianism so rife as in the City of Glasgow.

(9.50.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 90; Noes 128.—(Div. List, No. 210.)

(10.3.) MR. BARCLAY: I beg to move the omission of the words “including any sum not applied and distributed in terms of the preceding sub-section.”

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 18, to leave out the words “including any sum not applied and distributed in terms of the preceding sub-section.”—(Mr. Barclay.)

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I am willing to accept the Amendment.

MR. BUCHANAN: The acceptance of the Amendment means that these words mean nothing at all. This decision of the Government is, at any rate, a recognition on their part of the legitimacy of the arguments that have been brought forward on this side of the House and a confession of the ambiguity with which their proposals have been laid before us.

(10.6.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I should like to ask what is the meaning of the words “until Parliament otherwise determines?” I suppose every Act we pass in this House is only operative until an Act has been passed to modify it or put an end to it. I gather that there is a purpose in the methods of the Government, because when we come to Clause 3 we find, not precisely the same form of words, but precisely the same idea. Clause 3 is subject to an Act to be hereafter passed on an entirely different subject. I submit that the words I have quoted in this clause mean nothing at all, inasmuch as, whatever Act of Parliament we pass this year, it must be subject to any future amending Act. In order to bring the Government back to the ancient conservative methods of drafting Bills in this House, I beg to move the omission of the words.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 19, to leave out the words “Until Parliament otherwise determines."—

(Mr. Storey.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*(10.8.) MR. GOSCHEN: I think the hon. Member could find precedents for this course which is recommended by right hon. Gentlemen on his own side. Last year we had a similar form in Section 22 of the Local Government Bill. The words give a flavour of uncertainty, and indicate that the tax is not to be assumed to be a permanent one.

MR. STOREY: There may be reasons for inserting these words in the Bill, but I never heard of putting words into a measure in order to give it a "flavour of uncertainty."

*(10.9.) MR. GOSCHEN: My meaning is, that it is not to be assumed that this is a permanent tax. I think that is a perfectly rational point to suggest, though I may not have expressed it extremely well.

(10.10.) MR. STOREY: I really do not think it desirable to introduce these suppositions for the future. With regard to what has fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to precedents, for my own part I have no side. I sit below the Gangway, and if right hon. Gentlemen above the Gangway have, in a moment of weakness, introduced such forms, it does not strengthen the argument in my opinion. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will assent to the omission of the words, and leave the sub-section complete in itself.

(10.11.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not quite understand why the words were introduced. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that the tax out of which the whole of this money is to be produced is not to be a permanent one? He had better say that the whole of the Bill is to be held in a state of suspense. Does it mean that next Session the right hon. Gentleman may ask us to repeal the whole tax, and that then all the arrangements as to police superannuation and school fees will be knocked on the head because the tax upon which they rest will be gone? I think that the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is most unsatisfactory, and I would suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should withdraw both his argument and the words.

*(10.12.) MR. GOSCHEN: I am not prepared to withdraw either my argument or the words. The right hon. Gentleman must see that these words apply specially to the amount set free by the dropping of the Licensing Clauses. I have from the first treated the application of the sum so set free as a more provisional arrangement than the rest.

(10.13.) SIR W. HARCOURT: It is not the money that is set free, but the money that is raised, and it is raised as a single tax. It is not as if the two things were distinguishable. It is a tax raised upon spirits and beer. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that a portion of this tax is likely to be dropped in a future Session? I think that the second argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is even worse than the first, and I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he should drop both.

(10.14.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer's first speech had some force in it; but it seemed to me that he entirely contradicted himself in his second speech. I object so strongly to the way in which we are handing over to the Local Authorities larger sums than we ought, that I will support the Government in retaining these words, because the more flavour of uncertainty there is about the arrangement the better it will be. I think we ought to let the Local Authorities understand that Parliament is not going to hand over these very large sums to them simply in relief of rates, but that at some future time it may insist that they should apply a portion of them to purposes other than those introduced in the Bill. I hope the Amendment will not be passed.

(10.16.) MR. A. H. D. ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): As I read the Amendment which the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to move subsequently, these words apply to the whole sum, including the residue—that is to say, to £750,000. I think it is most important that we should know from the point of view of Wales and Ireland whether the right hon. Gentleman really means that the grant for intermediate education in those countries is to have a “flavour of uncertainty” about it.

(10.17.) MR. HUNTER: The Government have already successfully defied public opinion, and now they are determined to defy common sense. If the draftsman did not insert these words by accident he is a very remarkable draftsman. The inference to be drawn from the wording is that the sum for free education is to be applied whether Parliament otherwise determined or not, but the residue is to be differently dealt with and is only to be applied to the purposes mentioned in the Bill until Parliament otherwise determines.

Ayes 150; Noes 115.—(Div. List, No. 211.)

Other Amendments made.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 28, at the end thereof, to add the words—

“(b.) and subject, as aforesaid, among the county councils of counties and town councils of burghs, and police commissioners of police burghs, in Scotland, in proportion to the respective valuations of such counties and burghs and police burghs as such valuations shall be ascertained by the Secretary for Scotland at the date of such distribution, the share falling to such councils and commissioners respectively to be applied to the relief of local rates levied by them respectively, in such manner as they may determine.”—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

(10.35.) MR. SINCLAIR: The object of the Amendment of which I have given notice is to meet the case of certain districts in which the fees withdrawn are so large that the amount could not be met by the contributions from the Imperial Exchequer from the Probate Duty, supplemented by this new grant, and that the amount for the purpose might be added to from the residue. But as the case I intended to meet is covered by the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce), I think I shall best consult the convenience of the Committee by not moving my Amendment, but bringing it in as bearing on the question raised by my hon. Friend in the Amendment which stands next on the Paper.

*(10.36.) MR. BRYCE: I desire to move an addition to the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, and omitting the words after “applied to,” and add at the end—

“Educational purposes in such manner as may be prescribed by a scheme for each such county and burgh framed by each such Council and approved by the Scotch Education Department.”

I am not without hope that the Government will take a favourable view of this Amendment, for it must have struck the Committee that throughout the whole of these discussions there has been no demand for such a contribution to the rates as this sum of money will make. It is altogether a superfluous boon offered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and one never asked for by the Scotch people. I can appeal in proof of that to the words of the Lord Advocate when he said that in Scotland there had been no such demand for the relief of the rates as there had been in England. Taking Scotland as a whole, the difference between the two countries is very marked, for I think there never has been a Session when English Members have not been asking for contributions towards local burdens. Such demands have not been made in Scotland. I do not refer to the origin of this nest egg of £35,000 a year to taunt the Government about it. The suggestion to throw it into the rates came upon us quite unexpectedly when the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the purchase of licences fell through. The Government may not like looking back upon the period when we were fighting over that scheme, and cannot do so with much pleasure; but my desire is to make a golden bridge for a retreating enemy, by suggesting to them a good way of spending this sum, the disposal of which seems to perplex them. The Government may yet earn the gratitude of the Scotch people if they will apply this £35,000 satisfactorily. We have heard the Government say that as regards England, although they purpose to devote the surplus to the rates in the present year, their intention is, or they have given a strong intimation to the English people that in future years they will propose, to apply the English portion of the surplus to secondary or intermediate education in England. They have gone further in other parts of the United Kingdom. In Ireland they have devoted the whole of the amount which would otherwise have gone to the purchase of licences, to purposes of intermediate education, and with the full consent of the Irish Members. Something even better has been done in Wales. The Welsh people are going to get this money to supplement the amount they have under their Intermediate Education Act, and which has already begun to be applied in a manner which promises to be highly beneficial and likely to promote the best educational interests of Wales. What I desire to suggest to the Committee is that the example has been so well set in the case of Ireland and in the case of Wales, and hinted at in the case of England, should be applied in the case of Scotland. My proposals, I venture to say, will be generally consonant with the views of the Scotch Members. The Divisions upon this Bill have been significant. There has always been a majority of Scotch Members in favour of applying the money to educational purposes, and upon the main Division there was a crushing majority—42 to 14—of Scotch Members in favour of applying the money to free education. I believe I express the general opinion among Scotch Members in saying that if we cannot get the complete extinction of fees which we think to be by far the best course, we still would like an educational application of the money. I do not wish to detain the Committee by dilating upon the need in Scotland for some further provision for secondary or intermediate education, for that is a matter of common knowledge. There is no Scotch Member who does not feel that if we were free to have a Scotch Session to deal with our own needs one of our first Bills would be a measure for the purpose of improving intermediate education in Scotland. The old Grammar and Burgh Schools of the country are not sufficiently numerous nor sufficiently well equipped; in many of the newer towns no such schools exist; the provision of endowments is scanty, except in one or two places, such as Edinburgh, and there are large rural areas in which secondary schools either are lacking or are so placed that they cannot serve the needs of the country. That is particularly so in the Northern and Highland counties. Nobody can deny that money would be usefully employed in promoting secondary or intermediate education, and the expenditure of a comparatively small sum as a nucleus with this object would be of immense advantage to the nation at large. So, too, as regards technical education. Very few of the city or burgh schools have yet made proper provision for technical education under the Act we passed in 1887. That Act has not been largely availed of, but nothing would do more to stimulate its operation than to put a sum at the disposal of Local Authorities, to be made the nucleus for the promotion of technical education. The gift of even a small sum to make a beginning has the most useful results in stimulating local liberality. There are many other methods and plans by which the money at the disposal of the Local Authorities might be well applied. There is the promotion of evening schools, a subject with which some Members are more competent to deal with than I am, and to which one of my hon. Friends proposes to call attention. There is also the maintenance of what are called continuation schools. It is not so much a large sum that is needed as money well directed which would stimulate local benevolence. To such an end the value of this £35,000 is great, and out of all proportion to its actual amount. It may be made the beginning of educational work in this direction, a beginning for which we may have to wait a long time if we do not take the first step with this money we have at hand. It may be objected to the Amendment that further legislation is required to give effect to it. A short and simple Act would be all that is needed, and this might be passed early in next Session; meanwhile, the one substantial thing we desire to secure is that, instead of this money going to the relief of the rates, it shall be devoted to some educational purposes. The relief to the rates would be absolutely infinitesimal. This sum of £35,000 is, I believe, not more than one-seventh-hundredth of the whole rating of Scotland; and if hon. Members will only consider the proportion that will fall in their own district to the relief of rate-payers in counties and burghs, they will appreciate that it will have no sensible effect. The Government will earn no substantial gratitude by giving relief in the form they propose. I may perhaps be met on the part of the Government with the objection that the Local Government Act for Scotland makes no direct provision for enabling County Councils to act in educational matters. The answer to that is twofold. In the first place, it must be remembered when we come to complete the system of intermediate education for Scotland we shall be forced to use County Councils, School Boards not having a sufficiently wide jurisdiction; and why not entrust Councils which are certainly not overburdened at present with some educational functions, following an example which has had such happy results in Wales? Another answer is to refer to the 15th section of the Scotch Local Government Act of last year, which provides that it shall be lawful for the Secretary for Scotland to make from time to time Provisional Orders for the transfer to a County Council of certain powers, duties, and liabilities, now exercised by the Privy Council or the Scotch Education Department in regard to matters of an administrative character. I think the Committee will observe under that provision, which seems to point to some action of the kind proposed in this Amendment, it would not be difficult for the Government, if they took up this proposal with sympathy, to make Provisional Orders under which the powers of County Councils might be considerably extended and various educational functions conferred on them, enabling them to deal with the matter. I do not believe there would be any jealousy on the part of School Boards at seeing the purposes of secondary education so advanced. With regard to police burghs as well as other burghs, it might be that the School Boards would be more appropriate bodies than the Commissioners or Councils, and it would be easy to modify this Amendment, so as to enable them to deal with the expenditure of the money. I may add that the suggestion in my Amendment is that any scheme of the kind should have the concurrence of the Scotch Education Department, and this will be a guarantee against any imprudent experiments which authorities in counties or burghs may be thought likely to be tempted to make. I do not wish, having stated the principle of my Amendment, to occupy more time in urging it. I trust that the Government will give it fair consideration; that they will have some regard to the wishes of a large majority of Scotch Members; and that whether or not I have suggested the best machinery for carrying out the purpose, that they will not allow this residue to be lost, like a snowflake in a river, in the reduction of rates, but will reserve it for a purpose for which it is greatly needed and where it can be used with the happiest results.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment,

To leave out from the words "applied to," to the end of the proposed Amendment, in order to add the words "educational purposes, in such manner as may be prescribed by a scheme for each such county and burgh, framed by each such council, and approved by the Scotch Education Department,"—(Mr. Bryce.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'to the relief of local rates levied by them respectively,' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

*(10.50.) MR. GOSCHEN: Certainly I cannot complain of the tone or substance of the speech of my hon. Friend, who has stated in a very temperate manner some of the purposes to which, in his belief, the money might be legitimately applied. I can assure him that the suggestions he has made are but a reflex of the consideration the Government have given to this subject. The Government have already considered whether it would be proper to dedicate this sum to the purposes to which the hon. Member has referred. The hon. Member has alluded to the attitude the Government have taken up with respect to intermediate education in Ireland, Wales, and England. In Ireland we proposed to devote a considerable sum to intermediate education, and in Wales also. In England, although we have no proposals at present, we do contemplate the possibility of some liabilities with respect to education being put upon County Councils in the future. With regard to Ireland and Wales we have the machinery ready by which the sum placed at the disposal of the constituted authorities for intermediate education may at once be utilised. But in England and Scotland we have no such machinery ready, and we do not see our way to constitute machinery at once for the purpose. Now, I am perfectly ready to give my hon. Friend, and others who hold the same doctrine that he does, this assurance: that I think it is a matter perfectly open to legitimate discussion whether County Councils should not in the future be trusted with some of the powers which my hon. Friend has indicated; and in the same way as we hope to consider the case with respect to England, so we hope to consider and promote it in the case of Scotland. I do not for a moment preclude the idea of such a change, though perhaps not quite so complete as my hon. Friend has suggested. Hon. Members acquainted with the situation of the Local Authorities in Scotland will admit that at the present moment the County Councils and the Town Councils do not stand in any relation whatever to the educational arrangements of that country. They would have entirely to learn their business; they have no relation whatever to primary education. It would, I think, be most undesirable to bring about a collision or a contact between such bodies as the Town Council of Glasgow, and the School Board of Glasgow in order to determine any of these educational problems. We may lay it down as a principle that the County Councils are not in a position at present to interfere in any way with elementary education in Scotland, and in that I think I shall have the adhesion of a good many Members from Scotland. But my hon. Friend, I know, is thinking more of intermediate education. Well, the County Councils are a new body; they have yet to win their spurs, and I doubt whether, in the remaining part of this financial year, they would be able satisfactorily to work out the schemes suggested by my hon. Friend. They would have to work out those schemes under pressure, and that would be an undesirable position in which to place any body having money at their disposal, and having to find a means for its application in the current year. It is undesirable to hurry County Councils into any outlay on schemes with regard to those great questions of educational organisation which require so much care. My hon. Friend thinks the sum is so small that it will have no appreciable effect upon the rates, but really I think the ratepayers might put the sum to very good account by paying off some of the debt and relieving themselves in other directions. If it is small as applied to the relief of the rates, so also it is small as applied to a great educational experiment. I would press that point that it would be undesirable to hurry the County Councils into outlay on questions of educational organisation where the utmost care is required to avoid making great mistakes. I wish to reserve to the Government the freedom and the privilege of being able to deal with intermediate education in Scotland on some future occasion. As hon. Members know, the time will come when further money will be available for education in Scotland; and as so much has been done in the direction of primary, elementary education, there will be all the more means at our disposal to enter upon a substantial, reasonable, well-considered scheme for promoting intermediate education which is near to the hearts of Members on both sides of the House. A certain sum of money has been set free by the operation of the Educational Endowments Commission, and that sum has been employed in the promotion of intermediate education. I understand that some urgent cases have been dealt with, and we may look forward to the time when we may all concentrate our minds upon working out some satisfactory system of intermediate and technical education for Scotland. On behalf of the Government, I am unable to accept the Amendment.

complain of in the tone with which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has met the arguments of my hon. Friend. But the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is altogether too apologetic. Why is it that County Councils have such limited powers? It is because the Government would grant them no more powers. It was the desire of almost every Member representing Scotland that County Councils should have more ample powers than they at present possess. The right hon. Gentleman argues as if the Educational Endowments Commissioners had placed at the disposal of Local Authorities an amount of money more than sufficient for the requirements of secondary and technical education in Scotland or would have the means hereafter, but that certainly is not the case. I have had occasion already to commend the liberality of the Commissioners in appropriating as much as they possibly can of these endowments to the promotion of secondary and technical education; but we have had constantly before us the idea in Scotland that the Educational Endowments Commissioners are not at liberty to dispose of money which was originally bequeathed by pious donors in favour of education to purposes of higher education, and this has, to a certain extent, overborne the desire of the Commissioners. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is entirely wrong in assuming that the appropriation of money in relief of the payment of school fees in Scotland in 1889 has done anything whatever for the promotion of education. It has, however, undoubtedly given a fair and just relief in those parts where the pressure of fees was severely felt. We hope that this small sum of money may be added for the purpose of stimulating secondary and higher education. What I have endeavoured to impress on the Government is this, that with the comparatively small sum now offered they will be able to give a great stimulus to higher education. The money may, as you propose, be applied to the relief of the rates, but, as a fact, in Scotland there is no demand that it shall be applied in that direction, while there is a universal demand—and the Lord Advocate will not deny it—that the County Councils and Local Authorities shall have control over the expenditure of this grant. If they are given such powers as we ask, no doubt they will be stimulated to promote evening schools and secondary education beyond the Fifth Standard. Why should the Government tie the hands of the County Councils and the Town Councils when there is no doubt they will exercise their powers in the promotion of better education in Scotland? The Government seem determined to discourage the application of this money to higher or secondary education. The Lord Advocate cannot be ignorant of the fact that in Aberdeen a great stimulus has been given to such education by a few thousands from the Gordon College. We only ask for a little freedom of action, and for a power to exercise a little discretion, so that we may apply this money to the best possible advantage. I cannot see why the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Lord Advocate should use their great abilities in finding excuses why the people of Scotland should not aspire to higher education. I hope that they will agree to our reasonable proposal, and give the Local Authorities power to promote technical and higher education by means of money which really belongs to the Scotch people.

(11.12.) MR. BUCHANAN: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has only dealt with one part of the Amendment. He referred only to the County Councils, and not to the Town Councils. I understand it is not the intention of the Amendment to give this money to Town and County Councils to spend as they choose, but it is intended to give a direction that it shall be spent in promoting education. The Town Councils of Scotland are specially qualified to discharge such a trust, and to select suitable objects to which the money shall be devoted. I think the Government would do well to assent to the proposition to give directions to the Town and County Councils to apply this residue for educational purposes. The great difficulty in a large city like Edinburgh will be for the Town Council to know what to do with this money. The rates in Edinburgh amount to about £150,000 a year, and what gain will it be to the Town Council to get this small sum of £4,000 or £5,000? Without any direction as to the expenditure of it, it will probably give more dissatisfaction than otherwise. On the other hand, there are many excellent educational institutions in Edinburgh, and the expenditure of this money might be attended with the most valuable consequences to the community, if conducted as we suggest, whereas if it goes only in the relief of the local rates the benefit to the ratepayers will be infinitesimal.

(11.20.) MR. A. ELLIOT (Roxburgh): I hope that this Amendment will be looked at in a practical light, for it really involves the introduction of a new scheme of education, to be carried out by Local Bodies not specially identified with the subject and having no special machinery for dealing with it. It is easy to point out how large centres like Edinburgh may benefit by this grant, but it is rather the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to look to the best general use of the money in both town and country. I do not think the rural constituencies would gain much benefit if this money were devoted to educational purposes, and handed over to technical colleges. After all, the money in question is taken from Imperial sources, and Parliament hardly has the right to devote it to the cause of some special interest in special localities. The ratepayer is ubiquitous, and I think that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has endeavoured to benefit the community in general in the application of the fund. I think the ratepayers are entitled to this relief. I hope that this discussion will not be prolonged. If the same kind of verbal criticism were applied to all legislation as has been applied to the clause before the Committee, no measure would ever pass through the House of Commons. I believe the Chancellor of the Exchequer to be right in this case. I believe he has tried to benefit the community in general. We must all recognise that great things have been done for education in Scotland by the present Government. The Chancellor of the Exchequer in the present proposal has considered the interests of the general community, and he deserves, and will receive, the support of a large section of the people of Scotland for his proposals with regard to the application of this £40,000.

(11.25.) MR. STOREY: I note with satisfaction the statement of my hon. Friend in favour of giving this money not to any section of the people, but to the community as a whole. When we remember the attitude he took up recently at the time it was proposed to devote this very money to a much worse section of the public, and to a much worse question than education—

MR. A. ELLIOT: I voted that it should be used for the extinction of licences.

MR. STOREY: When we remember his former attitude we are grateful to him now for his change of opinion. It may be a matter for surprise that an English Member should interfere in a Debate peculiarly Scotch. No doubt we have no direct interest in this matter, but we have an indirect interest, for we are jealous about the making of precedents which are calculated to give us some trouble when we come to amend the English law. Of course, we sympathise with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Aberdeen in the object he has in view. We shall, as Englishmen, be glad to see the Scotch people get more education, for they need it nearly as much as the English people, but the Amendment contains a vicious principle, in that it proposes to give the control of this money to Burgh Commissioners and County Councils, and it altogether ignores the claim of the existing School Boards to deal with it—

*MR. BRYCE: I should prefer to give it to School Boards rather than Town Councils or Burgh Commissioners in burghs where School Boards exist.

MR. STOREY: I was not afraid of what the hon. Member was willing to do, for I knew he would take a common sense view of the matter. But it appeared to me that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was delighted that a proposal should emanate from the Front Opposition Bench in favour of placing educational matters in the hands of the Burgh Commissioners and County Councils in Scotland. He knows that in England attempts were made, time after time, to adopt a similar course, and to introduce bodies other than the School Boards into educational matters. Unfortunately, they were to a certain extent successful, especially in science and art instruction and technical education. Hon. Gentlemen opposite always seem to look with suspicion and doubt on the action of the School Boards, and have more than once attempted to lessen their usefulness and exalt other authorities. We English Radicals, at least, believe in the principle "as for Scotland, so for England." I should accordingly like to see the Amendment modified; but in any case I shall vote for it, for I am prepared to divide against anything introduced by the present Government, but I shall guard myself from admitting it as a precedent for England.

*(11.30.) MR. PROVAND: I wish to put in a plea for another educational purpose to which this money could be applied in Scotland—namely, for the formation of evening continuation schools. A great deal has been said about the money being given to the ratepayers, but the ratepayer has no claim to it, especially as it was originally intended for quite another object than his relief. Probably no branch of education has been more discussed within the last few years than evening continuation schools, and certainly no branch of education has been more generally approved. It has been felt and stated by educationalists of all Parties that the present method of education is defective through the absence of such schools, because under the present system the great mass of children, leaving school, as they do, at a comparatively early age, soon forget much of what they have been taught. This involves a great waste of money, and is a disadvantage to the State as well as to the individual. The majority of the recent Royal Commission on Education strongly recommended in their Report the formation of evening continuation schools, and used these words in their Report—"That the necessity of having some form of evening school for the purpose of fixing and making permanent the day school instruction is almost self-evident; and that it would be worth the while of the State to spend more money on such schools."

There has been no such profitable investment ever made by the State as that which has been devoted to expenditure in educating the young.

Mr. Storey

The Report of the Committee of the Council on Education in Scotland was presented to the House to-day, and, in glancing through it, I notice that this matter has received their attention. They say:—

"We regret to find that the education of many children appears to be discontinued as soon as the standard of exemption is reached."

This is true of Scotland, although the children go later to school and stay a little longer, than they do in England. In another part of their Report, the Committee dealing with the question of continuation schools, say:—

"We are as strongly convinced as formerly of the importance of such schools, both in developing and rendering permanent the work begun in the day schools."

In previous Reports the Committee spoke in favour of evening schools, and there has been some increase of their number in Scotland. The average at which children leave school in Scotland is rather high, and yet there is only one child out of 8 in school in that country over 13 years of age. There is room for a large number of evening schools, to enable children to continue their instruction at night. Now, what will it cost to provide continuation schools? We expend in Scotland, from all sources, nearly £1,400,000 every year on inspected schools. A large percentage of that amount must be wasted. A very small sum, say 3, 4, or 5 per cent. of that amount, would be sufficient to provide a system of continuation schools throughout the country. The saving from the adoption of such a system will be considerable. Mr. Paton, of Nottingham, who probably has had more experience in this country on the subject than anybody, points out that—

"First we build up at an immense expense a colossal system of primary education, and then see and allow the results of it to be very largely wasted and lost. Teachers speak dismally of the havoc to the fruit of their labours in the first two years after school is left. We cease to educate at the most important, the most receptive, the most plastic period of life."

The money that will be at the disposal of the Local Authorities in Scotland for this purpose will be something like £35,000. It is a very small sum, compared with the amount we expend on education generally, but it will be something towards the total needed. I have great pleasure in supporting the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Aberdeen.

*(11.41.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have great sympathy with what has been said by my hon. Friend the Mover of the Amendment, by my hon. Friend (Mr. Provand), who has just sat down, and others. They have urged the claims of certain educational purposes to a share of this money, but I am bound to say I see considerable difficulty in at once proceeding to take the step which is recommended by my hon. Friend (Mr. Bryce). In Scotland we have great needs in regard to intermediate education, but there is no machinery ready at hand by which the money thus applied could be immediately administered with success. I do not share the fear expressed by the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) as to the County Councils. I do not think that the feeling which may exist in England extends in any degree to Scotland, and that fact is owing to the circumstance that, as we in Scotland have fortunately a universal system of School Board schools, we have not that jealousy with regard to School Board schools which exists in England. I have no doubt that if educational matters were handed over to the County Councils in England, it would be regarded as a triumph over the School Board by those who may be said to belong to the reactionary party in education, who have always opposed the School Board system. In Scotland the same condition of things does not exist, and I have looked forward to the time when the machinery of County Boards and District Boards, which I hope will be soon set up, will be entrusted with the education of the country. But I do not think the time for that change has yet come. The County Councils were only established last year, and we must allow them to become really accustomed to their duties before we impose new duties of this kind upon them. On these grounds I have great scruples about supporting the Amendment of my hon. Friend, although I entirely agree with him in the main purpose of the Amendment. I agree with him in this, that if we cannot have the money applied to the relief of fees in primary schools, as we desire, I do not know of any object more tempting and alluring to me than that which he proposes. Perhaps the object least tempting and alluring is that selected by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, namely, what I have already called the naked and brutal relief of rates. I do not think much can be said—at least, I have never heard anything very satisfactory said—in justification of that proposal; but, although I do not approve of the Government proposal, and although I find we are thwarted in our desire to obtain what we prefer, I hope my hon. Friend will not press the Amendment he has moved. If he does, although I shall certainly not vote against him, I do not think I can see my way clear to support him.

(11.45.) MR. SINCLAIR: The proposal of my hon. Friend allows this residue to be applied also in freeing school fees where it is necessary to do so—and there are some cases in Scotland where it will be necessary to apply a further sum of money than that obtained from Imperial sources to this purpose. There are districts in Scotland—I represent one of them myself—where the amount derived from the Probate Grant, and from this special source, will not be sufficient to remit the fees within the compulsory area alone. There will be a further sum to be obtained from fees or elsewhere, unless the character of the education is to be reduced. I hope, therefore, the Government will allow this money to be devoted to purposes of education, in case of need, as proposed by the Amendment. There are no districts where the desire to have continuation schools, for the benefit of those who have been compelled to leave school at an early age, is stronger than it is in those which will suffer as I have mentioned. I hope, therefore, the Government will see their way to accepting the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

Original Question again proposed, "That those words be there added."

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (MONEY) BILL.—(No. 388.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [22nd July], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

*(12.0.) SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): The hon. Member for Peckham (Mr. Baumann) appears to have opposed the Second Reading of this Bill under a misapprehension. He seems to have supposed that it gives the County Council the power of spending a very large sum of money. That is quite a mistake; it gives no power of the kind. The Bill may be divided into two parts. So far as the expenditure of the County Council is concerned, the Bill gives no power of additional expenditure. The effect is to authorise them to raise money by loan spread over a certain number of years. They have already the necessary powers to spend the money, but if the Bill does not pass they will have to do so out of the rate of the year. As regards the second portion of the Bill, it enables the Council to make loans to local Metropolitan Bodies. It does not in any way increase their power of expenditure. The reason for the course adopted is that if each Local Authority raised its own loans it would have to pay a higher rate of interest. But they are allowed to borrow of the London County Council, and the London County Council, raising a large loan, is able to lend the money on better terms. The only effect, therefore, of [throwing out this part of the Bill would be that the Local Authorities would have to pay a somewhat higher rate of interest, and, consequently, the rates would be raised. The hon. Member seems to be under the impression that the London County Council has raised the rates. But what are the facts? The last precept of the Metropolitan Board was at the rate of 10·1d. per annum. To this must be added the payment to the Guardians at the rate of 4d. per day per head for indoor paupers. That is in addition to the Metropolitan Rate, and a corresponding relief of the local Poor Rate, and amounts to 1·88d. Again, there must be added the cost of services formerly provided for by County Justices in the old County Rate, amounting to 1·72d. These items make up 13·7d., and the present rate is 12·53d. Of course, to complete the comparison the Government contribution and the loss of the Coal Dues would have to be allowed for, and the net result will be that there is an increase of the hundredth part of a penny, which is mainly due to increased expenditure on parks. The hon. Member also said that the debt of London was increasing at the rate of £1,000,000 a year. This, also, is entirely an error. The net debt is now £17,800,000. Five years ago it was £16,900,000. To that must be added £670,000, which was taken over from Surrey and Middlesex when parts of these counties were included in London, and which, therefore, is no new debt. These, then, makes £17,600,000, and as the debt is now £17,800,000 the increase has been £200,000 in five years. So far, therefore, from being an increase of £1,000,000 a year, the increase has really been under £50,000 a year. I hope, therefore, that the House will agree to the Second Reading of the Bill.

(12.6.) MR. BAUMANN (Peckham): I rise, Sir—

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I rise to order. The hon. Member has already spoken.

MR. SPEAKER: The position of the hon. Member in this matter is somewhat peculiar. On the previous occasion he rose only to move the adjournment of the Debate. That Motion was eventually carried, although the hon. Member himself did not move it, and I think it would be rather hard if the House does not hear the hon. Gentleman now.

MR. BAUMANN: The right hon. Gentleman opposite has unintentionally misrepresented me. I did not say, as the hon. Baronet seems to think I did, that I objected to the Second Reading of the Bill. I merely objected to its being taken at a late hour, of the evening, without notice. The right hon. Baronet has said that this Bill only asks for money for schemes which have already received the sanction of Parliament. That is entirely a misleading statement, because none of the schemes of the London County Council have yet received the sanction of Parliament, although some of them have already passed this House. Again, with regard to borrowing powers, they are not merely the renewal, but the augmentation and increase of previous borrowing powers, and, therefore, hon. Members are free to criticise the proposals before they sanction them. In the third place, the Bill asks for money to carry out the general powers conferred by certain Acts of Parliament in respect to which no specific schemes have been presented to Parliament at all. With regard to the local indebtedness of London, I must say, after the statement of the right hon. Baronet, that I consider that great and growing indebtedness is a serious fact, not only for the London ratepayers, but for the country and the Government. The total debt on December 31, 1889, stood in round numbers at £29,000,000, and when I tell the House that the total assessment of the Metropolis is only £31,000,000, I think they will allow that that is a very serious figure. The right hon. Gentleman has said that the net debt is only £17,000,000, because the Local Bodies owe £9,000,000, but if that were added to the assets of the London County Council the indebtedness would not be reduced to £17,000,000. Under this Bill large sums will be lent to Local Bodies. The right hon. Baronet states that the London County Council act as bankers to the Local Bodies. That is true, but the only way the House can control these large borrowing powers is by criticising them when these Bills are brought forward. Nobody would object to lend £500,000 to the School Board if they knew that the money was to be expended on education, but, considering the large sums which have gone into the pockets of speculating contractors, builders, and lawyers, to run up all kinds of rotten buildings, hon. Members are entitled to ask for what purpose the School Board want this £500,000. I am opposed to the London County Council, not on account of its politics, which are a matter of perfect indifference to me, but because the members of the Council are such thoroughly bad men of business, and because they throw away the money of the ratepayers on preposterous Bills like the Overhead Wires Bill and the Betterment Bill. After the latter Bill had passed through the Select Committee, with the exception of the betterment clauses, it was abandoned by the County Council, simply because that body could not bend and tutor the House of Commons to its own will. The Council ostentatiously announced that it would not widen the Strand nor commence any other metropolitan improvement until it could get the House of Commons to swallow its preposterous Yankee notion of betterment. This is the body which we are asked to give a blank cheque to, and to respect as a body of business men. I refuse to do anything of the kind, and as long as I represent a London constituency I claim the right to fully criticise the financial and administrative policy of the London County Council, which has not yet commenced a single metropolitan improvement, which has given Parliament a great deal of trouble in checking its vagaries, and which has only succeeded in increasing the rates of the already over-burdened ratepayers of London.

(12.16.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I was under the impression that hon. Members opposite were anxious to bring this Session speedily to a close. We have already devoted a considerable amount of time to the consideration of Imperial matters, but there is still a large amount of Imperial business to be got through, including a considerable number of Votes on Supply. If the House of Commons chooses to add to the enormous duties it still has to perform, the management of London, and the control of its Local Government, including the School Board of London, and the financial arrangements of all the Metropolitan Vestries, we shall find Ireland a mere bagatelle compared with what we shall have undertaken. We have been endeavouring for many years past to develop Home Rule in London, and I am quite sure that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board found that the carrying of his Local Government Bill for London was not the least difficult part of the work he has had to do in bringing important measures before this House. If the right hon. Gentleman believes he was right in constituting the County Council, he must also think it right to leave to the Local Authority the management of its own affairs, the appeal against any misdoing, incapacity, or want of temper, on the part of the London County Council or the School Board being to the constituencies of the Metropolis. I agree with the hon. Member opposite that the ratepayers have a right to be dissatisfied with the action of the County Council in abandoning their scheme for the Strand Improvement, which, undoubtedly, is greatly needed. But I decline to admit that the House of Commons should be made a Court of Appeal from the County Council. I am quite sure that the County Councils of the large provincial cities, such as Birmingham, Manchester, Leeds, and Glasgow, would object, and very properly object, to the interference of the House of Commons with their affairs. The House has entrusted them with certain powers, and it is to their constituents alone that they are responsible for the exercise of those powers. I greatly regret that the President of the Local Government Board has not been able this year to introduce a measure in fulfilment of the promise made last year to obviate the necessity for these annual Money Bills. When any other municipality requires special Parliamentary powers the matter is submitted to the consideration of a Committee upstairs, every Member of which has to make a declaration that he has no personal interest in the objects intended to be promoted by the Bill. If such a Committee considers that the powers asked for should be granted, the House delegates to the Local Authority the power and discretion of carrying out the provisions of the Bill. But in this case the measure before us is practically a Government Money Bill, which comes to us with the stamp of the Treasury upon it. It will simply enable the London County Council to borrow money and expend it on purposes which have already received the sanction of the House. Why, then, should the House of Commons waste five minutes of its time in discussing such a question? The Treasury is satisfied, but if the Metropolitan Members, who are not Members of the London County Council, are to come here to oppose the action of the London County Council, we may be sitting here till Christmas. Reference has already been made to the scheme by which the London County Council is to be made the banker of the other Local Bodies, so that if the School Board or any other authority requires to borrow money, it may be able to obtain it at a lower interest than if it went into the money market. This, I think, is an admirable financial arrangement, because money can be borrowed by the London County Council far more economically than by the smaller Local Bodies. Reference has also been made to the debt of the London County Council; but that, after all, is a matter of very small moment, because the debt is not more than one-half the annual value of the Metropolis. I challenge the hon. Member opposite to instance any large municipality in the Kingdom which has so small a debt, compared with its annual value, as this Metropolis.

MR. BAUMANN: It is £29,000,000.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: I am comparing the debt of London with that of other large towns, and putting it at £25,000,000, I say that that is far short of one year's rateable value, but that, after all, is only a side issue. The real question we have to decide at this late hour, and at this late period of the Session, is whether we shall pass this measure authorising the London County Council to borrow money for purposes that have already been sanctioned by this House, or whether we are to undertake a wide, discursive, and endless discussion into all sorts of questions as to the wisdom or folly of the acts of the London County Council and the London School Board. This I think a very unwise thing, and I appeal to the Government to endeavour to bring this discussion to a close, so that this purely formal and technical Bill may be allowed to pass.

(12.29.) MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I think the House has hardly fully comprehended the great increase that has taken place in the rating of London. I find that at the present time the rating to be charged for the year ending the 31st of March, 1891, is no less than 13.25d., as compared with 1.86d. in 1857. No doubt fresh duties have been put upon the London County Council, but I must point out that whereas in 1888 the rating was 8.39d., it has increased in the present year to 13.25d. I would point out to Her Majesty's Government that it is desirable that the whole question of rating in the Metropolis, and the incidence of local taxation, should be referred to a strong Parliamentary Committee or Commission. We should definitely arrange whether the County Council shall be allowed to charge the ratepayers beyond a certain sum, and whether the School Board of London should not be obliged to limit their demands for money. In every clause of this Money Bill additional funds are sought, and, amongst other things, money is asked for the erection of a new Council Chamber. I think it is the duty of a London Member to protest against this Bill, and to submit that, before these powers are given, we should have a strong Parliamentary Committee of Inquiry.

(12.35.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, East): I only rise with one object, namely, to appeal to the President of the Local Government Board to introduce the Bill he has promised at an early period next Session, so that the London County Council will no longer be under the necessity of bringing these Money Bills before the House of Commons. It we were to take up the whole of the points referred to by the hon. Member for Peckham, and go into such questions as that of the money required by the Vestry of St. Pancras, we should find ourselves involved in a very lengthy discussion.

*(12.37.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's) I am not sure whether I can speak again.

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman only spoke on the question of adjournment, therefore, he is entitled to take part in the Debate on the Main Question.

MR. RITCHIE: I can assure the hon. Member opposite that no one regrets more than I do the fact that I have been unable to introduce the Bill during the present Session. It has been prepared and considered. It has been the subject of much negotiation between the Local Government Board and the Treasury, and it is now in a complete state. Until within the last few weeks I had hoped to introduce it during the present Session. It certainly is the intention of the Government to introduce it early next Session. London finance is by no means in a satisfactory condition. A Bill comes before the House of Commons, and passes every year, and passes as a matter of course. We necessarily pass it as a matter of course, because it is impossible for us to set ourselves up as a Court of Inquiry into every financial proposal made by the London County Council. I am one of those who do not raise the smallest objection to the course the hon. Member for Peckham has taken to-night. I think he and others are justified in criticising the proposal so long as the present procedure is maintained. At the same time it is impossible that the finances of the London County Council can be adequately inquired into and examined by the House of Commons, and I hope that, in view of the assurance I have given that the Government propose to introduce a Bill which, in their opinion, will put the finances of the London County Council on a much more satisfactory footing, and relieve the House from the responsibility which now attaches to it in the matter, the Debate may now close.

*(12.40.) MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I do not wish to oppose the Second Reading, but I wish to point out that I have had a notice on the Paper all the Session, asking for a Royal Commission to inquire into the action of the London School Board, with regard to their jerry buildings. It is my intention, when the Vote for the London School Board comes on in Committee, to bring forward the whole of the question of the London School Board, and submit it to the House.

*(12.41.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): As St. Pancras has been referred to by the hon. Member for Peckham, I would explain that the money for that parish is required for a very necessary purpose, that is to say, to enable some loans, which are bearing at the present time an unnecessarily high interest, to be paid off. I would suggest to the London County Council that they should seriously re-consider the proposal to spend a large sum of money on the building of a new Council Chamber and new offices. In a very short time, I trust, the London County Council and the Corporation of the City of London will be united. We shall then have one great Municipality for the whole of London, and the officers of the County Council will, necessarily, go to the Guildhall.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 30th July, 1890.

NEW WRIT.

For Carmarthen County (Eastern Division), v. David Pugh, esquire, deceased.

QUESTIONS.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now fix a time for taking the Scotch Estimates, and whether, seeing that the Votes in Class III. were taken at the very end of last Session, the Government will now put them down for consideration; and whether it is the intention of the Government to have a Saturday Sitting for that purpose?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I can give no other answer than that which I have already given, that the Scotch Estimates cannot be taken until the other business for which we have arranged has been disposed of.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): When will the Foreign Office Vote be taken?

MR. W. H. SMITH: The Foreign Office Vote will be taken after the Post Office Estimates, and after that probably the Scotch Votes.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Is it proposed that the House shall sit next Saturday?

MR. W. H. SMITH: That question has not yet been finally determined. I desire to consult the convenience of the Members and Officers of the House as much as possible in the matter; and if it is necessary to ask the House to meet on Saturday, I am sure that hon. Members will be glad to make the sacrifice.

MR. SEXTON: Will the Government be able to give a more direct reply to the question on Thursday?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope so.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): Will the Indian Councils Bill be taken to-morrow.

MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir.

VOL. CCCXLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL.—(No. 244.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 2.

Amendment again proposed, in page 2, line 28, at the end thereof, to add the words—

“(b.) and subject, as aforesaid, among the County Councils of counties and Town Councils of burghs, and police commissioners of police burghs in Scotland, in proportion to the respective valuations of such counties and burghs and police burghs as such valuations shall be ascertained by the Secretary for Scotland at the date of such distribution, the share falling to such councils and commissioners respectively to be applied to the relief of local rates levied by them respectively, in such manner as they may determine.”—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Question again proposed, “That those words be there added.”

(12.25.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): In the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark), I beg to move the Amendment which stands on the Paper in his name. The object of the Amendment is to prevent the abuse, which is possible under the Bill as it stands, of employing the money assessed to counties for the relief of landlords. The money will come out of the pockets of the working classes, and it would be a shameful abuse to allot it to the landlords. I doubt whether the County Councils would dare to do so; but as the insertion of these words can do no harm, I think it is only right that we should take it out of the power of the County Councils to perpetrate so great a wrong.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 7, after the word “respectively,” to insert the words “with the exception of the owners’ consolidated rate.”—(Mr. Hunter.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted in the proposed Amendment.”

(12.27.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The proposal of the hon. Member is one which would have a serious effect upon the principle of the clause. The proposition is to take away the discretion of the Local Bodies to determine what rates shall be relieved. The County Councils are elected, every one of them by a popular vote, and, of course, as the occupying ratepayers form a large majority of the electorate, they will have it in their power to prevent any abuse. I think it would be objectionable that we should attempt to dictate to the County Councils as to the mode in which the money should be expended, and I am surprised that there should be an attempt to interpose an anticipatory Instruction in regard to restricting the action of the County Councils. I may also point out that the road expenditure in counties is by far the largest. It amounts to something like £225,000, as against £280,000, and if the County Councils should feel inclined to relieve the counties of some portion of the road expenditure I do not see why they should be prohibited from doing so. That, however, is a matter for the consideration of those who are responsible to the ratepayers. There is, however, another aspect of the question. Take the case of the burghs. In the burghs the greatest part of the rates fall on the occupiers alone. With what justice, if you refuse money for the relief of the owners of property, can you apply it to the relief of the occupiers? For myself I do not think it is right that Parliament should discriminate between class and class, where it is anxious to provide relief from the burden of rates. If the burden falls heavily on one set of people, relieve them, and if upon another, relieve them. The Amendment now proposed amounts to an absolute want of confidence in the Local Administrators, and is positively unjust.

*(12.30.) Mr. ESSELMONT (Aberdeen, E.): The argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman would have been conclusive if he had started from fair premises, but he seems to have forgotten that the County Rate has been consolidated upon the land as a matter of bargain. [Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON expressed dissent.] The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but he must remember that last year the fight was that the landlord should not be relieved from the burden which he had contracted with the leaseholder—in many cases for 19 years—to divide the rate between the landlord and tenant. In order to equalise the rates they have been taken on an average of 10 years, and a specific sum fixed as the sum which the landlord ought to pay. In the event of any increase of rate it is to be divided, and so also in the case of a reduction of rate it ought to be paid equally to the relief of the landlord and the tenant. The right hon. and learned Gentleman says that the County Councils are popularly elected. He ought to know that that is not so. A certain portion of them may be, but another portion is returned by the Parochial Boards, and is not popularly elected. In the burghs most of the rates are imposed entirely upon the occupiers, but in the burghs there is popular representation, and the popular opinion can be brought to bear very differently from the way in which it can be brought to bear in the case of the County Councils. If the right hon. Gentleman had allowed us to deal with the rates in the way we pressed upon him last year he might have something to say, but the sixpence on whisky comes chiefly from the poorer classes, and all we ask is that it shall not be devoted solely to the relief of the landlords. In my opinion, the opposition to this Amendment is only a further manifestation of the policy of the legislation which the Government have sought to carry out in this Parliament, namely, to secure the advantage of the landlords, the publicans, or the clergy. I had hoped that this concession would have been made. It is a fair and reasonable concession, and it would have induced the people to believe that the Government were prompted by a desire to make an equitable distribution of the money. I trust that the matter will be carried to a Division, in order that, at any rate, the Scotch Members may be able to enter one more protest against the policy of the Government.

(12.35.) Mr. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): The right hon. Gentleman seems to forget that up to the passing of the Local Government Act the county rates in Scotland were payable by the landlords alone, and for the last 10 years those rates were higher than they will be now. Landlords have purchased property on the footing that the old county rates were a burden on the land. Is it now proposed to give the landlords a subsidy for the rates which were taken into account when the property was purchased? That is the point which we have now to determine. If we are going to give a subsidy on account of local rates, can we expect the County Councils to expend money on sanitary and other improvements? The only object of this Amendment is to secure that the County Councils shall not have the power of giving relief from a stereotyped rate. It would have been much better to take the Parochial Board Rate and to have made it payable one-half by the landlord and one-half by the tenant. In that case every ratepayer would get a benefit, and the question would not have arisen of devoting money towards the relief of a rate which has been stereotyped. As the landlord's property has all been purchased on the condition of the rates being a burden upon it, what you are proposing to do now is to give a subsidy that will go directly into the pockets of the landlords.

(12.40.) MR. A. ELLIOT (Roxburgh): As I read the Amendment it is quite clear that the money is to be distributed by the County Councils and the Town Councils. My hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Esslemont) has said that the County Councils are not Popular Representative Bodies.

*MR. ESSLEMONT: What I said was that the District Councils will, to a large extent, influence the distribution of taxation in their districts, and that they are not Popular Representative Bodies.

MR. A. ELLIOT: My point is that the question of the authority by whom the money is to be distributed will rest very much with those who elect the County Councils.

(12.41.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The hon. Member for Roxburgh (Mr. Elliot) is perfectly correct.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I am afraid it will be difficult to know what to do with the money, and, therefore, that the proposal of the Government will only throw an apple of discord into the County Councils, to be scrambled for in the most undignified manner. In the Irish case the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to give the whole of the money to education, but in the case of Scotland he refuses to do so in the most dogged manner.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! We are not now discussing the case of Ireland.

(12.44.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I do not think that the District Boards will have anything whatever to do with the distribution of the money, and, therefore, the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for East Aberdeen (Mr. Esslemont) as to the composition of the County Councils do not really bear upon the question of who will have the distribution of the money.

*MR. ESSLEMONT: I adhere most distinctly to my statement.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That has nothing to do with the question now under discussion.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: My hon. Friend below the Gangway (Mr. Hunter) brought forward a much more serious question, which the Government have not answered. It is a curious thing that in most of our discussions the Lord Advocate always avoids the most serious point. In the Debate upon free education the right hon. Gentleman made a long speech, but he skilfully avoided the Sixth Standard, which was the gist of the whole question. Upon this question the gist is the permanent burden upon the land; and if you allow the County Councils to relieve the landlords of that permanent burden, you will simply allow them to relieve themselves. The Government have given no answer whatever to that point, but it is one upon which I think every Scotch Member has a right to demand what the opinion of the Government is.

(12.46.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I do not intend to enter into a general justification of my conduct. I leave that to the judgment of the House. With regard to this Amendment, all I have to say is that, if it is intended to afford relief at all, it is impossible to justify the entire exclusion of the landlords from that relief.

(12.47.) MR. HUNTER: My contention is that there can be no justification for the allotment of money solely for the purpose of reducing the charges upon property.

Ayes 44; Noes 118.—(Div. List, No. 213.)

Question put.

"That the words '(b.) and subject, as aforesaid, among the County Councils of counties and Town Councils of burghs, and Police Commissioners of police burghs, in Scotland, in proportion to the respective valuations of such counties and burghs and police burghs as such valuations shall be ascertained by the Secretary for Scotland at the date of such distribution, the share falling to such Councils and Commissioners respectively to be applied to the relief of local rates levied by them respectively, in such manner as they may determine,' be added after the word 'Scotland,' in line 28."—
(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Ayes 122; Noes 51.—(Div. List, No. 214.)

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

(1.11.) SIR G. TREVELYAN: Before the clause is ordered to stand part of the Bill, I wish to say a few words. What has hitherto been done in respect to this clause has been to treat the Representatives of the Scottish people, who know their own minds thoroughly, especially on the questions of finance and education, as if they were in leading strings. The numbers voting in an important Division were 42 against the Government proposals, and 14 in their favour. I do not stop now to analyse the minority, but everybody knows that when the Government take up a certain line, the number of Members who support the Government do not actually represent the amount of public feeling in Scotland on their side, a fact which, I may say, is common to both Liberal and Conservative administrations. Still, when 42 Scotch Members vote on one side against the Government, and 14 on the other in their favour, I think there can hardly be a doubt as to which side represents the public opinion in Scotland. I must say that I regard the action of the Government on this question as most irritating, and, in some respects, almost as an unmannerly insult on Scottish feeling. I should like to know what would have been the case if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had treated Ireland in the same way. Let us look at the aspect of the House in reference to this measure. Here are most important clauses relating to Ireland, as to which Irish public opinion has been consulted, and the consequence is that there are only some three or four Irish Members present who may rise to endorse what is virtually an agreement made across the House between the Government and the Irish Members. How different is the position occupied by Scotland. We have a certain sum of money allotted towards free education, and every Scottish Member knows that free education will, thereby, be left in a most unfortunate position, and that every disadvantage which is said by its opponents to attach to free education is left there. The people are to have their fees paid for them instead of paying them themselves, and if this can have any effect on the individual character of the parents that effect is produced under the present system. But the Government propose to limit free education to a point exactly below that at which free education would encourage the parents to keep their children at school. This is the point the Scotch Members have all along been urging, and to this point, up to the present moment, we have had no adequate answer, and, indeed, hardly any answer at all. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the sort of House of Commons answer that he made on this subject, said we put but little trust in Scottish parents if we thought they would be deterred from continuing their children's education by not getting relief from the fees. The right hon Gentleman has been referred to as one who is interested in this education question, and, therefore, he must know that practical educationalists have always protested, both in their speeches in this House and in the Reports they have made to Parliament, against raising the fees as the children approach the upper standards. But this is not all. After having refused to do what the Scotch Members desire, the Government have insisted on inserting in the Bill words as to which there is absolutely no adequate explanation from a Scotch point of view. The Lord Advocate has told us that this money, in the case of the Scotch School Boards, may directly or indirectly be used for paying the fees in the higher standards, and yet it is insisted that in the Bill, which is understood to permit this action, certain words limiting the grant to the compulsory standards under the Scotch Code shall be retained. Why, I ask, should words be inserted in the Bill which can have no statutory or binding power? The only explanation that can possibly be given is that they are inserted to carry out an expression used by the Prime Minister, because the question is one involving considerations that will have a bearing on the English question. Scotland complains, first, that she is deprived of what she regards as a real benefit; and, secondly, that words have been put into this Bill which add to a very genuine injury something like sheer mockery, in order that the minds of the English Members who object to compulsory education, and wish to limit it as much as possible, may be put at rest. I am very sorry that the Government, having made concessions in this Bill which, whatever else they may have done, have greatly facilitated the business of this Session, should have made a stand only in the case of Scotland, and in order that they might not make what I described in the first speech I made on this question as a most gracious concession, which would have been received with gratitude, they have taken a course by which I feel that the genuine interests of Scotland have been sacrificed.

(1.17.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I should like to ask, if I am in order in so doing, whether the Government can give us any explanation of the inconsistency by which, while adhering to their proposals in this clause, they intend by the next to devote the whole of the Irish grant to educational purposes, and a portion of that grant to intermediate education. It seems to me an astounding inconsistency; and, worms as we poor Scotch Members are, we are bound to turn against this unequal treatment.

*(1.18.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): In reply to the hon. Member opposite I would point out that the inconsistency he speaks of is not at all astounding. In Ireland large contributions have already been made to the rates, but in Scotland no contribution whatever has been made before to the rates, and, as a matter of fact, Scotland gets more out of the money for education than any other part of the United Kingdom.

(1.19.) MR. CALDWELL: I think an important point to place before the Committee is the way in which under this clause the policy of the Unionist Government is exhibited. Hitherto the policy of the Government has been to treat the different parts of the United Kingdom with equal justice in the bestowal of grants from the Imperial Fund. It has been left to the Chancellor of a Unionist Government to divide the Kingdom into three separate nationalities, and to start separate accounts for each under the head of Imperial grants—

THE CHAIRMAN: I would remind the hon. Member that we are now discussing the question whether Clause 2 shall stand part of the Bill.

MR. CALDWELL: I bow, Sir, to your ruling; but I was anxious to point out that what has been allocated to Scotland is Scotland's share of the Imperial Fund, and I wish to argue that it is only right that the money should be distributed according to Scottish opinion. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer says that the Scottish Members do not represent Scottish opinion, and that a question which concerns Scotland alone ought not to be determined by the votes of Scottish Members, I think we may reasonably ask the Government to provide some other constitutional machinery whereby the voice of Scotland may be really ascertained.

(1.21.) MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I should not have risen to continue this discussion but for the challenge yesterday thrown out by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the Scottish Members, and the manner in which he, to a certain extent, hit myself more particularly than the rest of my Colleagues. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has said that we on this side do not fairly represent the feeling of the Scotch working classes in this matter, but it seemed to me that in the course of the encounter which took place between the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), the former right hon. Gentleman did not show himself particularly well acquainted with the educational condition even of the English working classes, more particularly in the county in which he himself resides. The Chancellor of the Exchequer referred to his own experience in relation to a constituency in the Scottish Metropolis, and adverted to an occasion on which he advocated principles antagonistic to free education, and said that he then and there obtained proofs of the confidence of that Scotch constituency in the opinions he professed. I may tell the right hon. Gentleman that I also have some acquaintance with that constituency, and that it is of a much more recent date than that of the right hon. Gentleman. Whether he was deceived by the post hoc or the propter hoc, or by some syllogism or other "ism" I do not know; but I can confidently say, as many of my Colleagues have said on behalf of the Scotch constituencies they represent, that in that particular constituency there is, among the working classes, a strong feeling antagonistic to the proposal now before this Committee. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer doubts what I say I will make him this offer. Let him come down to Edinburgh to discuss this matter, and we will promise him a fair field, and no favour; not only will he have the advantage of his great controversial ability, but he shall also have the leading speech and reply, and I will undertake to say that, even with these advantages, he will not find that the constituency he has mentioned as supporting his views on a former occasion will support them now. Should it turn out otherwise, I will undertake to go into sackcloth and ashes, or to perform any other humiliation which the Chancellor of the Exchequer may demand, and which may happen to be within my power. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer also told us that it was unfair to Scottish parents to say that if you remit the fees for more than the compulsory standards you do not rely upon their sense of duty. My reply to that is, that if that is an objection to this measure, it is an objection to compulsory education altogether, because every compulsory scheme must necessarily rely on the parents' sense of duty. The great object of the present educational system is that there should be a universal diffusion of knowledge throughout the community up to a certain standard, and for that purpose it is necessary that compulsion should be exercised on that class of parents who are not sufficiently moved by a parental sense of duty. I say that if we are not satisfied that the standard of education is sufficiently high we are bound to take such measures as may secure, as far as possible, that parents who are not moved by the sense of duty, shall, by some other means, be induced to carry on the education of their children to the necessary limits. We are asked why are we to free or emancipate parents from their duty. Sir, I do not regard the proposal for free education which we now make as any attempt to free parents from their duty. I regard it rather as an assistance to parents in the performance of their duty—as an inducement offered to them to keep their children at school after they have passed the compulsory stage in order that the standard of education may be raised as far as possible throughout the community. I would ask leave to say, further, that it is of the utmost importance to the object the State has in maintaining this system of national compulsory education, that the Sixth Standard should be made a free standard. I say that at the age when compulsion stops you lose what is the crown of the whole system you have been persevering with in the previous standards if you stop at that limit. I maintain that if the Sixth Standard is not made, as far as possible, universal, you, to a large extent, lose all the advantages derivable from the education given in the previous standards.

THE CHAIRMAN: Surely the hon. Member is travelling beyond the scope of the clause, because this clause does not describe what should be compulsory with reference to the standards.

MR. WALLACE: Of course, I shall not persist in an argument which you consider to be out of order, and, therefore, I will proceed no further with this point. The Bill, however, provides that money is to be given to free those standards which are at present compulsory. I do not know whether I should be in order in alluding to another part of the clause which gives money for purposes which are challenged in Committee on the ground that the money would be more advantageously devoted to other objects.

THE CHAIRMAN: I understand the hon. Member to be raising the question that the Sixth Standard ought to be made compulsory, more, even, than the other five standards. It does not matter whether there are five, six, or a dozen standards.

MR. WALLACE: I make no proposal to render the Sixth Standard compulsory, but I say that in this clause you are simply throwing obstacles in the way of the attainment of that which is the object in having the five compulsory standards. I was about to say that it is extremely desirable, from an educational point of view, to keep children in the Sixth Standard, even after the compulsory stage had been passed, and that this clause, because it throws itself in the way of the attainment of that object, is a most objectionable one. The five compulsory standards only give the key to knowledge, and do not give any experience of knowledge, or any pleasure, or any of the good temptation which arises out of that knowledge. If you merely give a person a key with no conception of what he is to find in the place the key fits, you have given him a useless instrument, because he has no temptation or stimulus to make use of it. I maintain, therefore, that it is a great calamity and disappointment to Scotland that the inducement that might have been offered to parents, through a better version of this clause, to keep their children longer at school than the compulsory stage, has not been held out. The only redeeming consideration I find in it, is that it will prove—and that not very long ahead—a greater disappointment, and a greater calamity to the Party who have so perversely refused the object on which the national will and aspirations were set. We have been told that the ratepayers ought to come into some benefit from this money. I maintain that the greatest benefit that the ratepayers could receive from the expenditure of this national money would be the elevation of the general standard of public education throughout the country. The Government told us that, as this money was derived from drink, the best use to make of it was, by its means, to diminish the consumption of drink—and then they went on to apply it—or propose to apply it—in the very unwise way of endowing public houses. In that application of the money they have been, politically speaking, disappointed. Why, then, did they not adopt the next best method of meeting the influence of drink, namely, by advancing education? I hold that to perfect the spiritual nature of man is the next best antidote—I would say the best, better than the endowment of public houses. I do not think that in that I am advancing an untenable proposition. And now I would renew my protest against what I will call the political fraud contained in this clause; that is to say, the attempt to declare that the money is given exclusively for the freeing of the compulsory standards, in the face of the promise given to us that "Behind the back of Parliament and the Statute it will be all right!" When I am compelled to sit here and see that sort of thing done, I feel almost that I am not in the best sort of company. It looks to me almost as if I were present at the concoction of a prospectus that may, by-and-by, require the attention of the Directors' Liability Bill. I say I will not be, even indirectly, concerned in putting forward a delusion of this sort to the public. It may be very clever, but I say that Artful Dodgerism in a political or any other character does not commend itself to my plain and unsophisticated understanding. I do not like old Fagan in any capacity, and I hope that, at the last moment, more straightforward counsels will recommend themselves to the Government.

(1.42.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): Before we pass from this clause, I think we ought to consider what it is, and what the Government and the House of Commons have been doing with it for the last three days. This clause is the 2nd clause of the Bill, or the first clause which is to dispose of the extra taxation raised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the satisfaction of the wishes of the various sections of the United Kingdom. We know what happened to the 1st clause of the Bill. It has gone to pieces. The 2nd clause is for the satisfaction of the people of Scotland, and we have had an opportunity in the House of Commons, in the last three days, of ascertaining exactly how far this clause satisfies the people of Scotland. We know that on the other side of the House no very high value is given to the opinions of the Representatives of the various parts of the United Kingdom. We have seen that with regard to Ireland, and we know how the opinion of her Representatives is treated with disdain, and even with hostility, but I think that until this week that principle has not yet been openly avowed, and practically acted upon, with reference to Scotland and its Representatives. But I will ask the Committee to consider what is the course and what is the conduct of the Government with reference to Scotland and its Representatives? Now, mark this; the question is the disposal of taxes raised upon what is, undoubtedly, one of the principal industries of Scotland, and we would have supposed that the disposal of the money would have been governed in some degree, at all events, by the opinion of the Representatives of Scotland. What are the facts? Scotland has 72 Representatives in this House, and, taking the Division on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Perth, who proposed to eliminate from Clause 2 the compulsory standards, as a test Division, the result of an analysis which I have made of the Division List shows that out of the 73 Scotch votes the Government are only supported by 12 Members. That is a matter which will be considered and remembered in Scotland. Now, let me go a little further in this analysis. Tories are not a numerous body in Scotland, but they have contributed seven votes, two of the number being votes of Members for Universities. Universities in Scotland, I fancy, like Universities in England, by their Representatives, are not friends of popular education or of free education. Out of those seven votes I find that three are those of Members sitting on the Tory Treasury Bench—one of whom represents the populous constituency of the Island of Bute—a fourth is that of a Member representing a University, and out of what I may call the independent votes for Scotland in this House three Tory Members have voted in support of the Government. Then there is another vote in Scotland, which we regard with considerable interest—in fact, its future state is the subject constantly of our pious commiseration. As far as I know, the gentlemen who call themselves Liberal Unionists number 16 amongst the Scottish Members. Out of these 16 how many have given their support to the Government on the present occasion? Just five. Of course, there was the Member for St. Andrews, and the Member for Roxburgh, who supported the Government by his vote and voice, and always exhibits the ardour and courage which characterises the sincere ally; then there were the two Members for Ayrshire and the Member for Forfar. I have spoken of the Tories who supported the Government, but where were the Tory absentees? There were several of them. Where were the two Members for Renfrewshire; where was the hon. Baronet the Member for Renfrew, the hon. Member for Dumbartonshire, the hon. Baronet the Member for one of the Divisions of Perthshire, and the latest acquisition, the victor of the Ayrshire Burghs, whom I see opposite?

*Mr. SOMERVELL (Ayr, &c.): My absence was owing to my being obliged to attend an important meeting in Scotland. I was detained until the moment I entered the House, and I voted in the subsequent Divisions.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I beg the hon. Member's pardon. I noted his absence, but did not know the cause of it. The Government got the votes of 12 out of the 72 Members. On the other hand, what had the Government against them in relation to the measure? I venture to say that they had the overwhelming voice of the people of Scotland in opposition to them. Forty-four Scotch votes were recorded against them, as compared with 12 in their favour. With regard to the Scotch Unionist Members, their votes were distributed with almost absolute impartiality, because five voted with the Government, five against the Government, and the other six wisely abstained from voting at all. The hon. Member for the Ayr Burghs has accounted for his absence. Of course, I cannot tell the causes of the absence of the others, but I observe that the hon. Member recently elected for the Partick Division did not vote. It is worth while to consider how Scotland has been dealt with by the Government on this occasion. All the Representatives of the great and populous centres in Scotland have voted against this measure. All the Members for Edinburgh, nearly all the Members for Glasgow, the Members for Aberdeen, Dundee, Dumfries, Greenock, Inverness Burghs, Leith, Paisley, Perth, Montrose, Stirling, and Hawick, have voted against you. What is there in your favour? You have the Member for St. Andrews and the Member for Central Glasgow. They are the only burgh Representatives who have voted with you. Of course you have the support of the Representatives of the Universities. Let us look at the counties. You have against you the Representatives of Aberdeenshire, Banff, Berwickshire, Caithness, Edinburgh, Elgin, Fife, Haddington, Inverness, Lanarkshire, Linlithgow, Perth, Ross, Stirling, and Sutherland. Such is the voice of the counties, and still you persist in the measure. You say you do it because of some great principle which is involved in the matter. The principle is laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Lord Advocate avoided the principle; he said a good deal about the practice, and very little about the principle. The principle is we will pay for the compulsory standards, but not for the voluntary standards. The Scotch Members have maintained that they attach even greater importance to the payment of the voluntary standards than to that of the compulsory standards. The matter has been ably argued by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) and others. It has been shown that your conception of excluding the voluntary standards depended upon the notion of a distinction of classes which is detested and repudiated by public opinion in Scotland, and, therefore, your principle is one which is repugnant to the mind of the majority of the people of Scotland. Your principle is a bad one, but there is something to be said for people who, having a principle, good or bad, carry it out. We had great difficulty in getting at exactly what was going to be done with this money. The Lord Advocate endeavoured to explain the matter over and over again, but the more he explained it the less we understood it. We said, "Your disposal of the money last year and your legislation were inconsistent with the great principle of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because you did not put in words to exclude the voluntary standards, and you did, in fact, give money which went, as I understand, to the payment for voluntary standards," and we asked why you departed from that. If the Lord Advocate had said, "Oh, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has got a great principle, and, therefore, I must depart from the practice of last year," I could have understood it, but the Lord Advocate was too prudent for that; he is much too canny to say that. He said, "Oh, no; consistently with the great principle of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that money is not to go to the voluntary standards, but, if you will only trust me, the voluntary standards shall get it." You are not to give Imperial money to the voluntary standards, but you are to give Imperial money in such a way that the voluntary standards may get it. What is to become of the money in the case of schools where already grants are sufficient to deal with the compulsory standards? The Lord Advocate says it will go to the ratepayers; but supposing the ratepayers use the money for paying the voluntary standards, the great principle of the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be upset. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is like a man who says to a small boy, "No power on earth would induce me to give you a penny to buy a tart with, because tarts are very bad things for small boys, but if you only spend a penny of your own upon a tart, I will take care to give you a penny." Now, what a piece of management is this. The Government have money to dispose of for the benefit of the people of Scotland. They have disposed of it in a manner which has almost given as much dissatisfaction to the people as if, instead of giving the money, they had taken it away. I do not know whether we are to be told that we have been obstructing this measure. [An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!] There is an hon. Member ready to say that. I observe that this morning the whole Unionist Press is in full cry against the Scotch Members, charging them with obstruction. Have you Unionist Gentlemen opposite any conception of what Scotch Representatives are here for? Irish Members are here to be voted down, to be defamed, and to be insulted. This was shown during the first 10 days of the present Session. Are the Government going to apply the same doctrine to Scotch Members? If you choose to raise against the Scotch Members the cry of obstruction, there is another cry that will be raised in answer, and that is the cry of Home Rule. Is it not monstrous to say that when the Government come forward with proposals which the people of Scotland think not to be a boon, but injurious to them, their Representatives in Parliament are not to be at liberty to argue against such proposals, to resist them, and to endeavour to amend them? What a conception is that of the union of the United Empire!

See what you did when you had to deal with a very much inferior question—question of the police. The Scotch people think a great deal more about their education than they do about police superannuation, but when you had to deal with the police, you appointed a Committee, which consisted exclusively of Scotchmen, a very remarkable and useful precedent. But what would have become of this clause if they had referred it to a Committee consisting exclusively of Scotch Members? Why have they not done so? The First Lord of the Treasury has let the cat out of the bag. It is because they mean to make the question of Scottish education subordinate and subservient to their views on English education. That will not commend itself particularly to the Scottish people, who have their own views and their own interests in the matter of education. There is one thing in which Scotland is fortunate and distinguished—that that bitter spirit of denominationism which has been so injurious to the cause of education in England, has had comparatively little influence in Scotland. And the Government have chosen, in dealing with this question, to subordinate the interests of Scottish education to the denominationist prejudices which exist in England. That is the secret of the manner in which they have dealt with this clause. These things will be thoroughly appreciated and understood in Scotland. It is said we should not look a gift horse in the mouth. But this is so bad a horse that we are obliged to look it in the mouth, and the more we look it in the mouth, the more we think the gift horse will not be worth its keep. I cannot understand on what principles the Government go in dealing with different sections of the community. They profess to bring in remedial measures for Ireland, but they will not consult Irishmen. You profess to bring in remedial legislation for Scotland and Wales, but you will not consult Scotchmen or Welshmen. Of course, you have got the Liberal Unionists. The Scotch Liberal Unionists are represented by their organiser the Member for St. Andrews, and the English Unionists are led by the noble Lord who is now the Member for Hampshire (Viscount Wolmer), but who is a candidate for one of the Divisions of the City of Edinburgh. [Mr. A. ELLIOT:

Sir W. Harcourt

Hear, hear!] The hon. Member for Roxburgh (Mr. A. Elliot) applauds that. But I commend the Action of the Liberal Unionists in this matter to the consideration of the electors of Edinburgh, whose representatives have unanimously voted against the Bill. The Government have against the repentance, and I hope that, still place for stage, the very necessary on the Report these three days' Debate education of the to make this 2nd will enable them to the acceptance clause a gift more worth of the people of Scotland.

(2.15.) Mr. A. ELLIOT: As a Scotch Member, I wish to say a few words on the clause, and on the somewhat extraordinary oration to which we have just listened. My right hon. Friend (Sir Henry Harcourt) seems a good deal more anxious to study the Division Lists than to study the Scottish proposals. I do not know for what purpose the right hon. Gentleman supposes the Scottish Members are here, but it is certainly not to run round the flaunting flag that the right hon. Gentleman so assiduously waved before us. I will not follow the right hon. Gentlemen in his analysis of the Division List beyond saying this—that the right hon. Gentleman hardly seems to be acquainted even with the names of the Scottish Members whose votes he criticises. He has discussed the vote of the Member for Hawick, and it is evident that he has failed to distinguish between two very different Gentlemen—Mr. A. H. Brown and Mr. A. L. Brown. The right hon. Gentleman has been equally at fault in his references to the hon. Member for Partick, and in assuming that because that hon. Gentleman was absent from the Division he was unwilling to support the clause. If the right hon. Gentleman does not know, he might have left that to the hon. Member alone. A similar argument may be founded upon the absence from the Division of the Member for Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair), who takes a good deal of interest in Scottish education.

SIR W. HARCOURT: He did vote. You are mistaken.

Mr. A. ELLIOT: The right hon. Gentleman assured me himself that he did not vote. I am talking about the late Division last night, and he assured me that he did not vote, because he was not aware that the subject was likely to be discussed at such extreme length.

SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman's name is here.

MR. A. ELLIOT: The right hon. Gentleman and I are thinking of different Divisions, and I may just as well count the Member for Leeds on my side if the right hon. Gentleman is to count the Member for Partick among the opponents of the clause. I wish to allude to something else, namely, the action of my right hon. Friend the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman). The right hon. Gentleman is a Scotsman, and he discusses this question occasionally with some regard to its merits. I was pleased to hear my right hon. Friend sever himself from the line taken by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce). The hon. Gentleman has practically led the House on this Scottish question. He moved the main Amendment, yet he distinctly separated himself from his right hon. Colleague, and refused to follow him into the Lobby.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I do not know what this has to do with the question before the House; but my action in the matter was perfectly intelligible. As I have explained to the House, I am entirely opposed to the proposal of the Government; but while I sympathised with the alternative proposal of my hon. Friend (Mr. Bryce) I was not able to support it.

MR. A. ELLIOT: After asking his hon. Friend not to go to a Division, because if he did he could not support him, the right hon. Gentleman when the Division was taken did support the hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce.)

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Perhaps I may be allowed to explain. The Division to which my hon. and learned Friend is now referring is not the Division to which my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby referred.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. A. ELLIOT: If the two Gentlemen concerned are well satisfied with their joint action last night, I only wonder at their admirable good temper and conciliatory disposition. With regard to Scottish opinion, I do not think that in Scotland, on a Scottish matter, the opinions of the Member for South Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) joined with those of the Members for East and West Fife (Mr. Asquith and Mr. Birrell) and one or more of the Members for Lanarkshire will carry great weight. These Gentlemen are very able, excellent, and admirable, but they are not acquainted with Scotch affairs. They are not Scotsmen—not even nearly so much as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton (Sir George Trevelyan). If Scottish Members have any merits at all, they are able to look after their own affairs, and they do not require any Englishman to take up the cudgels on their behalf. Surely it is not an "insult" and an "injury" to give the Scotch people £40,000 to aid in establishing free education. The distribution of the money, I contend, ought to be general, which it will not be if it is bestowed only on some central places for the advancement of higher education. In that case the rural population—the farmer, the blacksmith, the joiner, and the rest—will derive no direct benefit, whereas under the Bill every one of these individuals obtains some recognition. When the matter comes to the test of a Division I do not think certain right hon. Gentlemen will have the courage of their brave words. With regard to the suggestion that the matter should be determined by the preponderance of Scottish votes, will right hon. and hon. Gentlemen be willing to submit all questions relating to England to the English majority, in which the Conservative Party largely prevails? That is the test. I hope we shall have a Division on this clause. It may be that the results will be so strange that the Division List will afford further opportunity to my right hon. Friend (Sir W. Harcourt) to study the causes for which hon. Members absented themselves.

(2.28.) MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries): My hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Elliot) is not really a free agent, and for that reason we ought to make some allowance for him, because he knows that unless he succeeds in making himself agreeable to the Conservative Party in Roxburgh, he may spare himself the trouble of presenting himself there for re-election. That is the reason the Liberal Unionists are so obstinate, unconciliatory, and violent in their language against their old friends. My hon. and learned Friend is wise in not following up the analysis of the Division

Lists, because it will be found that throughout Scottish opinion has been over-ruled by the Government and their supporters. My hon. Friend has referred to the fact that some Scotch Members are not Scotchmen, and that some hon. Members represent a country with which they are not well-acquainted. Neither remark affects me, but would there be anything more parochial, contemptible, and narrow than for our countrymen to confine themselves simply to such talent as they may chance to find in their own part of the country, or to confine themselves wholly to Scotch Representatives. Many of our countrymen represent English constituencies. I once represented an English constituency myself, and this I will say, that I never found an Englishman in the whole of that constituency so shabby as to make it a matter of reproach that I came from the wrong side of the Tweed. In regard to my right hon. Friend the Member for South Edinburgh, and my hon. Friends the Members for East Fife and West Fife, I do not believe three more honourable representatives or more able men have been sent by any Scotch constituencies to this House. The hon. Member also says that, to be consistent, we should settle English affairs by English votes. Well, has that not been the practice absolutely? I think you will find I am right. I do not believe it will be possible to find a Bill relating purely to England on which the wishes of English Members were overborne by the introduction of Scotch and Irish votes. ["The Burials Bill."] No, I think the noble Lord is wrong, not even the Burials Bill.

MR. A. ELLIOT: Of course, the majority keeps the Government in Office, and that, surely, covers the legislation for England.

MR. R. T. REID: I do not think it does. It is true that in all Imperial affairs Scotch and Irish Members have taken their fair share, as I hope they always will; therefore, as an Imperial Government which is dependent on the whole House, it necessarily follows that the Government must be retained in office by the majority of the Members of the United Kingdom, but I do not believe that an Imperial majority has ever been used to thrust upon England any measure which the majority of English Members were opposed to. I do not believe any instance of the kind can be found. It is unfortunate, and I think hon. Gentlemen on the other side will, in their hearts, think it is unfortunate, that the practice of constantly superseding Scotch opinion by the majority of the House composed of English Members should have grown so much as in the last three or four years it has. I am sure it has been the practice in past times to consider and defer to Scotch opinion in matters of this kind. In this particular we were happily different from Ireland; as regards Ireland it was not the practice. It is this Conservative Government that has fallen into this unhappy unstatesmanlike course, of which this is the last and most signal instance, and if no other good arises from our protest, I hope, at all events, it may have the effect of calling attention to, if it does not check a continuance of, this disastrous and, as I think, most unstatesmanlike policy.

(236.) MR. HUNTER: The hon. and learned Member for Roxburgh rather despises our courage, and, by implication, admires his own, and challenges us to go to a Division on Clause 2. Well, whatever may be the state of our courage, we are not wholly destitute of common sense. What does Clause 2 effect? It effects the distribution of £140,000 to be devoted to Scotch purposes. In Scotland we would rather that this money should go to Scotland for any purpose, however bad, however objectionable, than that it should be lost to us. The money is not a gift. There was one part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby with which I disagreed; he spoke of this as a gift; it is no gift. For every 3s. 3d. given, you take 5s. out of our pockets. We are losers, even at the best, and we shall not be guilty of any such folly as the hon. Member for Roxburgh suggests in endeavouring to delete the clause. Now, the hon. and learned Gentleman talked very loudly about giving something to the ratepayers, but in the several speeches he has addressed to the Committee he has never attempted to say what the ratepayers are going to get under this clause. A farthing would be something, a penny would be something, but if a man picks your pocket of 5s. and gratuitously presents you with a penny you would be disposed to agree that would be something uncommonly like an insult. The fact of the matter is that, under the most favourable circumstances, the whole benefit of this may be measured by the value of an ounce of tobacco. That about represents the value the rate-payers of Scotland will get. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has relieved me from the necessity of bringing before the Committee a clear statement of the position in which Scotch Members stand in regard to the Government. But I am delighted with the course of the Debate. I deeply regret that the Government have refused to complete the work of freeing education. I do so, not only because of its effect on the cause of education, but because of its bad effect on School Board finance. We know the inconvenience the Boards have felt from not knowing what money they are to have, and what they will be required to raise. It is a great loss to Scotland that the system of free education is not to be completed. But there are considerations, on the other hand; and, just as many a dark cloud has a silver lining, so there is a brilliant lining to this, in that we have been afforded a good object-lesson in Home Rule for Scotland. Last year, in dealing with Local Government, the Government forced upon Scotland a scheme totally at variance with the wishes of her people, a bad scheme, as bad as could possibly be devised. Having done that last year, they now deal with local finance, a very ticklish question. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has practically admitted this principle in his scheme of subsidies for local rates, that money raised Imperially should be recognised as national property, to be distributed among the three nations from which it was derived; therefore, recognising, as he ought, that this money raised in Scotland is Scottish money, not English money at all, it ought to be spent according to Scottish, and not English, wishes. We considered you foolishly threw away your money last year; but that is your affair; we do not object to that, but we do strongly object that, your Imperial taxation having been raised by methods imposed against the wish of Scotch Representatives, you should proceed to spend the money so raised not on objects which the Scottish people desire, but upon objects which, in a relative sense, they detest. You are leading Scotland up to that point to which a little more than a century ago you brought your American colonies, when you imposed taxes upon them without their assent and against their wishes. What is the difference between imposing on a country taxation without the people's consent, and doing what the Government are now doing, first asking our opinion, and when that has been expressed in the clearest terms setting that opinion entirely aside? A more monstrous abuse of the power of taxation cannot be conceived. If it were raised for Imperial purposes it would be quite another matter. For Imperial purposes, the Imperial majority must decide, but this is not such a case. Having imposed taxation to the extent of 5s. for each family, you deduct from that 1s. 9d. for the benefit of England, and then deal with the residue in a manner totally opposed to the opinion of the people of Scotland. I do not intend to occupy time further, but I do not forget that the Government are not yet out of the wood. We have offered determined resistance, and I rejoice to hear that condemned by the Tory Press of London. If there is one thing to make our view universally popular it is to be attacked by the Cockney Press of London. We shall continue to use all the forms of the House to the fullest extent to prevent this scandalous, this gross, injustice to the people of Scotland. The Government may, if they please, be wise in time. They may resort to the Closure, or any means in their power, but one thing they cannot do—that is, reconcile us to their policy. They have cast their die, and let them go to Scotland with their cry of "Down with free education."

(2.50.) Mr. W. H. SMITH rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put accordingly, and agreed to.

Clause 3.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 3, page 2, line 35, leave out from "the sum of," to "shall," in line 40, and insert "£78,000."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

(252.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I think it would be convenient if the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Chief Secretary were now to offer some explanation as to the working of the scheme so far as it concerns primary education in Ireland. I have, on a former occasion, described it as complicated in character. The Chief Secretary differed, but I think it will be found, on consideration, that the scheme is one upon which the Committee may well ask some further explanation. I may recall the fact that we strongly objected to the increase of Revenue from Ireland as extremely unjust; and, although the original purpose of the taxation has disappeared, the money is to be raised, and I wish to say that we assent to the application of this part of the money in aid of primary education, by way of increasing the salaries of the National teachers. We are not disposed to give countenance to any suggestion made—not in the House, but outside—for the division of any part of the sum to any other use than that of primary education. We regard with satisfaction that a substantial part of the money is to be applied in aid of a class of men whose position is an extremely hard and bitter one, and who need further care on the part of the State. While we are satisfied that the money should be applied in this way, yet we feel that the case of the National teachers will have to be dealt with—not casually, and as by a windfall, but deliberately and permanently, as a matter of ordinary provision. In reference to what was said a while ago by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division, I have to say that this scheme for National teachers has been prepared in the usual Government mode, and without any reference whatever to Irish Members on the subject. I am not aware of the origin of the scheme. I do not know whether it was submitted to, or considered by, anyone in Ireland. I say frankly I do not think it by any means the best scheme that could be devised for the appropriation of the money. I go further, and doubt whether it is a good scheme, and I question very much whether it will work equally between large and small schools, between efficient schools in towns and backward schools in the country, between schools in the contributory and the non-contributory Unions. Though I think it would have been better if Irish Members had been consulted upon the details of primary education in Ireland before the introduction of this provision into the Bill, yet, as the whole of the money is to go in aid of National teachers, and inasmuch as the National teachers, the persons principally interested, have made no adverse representation about the scheme, I do not feel called upon to offer a scheme in substitution, or even a comprehensive Amendment of it, though I think a better scheme might have been framed, and a comprehensive Amendment of this could be supported by very strong arguments. There are one or two points upon which I feel it my duty to offer Amendments, in order to secure a more fair distribution. First I ask, is it intended to include what are called model schools in the scheme? If so, I shall have to protest against and resist it, because, though the amount of money that would be so diverted would be small, not more than £1,000, yet the principle at issue is imperative. These model schools have ceased to satisfy the purposes for which they were brought into existence. Those purposes were two, the training of teachers, and the provision of mixed education in an efficient form. There are now State training colleges, and, therefore, the model schools are no longer required for their original purpose, namely, the training of teachers. Secondly, they cannot be called schools in which mixed education is given, because they are attended almost entirely by children of one creed, and that not the creed of the great mass of the people. I do not believe there are more than 250 Catholic children in all the model schools in Ireland, and in some of them there is not a single Catholic child to be found. I would call attention to the fact that for the education of 7,000 children in these schools, the State pays £30,000 a year at the present time, that is to say, each child costs the State £4 a year, and

I doubt very much if, in all the systems of primary education in the world, you could find a parallel to this. The cost of the institutions approaches a scandal, and I shall resist voting another penny to their support. It is a question how long such a scandal is to continue. If the right hon. Gentleman feels himself called upon to answer me, I shall be glad to know if it is intended that any of the money shall go to the assistance of the model schools, where the teachers stand in a wholly different position to National school teachers. It is clear that the model school teachers are now well paid because there is a sum of £2,000 now paid in fees in those schools, annually paid into the Exchequer. There is every reason for refusing them any contribution from this grant, and, at the proper time, I shall feel it my duty to propose an Amendment excluding them. Then I have to ask, Have the Government considered the effect of this scheme of theirs as bearing upon the system of local contributions from the rates in aid of primary education in Ireland? That system exists to a very inefficient extent. From 160 Unions there are only 12 contribute to the rates. One effect of the scheme will be to put an end entirely to contributions from the rates in aid of primary education. I do not know whether that is desired or contemplated. I take it the contribution under the Bill by subsidies towards primary education will be greater than the aid from local contributions. The effect will be that in every Union where the Guardians pay more from the rates than they get under the Bill they will cease to contribute, and the teachers will be left to the State subventions. I take the case where the Guardians pay less and the result fees are low. Where they pay less from the rates than is payable under the Bill, it is quite obvious that there it will be to the interest of the teachers that the contributions from the Guardians should cease. Of course, the moment it becomes to the interest of the teachers that this should be so, the Guardians will cease to pay; they will respond to the representations of the teachers, who will be placed in a better position. When this Bill passes, then local contributions to the aid of primary education will come to an end. I do not argue whether this is good or bad; I only ask if you intend this to be the effect of the scheme? Great efforts were made to pass the Act of 1875, and the then Chief Secretary (Sir M. Hicks Beach) stated that if the Act failed to operate, then something further would have to be done. It has failed to operate, as is shown by the fact that, of 160 Unions, only 12 are contributory Unions under the Act of 1875. In the Amendment I shall propose to the clause, the principle is affirmed that the whole of this money, £78,000, is intended for education, and should be devoted to that purpose. But in the case of a contributory Union, where the Guardians pay less for education than the grant will reach to in that Union, the deficiency is not to be given to the teachers, but to be added to the Probate Duty Grant. Suppose Guardians pay £300 in aid from the rates, and the amount given under this capitation grant comes to £400, the course under the Bill would be that the Guardians would be paid £300, making good the amount contributed from the rates, and instead of the other £100 being given to the teachers, and placing them upon the level of teachers in non-contributory Unions, the equally unfortunate position is taken up by the Government that they divide this £100 between the Poor Rate and the Grand Jury Cess all over Ireland. Surely that is a most unreasonable determination. The Unions in which the contributions are less than the amount will be under the Bill, are limited in number, and the amount involved will be only a few hundreds or thousands, and you place the teachers in these contributory Unions in a worse condition than teachers in non-contributory Unions. I would suggest that where the present grant of the Guardians is less than the grant under the Bill, the balance should be divided among the schools in the Union in proportion to average attendance, placing teachers there on a level with teachers in non-contributory Unions, making your plan at once more symmetrical and more just. At the proper time I intend to move an Amendment in that sense.

*(3.5.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I have no complaint to make of the spirit animating the hon.

Member's observations, or the particular suggestions he has made. With regard to the suggestion that a better scheme might have been propounded as regards Ireland, I can only say that I gave a good deal of attention to the subject, and consulted those whose advice was at my disposal, and who are intimately acquainted with the whole details of the question, and the result is that, though I am far from saying it is the most perfect method of dealing with a somewhat complicated question, the scheme is the best available at the time, and, at all events, it has this one great merit, that it has given satisfaction, I believe, to the teachers as a whole. The hon. Gentleman has reminded the Committee that for a considerable time the position of Irish National School teachers was matter of dispute between Irish Representatives and the House of Commons at large, and, personally, I am glad to have the opportunity of doing something substantial to improve their position, and it is a gratification to know that what the Government have done has met hardly any—if any—criticism from those chiefly interested, but has, on the contrary, met with their approval. The hon. Gentleman appears to be of opinion that teachers in those Unions which have taken advantage of the Act of 1875 will be placed in a worse position than teachers in those Unions which have not done so.

MR. SEXTON: In those Unions where the contributions from the Guardians are less than the capitation grant under the Bill will amount to.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As I understand, the intention is to divide £78,000 among the Unions in Ireland. In those Unions which do not contribute under the Act of 1875, the money will go to the teachers. In those Unions which do contribute, it will go to the ratepayers.

MR. SEXTON: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman quite appreciates my point. In some contributory Unions the Guardians pay less in aid of education than the teachers would receive under this Bill if the Union were non-contributory: and my suggestion is, that in those Unions the balance remaining, after making good to the Guardians the amount paid, should be appropriated to the teachers, as it would be if the Union were non-contributory.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As illustrating the point of the hon. Gentleman, let me take two Unions, A and B. A has never contributed under the Act of 1875, and will get, say, £1,000, and that goes entirely to the teachers. In B the total amount contributed is £500 only, and in that Union, as I understand the hon. Gentleman, he thinks the £500 not contributed should be a first charge on this £78,000. That is what he thinks ought to be done.

MR. SEXTON: That the balance of the £1,000 should be distributed among the teachers in the Union.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Substantially what is done is that in Union B, as in the other Union, what does not go to the teachers goes to the rates. The hon. Member has raised the question of model schools, but I do not think the teachers of those schools get anything under the Act of 1875. They are, I understand, entirely supported by the Board of Education in Ireland.

MR. SEXTON: There are three classes of model schools, central districts, and Union, and the right hon. Gentleman will find that in all there are payments by results.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Speaking from memory, I do not think it was ever contemplated that the salaries of teachers in these schools would be liable to augmentation under the Act of 1875. The salaries of the teachers are, I believe, paid by the Board of Education in Ireland; and if that is so, and this Bill follows the Act of 1875, the salaries of the teachers of the model schools will not be affected one way or the other by any contribution under the Bill. Though I have not thought out the particular point raised, I am disposed to concur in the general view the hon. Gentleman has expressed in regard to this Local Taxation Bill, and have resisted schemes which, however attractive in themselves, however good, were not connected with the object of devoting this £78,000 to the relief of local burdens in Ireland.

Amendment agreed to.

(3.27.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. SEXTON: Following on my statement, I now beg to move the in-section of the words "excluding model schools," in line 3.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 3, page 3, line 3, after the word "schools" to insert the words "excluding model schools."—(Mr. Sexton.)

(3.28.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am rather disposed to think the words are not necessary, but I admit their principle. I agree that these schools which are supported by the Central Board in Dublin and by fees ought not to benefit by money which is intended to be applied in relief of local taxation. I have, therefore, no objection to the Amendment.

(3.29.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: Is the effect of this to grant public money to the aid of purely denominational schools? Is it so or not?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

MR. SEXTON: These schools are attended almost wholly by children of one particular creed, and the effect of the Amendment is to take such schools out of the distribution of this money.

Amendment agreed to.

Consequential Amendments,—(Mr. Sexton.)—agreed to.

(3.32.) MR. SEXTON: The only other Amendment is this: I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that if in a contributory Union the amount of money paid by the Guardians is less than the amount which would come to that Union under the Bill, the balance of the money will go to the teachers of the Union. In other words, that the teachers in such a Union should not be worse off than if the Union were non-contributory.

(3.33.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am obliged to the hon. Member for calling attention to this matter. I think I made a slight error when I spoke before in Committee. I was under the impression that under the Act of 1875 it was possible for the Union to make a partial and not a full payment. I have referred to the Act, and I find that they must either be wholly contributory or wholly non-contributory. If every Union under the Act of 1875 were to contribute, their contributions would amount to £114,000 or £118,000. The actual amount proposed to be contributed is £78,000. We do not propose under this Bill that the contributions by the State should ever exceed the amount that might be contributed by the Unions under the Act of 1875. As the hon. Member knows, that part of the salaries of the teachers which comes from results fees is divided into three parts. One-third comes absolutely from the Treasury, while the second third is contributed by the Treasury on condition that the third third is contributed by the locality. We propose that the local contributions shall be supplemented out of the £78,000. Supposing the total amount is £300: of that £100 would in any case be given by the Treasury; the second £100 is contingent upon the third third, contributed by the locality. The third third will not be provided wholly in any case from the £78,000. I presume that two-thirds or three-quarters of that third £100 will so be contributed. If the third third thus supplemented should in any case exceed the £100, which is, I think, practically impossible, then it will have to go to the general ratepayer.

(3.38.) MR. SEXTON: It is understood that the money available under this Act will be given in any Union, whether contributory or not, and so far as may be necessary to fill up the local contributions to entitle the Union to the third £100.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): Will the state of the law be exactly the same with regard to school pence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: This clause does not touch the question of free education in Ireland, and we do not propose to deal with the larger question.

MR. SEXTON: I may infer from what the right hon. Gentleman has said that when this Bill becomes an Act the teachers in a contributory Union in Ireland will in no case be in a worse position than if the Union were non-contributory.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is so.

(3.40.) MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): As I understand the Bill, it does not in the slightest way affect the existing regulations with regard to rates. It would be well for parents to know that the teachers get no more under this Bill than they now obtain. It should be further understood that the improvement of the status and position of the teacher is dependent on contingent results, and that it in no way affects the obligations of the parents to pay their children's school fees.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, that is so.

COLONEL NOLAN: Mr. Courtney—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member has spoken. There is no Amendment moved.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 3, page 3, after line 28, to insert—

"(ii.) The residue of such share shall, until Parliament otherwise determines, be paid to the Intermediate Education Board for Ireland, and be distributed and applied by them amongst schools to which the provisions of "The Intermediate Education (Ireland) Act, 1878," apply, for both or either of the purposes following, but for no other purposes, namely:—

(a.) for the payment of prizes and exhibitions, and the giving of certificates to students; and

(b.) for the payment to managers of schools complying with the conditions prescribed under the said Act, of fees dependent on the results of public examinations of students;

according to a scheme to be settled by the said Board with the approval of the Lord Lieutenant and the Treasury."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

(342.) MR. SEXTON: We quite approve of the appropriation of the sum for these purposes. The first is primary education, and the Bill determines that the money shall be applied in that way in any financial year. But in the Amendment just moved, the Chancellor of the Exchequer inserts the words—"until Parliament otherwise determines." Surely every enactment only holds until Parliament otherwise determines. I am entirely at a loss to understand what is in the mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because the governing words of the clause relates to any financial year. I move that the words be omitted, and I would further suggest that the Sub-sections (a) (b) should be reversed, inasmuch as (b) refers to the more urgent and important matter of the two.

Question put, "That these words stand part of the proposed Amendment."

Mr. E. Harrington

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member, I would point out that these words are already in the Scotch and English parts of the Bill. Clearly, we could not leave out of the Irish part of the Bill what is already in the other parts. With regard to the order of the two sub-sections, I believe it will be in the power of the Education Board to apply the money to either or both these purposes, but I rather think the second purpose is the more important of the two, and I have no objection whatever to adopt the suggestion.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: We had an explanation from the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the Scotch part of the Bill that these words, "until Parliament otherwise determines," was to give a flavour of uncertainty. It was a sort of warning that this money could not be taken for some other purpose. I think the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer are entirely applicable to Ireland.

(345.) MR. S. STOREY (Sunderland): I am very glad that this point has been raised a second time by an Irish Member, because I am hopeful that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government may give to the Irish what it would not yield to the English. The only reason which the Chief Secretary gave for retaining the words was that the Bill would be made more symmetrical. But that which is wrong may be symmetrical as well as that which is right. The Chief Secretary is wrong in supposing that these words as applied to Scotland relate to the same thing when applied to Ireland. In regard to Scotland, they relate to the residue which is to be applied to the payment for extinguishing pleuro-pneumonia and the cost of Medical Officers and Sanitary Inspectors. These uses of the money may be, and probably are, temporary in their nature. How does the case stand when you come to Ireland? The proposal is, that this money shall be given for primary and intermediate education; but, so far as intermediate education is concerned, the money shall only be paid so long as Parliament shall determine. Does not the House know that when once money has been granted for either primary or intermediate education there is no chance of Parliament altering its mind for the future? There is no reasonable chance that this money will be temporarily applied to the purpose of intermediate education and, if it is to be permanent, where is the sense of inserting these words? If the law is altered, the words are superfluous; if they are not altered, they are none the less superfluous. The Chief Secretary has often exhibited on that Bench great common sense in his treatment of matters; and I submit to him that, unless he can answer my argument that the use of the money is necessarily to be perpetual, there is no necessity for the insertion of these words, and that he ought to agree to the Amendment of the hon. Member.

(3.48.) COLONEL NOLAN: I would only observe that these words ought to be left out, for this reason: This £78,000 comes out of the tax on Irish industry, so that we are paying large sums into the Exchequer and only getting back £78,000. Now, the Whisky Tax goes on, and this £78,000 may be withdrawn. I think these words should be struck out.

(3.49.) MR. SEXTON: You are dealing with one tax, and, if you withdraw the sum applied to this purpose, you will have the whole of the money, though the Bill says it shall be applied to primary education in any financial year. I say that if you continue the tax, you cannot propose to deal with the £40,000 without opening up the question of the £78,000. I submit that the governing words in any financial year ought to be allowed to apply, without qualification, to both ~~sums~~.

(3.50.) MR. GOSCHEN: The argument of the hon. Member would be perfectly correct if we proposed to deal with the 6d. tax. But a distinction has been drawn not only in the case of Ireland, but will be drawn in the case of England, as regards the money which has been set free by the abandonment of the licences clauses, which money was devoted to the other purposes included in the Bill. The Government desire to keep their hands free as regards the former. I would further point out that it is not absolutely certain that all these purposes will be certain to be met, even if the tax of 6d. is maintained. Therefore, we have introduced the principle of a residue, and to that residue we do not give the same permanent character as to the remainder. It is highly possible and probable that this sum of money will be so well and usefully spent in Ireland that even if it is not continued according to the provisions of this Bill, it might be desired to continue it from another source. Therefore, I do not wish it to be understood that this contribution to intermediate education would necessarily fall through even if the tax were reduced.

(3.53.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): The hon. Gentleman said that the object of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to introduce a flavour of uncertainty. We do not want this flavour of uncertainty.

*MR. GOSCHEN: There is no uncertainty about the £78,000.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I think there is as much damage done by the uncertainty to intermediate education as to primary education. I hope the hon. Gentleman will press his Amendment.

MR. SEXTON: No one has any doubt that the tax of 6d. will yield a sufficient sum, and, therefore, that argument is disposed of. With regard to the £40,000, I would again point out that the omission of the words would not limit the power of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to deal with the money either by the abolition of this grant or by the transfer of the charge to any other tax. If these words are retained they will cause a feeling of uneasiness. I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will not mar the feeling of unanimity which exists on this question, a feeling too seldom experienced on Irish affairs in this House. I would respectfully urge on the Chancellor of the Exchequer and on the Chief Secretary, who has shown some disposition to meet us in this matter, to allow both sums to stand on the same level.

COLONEL NOLAN: I would like to point out that if these words are left in anyone who preached against intemperance would injure intermediate education. You put the Irish people in this absurd predicament: You say, "The more whisky you drink the better education you will get." If the Irish people do not keep on drinking whisky then their intermediate education will fall through.

(3.57.) MR. E. HARRINGTON: I am surprised that the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend. The words proposed to be left in introduce a degree of uncertainty which would have a bad effect. These words will be an indication of uncertainty which will have a moral effect, and I think an unanswerable argument is adduced when it is said that the allocation of this money to intermediate education in Ireland is conditional upon our drinking a certain amount of whisky in Ireland. It is not fair to throw that onerous and important duty upon us; and if the Government persist, in the event of their being a scarcity of funds, we should, of course, have to appeal to the hon. Member for South Tyrone and his friends to assist us in earning the money. We have had no reason given for the words, "Until Parliament otherwise determines." Why, Sir, the Union was agreed to "until Parliament otherwise determines," and that is the case with all fundamental Acts. Do you mean to say with reference to this £40,000 and £78,000 that one sum shall appear in the Appropriation and Continuance Acts and the other shall not? I hold that these words we wish to strike out are words of menace and a warning to intermediate education in Ireland, and that they will damage the very interest that the £40,000 is given to support. I think we have now put this matter very clearly before the Government. If the Government challenge a Division on these words, which they cannot defend, on them must depend the onus of protracting the discussion.

(4.3.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): There seem to me very strong reasons why an element of uncertainty should not be imported into this matter. There is no fact better known in Ireland than that the valuable system of intermediate education which was gradually growing up there has been sadly interfered with through the money grant having decreased from year to year and there having been insufficient funds to enable the schools to be kept in a state of inefficiency. I know an Order of brothers that has been losing large sums of money in the attempt to fit its pupils for intermediate education. I had an Amendment on the Paper with the object of giving the Order some share of this money; but as the Government have devoted it to intermediate education, I did not propose to persevere with the Amendment, or to try and fit it in with the new state of circumstances. I assumed that this would be a definite and permanent contribution. The Christian Brothers have lately had to consider whether it will not be necessary for them to close some of their schools and send some of their members away to the colonies or the Continent. The efficiency of the education they give has been attested by Royal Commission after Royal Commission; their pupils take many prizes, and it would be very regrettable if, through the admission of this element of uncertainty, they should be prevented from carrying on their useful work. If at some future time the Government desire to devote this particular £40,000 to some other purpose, it can be done, I apprehend, by some short Bill.

*(4.6.) MR. GOSCHEN: I would make an appeal to hon. Members opposite to be considerate in this matter. We have largely met their wishes in regard to the application of this money. We insisted on the retention of the words in the case of Scotland, and were supported in that by a majority of the Committee and if we omit the words in the case of Ireland, it will have a special signification and destroy the interpretation we have adopted in the case of Scotland. If the application of the money to intermediate education is found to have a beneficial effect in Ireland, even if it should be necessary to cut off this specific source of supply, it would be the duty of the Government to continue the grant. It is to be remembered that this is not merely an endowment, but an endowment from one particular source; and though it may be found expedient to continue the endowment, it may be right to obtain the money from some other source. It may be found expedient to continue the extra 6d. on whisky, or it may be found insufficient for the purpose. Do hon. Members from Ireland desire that this tax of 6d. on whisky should be permanent?

COLONEL NOLAN: No; but that the money should be permanent.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The question is merely one of the grant of a certain sum of money from a certain source. We are not granting it out of the Consolidated Fund, but from a particular source; and my case is, that the application of the money from that particular source to this specific purpose may be open to doubt, whilst it may not be open to doubt that the purpose should be continued.

(4.10.) MR. SEXTON: The declaration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is very important, and no doubt it goes far to meet the necessities of the case. Of course, we shall be glad to see an excessive and unjust tax lessened, if the useful object for which it is imposed can be otherwise attained. I understand that if this subvention is usefully applied, and if the source is abolished or proved to be insufficient, the Government will see that it is provided from another source. But I would suggest that the object the Government has in view in introducing the words "until Parliament otherwise determines" would be better accomplished by using the word "unless" instead of "until," because "until" appears to imply that Parliament will otherwise determine.

(4.12.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL: It is a dexterous speech we have just heard from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but I am not to be frightened and bought off by this declaration of the right hon. Gentleman as to the continuance of the Whisky Tax, as hon. Members below the Gangway appear to be. There are some of us who would not object if the Whisky Tax were even higher than it is. My objection to the clause is that Parliament is saying to the Board of Intermediate Education, "There is a donation of so much a year, but you are not to count it an annual subscription." The Intermediate Education Board cannot take effective action on such an understanding. If they are not sure of the money they can do nothing. If they go on the hypothesis that the money will be paid, they may get into difficulties. These words have no value whatever from the standpoint of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

(4.14.) MR. SEXTON: The prejudices of the hon. Member entirely blind him in this matter. We have an objection to the Whisky Tax, because we think that Ireland already contributes twice as much as she ought to the Imperial Exchequer, and we also think that if the tax is increased, the money obtained should be applied to some useful purpose.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: My answer to that is that the tax is paid by the consumer, and not by the distiller.

(4.15.) MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I repudiate entirely the suggestion made by the hon. Member for South Tyrone. We do not object to any Irish commodity being made available for taxation for the purpose of education, but what we want to be assured of is that, if this tax is taken off at some future time, it will have no prejudicial effect on intermediate education. The right hon. Gentleman has not given us a positive assurance.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Let there be no misunderstanding on the point. I thought I had expressed myself clearly. I stated what the general policy would be, and I thought I had generally satisfied hon. Members of the fairness of my position, but I gave no positive assurance, nor could such a positive pledge be given. I do trust hon. Members from Ireland will now allow this matter to be brought to a conclusion. I am sure I have endeavoured to meet them as fairly as possible.

(4.16.) MR. J. O'CONNOR: I have no desire to press the right hon. Gentleman unduly in the matter, but there is the point respecting the acceptance of the word "unless," instead of the word "until." If, in the future, this money should fail through any alteration in the incidence of taxation, we would undoubtedly be quite willing that the tax should be increased still further, if necessary, in order to keep the fund for the purposes to which it is to be applied. The question of intermediate education is one that cannot be left in a state of uncertainty in Ireland. The Irish people are an emigrating nation.

Up to the passing of the Intermediate Education Act the Irish emigrants were very badly equipped indeed for the purposes of emigration. Under that Act they have acquired some technical education, which enables them to meet in competition with the emigrants from other countries—such as Italy, and Germany, and France. As the clause stands, it leaves in a state of uncertainty the question whether the money set aside for the purpose of encouraging education will continue to be devoted to that purpose.

(4.18.) MR. SEXTON: I am unwilling to prolong the discussion. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has not denied that the word "until" colours the situation. It points to a time when Parliament will determine in a sense contrary to that now decided on.

*(4.19.) MR. GOSCHEN: I think the hon. Member will feel it is highly probable that if we give way on this small point we shall have to move an Amendment with reference to the clause respecting Scotland. ["No, no!"] Well, then I will agree to substitute "unless" for "until."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, To leave out "until" and insert "unless."—(Mr. Sexton.)

Question, "That the word 'until' stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That 'unless' be there inserted."

(4.20.) MR. STOREY: I frankly say I shall not take the trouble to move other Amendments. We have discussed for a long time, both yesterday and to-day, words that are absolutely useless in any Act of Parliament, and what is the outcome of the situation?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The Amendment now is that the word "unless" be inserted in the clause.

(4.22.) MR. STOREY: I was going to say that the insertion of the word "unless" is entirely unprecedented in the history of Parliament. The clause will provide that this money will be expended in a certain way "unless Parliament otherwise determines." Well,

Mr. J. O'Connor

Sir, every Act of Parliament passed is subject to Parliament otherwise determining. The words are entirely useless.

Question put, and agreed to.

Question proposed, "That Clause 3, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

(4.24.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: The Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to indicate that the Bill gave to Scotland more than to any other part of the Kingdom. The Bill gives to Scotland £40,000 for education, with the distinct proviso that it should not be applied to anything but compulsory elementary education. The clause now passed, or about to be passed, gives Ireland £78,000 for elementary education, and a further sum for higher education, assistance in regard to which is denied to Scotland. The Chancellor of the Exchequer may say that Scotland receives assistance by another measure. No doubt she gets something from the Probate Duties, but Ireland gets three or four times as much.

(4.26.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL: There are three or four Amendments on the Paper affecting model schools, and I hope the Government will inquire into them before the Report stage.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No doubt that will be done.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 4.

(4.27.) MR. STOREY: This clause deals with superannuation in England and Scotland, and I now propose to deal with the English question. I now propose a small Amendment which, with consequential Amendments, will materially modify the clause. At present, it provides that of the £300,000, which are to be given for the superannuation of the police, £150,000 shall go to the Metropolitan district of London, and the other £150,000 be distributed in certain proportions over the rest of England and Wales. My Amendment goes to that point, and that point only. I allege that that is an unjust and unequal distribution of the money, and I propose a plan by which the money will be distributed in equitable proportions. The clause, if amended as I propose, will run—

"The annual sum applicable under this Act for Police Superannuation in England shall be distributed among the Police Authorities for the Police Forces in England in a proportion equal to that which the number of the police in the Metropolitan Police District bears to the number of the police forces in the whole of England."

If that is adopted, London, instead of getting £150,000, will receive her fair share and no more, according to her size, population, and rateable value, and the number of her police as compared with the number of the police forces of the country. Now, I understand that this proposal of mine is likely to meet with some opposition, not only from Conservative Members representing London, but also from Liberal and Radical Members who represent Metropolitan constituencies. I cannot imagine that anyone should for a moment wish to give London anything more than her fair share. I would scorn to ask for my own borough anything more than it is fairly entitled to. I want the Home Secretary to tell us why London is to have half the money that is to be allocated to England and Wales. At the extremest calculation, London has a population of, say, 5,000,000, and at the most modest computation the population of England and Wales is 25,000,000. Therefore, on the ground of population London would be entitled to only one-fifth of the money. With regard to the rateable value of London, it is very much inferior to one-half the rateable value of the country. But the great test I would apply is the amount which London contributes towards the sum we are obtaining. As the whole world knows, that sum has to be got out of drink. I do not think the London people drink any more than people in other parts of the country. If that be so, London does not contribute more in proportion than the rest of the Kingdom contributes towards this sum. I should say London does not contribute one quarter of the sum. On what ground, then, can London be entitled to receive one-half? I come now to a still better test. I should say this money ought to be distributed according to the size of the police forces in the different districts. Such a distribution must be in favour of London, and not against it. The peculiar circumstances of London are such that we may assume the Metropolis has a larger number of policemen than an equal population elsewhere. This supposition is certainly borne out by facts. The Junior Member for Derby (Mr. T. Roe) had an Amendment down to the Bill, and I understand he put it down in concert with the Association of Municipal Corporations. But he tells me to-day that he understands that Association is satisfied by some arguments or explanations which the Home Secretary has given, and he does not intend to press that Amendment. I am astounded to hear this. I must venture to differentiate between the Municipal Corporations and the limited number of gentlemen who have presumed in this matter, at this late period of the day, to speak for the Municipal Corporations. Speaking for my own borough, I venture to say that we have no part or lot in any agreement; but, on the contrary, our County Council, with the fullest knowledge of the Bill, and after the suggestions of the right hon. Gentleman, have petitioned against the measure, which they regard as mischievous, and in part as useless. I think the Home Secretary will not contend that on any of the four bases I laid down London is entitled to anything like one-half of this money. What is the argument he has addressed to the gentlemen I have spoken of to induce them to give way? I understand that London, in consequence of having a greater number of pensioners, and a probable demand for a greater number still, really needed more money than other parts of the country. I admit London has a great many pensioners, and is likely to have a great many more. I imagine that if the ratepayers could measure what this Superannuation Bill will involve them in, they would give it as wide a berth as a sailing ship does a steamer at sea. The number of the Metropolitan policemen at the present moment is between 14,000 and 15,000. The Police Forces of England and Wales together, including the Metropolitan Police, amount to 38,000. Therefore, the forces outside the Metropolis number 24,000. The Government contend that the 14,000 Metropolitan Police should have an exactly equal amount of the public funds for the purpose of superannuation with the 24,000 outside the Metropolitan area. I submit that, on the face of it, this is an unjust and unfair proposition, which cannot be defended in argument. I believe I am right in saying that at present the deficiency in London approaches nearly to £200,000, while the number of pensioned persons is 4,000, or a little more. In the rest of England and Wales the number of pensioned persons is 3,500, or a little more. To this extent, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman has some reason on his side. The total amount of pensions paid last year for police in England and Wales, including the Metropolis, was £370,000, and of this £200,000 went to the Metropolitan Police. Again, I freely admit that, on the facts as they stand, the right hon. Gentleman has some reason on his side, but I say we have no right to settle this matter on the basis of the existing state of things. The right hon. Gentleman ought to project his mind forward a few years, and see, when an efficient and complete system of superannuation is carried out throughout the whole of the country, what will be the relative proportion between London and the rest of England and Wales. I will take £400,000 as the probable cost of superannuation in the Metropolis within a very limited time. According to the scheme of this Bill superannuation is to be on the same level and to grow in the same way throughout the country, and I estimate that the cost of superannuation outside the Metropolitan area in the same period will be £700,000 a year. That means a total of at least £1,000,000. Well, in the portion of the country where superannuation costs £400,000 a year the Government contribution will be £150,000, while in the rest of the country where the cost will be £700,000 a year the Government contribution will also be £150,000. I put it to the right hon. Gentleman, this is not just. My view is that he should take the police forces of the country and divide his £300,000 equitably amongst them according to their numbers, on the principle that their numbers are the test of the necessities of their districts. As things now are, I admit, the right hon. Gentleman's scheme does not appear so very equitable. In the County of Durham, which has 550 policemen and 57 pensioners, to whom it pays £3,300 a year, the amount obtained from the Government will be £3,000. Northumberland has 200 policemen and 28 pensioners; it pays £1,500 a year in pensions, and will get £1,200. Newcastle-on-Tyne has 270 police and 25 pensioners; it pays £1,360 in pensions, and is to get £1,400 a year. Sunderland has 134 policemen and 25 pensioners; it pays £1,100 a year in pensions, and is to get £1,000 a year. All this does not appear so bad, but I say the right hon. Gentleman has no right to take the present state of affairs. Looking forward for a brief period, I find that Durham will have to pay £15,000 a year for pensions, while it will still continue to get a contribution of only £3,000. The same result is exhibited in the other cases. For instance, Sunderland, with 134 policemen, will within a very brief period be paying £4,000 for pensions, and receiving only £1,000. As far as we are concerned, we do not want the right hon. Gentleman's money, nor his control. We want to be left alone after the good old fashion of municipalities; but, if he will devote this money to the purpose in hand, he has no business to give an unfair share to the Metropolis. If the right hon. Gentleman is determined to divide this money, he has no right to give the Metropolis more than its fair share. On these grounds I intend to move the first of the Amendments which stand in my name, with a view of afterwards moving that the money shall be divided pro rata among the police forces of the country.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 33, to leave out the words "out of."—(Mr. Storey.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'out of' stand part of the Clause."

(5.11.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Although the object of the hon. Gentleman's Amendment is to distribute the sum available according to the numbers of the various police forces, he has pretty well admitted that that is not a proper or equitable mode of distribution. The numbers of the police stand in no fixed or regular proportion to the superannuation charge. That charge depends not on the aggregate number of men in the force, but on the number of pensionable men—men who have served 15 years. It is true, as stated by the hon. Member, that in 1888-89, the Metropolitan Police Force numbered only a little over 14,000 men; since then, it has been augmented by a thousand men. None of those men could become chargeable upon the superannuation fund for at least 15 years, yet the hon. Member would allow the Metropolitan Police to draw pension contributions on account of those men during all those 15 years. That shows that the hon. Member's principle of distribution is not and cannot be a fair one. Take the case of a new borough just starting a police force of its own with 400 or 500 men; it would be obviously unfair to put it on the same footing with an old borough having a force of about the same strength, in which a large proportion of the men have reached the pensionable age and period of service, and who are coming on to the fund from time to time for a pension. Distribution according to numbers is obviously unfair and improper, and the only equitable mode of distribution is according to the actual figures of the pension charge. The numbers of the police were, in the Metropolis about 14,000, and in the provinces 23,000 in 1888-9; but the pension charges for the same year were, in the provinces (including the City of London, which is now excluded from the Bill) £177,000, and in the Metropolis £193,000. If the money were distributed according to the latter figures, the Metropolis would get more than is given to it by the Bill. But, says the hon. Member, "You must project your mind into the future; this system of distribution is to be for all time. You must not only fix the proportion in a way which is fair at present, but in a way which will be fair in the future also." That is making a very large call upon the ingenuity of any draftsman. If we do project our minds into the future, is there not a prospect that the increase in the Metropolis charge will be as rapid and as considerable as that in the provinces. I have, however, made what inquiries I could, and have laid on the Table actuarial calculations as to the probable future pension charge in the Metropolis. The figures run up to £520,000 or £530,000. I do not know where the hon. Member got his estimate of the probable future charge in the provinces. I have no figures myself, but general considerations induce me to think that the growth of the pension charge in the provinces will be neither so great nor so rapid as in the Metropolis.

VOL. CCCXLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

In the Metropolis the scale will be the maximum, while in the provinces it will probably be something below that. The amount paid to pensionable men will, therefore, not be so large. We know by actual experience that in the provinces there are various ways by which superannuation charges may be avoided, but which cannot be adopted in the Metropolis.

MR. STOREY: But your Bill will prevent that.

MR. MATTHEWS: The Bill no doubt gives the right to a police constable to a pension, but constables in the provinces often prefer after 25 years' service to stay in the force and draw their pay rather than retire on pension, while experience shows that is not so in the Metropolis. That practice, which is of constant occurrence in boroughs and in the provinces generally, will tend to diminish the number of men on the pension charge. The distribution in the Bill is more than justified by existing facts, and, so far as I am able to form a judgment, will continue to be so for the next 30 or 40 years. If the time should arrive when the distribution becomes unfair, it can then be re-considered. I know of no reason why the growth of the pension charge in the provinces should be greater than in the Metropolis, except in the case of a few small boroughs which have systematically avoided pensions in the past.

Question put, and negatived.

(5.16.) MR. STOREY: I did not press the last Amendment to a Division, but I propose to divide the House on the next one which proposes to substitute £120,000 for £150,000.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 24, to leave out "50," and insert "20,"—(Mr. Storey,)—instead thereof.

Question put, "That '50' stand part of the Clause."

(5.28.) MR. STOREY: I now beg to move to insert after the words "shall be paid" the words "for one year," so as to fix the contribution for London for one year only. I do so in order to enable the Committee to see in its naked entirety what we are being committed to. The Home Secretary, when I invited him to project himself into the future, said he was unable to accomplish that acrobatic feat. The last thing I should think of asking the right hon. Gentleman to do would be to perform an acrobatic feat, but I should like to point out that he did not contend, neither can he contend, that when full effect is given to this scheme—

It being half past Five of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

MR. J. R. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I object.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton): May I ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, seeing this Bill is warmly supported on both sides of the House, he will arrange to take the Bill when it cannot be defeated by an individual objector?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Government attach so much importance to this measure that they intend to take such steps as will insure its passing. I am surprised that my hon. Friend the Member for North Camberwell, looking at the universal acceptance of the Bill, does not allow it to proceed, seeing that it is only half-past five.

Amendment, as amended, deferred till to-morrow.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILLS.

*THE EARL OF LIMERICK: My Lords, my noble Friend the Earl of Jersey, who is unable to be present, has requested me to move the Resolution which stands in his name. I am, of course, not so well acquainted as my noble Friend with the circumstances which have conduced to the late introduction of these Bills, and, therefore, I hope my noble Friend the Chairman of Committees is not prepared to oppose the Motion very strongly. The delay, I believe, is due to the exceptionally heavy nature of these Provisional Orders, of which there have been nine, coming on this year for the first time. They have had to be prepared concurrently with 58 other Provisional Orders of various sorts between March and the end of May, and consequently a great deal of work had to be done, and pressure has arisen in consequence. I hope that, as the circumstances are exceptional this year, my noble Friend will not object to the Motion which I make as regards these Bills which appears on the Notice Paper.

Moved,

"That the Sessional Order of the 10th of March last, 'That no Bill brought from the House of Commons confirming any Provisional Order or Provisional Certificate shall be read a second time after Friday the 27th day of June next,' be dispensed with, and that the Bills be read 2^a."—(The Earl of Limerick.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY: My Lords, I really think that the Public Offices have been rather later than usual this year in introducing the various matters which they had to bring before your Lordships. The present five Bills I think it is impossible for me to pass, and I think I should be neglecting my duty if I did so without saying a few words. As your Lordships are aware, a Sessional Order was made that no Bills should be received here after the 27th of June. These five Bills were introduced into the House of Commons, one on the 5th June, one on the 9th June, two on the 10th June, and one, the most important of all, on the 11th June. It was absolutely impossible for the three last-named Bills to have got through the House of Commons in time to have complied with the Sessional Order of your Lordships' House. All these Bills, with one exception, I think, refer to the subject of borough extension, and that is a class of business which has only recently been thrown on the Local Government Board. That is, I believe, the only excuse which can be offered for the lateness of these Bills coming to this House; but I would point out this, that it is not fair for the offices to throw the responsibility on your Lordships' House at the last moment of not passing the Bills. It is simply because there is not time to discuss them adequately. One of them I am told is now opposed, and at this time of the Session it is no easy matter to get a Committee to consider such an important matter, for instance, as the Manchester City Extension. I thought it right to say these few words to show that it is no mere red tapeism that induces me to oppose the introduction of Bills at so late a period, but because I do not think at this time of the Session Bills, and especially opposed Bills, can be adequately and carefully considered. With those words I shall not oppose the Motion of my noble Friend, but I hope he will impress upon those whom he represents the importance of being earlier in the introduction of their Bills in other years.

On Question, agreed to.

PHYSICAL EDUCATION IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS BILL.—(No. 190.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF MEATH: My Lords, having already addressed your Lordships twice at some length on the subject of the introduction of physical education into elementary schools, I do not intend to occupy your Lordships' time to-day by recapitulating any of the statistics which I brought forward upon the former occasions, or in going over the arguments which I then adduced in support of my proposal. A very interesting article has appeared in the Fortnightly Review lately upon the subject of physical education. I might, perhaps, be permitted to strengthen the argument which I brought forward on a former occasion by quoting to your Lordships here a few statistics which were brought forward in that Review. In this article which was written by Mr. Gattie in the Fortnightly Review of April, 1890, he says—

"That while the average weight of British recruits finally approved for Service is only 9 stone 0·2 pounds, their average height being 5 feet 5·8 inches; the German recruits examined by Dr. Feitner, in 1877, with an average height of 5 feet 5·75 inches, had an average weight of no less than 10 stone 3·3 pounds."

That is to say, the German soldiers were heavier than the British soldiers by 1 stone 3 pounds. I know it is a very difficult thing to prove anything from such statistics as these, because there are a great number of circumstances which have to be considered. It is very difficult indeed to get all the circumstances alike, but in this same Review it goes on to say that a certain number of British soldiers were brought up to the Oxford Gymnasium for the purpose of seeing what physical difference would be made in them if they were put through a course of gymnastics. Mr. Maclaren, of the Oxford Gymnasium, has given some valuable statistics of the measurements and weights of this detachment of non-commissioned officers who were sent to him to be qualified as military gymnastics instructors.

"The men ranged in age from 19 to 28 years, in height from five feet five inches to five feet 11½ inches, and in weight from nine stone two pounds to 12 stone six pounds, so that various types were represented. After less than eight months' training, they were found to have gained, on the average, 10 pounds in weight, 2½ inches in girth of chest, ½ inch in the size of the fore-arm, and 1½ inches in that of the upper arm, while there was in every case a slight increase of height."

A very curious circumstance happened in connection with that. Before the fourth month was out several of the men could not get into their jackets and tunics without assistance, and when they had got them on they could not make them meet down the middle by a hand's breadth. In another month they could not get into them at all, and were obliged to go to and from the gymnasium in their great-coats until new clothing could be procured. That, I think, is an extraordinary proof of the difference produced by gymnastic training of the human frame in a very short space of time. Now the Bill which I have introduced into your Lordships' House practically consists of one clause. The clause is as follows:—

"1. The school authority for every elementary school in any populous town shall make fit and proper provision to the satisfaction of the inspector for the instruction and practice of all scholars of both sexes in physical education and exercises connected therewith, and no school or department of a school shall receive the higher of the two principal grants under section one hundred and one of the new code of regulations issued by the Education Department during the present Session of Parliament or under any other code for the time being in force, unless the requisition of this section be complied with to the satisfaction of the inspector as aforesaid."

That is to say, no school can receive the grant of 14s., unless physical education is carried out to the satisfaction of the Inspector. Your Lordships are aware that it is in the power of the Inspector to give a grant of either 12s. 6d. or 14s. Consequently it will be to the interest of each school that physical exercise shall be carried out. I desire to do this because at present, although a very great improvement has been brought about by the Government by the introduction of their new Education Code, it is still left to the discretion of the managers and of the School Boards to decide whether physical education shall be carried out or not, and there is no inducement to carry out this physical education because there is no money gained by it. Consequently, as a matter of fact, in those schools where there is not any very enlightened opinion upon the subject, or no very great desire to carry out physical instruction, it will be put in the back ground. By this clause there will be an inducement to the Local Authorities to permit physical education to be carried out. Your Lordships will notice that I have not in this Bill laid down any hard and fast rule as to what physical instruction is to be carried out, because I believe it is very much better that the school authorities should decide that question themselves, and that no particular system of gymnastics should be laid down by the central authorities as necessary. A society has been established within the last few years for the purpose of trying to get physical education brought into our elementary schools, and a meeting of this society was held not very long ago in which certain suggestions were made, and I think it may be of interest if I refer to them. It was suggested by this Physical Education Recreation Society that any system of education in which mental training is excessive, and bodily training neglected is injurious, not conducive to the health, strength, usefulness, and happiness of the people, and dangerous to the welfare and safety of the nation; that one half hour daily, if possible, after dinner or in the afternoon, should be devoted to bodily training; that the bodily training for boys under eight should consist of marching, either with or without music, and that the bodily training for boys over 11 should consist of marching, exercises with dumb bells, and so on; for the older boys there should be exercises on dumb bells, Indian clubs, horizontal and parallel bars with or without music; and that boys and girls should be taught swimming where practicable. I think that is a most important thing, and I hope Her Majesty's Government will see their way next year, at all events, to permit swimming to be included in the compulsory subjects. The Physical Education Recreation Society also suggested that the bodily training of girls should comprise marching and figure marching, exercises with dumb bells and light Indian clubs, either with or without music. They also suggest that children who are considered by medical men to be too weak should be exempted from the instruction. This is also, of course, important, because we know there are a certain number of children, especially in the poorer parts of the towns, who are so badly fed that it would be a cruelty to subject them to physical exercises. The next suggestion is very important; it is that the cost of gymnastic training should be paid one-half by the Government and the other half out of the rates. Then it is suggested that the exercises should take place in the open air in fine weather, and in bad weather within the schools, the desks and benches, where not fixed to the floor, being removed to the other end of the room. Now, a good deal has been said about the expense of this, and many who discussed this question were of opinion that it is not necessary to erect gymnasia; that the ordinary school-rooms are quite sufficient for the purpose of carrying out the exercises by the removal of desks and benches. It was also suggested that the measurements of chests, arms, and legs of those children who undergo physical training should be registered annually, and that there should be proper teachers, who have been instructed in training colleges, to teach the children suitable exercises. In drawing up this Bill I have had the advantage of the advice of a gentleman who is at the head of the Physical Education Department of the London School Board. Your Lordships will notice that this Bill does not apply to the country, it only applies to the towns having populations of over 15,000. I may mention that I have received letters congratulating me upon the introduction of this Bill, from both Chairman and Vice Chairman of the London School Board. The Chairman, in his letter to me, remarks—

"It is noticeable that the educational efficiency of the schools in other respects rapidly advanced concurrently with the increased attention paid to physical exercises."

That is an argument which I have, on former occasions, brought forward, and I am very glad to find that the Chairman of the London School Board corroborates what I have said upon that matter, that mental activity is increased in as great a proportion as physical training and exercises are introduced, if they are not too much prolonged in elementary schools. Of course, I know it is too late this year for this Bill to pass, but I bring it forward simply for the purpose of keeping this subject well before the public and well before your Lordships, and I hope that the Government will not be content with what they have already done in this direction. I thank them most heartily and sincerely for what they have done, but I hope they will go on and make our system of physical education still more perfect.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."—(The Lord Chaworth [E. Meath].)

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount CROSS): My Lords, I have to apologise for the absence of my noble Friend the Lord President of the Council, who has been called away on public business, and, that being so, it falls upon me to answer the noble Lord who has just sat down. I do so with considerable pleasure, because I happened to preside over the Education Committee which sat for many years, and which thoroughly considered the interesting question now brought forward by the noble Earl. I heartily sympathise with the noble Earl in his desire to see the physical education of children in our Elementary Schools, and I certainly must remark that no one has done more in carrying on this good work than the noble Earl himself. While, however, I have very great pleasure in paying this tribute to the noble Earl, and in recognising his anxiety in the matter, as shown by the introduction of this Bill, I am afraid I shall have to ask him to consider one or two things, and eventually whether he will not consent to withdraw the Bill for this year, at all events. In the first place, at this late period of the Session, it is absolutely impossible that it should become law, though it was quite right it should be brought forward for discussion. I would also remind him that the Government have this year taken a large step in advance in this particular direction. In the Code they have introduced they have not only made provision that physical exercises may be taught, but that they may be taught during the consecutive hours of school instruction; and the result is that, although no grant is directly made for instruction in physical exercises, yet a grant is indirectly made, inasmuch as the physical training is given during the time of the average attendance on which the grant is calculated. So that I think the noble Lord will admit that the Government have gone a considerable way this year in the direction he desires us to go. There is one more consideration which I would press on the noble Earl's attention. If this Bill were carried a considerable expense would undoubtedly be thrown on all the schools, and I see no special provision in the Bill for meeting that expenditure. The result would be that if the Bill became law the School Boards would simply have to add a penny or a halfpenny to the rate in order to carry out its provisions, while the voluntary schools would be entirely left out in the cold. I do not think that would be fair to the voluntary schools, and while I deeply sympathise with the object the noble Earl has in view, I trust he will perceive that there are still difficulties to be dealt with before a Bill of this character can be passed. I will only add that I hope the noble Earl will be content with the great step which has been already made by the provision in the Code which I have mentioned, and that he will not press the Bill to a Second Reading.

*LORD NORTON: My Lords, I should like to say a few words before this Bill passes away. It is now a certainty that the Bill cannot be proceeded with this Session. Still, the introduction of the measure will more or less have an influence on what may pass on the subject next Session. After what has just fallen from the noble Viscount, I would ask the noble Earl to consider whether he might not make his proposal on a future occasion in a much more effective way. We all agree that physical education would be very useful in our elementary schools—much more useful, indeed, than some of the subjects now attempted but not really taught in them. But I cannot help thinking that to provide that no schools shall receive the higher grants unless they have gymnastic practice and apparatus is rather a strange way of putting it. It seems to me somewhat ludicrous to propose in an Act of Parliament that schools shall go without grants for specific subjects unless they have gymnastic apparatus. That seems to me to be a rather inconsequent proposition. The recommendation of the Royal Commission was generally that physical training should be part of the process of instruction in our elementary schools. That is a general proposition, and if we get out of the vicious principle of attaching grants to particular subjects, and give to every elementary school a sufficient subsidy from the Treasury to do its full work of all kinds, physical instruction might and would be introduced into every school. So long as we go on the principle of attaching grants to particular items of instruction such a proposition as this, that schools are to go without grants for special subjects unless they teach something totally different, is absurd. I hope that the noble Earl will re-introduce the Bill in a different form next Session, and will propose that sufficient subsidy being given to Elementary Schools for all purposes, physical instruction, as recommended by the Royal Commission, should invariably be one of the subjects introduced into such schools.

THE EARL OF MEATH: The noble Lord who answered me and the noble Lord who spoke afterwards have both fallen into this error: they both imagine that it is necessary to have apparatus in the schools in order to teach physical exercises. Now, the London School Board have instituted physical exercises to a very large extent, and although they have a certain amount of apparatus out of doors, they have not used that for the purpose of this instruction. The instruction is given in free exercises; what is called Swedish drill or musical drill, and is really much more effective for general purposes than any system carried out with apparatus. Consequently, the argument of the noble Lord (Viscount Cross) falls to the ground with regard to expense, because the whole of this work which has been carried out in London has been carried out almost entirely by a grant made by an Association with which I am connected, of £400. My Lords, I withdraw the Bill.

HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPT COMMISSION—REPORTS.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government whether the Reports of the Historical Manuscript Commissioners which are out of print can be re-printed; and, if so, whether orders will be given to have this done, said: My Lords, early this Session, your Lordships, on the Motion of my noble Friend who is not present this evening (Lord Beauchamp), passed a Resolution authorising an index to be made of the Reports of the Historical Manuscript Commissioners. A very great deal of interest, whether evoked by the noble Lord's question or not I do not know, has been taken in these documents, and it turns out that some of the Reports published at an earlier date are out of print. I do not know whether this is to be attributed to the neglect of the Commissioners that they should have allowed valuable Government documents to go out of print or not, but I certainly cannot exonerate them from blame in the matter. These Reports become, of course, of great historical value, and are very much sought after in public libraries; and the extension of the Free Libraries Act has created a considerable demand for such papers for reference. The object of my question is to ascertain from Her Majesty's Government whether they will consent to have the Reports, I believe five in number, which are out of print, re-printed for the benefit of those who may apply for them. I should not think the expense would be very great, and certainly in dealing with matters of historical interest it would be of great advantage to have the whole series get-at-able, so that the public can procure them. I beg to ask the question which stands in my name.

*LORD DE RAMSEY: My Lords, in all there are 40 reports of the Historical MSS. Commissioners which have been issued, and of those, seven are practically out of print. The estimated cost of re-printing those Reports would be £120 each, or £840 in all. If 500 copies of each Report were printed and sold, in accordance with the ordinary practice as to Parliamentary Papers, at the original prices, the Stationery Office could only recover £560 of that amount, even in the highly improbable event of every copy being sold. As the re-printing of the Reports in question could not be carried out without loss to the Exchequer, the Government do not propose to sanction such re-printing.

NATIONAL COMPETITION OF SCHOOLS OF ART.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD SANDHURST: In rising to call attention to the National Competition of Schools of Art under the Science and Art Department, and to ask the Lord President whether he can furnish any information as to the numbers entered for competition in each of the last five years, the different localities sending up competitors, and the comparative quality of the works submitted to the Examiners, said: My Lords, I have been anxiously waiting for the arrival of the noble Lord (Earl Spencer) in whose name this question appears on the paper, but as it was uncertain whether he would be able to attend to-day, he has asked me to put the question for him, in reference to Technical Education and the system now pursued. It is beyond doubt that the subject of technical education is one of extreme interest, and of great importance, and it is to that that many of our manufacturers look for success in the future in their competition with the manufacturers of other countries. In asking for information as to what opportunities are given to competitors, and what improvement there has been made in this direction, it is as well, perhaps, to examine a little into what has been done in this respect in the country already. Great efforts have been made during the last 30 years to this end. A great Central Museum and School of Art has been established, where every description and form of modelling is to be found, including a gallery of art, where every description of art can be studied. Facilities have also been given to different localities where the various art trades are followed. In addition to the normal school in London, opportunities have been given for obtaining certificates by intending teachers in art schools, which have been founded by the munificence of private individuals, or by the energy of Municipal Councils. The object of this question is to draw attention to an exhibition now being held at South Kensington, which includes exhibits from the provinces and towns throughout the country; for instance, exhibits from the large schools of Manchester, Glasgow, Birmingham, Leicester, and others, from which really very beautiful designs have come. It also includes, I may say, New South Wales, which is prominent for designs and architecture. In drawing attention to this exhibition, I should like to ask the noble Viscount whether, in the opinion of those who are best qualified to form an opinion, a real advance has been made; whether this exhibition may be looked upon as a satisfactory test; and also whether we are getting value for the money expended for this purpose?

VISCOUNT CROSS: My Lords, in the absence of my noble Friend, the Lord President, I will give such information as he has received upon this point from the Science and Art Department. With your Lordships' permission, I will give a few figures, as they are not very numerous. Up to 1887 all the works done in schools of art and art classes were sent to South Kensington for payment on results, and in that year the number of them reached 800,000, so it has been found necessary to exclude for the future those of a very slight or elementary nature, as it has become physically impossible to deal with that vast number in the limited space available in the existing buildings. Since then only works of the more finished or advanced kind have been sent up. At the time that restriction came into force the schools were receiving compensation in the way of payments on the third grade examinations held all over the country, which hitherto had been confined to South Kensington, and also a somewhat higher scale of payment for the advanced works and on the second grade examinations. The number of these more finished works has not increased, but the quality of them has improved, and the third grade examinations have also shown a steady advance. In the results of these latter, and in the works submitted in the national competition, the examiners saw a general improvement, and that was notably the case with exercises in designs for manufactures, especially in the large schools of Manchester, Glasgow, and Birmingham, where trades depending on decorative design are extensively carried on. It is much to be desired that those interested in art education, aided by the State, should carefully inspect the works now exhibited at South Kensington, and especially that those who criticise the working of the Department should make themselves acquainted with the kind of work which is encouraged by prizes and payments, and distinguish between it and the amateur or purely pictorial work which the schools are free to turn out, but do not get grants on. It was impossible to get Returns in time to answer the noble Lord's question fully, but, if the noble Lord wishes it, I will give the best figures available. In 1886 the number of works sent up from Schools of Art for Examination was 324,315; in 1887 the number was 364,986; in 1888, when elementary works ceased to be sent in, the number fell to 78,730; in 1889, however, the number rose to 139,314; and in 1890 the number was 135,651.

FLASHING SIGNALS—ADMIRAL COLOMB'S INVENTION.

LORD SUDELEY: My Lords, I beg to move for the Return of which I have given notice.

Moved,

"For certain further official Correspondence relating to Admiral Colomb's system of flashing signals between the years 1861 and 1867, also since that date; to include the letter from the Treasury to the Admiralty offering to give Admiral Colomb £2,000, and Admiral Colomb's reply thereto."—(Lord Sudeley.)

LORD ELPHINSTONE: There is no objection to making this Return, but I must point out to my noble Friend that one of the Papers he asks for is not in existence. We have had no reply yet from Admiral Colomb, but if that reply is received in time, it will be printed with the other Papers.

LORD SUDELEY: I hope my noble Friend will arrange with the Admiralty that, if necessary, the Return shall be delayed for a few days for the purpose of including Admiral Colomb's reply. The Treasury has taken one month in making their offer, and, therefore, it may take a little time for Admiral Colomb to forward his reply. It should, of course, be printed with the other Papers to make them complete.

LORD ELPHINSTONE: I will put the noble Lord's request before the Admiralty; I cannot say anything more.

On Question agreed to; Return ordered to be laid before the House.

House adjourned at ten minutes past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

QUESTIONS.

CATTLE IMPORTED FROM TRANS-ATLANTIC PORTS.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether his attention has been called to the cruelties which attend the importation of live cattle into this country from transatlantic ports, and to the dangers to merchant seamen in connection therewith; whether his Department has evidence to show that the prohibition of the shipment to this country of live cattle for food would necessarily raise the price of meat to the consumer, seeing that the cattle now so shipped could also be shipped as dead meat; and, if so, to what probable amount; whether he has any Statutory powers for regulating the traffic in live cattle, so as to prevent the cruelties referred to; and, if so, under what Acts; and whether he is prepared to make regulations under these Acts for the prevention of the cruelties complained of pending further legislation?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Yes, Sir, my attention has been called to the suffering of cattle referred to in the first paragraph of the question, which, I am afraid, is inseparable from every passage across the Atlantic in bad weather. With regard to the second paragraph, we have certainly no evidence to show that the prohibition of the shipment to this country of live cattle for food from transatlantic ports would raise the price of meat to the consumer; on the contrary, I should say, from inquiries I have made since the question appeared on the Paper, that the presumption would be the other way. I am informed that the meat of American cattle killed in Great Britain was selling to-day at 3s. 9d. per stone of 8lb., while the meat of animals killed in America, and sent to this country as dead meat, was selling at 2s. 7d. In reply to the third paragraph, the Board of Agriculture has considerable powers under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878-1890, to make regulations for the purpose of preventing the cruelties referred to. And in reply to the last paragraph, I may say that I have already arranged for the appointment of a Joint Departmental Committee of the Board of Trade and the Board of Agriculture to consider what further regulations may be necessary to prevent, or, at all events, to minimise, as far as possible, the suffering of cattle on their passage across the Atlantic.

CULTIVATORS IN KOLABA AND THANA.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State has seen in the Times of India, of 9th April, 1890, a Resolution of the Government of Bombay, relating to trees on occupied lands in Kolaba, in paragraph 30, where it is stated—

"The same terms as are being offered in Thana under paragraphs 9, 10, and 13 of Government Resolution, No. 2447, dated 8th April, 1890, may for this purpose be offered in Kolaba."

whether what purports to be Government Resolution No. 2447, dealing with trees in occupied lands, Thana, has been published in the Times of India of 12th April; whether he will state what were the terms mentioned in paragraphs 9, 10, and 13, of the Resolution No. 2447, of 8th of April, and whether they contained important concessions to cultivators; whether he will state why this Resolution has not been published in the Government Gazette; and whether the Government of Bombay having refused, in their letters Nos. 3024 and 4163, to supply copies of the Resolution to the Forest Association of Thana, he will give instructions for the publication of the Resolution, as framed by Lord Reay's Government, so that the cultivators in the Kolaba and Thana districts may obtain the benefits which it was intended they should derive?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (SIR J. GOSST, Chatham): The answer to the first paragraph of the question of the hon. Member is in the affirmative. The Secretary of State has seen the Resolution from paragraph 3, and not 30, of which the quotation is taken. The answer to the second paragraph is in the negative. The other Resolution, No. 2447, has not been published. In answer to the third paragraph, I have to say that the Secretary of State cannot state the terms of the Resolution, because the document in question is marked confidential. The Secretary of State is not aware whether the Government of Bombay has refused to publish the document, nor, if so, on what grounds. The Secretary of State is not aware of the refusal of the Government of Bombay to publish the Resolution, and the matter seems to be one of local administration, with which, as at present advised, he should not interfere. The hon. Member's question will be sent to India in ordinary course.

THE BURMESE DACOIT BOH YAN MYUN.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Camberland, Cockermonth): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he has yet received any answer to his inquiries into the case of the Dacoit Boh Yan Myun's trial in Burmah?

*SIR J. GORST: No telegram has reached me on the subject.

SIR W. LAWSON: When does the right hon. Gentleman expect to hear?

*SIR J. GORST: Probably by Monday next; inquiry is being made.

INDIAN MIDLAND RAILWAY.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Indian Government documents relating to the acquisition of the lands and material in certain of the states of Bundelkund, Central India, for the purposes of the Indian Midland Railway, numbered respectively 357, 359, 272, 2,550, 686, 584, and 756, of 1886, concerned all the States through which the railway runs, and covered the acquisition of all lands, and the purchase of timbers, stones, &c.; whether in the engagements entered into under these documents a sum of about five lakhs of rupees have been claimed by certain chiefs of States in Bundelkund; whether, notwithstanding such engagements, Mr. Henvey, the Agent of the Governor General of Central India, has recommended that no compensation be paid to the chiefs, on the ground that collateral advantages may hereafter accrue to them; and whether the Government will lay upon the Table the Papers relating to the transactions entered into with any and all of the chiefs of States in Bundelkund, through which the Indian Midland Railway runs, by the contractors for the railway, or by any other parties in connection with the railway.

*SIR J. GORST: With the exception of No. 272, which was the subject of my reply on the 3rd of July, none of the documents referred to in the question can be traced. The question will be sent to the Government of India in ordinary course.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the Post Office Savings Bank Department has refused to accept the transfer of moneys, deposited by the Trustees of the Camberwell branch of the Amalgamated Society of Painters and Decorators, with the Trustees of the Camberwell Savings Bank, to the Post Office Savings Bank; and, if so, on what grounds the refusal is based; whether he is aware that the moneys aforesaid, amounting to £118 ls. 3d., were deposited in the Camberwell Savings Banks under the Friendly Societies' Clause, as a Friendly Society, and was entered as G. 583 in the said bank; whether the Amalgamated Society of Painters and Decorators is a Friendly Society within the meaning of the Act, and has been allowed, as such, to deposit its funds in Trustee or Post Office Savings Banks for many years, and has now deposited funds in the Post Office Savings Banks of the country; whether he is aware that this branch of the Amalgamated Society of Painters and Decorators is unable, by reason of the closing of the Camberwell Savings Bank, and the refusal of the Post Office to accept the transfer of its funds, to make payments to its members for sickness, funeral, accident, out of work, and other benefits; and, whether he will cause such transfer to be accepted without delay, in accordance with the existing law and practice in similar cases?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The National Debt Commissioners are responsible for what has happened, and, therefore, the question ought to have been addressed to me instead of my right hon. Friend. I am making inquiries into the matter, and will be glad if the right hon. Member will postpone the question until to-morrow.

CHELSEA SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is a fact, as has been stated, that the assets under the control of the Official Liquidator of the Chelsea Savings Bank are sufficient to pay all the depositors in full; and, if so, can he inform the House why the depositors have not been paid in full; whether it is true, as alleged, that the costs of the Solicitors, Messrs. Hare & Co., of the Official Liquidator, and of the Treasury Agents already amount to the sum of £3,000; and whether he will lay upon the Table of this House a statement of the costs and charges in connection with the winding up of the affairs of the Chelsea Savings Bank?

MR. GOSCHEN: No, Sir; the assets are not absolutely sufficient to pay all the depositors in full. But those who are not paid in full will receive 19s. 8d., when the Official Liquidator pays a further dividend of 4s. 8d., which he hopes shortly to be able to do. The costs and remuneration of the liquidator will be settled, and the solicitors' charges will be taxed by the Court, in accordance with the usual scale, and together will probably exceed £3,000. But this is only an estimate. I will consider the question of laying a statement upon the Table, such as the hon. Member suggests.

THE BRENNAN TORPEDO.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what is the total amount paid, and to be paid, to Mr. Brennan for his torpedo; how much of it was payable as a lump sum, and how much as an annual payment, or payments, and for how many years; and who recommended these payments?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The total amount to be paid to Mr. Brennan for his torpedo was £110,000, of which £30,000 was paid in a lump sum, and the balance at the rate of £16,000 a year for five years. These payments were recommended by the

Secretary of State for the time being, after consultation with several military and naval officers.

THE ARCHBISHOP'S THRONE AT CANTERBURY.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that the archbishop's throne which was presented to Canterbury Cathedral by Archbishop Tenison, and which was designed and executed by Grinling Gibbons, has for many years past been stowed away as lumber in a damp cellar adjacent to the cathedral cloisters; and whether he will, on behalf of the Department of Science and Art, apply to the Dean and Chapter for the loan of this beautiful and interesting work, in order that it may be rescued from its present unsatisfactory position, and preserved in the Kensington Museum?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (SIR W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I am very much obliged to my right hon. Friend for calling attention to the matter, and shall be glad to act upon his suggestion as soon as possible.

SPEED OF CRUISERS.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been drawn to the discrepancy between the statement made by him explanatory of the Navy Estimates, 1889-90 (pages 5 and 6), where the nine first class cruisers and the 29 second class cruisers are all given a "speed at sea (continuous steaming) of 18 knots," whilst in the Navy Estimates, published in February of this year, the same first class cruisers are given a continuous seagoing speed of 96 hours duration, natural draught, in smooth water, and with clean bottoms, of 16½ knots an hour, and the second class cruisers mentioned above a speed of 16 knots; and whether he can explain these differences?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (LORD G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The particulars given for these cruisers at pages 5 and 6 of the statement were supplemented by those given on pages 182 and 188 of the Navy Estimates for 1889-90. From the latter it will be seen that the figures for speeds relate to maximum trial speeds—with forced draught, 20 knots, and natural draught, 18 knots, respectively. The words continuous steaming, as the context shows, were used to contrast the speed developed under forced draught for four hours, and that under natural draught for a longer period. Since the preparation of the Estimates for 1889-90, and the explanatory statement thereon, the whole question of the probable development of power in Her Majesty's ships when steaming continuously at sea for long periods has been reconsidered. A number of trials have been made with ships on service, and the figures published in the Navy Estimates for 1890-91 represent the results of the inquiry, and the calculated speeds corresponding to the powers that will probably be developed for long periods under the conditions of actual service. I may add that the capacity and boiler power of these vessels have been largely increased, and are some 20 per cent. in excess of that contained in the original design.

RATING OF VOLUNTARY SCHOOL BUILDINGS.

MR. HOWARD (Middlesex, Tottenham): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, in view of the action of the London County Council with respect to increasing the rating of voluntary school buildings, the Government will promote legislation to exempt public elementary schools from rating, so as to prevent the extinction of many voluntary schools?

SIR W. HART DYKE: If the threatened steps to increase the rating of elementary schools are seriously intended, a large number of voluntary schools must inevitably be closed, and in order to avert such a disaster there can be no doubt that the demand for the exemption of all public elementary schools from rating will, in the general interests of the ratepayers, become more pressing, but at this stage of the proceedings it would, I think, be premature to pledge the Government to any particular course of action.

THE MASTER OF THE HAWKS.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what part of the £965 paid yearly to the Master Surveyor and Keeper of the Hawks was originally for salary, and what part was for the purchase and maintenance of hawks; whether he has observed that the Act 2 and 3 Will. 4, c. 96, Clause 9, whereby the pensions to the Marquess of Downshire and other persons were first charged on the Civil List, directs the same to be so charged "during the pleasure of His Majesty"; whether he will state if, since the Treasury proposed that the pay of £162 10s. yearly to the warders of Hillsborough Fort shall continue until "the resignation or demise of the present recipients of the allowances," steps have been taken to ascertain who the recipients are, and what are their respective ages and consequent expectations of life, so as to determine whether the allowances, before they lapse, will amount in the aggregate to a large or only to a small sum, in order to enable the House to "pass an opinion on each agreement to commute," as invited by the last paragraph of the Treasury Minute of 15th July; and whether the Treasury has any reason to expect that any of the warders will tender their "resignation," and so terminate their allowances before demise?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): If the hon. Member will refer to the reply which I gave on Tuesday to my hon. Friend the Member for Preston, and to the appendix of the Report of the Select Committee, he will find all the information asked for in his first and second questions. Payment to the warders would only be made on direct proofs of life and of tenure of office.

MR. HANBURY: The right hon. Gentleman did not answer part of my question the other day, namely, whether all the payments will be commuted at the same rate?

MR. JACKSON: Certainly, Sir; but I think I did answer that question the other day.

SCHOOL BOARD OF HULLAVINGTON.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that the School Board of Hullavington, Wilts., in advertising for a certificated master from

Michaelmas next for the mixed School Board of Hullavington, the wife or sister of such master to take infants and needlework, have intimated that—

"The present teacher (mistress) takes the church services, for which she receives separate remuneration."

And—

"That if the master had a daughter to take pupil teacher's place it would be a great inducement to his appointment."

And that candidates—

"Must be members of the Church of England ;"

whether, having regard to the Cowper Temple Clause and other provisions of the Education Act of 1870, a School Board is within its legal right in insisting on membership of any particular Church as a necessary qualification for teachers; and whether the Education Department will take steps to prevent the imposition of such religious tests?

SIR W. HART DYKE: I have no information beyond that given in the question, but some years ago the Department took a legal opinion upon a similar point, and they were advised that they had no power to interfere with such an advertisement.

LABOUR TRAFFIC IN THE PACIFIC ISLANDS.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if the Imperial Government controls the labour traffic in the islands of the Pacific for the supply of the Queensland plantations, and takes measures to prevent the forcible abduction of natives and other abuses; whether the Naval Officers, acting with the Western Pacific High Commission, have orders to safeguard the liberties of the natives; whether any regulations and instructions have been issued for the guidance of Her Majesty's Officers in that matter, and where they are to be found; and whether it is true that N. MacNeil, and other British subjects, convicted in the Queensland Courts of the murder of natives on the high seas, in the year 1884, and whose death sentences were commuted to penal servitude for life, have since received a free pardon, and are now at large; if so, whether the pardon was given by the Government of Queensland, with the sanction and approval of the Secretary of State, or solely on the advice of the Colonial Ministers?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): If the hon. Member will refer to the Pacific Islanders' Protection Acts, 1872 and 1875, I think he will find the information he requires. Instructions are, from time to time, sent to the Naval Officers, but these have not been published. The prisoners referred to have not received a free pardon, but their sentences have been remitted, and they are now at large. The remission was granted by the Governor of the colony, on the advice of his Ministers.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Did the Secretary of State for the Colonies sanction the pardon?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I should have thought the hon. Member would have known that the Secretary for the Colonies had no power to interfere in the matter.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: As this was a case of murder on the high seas was it not dealt with by the Imperial Court, and not by the local Queensland Court?

BARON H. DE WORMS: No, Sir.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the account stands in regard to the pictures purchased for the National Gallery, a few years ago, under the arrangement by which the excess amount was to be recouped from the usual allowance for the purchase of pictures, how much has been recouped in this manner, and how much remains unrecovered?

MR. GOSCHEN: Out of the total grant of £87,600 for the Blenheim pictures, £55,600 will have been recouped under the arrangement mentioned by the hon. Member by the end of the present year, leaving an unrecovered balance of £31,900.

LONDON WATER SUPPLY.

MR. TATTON EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the quality of the water supplied by the Grand Junction Water Company, which contained on 24th July 33 per cent. more organic ammonia than the sample taken on 23rd July, 1889, and nearly double the amount of that contained in the Chelsea Water Company's water, namely, 16·4, as against 9·2, per 100 mil.; also the solids, on heating, showed a marked blackening, and the colour was of a marked yellow colour; whether this all indicates bad filtration; and what penalty attaches to supplying water of such an inferior character?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): My attention had not been called to the quality of the water of the Grand Junction Water Company on the date referred to, until my hon. Friend gave notice of his question. I do not know where my hon. Friend gets his figures from. I may, however, say that, so far as regards the water supplied by this company in the earlier part of the present month, the Report of Dr. Frankland, by whom analyses of the water of the London Water Companies are made on behalf of my Department, was to the effect that the improved quality which the Thames-derived waters have of late exhibited had been maintained. With regard to the supply on the date referred to, the result of the inquiries which I have caused to be made is, that I find that on July 24, and for some days before and after that date, the Thames was swollen with rain, and the water was turbid and highly tinted with colouring matter, no doubt mainly derived from the abundant vegetation, cut grass, &c., spread about in the Thames Valley. At the same time, there can be no question that the want of adequate filtration arrangements prevented the company from effectually coping with the difficulties referred to. The attention of the Directors has been repeatedly called in the Reports of the Water Examiner of the Metropolis to the necessity for increased filters, and I am glad to learn that, in view of the evidence which has been afforded of the need for a larger filtering area, in order to deal with exceptional conditions of the river, the company have intimated that the construction of additional filters will be undertaken without delay. Dr. Tidy, by whom the waters of the company are analysed, states that no such thing as organic ammonia exists in the water, but is manufactured during the process of analysis. The special material to which the colouring matter of the water is due, yields large quantities of the so-called organic ammonia, the quantitative estimation of which is no reliable test whatever of pollution. In justice to the Water Company I think it right to state that I am informed by the Water Examiner that the filters, as now existing, are capable of dealing satisfactorily with the water when the river is in a normal condition, and the Directors appear to have been erroneously impressed by the fact that during the past 18 months the company's water showed on several occasions, in Dr. Frankland's tables of the results of his chemical analysis, the smallest proportion of organic impurity of any of the Thames-derived companies. In fact, in its average proportion of organic elements during 1889 the company appears to stand, with the Lambeth Company, second in degree of purity of the river-drawing companies. I see no ground in the communications which I have received on the subject for the suggestion that the appearance of the water, or the results of the analysis, show sewage contamination.

MR. T. EGERTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman able to say whether the water of the Grand Junction Company did not contain much higher percentage of organic ammonia than the water from the Chelsea Company?

*MR. RITCHIE: There is no doubt that the filtering power of the Grand Junction Company, as compared with that of the Chelsea Company, is deficient. Assuming that what my hon. Friend says is correct, although I have no knowledge of that, it is undoubtedly due to that fact.

MR. T. EGERTON: My authority is the public analyst of the Vestry of St. George's, Hanover Square, who is also analyst for Kensington.

ADMIRALTY—UNIFORM COMMITTEE.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Uniform Committee has finished its sittings; whether it has presented a Report; and whether it is intended to supplement the inquiries of the Committee by sending round to all ships in commission an outline of the recommendations of the Committee before giving effect to them?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I understand that the Committee appointed to consider the question of the uniforms of officers of the Royal Navy have practically concluded their inquiry, but they have not yet presented their Report. Until the Report has been considered by the Board of the Admiralty it is impossible to say what further action, if any, will be found desirable; but no material changes in the existing uniforms would be made without further consultation with the Service afloat.

POST OFFICE HOLIDAYS.

EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether sub-postmasters are entitled to any holiday, and whether they have some substitute not at their own cost during such holiday; and whether, in the case of large sub-offices where three clerks are employed, these clerks are appointed from the established Service, or whether they must be provided and paid for by the sub-postmasters?

MR. RAIKES: (1) Sub-postmasters are not required to give their whole time to the Service, and are not entitled to annual leave of absence at the cost of the Department. (2) The Sub-postmasters are paid in accordance with the amount of business transacted, and out of their pay they have to provide any assistance which they may need in carrying on the duties.

CHATHAM CONVICT PRISON.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recommendations of the Visitors who held the recent inquiry at Chatham Convict Prison have been adopted; and what recommendations, if any, have not been acted upon by the Executive?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Some of the recommendations of the Committee were already the practice of the prison. The others have all been acted upon by the Prison Board, except that they have not thought it necessary to issue any order with respect to the recommendation contained in paragraph 45 of the Report, as they considered the complaint as to the gates outside their cells not being unlocked for the admission of breakfast and tea to be of a trivial nature.

MR. SEXTON: Has it not been recommended that Durban, one of the persons mentioned in the Report, should be reinstated?

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Was not this man Durban degraded and removed from his position on the recommendation of the officials of the prison? Is it the case that he is now employed in compounding medicines, and, among others, for the prisoner Daly?

MR. MATTHEWS: I must ask for notice of those questions.

THE ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

MR. CHANNING: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that the Hon. Cecil Rhodes, the new Premier of the Cape Colony, has given notice of a Motion in the House of Assembly, that that House regretted that the Cape Government had not been consulted with regard to the Anglo-German Agreement, as far as it concerned the territory south of the Zambesi, and that the Cape Colony ought to have a voice in any subsequent agreement regarding such territory; whether it is true that no intimation was given to the Cape Government until the terms of the Concession to Germany of the territory stretching to the Upper Zambesi were settled; and whether, in any future negotiations involving cessions of territory or "spheres of influence," which affect the interests of British Colonies, a proper opportunity will be given to the authorities of such colonies to lay their views before Her Majesty's Government, in time for them to be fairly considered, before such negotiations are completed?

MR. SUMMERS: I beg also to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is now in a position to state what was the nature of the communications that passed between the Home Government and the Government at the Cape with reference to the matters dealt with in the Anglo-German Agreement, and more particularly with reference to those portions of the Agreement which concerned the territory south of the Zambesi?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Her Majesty's Government have seen the report of Mr. Rhodes's notice of Motion in the newspapers. Communications in respect of Walfisch Bay and Damaraland passed with the Cape Ministers before the Anglo-German Agreement was signed. The High Commissioner also made various communications to Her Majesty's Government, relating to the retention of Lake Ngami and the keeping open of the route northwards. Her Majesty's Government can give no such general pledge as the hon. Member for East Northampton proposes in the third paragraph of his question; but it may be assumed that every opportunity which is possible will be given to the colonies directly affected by international negotiations to lay their views before Her Majesty's Government?

MAILS TO SHIPS OF WAR—H.M.S.
THRUSH.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Cantorbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that H.M.S. Thrush left England on 1st June for Gibraltar and Las Palmas, instructions being left that mails for the vessel should be sent on without delay to those places, and that although the Thrush stayed a fortnight at Gibraltar, reaching Las Palmas on or about 30th June, up to 1st July last the only mails addressed to the Thrush that had been delivered were those of the 6th and 7th of June; can he explain why the mail steamer reaching Las Palmas on 1st July brought no mails for the Thrush; and whether he will take measures to insure the punctual despatch of mails to Her Majesty's ships of war, according to the instructions given?

MR. RAIKES: Correspondence is despatched hence to Her Majesty's ships with the utmost regularity in accordance with addresses furnished by the Admiralty to the Post Office, and no fresh measures are required. I find that the Thrush left on the 1st of June; that the address furnished for her mails up to the 17th was Gibraltar, and after the 17th Bermuda; and that the mails were punctually despatched to those addresses. The steamer referred to by the hon. Member as reaching Las Palmas without mails for the Thrush would seem to have been that despatched from Liverpool on the 21st of June, when the mails were already being sent to Bermuda.

PURCHASE OF THE SUBMARINE CABLES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is now in a position to inform the House if the purchase of the submarine cables by the English and French Governments has proved a financial success; and whether he can state the share of profits realised by the two Governments respectively, and give any statistics showing the increased number of words and messages forwarded over stated previous annual periods?

MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member I have to state that a substantial profit will, no doubt, result from the purchase of the submarine cables between this country and the Continent; but it would be premature at present to estimate the amount of that profit in view of the condition of the cables. As the House is aware, some of these cables are very old, and it is possible that, before long, a considerable expenditure may have to be incurred in renewals. Not only so, but the necessity for additional plant has arisen, and a large sum will be spent in the course of the current financial year on a new cable and land line. The number of words in Anglo-French telegrams has risen from 13,376,333 in the year to the 31st March, 1889, to 15,495,791 in the year to the 31st March last. Other telegrams have passed over the Anglo-French cables, but I am not able to give separate particulars with regard to them.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: Arising out of that question, I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that the French Assembly has been asked for a Vote for an additional cable to England, also whether this House will be asked for a Vote for a new cable to France?

MR. RAIKES: I have no knowledge of what has passed in the French Chamber. It is possible that it may be necessary there to ask for a Vote for a cable between France and England, but it is not necessary to ask Parliament for the money for a cable to France.

UPPER MACEDONIA.

MR. LEVESON-GOWER (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give the House any information as to the condition of Upper Macedonia, as described from personal experience by the special correspondent to the Daily News in the issue of the 29th instant; whether Her Majesty's Government have received any reports throwing light upon the brutal murders alleged to have been committed by Arnauts upon Christians in the neighbourhood of Pristina and Prisrend; and whether, in the event of the Porte being unable or unwilling to protect the lives and property of its Christian subjects in that Province, Her Majesty's Government would think it advisable to confer with the other Powers as to the best means of restraining the excesses of the Arnauts?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): I am unable to add anything to the reply given to the hon. Member for Aberdeen on the 22nd instant, as we have received no subsequent information. No information has reached Her Majesty's Government which would, in their opinion, justify so serious a step as inviting a conference of the Powers on the internal affairs of Turkey.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Is anything being now done to fulfil the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin as to giving Home Rule to Macedonia?

[No reply was made.]

THE FLOATING DEBT.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Derby): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the present amount of the Floating Debt; what is the rate of interest at which the last issue of Treasury Bills was made; and whether he proposes to take any measures to reduce the amount of the Floating Debt, which is now considerably in excess of that at which it has generally stood in recent years?

MR. GOSCHEN: The present amount of the Floating Debt in the hands of the public is about £23,000,000, as against an amount of a little under £14,000,000 in 1885-6. The present amount of Unfunded Debt held by the National Debt Commissioners is about £11,400,000, as against an amount of about £3,750,000 in 1885-6. The large increase under both heads is almost wholly due to conversion and redemption operations, and it must be remembered that the amount held by the National Debt Commissioners can be funded at any time. The last issue of Treasury Bills was made at about 3½ per cent., but it would not be fair to let the rate of interest at any particular moment influence the judgment much. The average rate over a series of years for three months' Treasury Bills has been £2 6s. 8d., and for six months' Bills £2 12s. 2d., clearly a very remunerative rate for the Exchequer. The rate of interest during the current financial year up to date, taking three and six months' Bills together, works out at £2 11s. 5d., still a satisfactory result, but it is probable that the average will be higher during the remainder of the financial year. On the whole, the interest of the Floating Debt over a series of years has been materially in favour of the State as compared with the rate of Consols. Still, I am anxious gradually to reduce the amount of Unfunded Debt in the hands of the public, and I have that object constantly in view. The resources of the National Debt Commissioners afford me the means of doing so, and they would gradually absorb the excess. Another possible means of reducing the amount in the hands of the public would be the issue of Consols on a large scale, the proceeds of which would be applied to paying off Bills, but I do not contemplate such a course. It would disturb the money market and the Consol market, and would, under present circumstances, certainly not be profitable to the State. I look on a gradual reduction as a preferable policy. I hope that, if the right hon. Member will only give me time enough, I may leave a reduced amount of Unfunded Debt to whoever may be my successor.

BRITISH ENTERPRISE IN SERVIA.

SIR ROPER LETHBRIDGE (Kensington, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to a statement in the Times of 10th July, that an important concession for the salting and curing of pork at Nish has been granted to a British subject by the Servian Government; whether the Foreign Office has received any information regarding this concession; and, whether Her Majesty's Consuls in the Danubian States have been instructed to report fully on such openings for British enterprise?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: An exclusive concession for pork-curing has been granted to a British subject for 15 years, with certain requirements as to his erection of a factory and obligation to slaughter 60,000 hogs in the first year, 80,000 in the second, and 100,000 in the third, with many contingent privileges and immunities. Her Majesty's diplomatic and consular officers all over the world are instructed to report on enterprises which offer openings for British capital, and notices of such Reports are frequently published. These instructions were laid before Parliament in No. 16 Commercial, 1886.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if it is to be clearly understood that the answer he has given is by no means an assurance or intimation of the opinion of the Government that this particular concern is a sound commercial investment?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No, Sir; I merely stated the effect of the Report made to the Foreign Office.

CARNARVONSHIRE QUARRIES.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether there is a probability of the negotiations now pending for the grant of a lease of the Gwylwyr Sett Quarry, Pistyll, Carnarvonshire, being brought to a speedy and successful determination? I wish further to ask, whether, having regard to the vital importance of the Gwylwyr Sett Quarry, Pistyll, Carnarvonshire, to the quarrying population in that district, he will take steps to ensure that no lease shall be granted of that quarry which does not contain a proviso for its being worked by an adequate number of men; and whether, in the event of there being more than one application for such a lease, he will advise the selection of the applicant who has the greatest interest in and is the most likely to develop the quarry.

VOL. CCCXLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. JACKSON: There is a probability that the negotiations will be brought to a speedy and successful determination. It is usual to insert in Crown leases of quarries a covenant requiring the employment of a certain number of men, and, so far as is known at present, there seems no reason for omitting that covenant in the case of the Gwylwyr Quarry.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS—Messrs. BRYANT & MAY.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he has received any communication from Messrs. Bryant & May, contradicting the official statement that, although appealing for public support on the ground that they were large employers of British labour, they had a factory in Sweden for the supply of the English market and Her Majesty's Service; and, further, if it is true that an annual contract has been recently renewed by Her Majesty's Government with a middleman for the supply of Swedish safety matches to order, and, in such case, if directions can be issued to the public Departments that, wherever practicable, goods made by British or Irish labour are to be ordered, having regard to the congested state of British labour, and the desirability of returning the taxation of the people, so far as circumstances allow, in industrial wages?

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I should like to ask whether the recent statistics published by the Labour Bureau of the Board of Trade do not show that the labour market is not congested?

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: Before my right hon. Friend answers the question of the hon. Member for Northampton, let me ask him if the Reports of the Labour Department of the Board of Trade should not refer almost exclusively to the state of the skilled labour market, on the evidence of the Trades Unions who consent to report, and not to the masses of unskilled labour?

MR. JACKSON: I am afraid that it would be out of order if I were to enter into that matter. Since I answered a question on the same subject the other day, I have been informed by Messrs. Bryant & May that they ceased to have any interest in the Swedish factory at which the "Lion" matches are made, in 1886, and that their matches are made only at their Fairfield Works at Bow. I am unable to suggest to my right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works a course which would preclude his purchasing any articles necessary for the Public Service, even though such articles be manufactured abroad.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: Does my right hon. Friend mean that, although British working men may be starving at the gates of Parliament for want of employment, public money may be fitly used in remunerating foreign labour?

*MR. BRADLAUGH: May I ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the periodical Returns of the Labour Department do not contradict the view that there is a congested state of the labour market?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I must ask for notice.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE AND THE GRENADIER GUARDS.

CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, as Colonel of the Grenadier Guards on full pay, is in any degree responsible for the discipline and efficiency of that regiment, or whether the appointment is a paid sinecure?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, as the Colonel of the Grenadier Guards, is in the same position as all other honorary colonels, and is in no way responsible for the discipline and efficiency of the regiment.

TRAM AND RIVER STEAMER FARES.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that some Tram and River Steamer Companies in the metropolitan district are in the habit of charging double, and, in some instances, quadruple, the ordinary fares on Bank Holidays; and, if so, whether this excess charge is legal?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): This is a matter with which I have no power to deal, and, on the question of fact, no information has reached me. I cannot undertake to express any opinion on the legal point, but may observe that in the case of tramways the fares are fixed by the special Acts of Parliament.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Cannot these companies be compelled to fix up in legible characters outside a list of fares?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I cannot answer that question off-hand.

SWAZILAND.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that a Convention has been signed with the Transvaal Government, and whether that Convention excludes Her Majesty's Government from the paramount position in Swaziland conceded to it under the Convention of 1884; and whether Her Majesty's Government have acquiesced in the demand of the Transvaal State for extension of their site to the sea?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Her Majesty's Government are not aware that a Convention has been signed with the Transvaal about Swaziland; but if the hon. Member will repeat his question in a few days, I trust that I may be in a position to give him some information on the subject. The hon. Member will see that it would not be in the public interest that I should give further information until negotiations are concluded.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I will repeat the question on Monday.

SLAVERY IN ZANZIBAR.

SIR LEWIS PELLY (Hackney, N.) I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, referring to the telegrams from Zanzibar appearing in the Times of Saturday 26th July, which state that the Arabs at Zanzibar, under the influence of intriguing advisers, are becoming much alarmed as to the effect of the forthcoming British Protectorate on their slaves, is there any intention that the private property of Arabs in domestic slaves should be confiscated on the Sultanate passing under the protection of this country?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have received no confirmation of the reported agitation among the Arabs. There is no intention of confiscating domestic slaves, but every effort will be made to insure the carrying out of the provisions of the Act of Brussels, and the prevention of abuses.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Are we to understand that when a country is put under the British flag, slavery is to be retained?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: There is no idea of putting the dominions of the Sultan of Zanzibar under the British flag.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): May I ask whether it has not been stated that the Protectorate of Zanzibar is to be established in a concrete fashion; and, if so, is slavery to be upheld?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I only said it is not intended to assume the Protectorate in so complete, not concrete, a fashion as to exclude the commerce of other Powers. I think it will be found that the measures to be taken on the coast will largely result in the suppression of slavery.

H.M.S. BARHAM.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, when the Barham broke down for the third time on Thursday last, the engines were being worked at the guaranteed power of 6,000 horses; if not, at what rate; whether the main cause of this vessel's repeated breakdowns is that no margin is left for the expansion of the tubes when subject to intense heat, the result being that the tubes are forced through the plates at the fire-box, and thus the collapse of the boilers; and what steps are being adopted to make the vessel seaworthy, and also to prevent similar casualties occurring with the sister ship Bellona, now in course of completion?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The machinery of the Barham was not being worked on Thursday, the 24th inst., at the power specified, but at 3,800 horses, being 300 above the guaranteed natural draught power. The boilers of this ship are of the wet bottom locomotive type, and were constructed by a firm having great experience in boilers of this class in the usual manner, and with provision for expansion under heat. The cause of the leakage of the tubes is under investigation, and experiments are now being made as to the steps to be taken to overcome this defect, both in the Bellona as well as the Barham.

TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education if he can inform the House to what extent the Technical Instruction Act of last year has been put into operation in England and Ireland respectively, and to what extent "The Technical Schools (Scotland) Act, 1887," has been availed of in Scotland?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I have no information as regards Scotland, but if the hon. Member will refer to pages 43 and 44 of the recent Report of the Science and Art Department, he will see that very gratifying progress is being made in bringing the Act of last Session into active operation.

GERMAN PROTECTORATE OF ZANZIBAR.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, under Article I. of the General Act of the Conference at Berlin (1885), the Conference Powers agreed to use their good offices with the Governments established on the African shore of the Indian Ocean, for the purpose of obtaining their approval to the establishment of complete Free Trade within their respective territories, and, in any case, of securing the most favourable conditions to the transit traffic of all nations; and whether the Conference Powers did use their good offices in the sense indicated; and, if so, with what results?

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): I beg also to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been drawn to that part of the Declaration of the West African Conference embodied in Article VIII. of the Anglo-German Agreement, and whether, therefore, it will be beyond the rights of the German Authorities to levy duties upon British and Indian trade in the German Protectorate of Zanzibar, including the 600 miles of coast territory, of which Great Britain has engaged to facilitate the absolute cession to Germany; and, if not, in virtue of what special arrangement between Her Majesty's Government and Germany will the German Authorities be entitled to levy duties?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Act of Berlin, which must be meant by the "Declaration of the West African Conference," stipulates that in a certain defined zone no Import or Transit Duties shall be levied. There is no restriction as to the levying of Export Duties except a provision against differential treatment. The prohibition as to Import Duties is modified by the Declaration appended to the Act of Brussels, which permits their being levied up to a maximum of 10 per cent. ad valorem except in the case of spirits. The territory of the Sultan of Zanzibar, though within the zone, was not to be subjected to the trade system of the Act, except with His Highness's approval, which has not been given. Duties on British and Indian trade at Zanzibar, both on the mainland and on the coast administered by the British and German Companies, are levied in accordance with the Commercial Treaty of 1886, which allows a maximum of 5 per cent. on imports, excepting spirits, on which the duty is 25 per cent., and certain specified duties on exports. If a portion of the Zanzibar coast is ceded to Germany, duties on British and Indian goods will continue to be levied under the Treaty, or if the free zone system is applied under that system, as amended by the Brussels Act. Under either the trade is protected from any differential treatment or excessive burdens.

MR. SUMMERS: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the second part of my question.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No, Sir; the Powers have never exercised their influence in the sense indicated.

MR. BUCHANAN: What are the portions of the German sphere of influence within the limits of the Free Trade zone, to which the provisions of Article VIII. of the Anglo-German Agreement are to apply?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I must ask for notice of that question.

MR. A. R. SAWYER.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is true that Mr. A. R. Sawyer, Assistant Inspector of Mines for the district of North Staffordshire, has resigned, or offered to resign, his appointment; if so, whether such resignation has been accepted by the Government; and whether he will state the alleged grounds for such resignation?

Sir J. Fergusson

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; Mr. Sawyer resigned in February last. The ground of his resignation was that he was suffering from an affliction of the eyes, which was aggravated by his occupation as an Inspector of Mines. He retired on medical certificate, and received a pension from the Treasury.

THE LIVERPOOL TELEGRAPHISTS.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the Chief Superintendent at the telegraph branch of the Liverpool Post Office has refused to allow a Petition from the Liverpool telegraphists, praying for the reinstatement of the exiled Cardiff telegraphists, to lie for signature within the official premises under his control; and whether this is contrary to usage?

MR. RAIKES: No, Sir; I have received no information on the subject referred to in the question, but I will make inquiry.

THE SCOTCH MAILS.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether arrangements have yet been completed to accelerate the mails between London and the North-East of Scotland?

MR. RAIKES: I am happy to inform the hon. Member that arrangements have been made for accelerating the night mail service between London and Aberdeen on and from the night of the 4th proximo. The mail will reach Aberdeen nearly an hour earlier, and the return mail to London will leave Aberdeen nearly an hour later.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, inasmuch as the laws relating to Parliamentary elections fill a very considerable space in the Statutes of the realm, and that the total number of Acts, and portions of Acts, now in force relating to such elections, qualification, disqualification, &c., of Members of this House, the qualification, registration, and mode of voting of electors, and other matters, extends to something like 180 Acts, the Government will, during the Recess, consider the propriety of preparing a measure for consolidating, amending, and simplifying the law relating to Parliamentary elections, and matters connected therewith?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The subject to which the hon. Gentleman calls the attention of the Government will receive very careful consideration.

CARDINAL MANNING.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government have advised or mean to advise Her Majesty in the issue of Royal Commissions or similar documents to give precedence by courtesy next after the Royal Family to Cardinal Manning or any other priest of any of the unestablished religious sects in this country; and, if so, whether that act of courtesy is one dependent on age, or any considerations other than the claims of the Religious Body to which he belongs?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not competent to express any opinion on such a difficult question as precedence. Such matters are regulated by Act of Parliament, and we have no intention of introducing a Bill on the subject.

SIR LINTORN SIMMONS'S MISSION.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether His Holiness the Pope, in the farewell audience granted to Sir Lintorn Simmons on the affairs of Malta, said that—

"Negotiations conducted in this way between the Holy See and Her Majesty's Government would be beneficial as regards the people of Malta, but might also be usefully extended to other parts of the Empire where Catholic interests were of great importance;"

and whether, in accordance with the suggestion of His Holiness, it is the intention of the Government to send special Missions to the Vatican to discuss questions of administration and legislation affecting Catholics in other portions of the British Empire besides Malta?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: This is a Departmental question, and had better be answered by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. In the case of purely Departmental questions (of which there are several on the Paper addressed to me) it would be better that they should be addressed to the person responsible, who would be able to give information which I cannot give myself.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The passage is correctly quoted from Sir Lintorn Simmons's Despatch of April 7, reporting his final audience to the Pope, which was presented to the House in Miscellaneous No. 1. Her Majesty's Government do not at present contemplate sending any further Mission to the Vatican.

JEWS IN RUSSIA.

MR. FORREST FULTON (West Ham, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is true, as stated by the correspondent of the Times, of 30th July, that the Russian Government have ordered the enforcement of supposed obsolete laws, which would compel all Jews in Russia now engaged in agriculture to abandon their occupations and migrate into the towns; to force all Jews living throughout Russia to migrate into 16 specified countries; to deny them any educational advantages; and to prevent their following the literal professions, such as the law and medicine; and whether, if this report be true, the Government will take steps, either alone or in conjunction with the other great Powers, to protest against such an exercise of arbitrary power upon the unoffending members of an important nationality, many of whom are domiciled in the British dominions?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: According to information supplied by Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires in St. Petersburg last month, no measure depriving the Jews of such privileges as they now enjoy in the Russian Empire was intended.

THE ANGLO-FRENCH AGREEMENT.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in the proposed Anglo-French Agreement, the Government will take care that in any enlargement of the sphere of influence of France in North Africa, complete freedom of trade shall be secured?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is impossible for Her Majesty's Government to pledge itself in advance to make any particular stipulations, but it is manifestly their duty and intention to consult British interests to the utmost possible extent in any negotiations with foreign Powers. To require the abolition of all Customs Duties in territory on the southern frontier of Algeria would be to require the same abolition in Algeria itself, as an internal Custom House is evidently very difficult.

AGREEMENTS WITH FOREIGN POWERS.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that Article VIII. of the Treaty of Paris stipulates that "If there should arise between the Sublime Porte and one or more of the other Signing Powers any misunderstanding which might endanger the maintenance of their relations, the Sublime Porte, and each of such Powers, before having recourse to the use of force, shall afford the other contracting parties the opportunity of preventing such an extremity by means of their mediation;"

and whether Her Majesty's Ministers will consider the advisability of acting in conformity with this precedent, and of inserting arbitration clauses in agreements which they may hereafter make with Foreign Powers?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: As the House has been already informed, Her Majesty's Government are favourable to arbitration where the circumstances render that course expedient; but they cannot enter into any such general engagement as is indicated.

IRELAND—PETTY SESSIONS CLERK OF KILREA.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the election by the Magistrates, on the 7th of July, of Mr. Hay, as Petty Sessions Clerk of the Kilna district; whether the late Petty Sessions Clerk of this district obtained his appointment on the condition of residence in Kilrea; whether Mr. Hay, who has been appointed in preference to several other candidates, fills the office of Petty Sessions Clerk in Coleraine, a town 18 miles distant from Kilrea; and whether this dual position is compatible with the due and efficient discharge of the duties of either post; whether he is aware that Mr. Hay had been previously dismissed from the clerkship of Petty Sessions in Coleraine in consequence of several grave irregularities in connection with that office, and was only reinstated to the post after two elections by the Magistrates; and what action, having regard to the circumstances of the case, does the Government propose to take with reference to the ratification of this gentleman's election to the Petty Sessions clerkship at Kilrea?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Registrar of Petty Sessions Clerks reports that the late Clerk of Petty Sessions of Kilrea obtained his appointment on the condition of residence in Kilrea. He held that clerkship alone, and in such cases the rule is that a clerk must reside in his district. Mr. Hay, the present clerk, resides at Coleraine. He is permitted to do so because he holds the clerkship of Coleraine as well as that of Kilrea. Care will be taken that he makes adequate attendances at Kilrea, which is connected with Coleraine by rail. In many instances the duties of two or more districts are satisfactorily discharged by one clerk, and there is no reason to doubt that Mr. Hay's dual position is compatible. It is true that in 1867 Mr. Hay was dismissed from the clerkship of Coleraine, for irregularities resulting from intemperance. He was re-elected at one, not two, elections, in November, 1888. The Lord Lieutenant, after long and careful consideration, approved of his re-appointment, all claims against Mr. Hay having been fully discharged, and it being shown that his life during the 21 years between dismissal and re-election had been steady and respectable. His conduct since re-appointment has been excellent, and His Excellency does not propose to interfere with his holding the clerkship of Kilrea.

THE CORK TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, when dealing with the case of the Cork telegraph office, under his new scheme, inquiry was made as to the relative cost of living and house rent in Cork and Belfast where the maximum pay for first-class telegraphists is to be 4s. a week in excess of that at Cork; whether such inquiry, if not already instituted, will be made; whether the classification and average amount of work performed by first-class telegraphists in Cork and Belfast are equal, and the strain on individuals identical in both cases; whether, in the new scheme, many offices that perform no night duty and deal with no heavy Press work are put on an equality with Cork with regard to pay though the latter, as regards both these harassing duties, is in the same category with the first-class offices in Ireland and England that are favoured with the new higher maximum salaries; and whether, in view of these circumstances, the claims of Cork, to be placed in an intermediate position as regards pay between these two classes of offices, as Belfast has been, will be considered, especially if the contention of the Cork staff that the cost of living and house rent in Belfast are not in excess of those in Cork should be found to be correct?

MR. RAIKES: The points referred to have been considered, but the hon. Member must perceive that the position of the various towns and offices must be regarded from a somewhat larger point of view, and I am satisfied that, looking at the conditions of Cork as a whole, that it has been placed in its proper category, and that it would not be right for me to alter the arrangement.

THE TRIAL OF CAPTAIN RYE.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether Mr. John S. Collins was one of the jury who tried the case of Captain Richard Tonsen Rye, J.P., D.L., who was charged at the present Cork Assizes for unlawfully firing at and wounding Jeremiah Corcoran; is he aware that a Mr. John S. Collins wrote a letter to the Cork Constitution, the local Conservative paper, on the 11th April last, in which he condemned the Magistrates at Farran Petty Sessions for having sent the case forward for trial; and is this Mr. Collins the same person as the Mr. Collins who served on the jury; and, if so, how did it happen that he was allowed to sit on a case which he had publicly prejudged?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I have no means of obtaining information on the subject of this question. If it be true that Mr. Collins wrote the letter imputed to him, he proved himself to be eminently open to reason, for, having heard the evidence, he concurred in a verdict of guilty against Captain Rye.

MR. FLYNN: Is this man the Collins who wrote the letter; and, if so, why did not the Crown Solicitor instruct him to stand by, seeing that more than 30 challenges were made by the Crown?

*MR. MADDEN: I have already said that I have been unable to obtain the information.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Was it not the duty of the Crown Solicitor to prevent this man from serving on the jury?

*MR. MADDEN: Certainly it was, if the facts are true, but the fact I have been unable to find out is that he is the man who wrote the letter. Beyond all doubt if he had expressed an opinion one way or the other he ought not to have been on the jury.

MR. SEXTON: If I put a question on Monday will the right hon. Gentleman have sufficient opportunity to enable him to ascertain in the meantime if this was the same person?

*MR. MADDEN: I have no means of ascertaining.

MR. MAC NEILL: Is it not the fact that Captain Rye was charged with firing at and unlawfully wounding Corcoran, and that he was only tried for a common assault?

[No answer was returned.]

EAST LANCASHIRE REGIMENT.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): At the request of the Secretary of State for War I beg to postpone a question I intended to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether his attention has been called to the report in the Newry Reporter of 26th June, 1890, of an action for trespass against Captain Irwin, of the East Lancashire Regiment, brought before the County Court Judge of Down at the last sitting of the County Court at Newry, from which it appears that, on the 15th July, 1889, Captain Irwin and about 60 men of his regiment were going through a "night attack," in the course of which a number of his men trespassed on the lands of Mr. James Goodman, of Cloghmore, and did damage to his crops; whether he has observed that it appeared in evidence that, when Mr. Goodman protested against the trespass on his crops, one of the soldiers pointed a revolver at him and threatened to shoot him; whether Mr. Goodman offered to leave to arbitration the amount of loss sustained by him; whether Colonel Griffiths, on 14th August last, in answer to a letter of Mr. T. J. Marron, Solicitor for Mr. Goodman, referred Mr. Marron to Captain Irwin as "the officer who was in sole command, and who was solely responsible for any occurrence connected with his party on that night;" whether, at the trial, advantage was taken of the fact that the trespassers were under the immediate command of the colour-sergeant, and that the proper defendant was not before the Court; and whether the Judge is correctly reported to have said "he believed damage had been done by the military, but he could not hold Captain Irwin liable," and he dismissed the case;" and whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the matter, and see that fair compensation be given to Mr. Goodman for the damage done to his property by the soldiers on that occasion.

THE ROYAL IRISH RIFLES.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is intended to supply the Royal Irish Rifles with the new pattern head-dress, which has been served to the Rifle Brigade and to the 60th Rifles, in place of helmets?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The whole question of the head-dress for Rifle Regiments is now under consideration.

OUTRAGE IN TRALEE.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in the district of Tralee, County Kerry, four stabs were inflicted on a donkey belonging to Thomas Grogan, on an evicted farm; if so, whether any one has been made amenable for the outrage?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that in the district of Tralee a donkey which was grazing on an evicted farm was found on the 22nd instant to be stabbed in four places. No person appears to have been so far made amenable for this cowardly and cruel outrage.

Mr. McCarlan

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Has it been brought to the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman that the punctures were such as might have been made by a Constabulary bayonet?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the owner of a racehorse stabbed his own animal and then obtained 100 guineas from the Grand Jury?

[No answer was returned.]

CHARGE AGAINST A PETTY SESSIONS CLERK.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that Francis C. Garvey, of Murrisk Abbey, Mayo, Ireland, who was appointed clerk of Petty Sessions for Lonisburgh district by the Justices of said district, and also recently appointed Commissioner for taking affidavits by the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland, was dismissed his ship and the Service, he being then an officer in the Royal Navy, on a charge of larceny, and was sentenced to a term of imprisonment; and whether, in the face of the above-mentioned finding, he will be continued in the position of trust and emolument to which he has been appointed?

MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to defer the question until some day next week. The Registrar of Petty Sessions clerks is making inquiries.

DR. TANNER: The matter is one of very great importance, and I ask that an answer shall be vouchsafed at the earliest possible opportunity. I will put the question down again for Monday and shall expect an answer.

APPEAL ON SUMMARY CONVICTION.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, considering that the Law in England allows every person convicted by summary jurisdiction, and sentenced to imprisonment without the option of a fine, the right of appeal to a superior Court, whilst the law in Ireland denies such appeal except when the term of imprisonment exceeds one month, the Government will take any step to modify the system by which Magistrates in Ireland are able to refuse to increase sentences of one month and under, and so withhold from persons summarily convicted in Ireland the right of review by a superior Court enjoyed in every case as a matter of legal right in England? I wish to explain that the question has been fundamentally altered since I handed it in, and that I did not refer to the ordinary Justices at all.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can only answer the question as it appears on the Paper. The difference between the two countries depends on the terms of the Petty Sessions Act, 1851, which govern all summary jurisdiction. It is impossible without legislation to modify the system, and legislation, even if desirable in the abstract, is obviously impossible in existing circumstances.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman introduce a non-contentious Bill to assimilate the law of the two countries; and, if not, will he lay on the Table of the House a declaration that it is expedient to give the same right of appeal to prisoners sentenced in Ireland as that which is now enjoyed by prisoners sentenced in England? The right hon. Gentleman must remember that he promised an appeal in all cases.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I deny that, either in public or private, I ever intimated any intention of interfering with the Magistrates in the exercise of their judicial functions.

Several IRISH MEMBERS: You did.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman bring in a Bill to assimilate the law of Ireland to that of England in respect of the right of appeal?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It would be obviously absurd to undertake to introduce this Session a Bill to make so important a change in the law.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman introduce a Bill next Session?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can make no promise of the kind.

THE ARTILLERY RANGE AT ROSSBEIGH

MR. EDWARD HARRINGTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any Memorial has reached his Department from fishermen of Crombane, Killorglin, County Kerry, whose industry has been affected at the most favourable fishing season by the fact that the confluence of the three rivers in which they trawl salmon is in the line of fire of the Artillery range at Rossbeigh; whether the names of such men, who have (after paying for their £3 licences) been hampered in their industry, have been forwarded to the War Office; and will their representation be favourably considered?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Memorials have been received from seven fishermen of Rossbeigh and Crombane asking for compensation for losses in salmon fishing consequent on Artillery practice at Glenbeigh. The Chief Crown Solicitor in Ireland reports that on completion of the Bye Laws for the Artillery Range at Glenbeigh, the question of the rights of the fishermen will have to be considered; and as the petitioners' claims to compensation for disturbance in the pursuit of their industry depend upon their possession of such rights, the matter must be left in the Crown Solicitor's hands for further report. The Irish Fishery Department have also offered to hold a local inquiry into the case.

MR. PERCY MAGAN, J.P.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can now state what decision the Irish Land Commissioners have come to with regard to the explanation given by Mr. Percy Magan, J.P., to the charge of having obtained money under the Arrears Act by false representations; whether he will lay the explanation before the House; and, whether, the Land Commission showing by their demand for an explanation that a prima facie case had been made out, he still declines to take any steps to direct the attention of the Lord Chancellor to the case, with the view of having Magan suspended from the discharge of magisterial functions pending a full inquiry.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that they have considered the charges made by the hon. Member, and Mr. Magan's reply thereto, and that they intend to forward a Report in the matter to the Lord Lieutenant. The Executive Government now await the receipt of that Report.

MR. SEXTON: As a prima facie case has been established, will not the Government in the meantime suspend Mr. Magan?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As the Law Officers of the Crown have not yet seen the Report, the hon. Member will see that they cannot take any action in the matter.

LAND COMMISSION—WICKLOW.

MR. HAYDEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on the County Leitrim estate of Mr. William R. La Touche, Bellevue, Wicklow, originating notices have been served as far back as October, 1887, which have not yet been heard by the Land Sub-Commission; whether he is aware that it is proposed to sell the estate under a mortgage; and, whether, in view of the fact that under such circumstances it is very undesirable that the rent should remain undecided, he is in a position to state the date for the next sitting of the Sub-Commission in Carrick-on-Shannon.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that there are only five cases outstanding on the estate referred to. They were all received subsequently to October, 1887. An application has been made to the Land Commission to purchase this estate, which is for sale in the Land Judge's Court, with a view to re-sale of the same to the tenants. Three of these cases, which are in the Poor Law Union of Bawnboy, will probably appear in the Ballyconnell October list. No arrangements have yet been made for a Sub-Commission sitting for the Union of Carrick-on-Shannon.

LAND COMMISSION—DOWN AND ANTRIM.

MR. McCARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware of the dissatisfaction among the farmers of the Counties of Down and Antrim, who have upwards of two years ago served notices to have fair rents fixed, and who, pending the hearing of their applications, are now obliged to pay the old rack rents; whether the Sub-Commissioners appointed for Down and Antrim were some time ago taken away from their work there, and sent to another part of Ireland; whether anything has been since done in these counties to give to the tenants the benefits conferred upon them by the Land Acts; and, whether, considering the inability of the tenants to pay the old rents, and the number of ejectment decrees already obtained against them, he will give directions to have the Sub-Commissioners sent back to these counties without delay?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that all applications to fix fair rents in the Counties of Down and Antrim have been disposed of up to the end of the year 1887. In April last the Commissioners found it necessary to move the Sub-Commission which had been working in the counties in question to the Counties of Mayo and Sligo, in order that the undisposed of cases in those districts might be brought up to a level date. According to the present arrangements a Sub-Commission will commence the hearing of the cases from the Counties of Down and Antrim on the 7th of October next. In the case of any tenant proceeded against for the old rent, it is open to him to apply to the Court for a stay of execution or other order as to the Court may seem fit, and where the tenant pays at the old rate he is entitled to make a future deduction for the difference between such payment and any reduced rate at which the judicial rent may be fixed.

CONVICT PRISONERS AT CHATHAM.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a Member of this House was not permitted to have an interview with James Egan, a prisoner in the Convict Prison at Chatham, except in the presence and hearing of a warder, although such interview was granted at the convict's own request, whereas agents for the Times, and detectives in the service of the Times, were permitted to hold interviews with convicts both in Chatham Prison and other prisons in England, such interviews being unsolicited by the convicts, and held on some occasions in the presence, but not in the hearing, of a warder, and on other occasions out of the presence and hearing of a warder; and on what ground is the distinction of treatment of a Times agent and detective and the treatment of a Member of this House maintained?

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I also beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, with reference to the case of Egan, whether he is aware that the warden in charge of the prisoner told the hon. Member for South Wexford, during his visit to Egan on Monday last, that "he (the warden) had received special instructions not to permit the slightest reference to the treatment of the prisoner," and by whom such special instructions were given; whether Egan solemnly protested that "it was a matter of life and death to him" to be allowed to refer to it; whether he is aware that the friends of the prisoner apprehend the most grave circumstances unless he allows a visit by some independent person in whom the prisoner will have confidence; and whether, considering the peculiar circumstances, he will now allow such a visit?

MR. MATTHEWS: The interview with James Egan, at Chatham, alluded to in the question, was subject to the practice which governs all ordinary visits, namely, that they take place in the presence and hearing of a prison officer. I am not aware of any exception having been made to this rule. Visits by solicitors on business are special visits. They are allowed to take place before conviction in the sight, but not in the hearing, of an officer; and in local prisons the Commissioners have, in their discretion, allowed similar visits after conviction. The visits of Mr. Soames to convicted prisoners at Chatham took place in the sight and hearing of the Deputy Governor. His agents saw some prisoners in a local prison in the sight, but out of the hearing, of the prison officers. I am not aware of any such visit having been held out of the sight of a prison officer. I have more than once explained in this House that a distinction is made by the Prison Authorities between ordinary visits and visits by solicitors on business, and this is the sole cause of the difference alluded to by the hon. Member. No special instructions were, so far as I know, given to the warden in charge of the prisoner with reference to the visit of the hon. Member for South Wexford. The general instructions given to all visitors are that reference to prison treatment is not allowed. Any complaint by a prisoner of his prison treatment should be addressed, not to an outside visitor, but to the Governor, or to the Prison Directors, or to the Secretary of State, or to the Visitors of the prison, who are perfectly independent, and who, a short time ago, made a special inquiry covering Egan's treatment. I have requested the Visiting Director to make immediate inquiry from Egan personally as to his complaints.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the hon. Member for South Wexford (Mr. J. Barry) sought to obtain from the prisoner in question a statement as to the treatment he received, but that the warden interrupted him, stating that he had received special instructions not to permit the slightest reference to the matter; that Egan then protested that it was a matter of life and death to him, and seemed greatly distressed, pressing his hand to his head. In view of the peculiar circumstances of this case, will the right hon. Gentleman consent to allow some person quite independent of the prison, not necessarily a Member of the House, but someone in whose discretion the right hon. Gentleman himself would have confidence, to have a private interview with the prisoner, and represent to the right hon. Gentleman the result of the interview, so that the impression which exists in the public mind regarding Egan's treatment may be removed?

MR. MATTHEWS: I must remind the hon. Gentleman that only a short while ago a special inquiry was made into the prison treatment at Chatham, and with the result with which the hon. Member is, no doubt, acquainted. Inquiry will, however, be made into this subject, and if I find there is any difficulty in getting a full statement from Egan of his complaint, I will request some one not connected with the Service to hold an inquiry. But I must point out that it would be destructive to prison discipline if Members of Parliament or other persons outside were to make a claim to investigate these cases.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: In the case of prisoners in Scotland, has it not been decided that they are entitled to additional letters in consequence of the difficulty of seeing them.

MR. MATTHEWS: In a matter of detail of that kind it would be better to put a question on the Paper.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I may remind the right hon. Gentleman that I have already put a question on the subject, and that he promised to make inquiry. I now ask him what the result of the inquiry is?

MR. MATTHEWS: I do not remember the circumstance. If the hon. Member desires to have a correct answer, he had better put a question on the Paper.

SHELBOURNE NATIONAL SCHOOL, KENMARE.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attendance in the Shelbourne National School, Kenmare, the class of the principal teacher, and the condition of the school, warrant the appointment of two monitors; whether he is aware that Julia O'Sullivan, sister to the principal teacher, recently passed successfully the required examination for monitress, but was rejected merely because, owing to the illness of the local Registrar, a certificate of her age was not forwarded within six days; and what has been the average daily attendance for past year and for past quarter in said school, and what is its present teaching staff?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Commissioners of National Education report that the appointment of two monitors is not warranted. The condition of the school has not been satisfactory. Within a period of little over three years the teacher had to be twice reprimanded, once cautioned, and once admonished. The previous monitor, moreover, failed badly in his fourth year's examination. The application was refused for the foregoing reason, and because no recommendation was received from the Inspector, who stated he was doubtful as to the advisability of the appointment, and he thought it would be well to postpone the question until next year to afford time for a further observation of the working of the school. The last recorded annual average—that for the year 1889—was 71·6; the average for last quarter was 86. The staff of the school at present consists of a principal and an assistant teacher.

MAIL SERVICES BETWEEN LARNE AND STRANRAER.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General to what decision he has come with respect to the representations and suggestions lately made to him for acceleration of the mail services by the Larne and Stranraer route; is the right hon. Gentleman aware that letters were received only, to-day, too late for delivery?

MR. RAIKES: I have received no information to that effect, and shall be sorry to find that it has been so. In reply to the question on the Paper I have to say that the Railway Companies concerned have not yet furnished me with a statement showing definitely the terms on which they would be prepared to provide a greatly accelerated service via Stranraer and Larne. I am, therefore, not yet in a position to come to any decision in the matter; but, meanwhile, I have ordered Returns of correspondence to be taken, with a view to determine what expenditure, if any, might properly be incurred for the establishment of the service desired.

THE NATIONAL LIBRARY, DUBLIN.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether complaints have reached him that the furniture supplied to the National Library in Dublin is of an inferior and unsuitable class; and whether directions will be given that the furniture shall be in keeping with the panelling, doors, and other woodwork fittings of the interior?

MR. JACKSON: I have not heard any complaint so far, but I will communicate the question of the hon. Gentleman to the Board of Works.

MR. SEXTON: I trust I may be allowed to express a hope that this important National institution will not be furnished like a waiting-room at a railway station.

EX-CONSTABLE PALMER.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is true that ex-constable Palmer was interviewed and recognised by the detective police at Queenstown on the steamship Arizona when escaping from justice; and whether any attempt to effect his extradition will be made by the Dublin Castle Authorities?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that they have grounds for believing that the ex-constable when on board the steamship was spoken to by the detectives, but that it is not true that they recognised him. The man gave his name as "Joseph Pears." The police did not observe anything to suggest suspicion. The offence is not one to which extradition applies.

DR. TANNER: Did not a man see him on board the Arizona who had been in the Force with him for six months?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is a matter of fact of which I must have notice.

MICHAEL MORISSEY.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, seeing that Michael Morissey is now nearly five months in prison for contempt in disobeying an order which he could not legally obey, he will recommend his immediate release?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As I have already stated, the Government have no title to interfere with the discretion of a Judge in a case where he has made a committal for contempt of Court.

DERRY PRISON.

DR. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the sanitary condition of Derry Prison, if it is true, as stated in the Report of Major Beamish, that the "soil pipes of the prison are deficient of disconnecting traps and air inlets" at the point where they join the soil drains of the prison?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With regard to the point in Major Beamish's Report as to the condition of the soil pipes in Derry Prison, the General Prisons Board refer to their statements in paragraphs 3 and 4 of page 8 of that Report. Since that Report the ventilating pipe recommended in connection with the public sewer of the town has been erected by the Corporation, and the new medical member of the Board has also visited the prison, and is clearly in accord with the former expressed opinion of the Board as to the satisfactory condition of the drainage of this prison. The Board further add there is in this prison a system in full operation for the complete and frequent flushing of the drains, which is found to be most effective.

DR. FITZGERALD: I think the right hon. Gentleman does not understand that the town drainage in no way affects these traps. Will he make further inquiry?

DR. TANNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the question. Yes or no?

THE REVOLUTION IN ARGENTINA.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): Has the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs any information to give with regard to Buenos Ayres?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: This telegram arrived to-day, dated 7 o'clock last evening:—"Everything settled; town quiet; street traffic resumed."

MR. SCHWANN: Is there any information from San Salvador and Guatemala.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No, Sir, nothing yet.

WARSHIPS AND DISABLED FISHING BOATS.

MR. M. CAMERON (Wick, &c.) I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the stranding of the fishing boat Missionary, of Stornoway, in Wick Bay, and to the ineffectual efforts made by the crew of another boat, named Orient, to get her afloat, that during those efforts the gunboat Jackal lay quietly at anchor, while her commander, owing to the want of steam, could not offer any effectual assistance beyond sending a small boat to the stranded craft; whether it is not the duty of the commander of the Jackal to have sufficient steam continuously in his ship's boilers to enable him at any moment to weigh anchor and render assistance to disabled fishing boats; and whether the noble Lord is prepared to substitute for so antiquated a vessel as the Jackal one of more modern construction?

LORD G. HAMILTON: It is an error to suppose that it is the business of Her Majesty's war-ships to keep up steam for the purpose of assisting fishing boats in distress. Their duty consists in protecting fishermen, or in seeing that foreign fishermen do not interfere with them.

MR. M. CAMERON: Then are we to understand that it is not the duty of the officer in charge of a vessel appointed to look after the fisheries to render a boat assistance when it is in difficulties?

LORD G. HAMILTON: No doubt assistance should be given in such cases, but that is not the object with which a vessel is sent on duty.

MR. M. CAMERON: I shall refer to the matter on the Estimates.

THE IMPRISONED GUARDSMEN.

MR. E. STANHOPE: Some 10 days ago I was asked a question, which I was not then able to answer, with respect to the six Guardsmen recently tried by Court Martial and sentenced to terms of imprisonment. I hope the House will now allow me to answer it. In the interests of the men themselves, I hope that no attempt will be made, either in this House or by means of any public meeting, to put any pressure on the War Office in this matter, because it will be clear to the House that any sympathy shown or suggested with a gross breach of discipline will at once aggravate its importance and its danger. I think, however, that there will be a general feeling that the sentences passed upon these men were in themselves severe. The time has not yet arrived to decide this question, but I have requested the Commander-in-Chief, and he has readily undertaken to examine the cases of these men, including their subsequent behaviour in prison, with the view of considering whether, with due regard to the requirements of military discipline, any remission of the sentences could be granted.

SIR G. ERRINGTON'S MISSION TO THE VATICAN.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a question, of which I have given him private notice—whether there are any Papers in the Foreign Office relating to the Mission of Sir G. Errington to the Vatican, under the auspices of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, and, if there are any Papers, whether they will be laid before Parliament?

Lord G. Hamilton

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have only received notice of the question after entering the House. The hon. Member will therefore see that it was not possible for me to communicate with the Foreign Secretary since then. If the hon. Gentleman will put a question on the Paper for Monday, I will inquire whether there are any Papers which could be produced.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I have not received any notice of this question, and, considering that it is quite obvious at whom the question is aimed, I think, in point of decency and Parliamentary usage, the hon. Member might perhaps have given me notice of it. There has never been anything, so far as I know, in the nature of a mission to the Vatican under any Government with which I have been connected, or any other Government, but there were, and have been at various times, undoubtedly, communications held so far back as the time of Lord Palmerston and in the Pontificate of Gregory XVI.—communications held by persons holding some office in Italy for the purpose of conducting any correspondence that it was thought fit to establish. There are many cases to be made known, and a variety of them might, I should suppose, from the annals of the Foreign Office, be specified, and an account laid before this House, which I think would not be an undesirable mode of giving information to the country upon a question of great interest. As far as I remember, the persons who were principally concerned—at all events, some of the persons who were concerned—were a diplomatist who belonged to the family of the Seymours in the time of Lord Palmerston, and in the Pontificate of Gregory XVI., after that the very well-known and highly-esteemed diplomatist Lord Odo Russell, and the last of these was the case of Sir G. Errington in the Government with which I was connected. He bore no diplomatic character whatever, but he undoubtedly conveyed and received information. As far as I am aware, the essential distinction between those cases and the case of Sir Lintorn Simmons was this—that no gentleman who carried on these correspondences on any occasion had any power whatever to commit Her Majesty's Government upon any subject, or claimed any power to receive requests ordemands from the Vatican, and to accede to those requests and demands. But I am quite of opinion that, as the right hon. Gentleman is going to inquire into the matter, it would be well that the inquiry should hardly be limited within the bounds of an answer to question. The subject is of great importance. Much attention has justly been drawn to it in consequence of recent circumstances, and I should think that the preparation of a careful Memorandum in the Foreign Office, illustrated by all documents which are available, and which can be properly produced, would tend to put the House and the country in full possession of matters of which, undoubtedly, they are but partially informed, and which are of great importance to the country. I may state this, with regard to the Mission of Sir G. Errington—which I should not be at all sorry to see brought under discussion in this House, when I could express my sentiments about it—that, as far as I am aware, the Mission of Sir G. Errington, was really not so much a Mission as the taking advantage of Sir G. Errington's residence in Rome to correspond with the Foreign Office and to make known his views. As far as I know, the case of Sir G. Errington differed from all cases which preceded it in this, that it was constantly made the subject of questions and explanations in this House, and to the best of my memory in all the previous cases hardly any notice was given to the matter.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will take care to communicate to my noble Friend at the head of the Foreign Office the suggestion which the right hon. Gentleman has thrown out—that a careful narrative Report, by the documents which may be in existence, should be prepared for the information of the House. The suggestion will be carefully considered by the Government. It would be better now to refrain from any argument or any statement with regard to the character of the Representative of this country at the Vatican, either under a former Government or this Government.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to give notice that I shall repeat the question on Monday.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I desire to add that in giving an answer on the moment to the notice of the hon. Gentleman behind me, I must not be taken to have purported to give a complete or historical narrative. I stated all that was within my recollection, and I rather think that what I have stated will be found to be correct so far as it goes, although doubtless it may admit of amplification.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): I desire to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a question, of which I have given private notice, with regard to the speech last night of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, in which the following passage occurred—

"The Pope was induced about 18 months ago, I think, to fulminate what was called a rescript against the Nationalists of Ireland. He thereby, in my opinion, at great cost to his own influence within the legitimate sphere of purely spiritual authority—at very great cost, damage, and detriment to himself—undoubtedly did his utmost to prop up a labouring and failing cause, namely, that of the anti-Irish Party in this country. That was a great step on the part of the Pope. Did it not demand a return? You have got the return before you. The return is by sending somebody whom you call an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Pope."

I wish to ask whether there is any foundation whatever for the insinuation that the late Mission of Sir Lintorn Simmons was the consequence of the action of the Pope in publishing a rescript condemning the un-Christian practices of boycotting, intimidation, and the Plan of Campaign?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman must be aware that this is a question which a Minister cannot be expected to answer in that form.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I wish to ask as to the order of business. Will the Report of the Local Taxation Bill be the first order of the day to-morrow; next, is the House to sit on Saturday; and lastly, as this is the 31st July, and there are ill-omened rumours of our meeting in November, will the right hon. Gentleman state what Bills will be proceeded with?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I understand from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it will be for the convenience of the House that the Report of the Local Taxation Bill shall be taken to-morrow if the Committee is concluded to-day, and if that is the view of the House the Government will be very glad to take the Report to-morrow, substantially as the first order. They then propose, if a sufficient interval can be found, to take the Post Office Vote, which it is desirable should be obtained. The Police Bill will be taken as soon as the Report of the Local Taxation Bill shall be completed, whether on Saturday or Monday. I have received intimations from different parts of the House that it will be for the general convenience that the House shall meet on Saturday, the sitting being subject to Wednesday rules—that is, that the business shall practically be suspended at half-past 5 o'clock. The Bills which the Government intend to proceed with are the Local Taxation Bill, the Police Bill, the Census (Ireland) Bill, London County Council (Money) Bill, Public Works Loans Bill, and the Savings Banks Bill, if it is not opposed.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): It will be opposed to the end.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Then, with reference to that intimation, I can only deeply deplore there should be opposition of the kind declared to a Bill which, I believe, is regarded by the vast majority of Members, even on the hon. Member's own side, as embodying a great safeguard to investors in Savings Banks. On the hon. Member must rest the responsibility if the Bill is not passed. The Partnership Bill, a purely Legal Bill, I believe has been accepted by the House without question. The Public Health Acts Amendment Bill the Government desire to proceed with, and, of course, the Expiring Laws Continuance Bill must be passed. As to the Employers' Liability for Injuries to Workmen Bill and the Reformatory Schools Bill, the order will be discharged. The Electoral Disabilities (Naval, Military, and Police) Bill I hope to pass, on the understanding that Ireland will be exempted from the scope of its operation. With this statement I hope I may appeal to hon. Members to give the Government their assistance in making material progress with the business of the remainder of the week.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: The right hon. Gentleman has not mentioned what is to be done with the Indian Councils Bill. We ought to know the intentions of the Government with regard to that measure.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): Could not the Bill be taken on Saturday, instead of the Police Bill, which has never been discussed in Committee, and to bring on which would be very inconvenient to Members, as it affects nearly every constituency?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid the Indian Councils Bill must be postponed until after Supply, and if it is possible to take it during the stages of the Appropriation Bill the Government will be glad to do so.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: If the Bill is left to the end of the Session it will be extremely unfair to hon. Members interested in it, and will, moreover, be an absolute breach of the promise given by the First Lord of the Treasury in the Debate on the Address.

MR. A. J. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): Is it intended to discharge the order for the Education of Blind and Deaf Mute Children (Scotland) Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If the right hon. Gentleman will assist us to pass the Bill without opposition, we shall be glad to do so.

MR. A. ELLIOT (Roxburgh): When will the Scotch Police Bill be taken.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot say at present.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton): With reference to the promised day for discussion of the Treasury Minute relating to Treasury pensions, may I suggest whether it would not be advisable to postpone any commutation till next Session, so as to give a fair opportunity for discussion. There is no immediate necessity for action this Session.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman a very reasonable one, and, therefore, I have no hesitation in postponing the consideration of the Minute till next Session.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): May I ask when the long-promised opportunity for the discussion of the Report of the Vote on the Irish Land Commission will be given me?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government are anxious the hon. Member shall have his opportunity. It is, of course, subject to certain business being carried through.

MR. DILLON: There is no such condition.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That is the condition on which alone it is in the power of the Government to give the hon. Member his opportunity; and if we are able to conclude the Local Taxation Bill before 11 o'clock this evening, and obtain a vote in Supply, the Government, will then take the Motion of the hon. Member.

MR. DILLON: That amounts to a declaration that I am not to get my opportunity. Now, I have to inform the right hon. Gentleman that I gave a large quid pro quo in the agreement made with him. I saved the Government a great deal of time, and the Chief Secretary promised that an opportunity should be given me, in consideration of my foregoing my right to talk out the Vote, to raise a discussion on the Report of Supply.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It does not appear to me that the explanation of the hon. Gentleman is inconsistent with what the First Lord of the Treasury has just stated. I stated to the hon. Gentleman that he should have the opportunity of discussing the Report of the Land Commission Vote at a reasonable period—that is to say, not later than 11 o'clock. But no particular day was stated or suggested. The hon. Gentleman knows that we must take this Report, and we are pledged not to take it after 11 o'clock.

MR. STOREY: There is an Amendment on the Paper to enlarge the amounts which depositors are permitted to pay into a Savings Bank during the year. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that that Amendment is an exact copy of a clause of the Bill proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in 1880, at the time when he reduced the interest charged by the Savings Banks? The second part of the Bill had to be abandoned under the stress of the Compensation for Disturbance Bill, though we were promised that it should be re-introduced in 1881. Up to the present time, although the Savings Banks interest has been reduced, that promise to the Savings Banks has never been carried out. In view of that promise, given by the Government of the day in 1880, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will accept the Amendment?

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member asks me whether it will be possible to deal with a matter that was so contentious that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian had to drop it from his Bill. Clearly, if a matter of such controversy is to be introduced, either on one side or the other, it will be impossible to pass the Bill.

MR. LEVESON-GOWER: Will the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House say when the Foreign Office Vote will be taken, as there are several important topics, which hon. Members on both sides are interested in, which will have to be dealt with.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have already stated that we hope to take the Vote as soon as we have disposed of the Police Bill.

*MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): May I ask when the Intoxicating Liquors (Ireland) Bill will be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That measure is in the hands of private Members.

*MR. CHILDERS: I desire to ask in what position it is proposed to put the Scotch Superannuation Bill. I understand that the Government have undertaken to take it after the Report stage of the English Bill, but from what has just fallen from the right hon. Gentleman it looks as though he contemplated making some modifications in the arrangement of the business. I ask the question, as I took a great deal of interest in the Bill in Committee, and I think we should know precisely how the Bill stands.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Is it intended to put the English Police Bill through on a Saturday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Most certainly. With reference to the Scotch Superannuation Bill, I will consult the convenience of Scotch Members, and shall be glad if we can deal with it in the manner the hon. Gentleman suggests. I trust that I may appeal to the House to make progress to-night, seeing that the contentious matter of the Local Taxation Bill has been largely disposed of. Then we can take the Post Office Vote, which is so much required.

*MR. CHILDERS: The suggestion that the Committee stage of the Scotch Police Bill should follow the Report stage of the English Bill was well received by Scotch Members on both sides of the House. If the right hon. Gentleman will inquire I think he will find that that is the feeling of the majority of Scotch Members.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: As I take it that the right hon. Gentleman speaks with the concurrence of the great majority of the Scotch Members on his side of the House I will endeavour to make the arrangement he refers to.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: As there will be great opposition to the Scotch Superannuation Bill, would it not be well for the Government to postpone it altogether for the consideration of the Scotch people?

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: Will the London County Council (Money) Bill be taken to-night? I see it is on the Paper.

MR. JACKSON: I should think it would be better to take it on Monday, but hon. Gentlemen opposite will know about it better than I.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK: The Bill will only require slight amendment, and I think it would be to the general convenience of London Members if it could be taken to-night.

MR. JACKSON: I will confer with the right hon. Baronet on the matter.

MR. ENSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): Considering the interest taken in the Bill relating to Blind and Deaf Mute Children in Scotland could it not be arranged to take that measure by consent some night after 12 o'clock?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I know that the hon. Member and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield take some interest in this subject. I will confer with them, and shall be glad if some arrangement can be come to by which the Bill can be taken.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury is mistaken in saying that the Youthful Offenders' Bill is not opposed. There are Amendments on the Paper, and the Bill will most certainly be opposed.

DR. FARQUHARSON: Will the Army Estimates be taken next week?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid I have gone as far as I can. The hon. Member will see that I cannot say more than I have.

Mr. Childers

IRELAND—EVICTIONS ON GREAT BLASKET ISLAND.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): I desire to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has received any official Report as to the cruise of Her Majesty's ship Britomart, which was referred to in yesterday's newspapers. It was stated that at an early hour on Tuesday morning the inhabitants on Great Blasket Island, 10 miles to the west of the Dingle Promontory, were surprised to see Her Majesty's gunboat Britomart in their waters. The vessel had on board the Sub-Sheriff of Kerry, a number of Bailiffs, 100 police under County Inspector Lonnell, Mr. Cecil Roche, R.M., being in supreme command. The object of the invasion was to make seizures in satisfaction of rent due to the Earl of Cork and Orrery. It seems that a number of fishing boats were seized, amongst the number being one belonging to the opposite shore, which had been used for the purpose of bringing a clergyman to the island. Were these boats taken on board the Britomart, and is it the intention of the Admiralty to continue this practice of lending Her Majesty's ships of war for passenger boats to convey, not merely troops, but a Sub-Sheriff, Bailiffs, and police. I would also ask whether, in answer to a question of mine, the Government did not refuse to the fishermen at this very place?

*MR. SPEAKER: I think the hon. Gentleman ought to give notice of that question. It is a complicated and somewhat argumentative question.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: Then I would merely ask whether the Admiralty has received any report as to the cruise of the Britomart?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Not that I am aware of.

SIR G. ERRINGTON'S MISSION.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): When the Government lay on the Table the Papers relating to Sir G. Errington's Mission, will they take the same course in regard to the Mission of the Duke of Norfolk?

MR. SEXTON: May I ask if the Government can give us any information as to the functions about to be performed in Rome by Mr. Kenelm Digby?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not aware of the existence of Mr. Kenelm Digby, but will make inquiries.

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL.—(No. 244.)

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 4.

(5.18.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): Inasmuch as I shall have another opportunity of discussing Clause 4, and shall then be able to raise the question whether this shall be a temporary or permanent charge, I do not propose to go on with the Amendment I mentioned yesterday afternoon when the House resumed. I now ask leave to move an Amendment at the end of line 39, after the word "England." The clause, as it at present stands, reads:—

"The remaining half of the said annual sum shall be distributed by the Police Authorities for the Police Forces in England."

I propose to add "other than the City of London." The effect of that will be to distribute the £150,000 a year over the Police Forces in the Kingdom, except that of the City of London. The object I have in view must be apparent to the Government, and I cannot but think that it has been by pure inadvertence that they themselves have not proposed the Amendment.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am willing to accept the Amendment.

MR. STOREY: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider a clause to exempt other large municipalities in the country who have sufficient borough power, who do not want to be brought under the operation of the Bill, and who are willing to forego their share of this money?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): We accept the Amendment, on the ground that last year an Act was passed enabling the City to make satisfactory arrangements for the superannuation of its police. I do not know that other Municipalities are in the same position.

(5.21.) MR. STOREY: The right hon. Gentleman is aware that there are other boroughs and districts in the country who have for years proportionately spent quite as much on police superannuation as the City of London. The City of London spends at the present time only £11,818 per annum, but the County of Lancaster spends £14,901; the North Riding of Yorkshire, £10,210; the City of Liverpool, £10,764; and Manchester, £6,405. These districts desire to be free from Government control in this matter. They want to be treated as men, and not as children in leading strings, and I ask, supposing they are willing to forego their share of this filthy lucre, ought they not to be excluded.

(5.23.) MR. MATTHEWS: I am aware of the facts to which the hon. Member refers, but I would be no party to depriving any of these localities of their share of this money.

(5.23.) MR. STOREY: The right hon. Gentleman knows that English people get on very much better when left alone.

(5.23.) THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is discussing a point which is not now before the Committee.

MR. STOREY: I will take the answer, Sir.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 39, at the end of the line, to insert the words, "other than the City of London." (Mr. Storey.)

(5.24.) Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Clause 4.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 4, to leave out from the word "so," to end of Clause, and insert the words "distributed and applied shall remain to the credit of the local taxation accounts." —(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

(5.24.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): Supposing the Scotch Police Act fails to pass this year the proportion allocated to Scotland would, I suppose, be sufficient to meet all requirements.

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes.

(5.25.) MR. STOREY: The clause as it stand enables these municipalities to receive money which has to be distributed and applied to superannuation in accordance with a Bill hereafter to be passed. That Bill may not be passed this Session at all, and I hold that it is improper and unconstitutional to appropriate money in one Act which can only be applied by another that possibly may not be passed until a future Session. It is a pity that a Conservative and Constitutional Party should need to be reminded of the desirability of adhering to constitutional methods by an extreme Radical.

(5.26.) Question put, and negatived.

Mr. Storey

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

(5.27.) MR. STOREY: I must oppose this clause, but it is unnecessary for me to repeat the arguments I advanced when attempting to introduce Amendments. I must, however, reassert my position, that if the Government propose a Superannuation Fund, and the division of the money rests with the House, it ought to be allocated according to the size of the Police Forces, and on no other basis whatever. The Home Secretary, the other night, said he based the sub-division of the money of the expenditure at present incurred by the different Police Forces on superannuation. I think I am entitled to press on the Government that this is an extremely illusory and absurd basis, for it amounts to this, that the municipalities who have spent most are to get most. Those who have spent least are to get least. That may be very fair, by way of punishment, but the fact remains that those municipalities who have spent most will have less need to spend in the future, and that those who have spent least, and have the least effectual superannuation, will have more need to spend in the future. It should be distributed over the whole Police Forces of the country, according to the size of each Force. In order to give effect to that view, I shall take the liberty of dividing the Committee against the clause.

(5.31.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I think it is the case that too much money is given to the Metropolitan Force. The Home Secretary justifies his position by the argument that the distribution should be according to the expenditure of each Force. I consider that the Metropolitan Police Authorities have been extremely extravagant, and the system of superannuation which they have initiated is extremely extravagant. I have the Report of the Home Secretary, which shows that the present system of superannuation will amount to considerably above £500,000, probably £600,000. Because an extravagant system has been initiated, I do not see that a disproportionate amount should be given to the Metropolitan Police in order to cover this extravagant super-annuation system.

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member for Sunderland has confined his observations into a very short space, and I put it to him whether he will not content himself with a protest, and avoid consuming the time which would be occupied in a Division.

MR. STOREY: I have incurred the censure of the right hon. Gentleman in reference to the Savings Bank Bill, and I would not like to fall under his double censure. I have no objection to be content with the protest I have made.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 5, agreed to.

Clauses 6 and 7 omitted.

Clause 8.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, lines 22 and 23, to leave out the words "if an on-licence."—(Sir Wilfrid Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out, stand part of the Clause."

MR. GOSCHEN: As the Government have chosen to omit this clause, it will not be necessary to discuss any Amendment in detail before we move the omission.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Notwithstanding that the clause is to be omitted, we wish to go through with our Amendments. I shall move this one, and we shall do what we can to carry it.

MR. STOREY: This is a Government clause, but the Government have never had any affection for their own offspring, and they do not wish to press it. But we are too fond of the offspring of the Government to permit them, without considerable debate, to slay their own child. There is no earthly reason why the clause should not be accepted by the great body of the House. If there is any objection at all, it must come from hon. Gentlemen opposite. I venture to assure the right hon. Gentleman that any proposal to withdraw this clause will not save time, but will have the effect of causing prolonged discussion.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): It is obviously impossible for the Government to discuss this Amendment, for the very reason that we are asking the House to omit this clause. What we propose is to accept the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

SIR W. LAWSON: I beg to move in page 5, line 23, after "granted," to leave out all the words to the end of clause. The House will see that the effect of the Amendment is that all these exceptions shall be left out. I want to leave them out, because I believe that if they are retained things would be left very much as they are now. It would be a valuable clause if these exceptions were left out, and it stood "That there shall be no new licences granted." If the Government accept this, they could put in a proviso that the clause should only be enforced for one year or two years, just as Mr. Bruce did when he brought in his clause. If they accept the Amendment, they would then be able to carry out the clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 23, after the word "granted," to leave out all the words to end of clause.—(Sir Wilfrid Lawson.)

*(5.45.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The Committee must not be in the slightest doubt as to what the course of the Government is going to be when I say that we shall accept this Amendment, and that upon the clause as amended being put, we shall vote against it. The clause as it originally stood in the Bill, along with other clauses, was fair and proper as part of a series of clauses for dealing with licences. The other clauses have been omitted, and if this clause were now left in, it would not form part of a scheme, and would be isolated, and without anything in the Bill germane to it. The leader of the House some weeks ago stated what was the policy of the Government in respect to this clause. If there had been a disposition on the part of the Committee to accept the clause practically as it stood, even though it was not germane to the Bill, the Government, in face of a strong expression on the part of the House, would have raised no objection. But instead of the suggestion of my right hon. Gentleman being regarded with favour, and hon. Members doing their best to pass the clause, a considerable number of Amendments have been put upon the Paper.

MR. STOREY: Your own side.

*MR. RITCHIE: I do not care; I am not regarding the question as from one side of the House or the other. I want to avoid any discussion of that kind, tempting as it is. I will mention a few of the questions which are dealt with by these Amendments. One class of Amendments has for its object the omission of the whole clause, because it would create a very great monopoly. Another point raised is that an increased duty should be put upon licences. There is another enormously important question—and that is, the repeal of the law with regard to removals. Some desire to do away altogether with the possibility of removing licences from one house to another. That is a very arguable question. Then there is the policy of exceptions to the non-issue of new licences, and again whether the interest in the licence shall be restricted to the owner of the licence. That is a point which has been very fruitful of discussion. Another point raised in these Amendments is that the licence ought to expire with the lease of the house to which the licence is granted. Another point is that licences, if granted at all, ought to be paid for by some money payment to the Local Authority. Yet a further question is the vesting of absolute discretion in the Local Authority to refuse the renewal. Of course, we know there is a contention that the Licensing Authority has that discretion now. I am not going to argue that question at present. Then there is also the whole question of compensation involved in these Amendments on the Paper. Therefore, I think the Committee will see that, however desirous the Government might be of proceeding with this clause, with these Amendments on the Paper, there is no hope that the Committee would be unanimous on the subject, and we should inevitably be called upon to discuss all these Amendments, some of them involving very great matters of principle. Under all these circumstances, the Government have been driven to the conclusion that it would be impossible to ask the Committee to proceed with this clause.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman explained that, in accepting the proposed Amendment, he was not to be understood as accepting the clause. The discussion on the proposed Amendment ought to be confined to the proposed Amendment. The discussion on the general question of the clause will take place when the Motion is put from the Chair, "That this clause stand part of the Bill."

SIR W. LAWSON: Certainly, Mr. Courtney; but I was only going to observe that, having accepted my Amendment, all the other Amendments are gone, and there can be no talk about them. I am very pleased with that result, and the clause as it stands is a very good clause, and we shall do our best to carry it.

Question proposed, "That Clause 8, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

*MR. RITCHIE: I am greatly obliged to you, Mr. Courtney, for having permitted me to say what I did with regard to the Amendments. I was extremely anxious that the Committee should not be misled. I have stated the reason why we cannot accede to the passage of the clause. The hon. Baronet has said that all the Amendments are disposed of, but I am sure he will understand that the only reason why the clause has been allowed to assume the position in which it is, is that the Government have expressed their intention of opposing the clause, and every one of those gentlemen who have Amendments on the Paper would be entitled to complain that there had been no opportunity to discuss his Amendment if we accepted the clause in its amended form. We now propose to oppose the amended clause.

MR. STOREY: We are now in a position to test the bond fides of the Government in the matter of temperance. Here is the clause as amended:—"After the passing of this Act a new licence shall not be granted." The Government told us that they were against the present state of things, and that they were extremely anxious to do something for the cause of temperance. I listened with amazement to the right hon. Gentleman, who said that this clause was an isolated clause. It fulfils a very important function. The Government have told us that they are extremely anxious that the granting of new licences should be curtailed and curbed. Here is a clause which will prevent the granting of any new licences throughout the whole country. I submit to the right hon. Gentleman that if he opposes this simple suspensory clause to-night, it will then make it all the more incumbent in the very next year to deal with this whole matter. The clause is an excellent one as it stands. It will need amendment next year. That is the inevitable issue of all clauses and Bills passed in this House. Inasmuch as it is a good clause in itself, I submit that we ought to take the opportunity of voting for it, and thus get the matter out of the way. It will be our duty to show that, at any rate, the Government have not been in earnest in the matter.

(6.0.) MR. E. ROBERTSON: My hon. Friend must not be supposed to be speaking the universal sentiment of hon. Members on this side of the House. I am bound to confess that if the Bill had remained in its original state, I should have opposed this clause, and placed an Amendment on the Paper with that object. This clause is now irrelevant to the Bill—so irrelevant that if it had been moved as a new clause, I imagine it would have been altogether out of order. As it stands, the clause is a flat and bare prohibition of the issue of new licences—I will not say naked and brutal—a phrase which has been current in the House during the last two or three days. What is the first and necessary result? It is the creation of a new monopoly. It means an increase of the monopoly value of the licences now in existence. What has been the great difficulty of the House in dealing with this temperance question all along? Has it not been the value vested in existing licences through the restrictions at present in operation? The hon. Baronet the the Member for Cockermouth in his desire to curtail licences has forgotten a great number of very useful things—among them the public interest in this licensing question. It is not in the interests of the country that this enormous endowment should be conferred upon those who own licences. We have had denunciations of the owners of licences, and of those who control the owners of licences. We are told of immense fortunes made by brewers and others who own tied public houses. It is the Temperance Party who, through their ill-considered restrictions, are responsible for these monstrous fortunes. The great question of temperance reform is whether the monopoly value caused by these restrictions is to go into the pockets of the publicans, the brewers, and the distillers; or whether, being public money, because it is a monopoly caused by restrictions, it shall be applied to the public. That is a solution of the question which has been adopted in many of the States of America.

MR. STOREY: I refer my hon. Friend to the Reports now before the House.

AN HON. MEMBER: What State?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Philadelphia, Chicago, and many others.

MR. STOREY: I know how various the systems are, and I wish to know what State he is referring to.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: The States are so numerous that I did not stay to name them. The high licensing system is one which prevails very largely in the United States. I may inform my hon. Friend that I wrote to the Foreign Office to get the best available information with respect to the system prevailing in the United States; and the right hon. Baronet who represents the Foreign Office in this House most courteously acceded to my request; and the result is, the two Reports which may be seen in the Library. I am not going to discuss the high licensing, but I am certain that the broad result of official opinion in those two Reports is, that high licensing is the best road to temperance, and that it is taking the place of the prohibitory movement. There is a consensus of opinion that it not only promotes temperance in the best way by suppressing the worst class of public houses, but that it preserves to the public that public endowment which is created by restriction. Much as I respect the principle of my hon. Friend the Member for Cockermouth, I will not aid him to bring it about by the wholesale endowment of the very class he denounces. Something has been said about moving the Amendment to facilitate the passage of the clause. To my mind, the removal of all restrictions from the clause makes it not less, but more objectionable, because it makes the prohibition unlimited, and more peremptory than it was before. Let me say that we, who dare to call ourselves friends of temperance, wish to leave the regulation of the liquor traffic to the people who are affected by it. We want to leave to the community the power of dealing with the liquor traffic in that community. In other words, we are Local Optionists. Where is the Local Option in this clause? It is Imperial prohibition of all licences.

SIR W. LAWSON: Hear, hear.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Well, it is a very good thing; but it is not Local Option. We who have supported the temperance movement are really Local Optionists, and we want to leave the community to deal with this question. Sir, I am constrained much against my will to follow the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board on this occasion in opposition to his own clause.

*MR. RITCHIE: It is not my clause now.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: The right hon. Gentleman is responsible for the existence of the clause. But I shall not quarrel with him for that, and shall assist him in opposing it.

*(6.10.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyron, S.): I think the Division that will take place to-night will clear the air for temperance reformers in this House. We have been considerably mixed of late. I, for one, certainly welcome this Division which will draw a distinction between mere sentiment and active temperance work. Now, I stood by the Licensing Clauses of the Government when it was unpopular to do it. I am not going to run away from them now. I think this is the best clause in the Bill, and I think it is immensely better as amended than it was before. The right hon. Gentleman has got rid of all the difficulties, a list of which he read, by accepting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cockermouth. The simple issue now before the House is whether new licences are to be granted or not. The hon. Member for Dundee objects to this proposal because it creates a monopoly. The monopoly is created already. There is a ring drawn round the traffic now, and the hon. Baronet says that no more shall enter that ring. Another mistake the hon. Member fell into was this: He taunted the hon. Baronet with Local Option. But the hon. Baronet has never professed to be a mere Local Optionist. He has merely used Local Option as a means to the end, the prohibition of the traffic. He objects as a prohibitionist to the creation of any further licences. The Government have made up their minds, and I am with them, that you will not be able seriously to diminish this traffic in future without compensation. Now that having been resolved upon by the Party opposite, I put to them this question: If you are going to compensate these traders in future—and I admit it is very hard you should be compelled to do it—why are you creating any more of them? We are told that there are new neighbourhoods, and why should they not have licences? What are the facts relating to new neighbourhoods now? They are places where the people fight against licences being thrust upon them. As a matter of fact, the landowner has power to prevent new licences being granted, and that power has been exercised all over the country. The real fact is, the country is deluged with drink; the liquor shops are everywhere. I shall vote for this clause all the more that it has been amended, and the Division will, at all events, tend to separate the sheep from the goats, and allow the Temperance Party to know who is who, and who are the real temperance reformers.

*(6.15.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): As I voted against the other licensing clauses of the Bill, I wish to explain why it is that I vote against this one as it now stands. In my judgment, the hon. Member for South Tyron fell into two strange errors. He said that this clause does not create a monopoly because a monopoly already exists. But what is the value of that monopoly? If you had no further new licences granted, would the hon. Member for a moment suggest that the value of existing licences would not be enormously increased? Where you have a growing population, the demand for drink will become year by year greater; and if the number of houses is restricted, inevitably it must follow that a larger quantity of drink must be consumed in the houses which remain, and that the value of those houses must thus of necessity be increased year by year. He says that compensation must be given, and he must know that the more licences you grant the more compensation you will have to pay. I decline to accept that view.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I said quite the opposite.

*MR. KELLY: I say no compensation need be given. Without confiscating the property of the publican, you may avoid, and easily avoid, paying one farthing in money. But then the hon. Member has entirely forgotten what the proposal in Clause 9 was. Clause 9 must be taken with Clause 8, and the object of both was to considerably limit the number of public houses. There can be nothing simpler and bolder than Clause 8 as it now stands. It simply says that new licences shall not be granted. I regret that what the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board has to-day said was not stated before, namely, that the Government might have persisted in Clause 8, had it not been for the string of Amendments put down to it. Had he said this before, the great bulk of those Amendments would have been withdrawn, and this clause might very well then not have been lost. Not that I believe it would have made much difference with the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth. He has destroyed what I believe would have been a most useful clause, and one which would have done more for the cause of temperance than anything else I am able to suggest. He has emasculated it; and he is prepared, as all temperance leaders are, to accept any amount of responsibility in that direction. I lament to think that he has struck one of the saddest blows at temperance that has been delivered by any man in this House or outside of this House. The prohibition of further public houses, which prevents the extinction of hundreds of houses by way of removals, will do nothing but aggravate—seriously aggravate—the present system, and I do not think any honest, or rather real—for I do not wish to question the sincerity of the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth—friend of temperance can vote for the clause, which is not now the clause of the Government, but the clause of the hon. Member for Cockermouth.

(6.20.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I do not know whether I am an honest and real friend of temperance, only I do not know what my hon. Friend (Mr. Robertson) means by temperance. I heard him with astonishment, because he generally advances logical reasons for the course which he adopts. The monopoly that now exists will not be increased in value by the adoption of this clause. The value of the monopoly will be lessened, because by every new licence you create you increase the amount of compensation. The brother of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian fought out this question in Liverpool many years ago, and my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee perhaps takes the same position as was taken then—that, is free trade in liquor.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: What I am advocating is not free trade in liquor, but the high licensing system.

DR. CLARK: One result of increasing the monopoly would be that you would have an increase of crime, pauperism, and premature death. As a matter of fact, the supply of your houses causes the demand, and hence you have an increase in the traffic, and hence you will have more to pay in compensation for those licences than you would have to pay now. Some of us do not call ourselves temperance men because of the meaning attached to the name. The hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth is not a temperance man; he is a prohibitionist, and he wishes to obtain prohibition by Local Option, as that is the easiest way to obtain it. I myself think that the only solution of this question is absolute prohibition of the importation, manufacture, or sale of intoxicating drinks. We are told that the public interests are not considered. But that all depends upon what the public interests are. If by a traffic the pauperism, crime, and premature death of the country are increased, then that seriously affects the public interests. Under the high licence system, what would my hon. Friend do with the money that went to the State? Would he use it for the purpose of buying them out?

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Certainly not.

DR. CLARK: If, as in Norway and Sweden, you find that the money so obtained has to be expended in remedying the results of the traffic, then it is a very bad method and a very bad way of raising revenue. I am very sorry that the Government are not going to support the clause, because it will have the effect of creating more licences to be bought out. The clause ought to be tried for one or two years, and I think the probable result would be a diminution of the evils resulting from drink to a degree so convincing as to induce a continuance of the work not only in the direction of issuing no new licences, but in reducing the present number of licences.

(6.28.) SIR W. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I confess I regret that the Government cannot support the clause as it stands. I quite understand the reasons which induce them to withdraw the clause as it stood, with the many Amendments standing against it on the Paper. I believe some of the Amendments were very good ones, and might have been very well accepted by the Government. Still, there is no doubt they would have drawn the House into a very considerable discussion which at this time of the Session it is almost impossible for the Government to contemplate. But as the clause has been simplified, I really do not see why the Government cannot accept it. It is admitted on all hands that there are too many licences in the country, and surely the simplest way of beginning to reduce them, if we cannot hit on a plan for reducing those in existence, is, at any rate, not to create any more for a time. Now, the principal part of the clause, in addition to that which we are now discussing, was that relating to special cases and new districts. I think that is a very proper subject for consideration, but I do not press the Government on that. All the great majority of the House wishes is to do something to decide the question. We have not decided yet what we are agreed to do. That is precisely what was the position of affairs in 1871, when the House, without a Division, I believe, decided to suspend the creation of new licences for one year, in order that the country and the House might have time to consider the whole question. That is the position in which we now are. If the Government cannot accept the Amendment as it now stands, I hope that they will accept it with a limitation to one year. I am not surprised at the Government not caring to enter on this burning question; but, still, it must be settled one way or the other. I do hope the Government will consider whether they can accept the Amendment with the limitation I have suggested; if they do not, I shall certainly have to go into the Lobby against them.

(6.33.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I think that no new licences should be granted. The only argument advanced against the retention of this clause seems to be that the refusal to grant new licences will create a greater monopoly in the liquor trade than at present exists. But I hold that the larger the number of houses licensed for the sale of drinks the greater is the amount of intoxicating liquor consumed. We are not, however, discussing that point this afternoon. Never, I think, have any Government made such propositions with reference to compensation as were made by this Government at the beginning of the Session. I contend that if we agreed to the retention of this clause less compensation would have been paid than if the clause were rejected. Whatever may be the monopoly, there is no doubt that there would be a larger demand for compensation for four houses than if there were only three. We on this side of the House desire to retain this clause. We believe it will be a step towards a diminution in the consumption of intoxicating liquors. We do not believe that this increased monopoly will really entail a larger amount of compensation, because, when the question of compensation comes to be argued, the question will turn upon the amount of profits made.

(6.36.) MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I have taken a somewhat prominent part in advocating the retention of these licensing clauses, and I hope that the Government will leave this an open question, for there are many of their supporters who would like to see this clause retained, and who would very much regret having to vote against them.

(6.37.) MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyne): There are many hon.

Members on this side of the House who are in favour of the retention of the clause, and who will be obliged to vote against the Government if they persist in seeking to omit it.

(6.38.) CAPTAIN BOWLES (Middlesex, Enfield): No doubt those who are in favour of prohibition would like to see this clause retained in the Bill. Many hon. Members are in favour of dealing with this licensing question by means of Local Option; but if the Government retain this clause in the Bill, they will be practically shutting the door to trusting localities in this matter hereafter. I think each locality might be left very well to decide for itself what public houses shall be retained in its midst. There is one important point which seems to be overlooked, and that is that there are many brewing firms who have nearly a monopoly of public houses in given districts; and I cannot help thinking that if this clause were passed, the result would be to secure their monopoly, and they would thereupon treat the public to inferior drinks. Some hon. Members laugh at that suggestion, but bad as good beer may be, bad beer is a great deal worse. With these few remarks I will conclude by expressing the hope that the Government will persist in their proposal to withdraw the clause.

*(6.40.) MR. J. C. STEVENSON (South Shields): No one, I think, will venture to say that our present licensing system is satisfactory; and any proposal to arrest the system of a single year in order to clear the way for a new departure should, I think, be heartily welcomed. I fail to see why the Government should not for a single year suspend the system, and next year endeavour to deal with this most difficult question in the way in which it should be dealt with. The clause as it originally stood in the Bill, while permitting new licences in certain circumstances did not provide that the additional value given to the premises by such licences should be the property of the public, but created new interests in private hands.

*(6.42.) MR. LENG (Dundee): I had not the advantage of hearing the reasons adduced in support of the Motion by my hon. Colleague the senior Member for Dundee on this clause; but, regarding it as a practical question, it appears to me it is most desirable that we should avail ourselves of the opportunity this proposal of the Government gives us to put a check on the means for the sale of drink. I have no doubt that before this clause was proposed by the Government it was very carefully considered, and it appears to me that the reasons which then existed for its introduction in the Bill must remain as valid now as then. If anything could have induced me—and at one time I wavered in my mind as to the course I ought to take—to have supported the Compensation Clauses in Bill, it was this suspension clause. It seemed to me that to impose a limitation upon the continual growth of public houses was a most desirable object; that it was the one bright spot in the Bill which counterbalanced its faults. I still think it is most desirable the Bill should contain some such enactment. Let us try and adopt the view of the hon. Baronet opposite, and, at all events, let us endeavour for one year—and after the excitement of the last few weeks we need a little time for reflection—to see what would be the effect of suspending the issue of new licences. If we only make that experiment for one year, it will give us time to formulate our views with regard to the legislation of the future. I shall, under these circumstances, vote for the retention of this clause in the Bill.

(6.45.) MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I wish to join in the appeal to the Government to retain this clause. I have consistently supported them throughout the Session in all the important Divisions. I trust that the Amendment proposed by the hon. Baronet on this side will be accepted, and that the Government will see their way to retain the clause in the Bill, and thus avoid the painful necessity which would be thrown upon some of us of voting against our Party.

*(6.46.) MR. RITCHIE: Some weighty reasons have been given by my hon. Friends in favour of the clause, but the reasons which prevent the Government from accepting their advice are of considerably greater weight. I do not think I was bound to put a notice on the Paper, because some days ago I gave full and adequate notice that I should move the omission of the clause. The Government have accepted certain Amendments, and the consequence is that the proposal now before the House has assumed an extremely simple form, but it might be argued that it is an extremely objectionable form. If the clause were retained, it would prevent the issue of any new licence for an hotel or any other place, though absolutely wanted; it would prevent the granting of a licence on removal, and no renewal of an old licence could be given. Therefore, the Government cannot possibly assent to the clause. To accept it would be a gross breach of faith. In consequence of the position which the Government have taken up, many hon. Gentlemen have been prevented from moving Amendments, and, therefore, if the Government accept this amended clause, it would be a breach of faith. It has been suggested that we should accept the Bill for one year, but it is impossible for the Government to hold out any expectation, as has been suggested, that they will legislate on the subject next Session. They will have much to do next Session, but among their measures they do not include the re-arrangement of the licensing system. It will, therefore, be impossible for them to accept the proposal to confine the operation of the Bill to one year. I very much regret that in this matter we cannot have the support of some of my hon. Friends behind me, but we must adhere to our proposals.

(6.49. MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I have heard with great regret the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. I do not think it lay with the Government, after having consented to Amendments, to say that they could not accept the clause without being guilty of a breach of faith. The better course would be for the Government to say what modifications they think will be absolutely essential for the proper working of the clause, and allow the House to consider it in that form. I hope that even now the Government will agree to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Manchester. It is quite within the power of the Government to introduce modifications, and I think that the House is so anxious to deal with the question in an effective way that it will be willing to accept less for the sake of getting an improved plan. It has been suggested that the value of existing licensed houses will be increased if no new licenses are granted; but I think that that argument is outweighed by the consideration that if new licences are granted, you create new vested interests. I think the Government will be acting in accord with the feelings of many of their own supporters if they retain the clause and introduce necessary Amendments on the Report stage.

(6.53.) MR. CORNWALLIS (Maidstone): I deeply regret the proposal of the Government to withdraw the clause. I fully appreciate their efforts in the cause of temperance, but cannot support the amended clause in its present crude form. I hope that even now it is not too late for the Government to show the Committee the way out of the difficulty, so as not to leave this pressing question open any longer. The Government have shown, by bringing in the Bill, that they know the evils arising from the liquor traffic, and the time is now near when there must be some restriction on the issue of new licences. It is on that account that I wish to see the Government do something to accomplish the object which so many have in view.

Ayes 128; Noes 157.—(Div. List, No. 216.)

Clause 9 omitted.

Clause 10 omitted.

Clause 11 agreed to.

Clause 12 omitted.

Clause 13.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 3, to leave out from beginning of line, to end of line 11, page 9, and insert—

“The expressions ‘burgh,’ ‘police burgh,’ and ‘police commissioners,’ have respectively the same meaning as in ‘The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889.’”—(Mr. Ritchie.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 14 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported as amended.

Question proposed, “That the Bill, as amended, be considered to-morrow.”—(Mr. Ritchie.)

(7.10.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): It is necessary that we should have the Bill reprinted in its amended form in order that we may give notice of Amendments, if necessary, on the report stage. I would ask that the consideration of the Bill be set down for Monday, for we do not now know what we are dealing with; nobody knows exactly what the Bill is in its present shape.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The hon. Gentleman must be aware that this was the subject of a question and answer earlier in the evening, and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer was appealed to last evening to fix Report stage for to-morrow in the event of Committee being finished early this evening. We have undertaken that the Bill shall be reprinted and in the hands of Members to-morrow, and I should be breaking faith with hon. Members if I did not set it down for to-morrow.

Dr. CLARK: But if we only get the Bill to-morrow, it will be impossible for us to give notice of Amendments in the usual way.

*Mr. W. H. SMITH: I think hon. Members are well aware of the position of the Bill as it stands, and it is perfectly in the power of hon. Members to put Amendments on the Paper this evening without having the reprinted Bill. I am under engagement to take the Report stage to-morrow.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill to be considered to-morrow, and to be printed. [Bill 404.]

SUPPLY—REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

1. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum not exceeding £4,898,661 (including a Supplementary sum of £50,000), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1891, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Post Office Services, the Expenses of Post Office Savings Banks, and Government Annuities and Insurances, and the Collection of the Post Office Revenue."

*(7.15.) Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I propose on the Post Office Vote to raise a question of some importance in connection with the financial position of the Postal Service.

I propose to show that there has been a large and growing increase in the gross Post Office revenue in the last few years, while at the same time there has been considerable neglect and delay in improvement of Postal Service. Few people are aware, I think, of the extent at which Post Office revenue has grown of late years; the figures are rather surprising. In 1860, when the Post Office had recovered altogether from the changes made by the introduction of penny postage, I find the net surplus revenue paid into the Exchequer, after deducting the cost of the packet service, was £440,000. Ten years later, in 1870, the net Post Office revenue had increased to £1,173,000, in 1880 it was £2,225,000, and in the year ending March 31st last the net surplus revenue paid into the Exchequer was £3,335,000. During the whole of that period, with few exceptions, the progress of the increase in Post Office revenue was continuous. In the years 1884 and 1887 there were slight reductions as compared with the previous years in consequence of very large capital expenditure, in the one case in making preparations for the introduction of the system of parcel post, and in the other cases by the purchase of an expensive site for the extension of Post Office and Savings Bank premises in the City of London at a cost of £300,000. With these exceptions, the increase has been continuous up to the present time. During the last four years the increase has been greater than it ever was before. On the average, during the last four years the increase has been something like £200,000 a year, so that in the present year the Chancellor of the Exchequer is receiving about £600,000 more from the Post Office than he did when he came into office. The income derived from the Post Office is six times greater than it was 30 years ago, and three times greater than it was 20 years ago. The question is, has this large increase been obtained by neglect of improvements in the Service, which the public have a right to expect? The hon. Member for Canterbury in a recent pamphlet has enumerated no fewer than 60 different points on which he considers improvements might be carried out, and, without committing myself to all the various items, I feel bound to give it as my opinion that in the very large majority of cases the hon. Member has right on his side. Irrespective of those specific points, there are certain general heads in which improvement is required in the Postal Service. The means of cross communication, not only between rural districts, but also between towns of considerable importance, are deficient, and as the result letters take two days in transit from one district to another; there are large districts of great commercial importance in which there is no second delivery, and consequently a large proportion of their correspondence takes two days in transit; there are numerous cases in which suburbs of large towns are not included in the town delivery; there are a great many scattered hamlets in which there is no delivery at all and where inhabitants have to send a mile or two for their letters; there are important commercial centres where accelerations ought to be made, and especially of the foreign mails. We had the question raised a day or two ago in connection with the mails to the West of England, and there are other illustrations of the way in which improvements under this head might be effected; and, lastly, the Parcel Post greatly needs simplification and reduction in charges. Of course, all those improvements would involve additional expenditure in the first instance, but the almost invariable experience of the Post Office has been that such increased expenditure is eventually covered by increased income, and that usually in a comparatively short time. There is no question also that the Department has fallen behind in respect to offering increased public facilities, as compared with other countries. I can cite the Permanent Secretary, Sir Arthur Blackwood, as a witness, who, at the Jubilee Memorial Dinner a short time ago, said it was true that some countries which followed us in the postal reforms introduced by Sir Rowland Hill, had in some respects outstripped us in improvements since, and he confessed to some feeling of humiliation when at International Postal Conferences he had been asked if England, so long in the van of postal reform, was now going to take second place. Sir Arthur Blackwood went on to say, avoiding any criticism of the doings of his superiors, that he should like to see the Department administered on something like fair commercial principles to the public at large, offering increased facilities and extending its work in the country. Now, Sir Arthur Blackwood is one of the most loyal and courteous of public servants; he was trained at the Treasury, and has all the instincts of a Treasury official. So that such language, coming from him, is strong support to my contention that improvements and extensions of Post Office work are neglected. Why is it, then, that the Post Office has thus fallen behindhand in respect of improvements? That the Post Office has fallen somewhat behindhand in respect of improvements in the Service is not the fault of the officials of the Post Office. So far as my experience goes, they are still imbued with the traditions infused into the Department by the late Sir Rowland Hill, and it is the fact that from that time to the present almost all great reforms in the Department have been suggested by permanent officials; and in this connection I might mention the names of Mr. Scudamore, Mr. Tilley, and others, and I believe there are men now in the Service quite as able and quite as willing to institute improvements and reforms as the men I have mentioned. I do not believe it is due to my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General. I think my right hon. Friend himself must be conscious of the need of improvements in many directions. The Postmaster General is controlled and restrained by the superior powers at the Treasury, and I cannot but think that of late years the power of the Treasury over the Post Office has been increasing, and that the tendency has been to convert the Postmaster General into a subordinate officer of the Treasury. I cannot but think that it was to the Treasury my right hon. Friend referred when, at the jubilee dinner, he spoke of the progressive and reforming spirit of the Department being checked by the influence of his partner "Jorkins." It is, no doubt, a fact that the Treasury is supreme in all matters of Post Office expenditure. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, as guardian of the public purse, and wishing, no doubt, to add to the income of the country, practically overrules the Postmaster General in all the applications which the latter makes to him. It is a fact that the Postmaster General cannot spend a single penny of the money which he receives from the Post Office on improvements of any kind, small or large, without the previous consent and approval of the Treasury. In all questions of extensions of offices, new branches, improvements of service, and additional deliveries, the Post Office is under the strictest rules laid down by the Treasury not to incur any expenditure until it can be shown that it will be accompanied by an increase of income sufficient to meet the increased expenditure. With regard to local improvements and more important matters, the consent of the Treasury has to be obtained, and I think I am right in saying that when a question goes to the Treasury it is perhaps necessarily regarded, in the main, from a Treasury point of view. I do not doubt that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to some extent, takes into account the requirements of the public and the necessities of the Service; still, it is only in human nature that the right hon. Gentleman should consider the interests of the Exchequer from a revenue point of view rather than the interests of the Post Office from a public point of view. I cannot help remembering that whilst we have seen this continuing increase of revenue from the Post Office on the one hand, on the other we have complaints that improvements are not made in the Post Office, and that there is neglect and delay in giving facilities which the public want. The effect of the Treasury curb is felt over the whole Postal Service. The Postmaster General himself does not like to be continually urging improvements on the Treasury when he knows that a large number of them will constantly be refused, and there is the same feeling among the officers of the Post Office below him. This affects also the question of economies which might be carried out, because there is a feeling among the officials that the money saved by economies is not used for the benefit of the Service, but goes to swell the Treasury surplus; and it is only human nature, therefore, that the Post Office officials are not so eager to effect economies as they might be if the savings effected went towards improvements in the Post Office itself. I think I am right in saying that, as a matter of fact, no other country in the world makes the same income out of its Post Office that we do. In some countries the expenditure is greater than the revenue.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): That is the case in every country but one.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Yes, in no case but our own is there any considerable revenue made out of the Post Office. I cannot but think that some change is necessary in the relations between the Post Office and the Treasury which will give a freer hand to the Postmaster General in the institution of improvements in the Post Office itself; and that there should be a fixed limit to the income to be derived from the Post Office, so that facilities of all kinds to the public may be increased. I do not suggest that the whole surplus income should be given over for improvements in the Postal Service; that would mean a large increase of taxation in other directions, and I am not in favour of such a course. The surplus for this year is £3,335,000, from which there is to be deducted a certain amount of expenditure on buildings amounting to about £140,000. I am content to put the limit at £3,000,000 a year. I should not propose that the limit should be statutory, but rather a Parliamentary and Departmental one; that there should be a general understanding that only £3,000,000 should be paid over by the Post Office to the Treasury. The suggestion which I make has met with the general approval of Chambers of Commerce throughout the country, and I think that the Government would do well to adopt a suggestion of this kind. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the interests of the public revenue, would do well to consider this matter, because he cannot but be aware that there is a growing discontent in commercial circles at the neglect of improvements which characterises the Post Office. During the last few years the increase in the surplus has amounted to £200,000 or £300,000 a year.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): During the last five years it has only been about £160,000.

*MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I admitted at the commencement of my speech that in 1884 and also in 1887—in consequence of the very large capital expenditure in 1885 on the preparations for the Parcels Post, and in consequence of payments to the extent of £300,000 having to be made for sites and the increase in the Post Office Savings Bank business in London—there was a temporary reduction, but I think the fairer way to deal with the matter is to take decennial periods, and I have given the figures for those periods. The Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot gainsay that the surpluses of the Post Office, taking into account the Packet Service has increased from £440,000 in 1860 to over £3,000,000 in 1890. There can be no doubt that the revenue has multiplied six times in 30 years. My belief is that there is a general impression throughout the country that Post Office improvements are being neglected and that postal facilities of all kinds that the public demand are being refused. I believe that unless something in the direction I have indicated is done, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will risk a much larger and wider demand which may trench to a much greater extent on his surplus. I think, therefore, that in the interest of the revenue he has been receiving for the last few years, he will do well to adopt the suggestion which I have made, and to give a freer hand to the Postmaster General in the disposal of the surplus beyond a certain point, which point, as I say, I am ready to put at either £3,000,000 or £3,200,000.

(7.46.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The right hon. Gentleman has given some interesting statements of what he considers to be the views of the public generally, and also the views of the Postmaster General and the Secretary to the Post Office. I understand that the speeches he quoted of the Secretary to the Post Office and of the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General were both of them after-dinner speeches, and we are apt sometimes to allow a little latitude for the imagination under such circumstances. The right hon. Gentleman opposite desires, apparently, to fix some limit to the net revenue which is to be derived from the Post Office, and I gather from him that his object is that the balance of revenue received above a certain sum shall be expended in making improvements in the Postal Service generally. But neither the right hon. Gentleman nor the Committee need trouble themselves about fixing a limit of revenue, because although during the last two or three years the revenue has shown a tendency to increase, yet the figures show that there has been an enormously increased expenditure in recent years on the improvement of the Postal Service; and I may say further—speaking as I do with some knowledge of the applications which have been made and are being made to the Treasury for increased expenditure—that within the next few years there must be a very large increase of expenditure in providing additional accommodation for increase of business. These is hardly one of our large towns—nay, there is hardly one of our middle-sized towns—where increased accommodation is not necessary and must be provided within a short time. In London at this moment there are schemes of improvement on foot which will cost some hundreds of thousands of pounds, and the sooner they are carried out the better it will be for the Service. In Liverpool, also, improvements are advocated. I was rather horrified to hear that the Postmaster General had received a deputation, who had suggested that he should buy a site in Liverpool, which I think will cost more than £300,000, and those improvements, and the extensions in connection with them, will involve an expenditure probably of not less than £500,000. In Glasgow, in Edinburgh, in Leeds, and in nearly all the large towns, with the exception of only two or three where additional provision is being completed, a large expenditure is pending which will involve an enormously increased charge upon the Post Office Department. It must be borne in mind that the conditions of the Parcels Post Service have very greatly increased the necessity for additional accommodation, and this accommodation has to be met in some cases at a very heavy charge in consequence of the sites required. Space has to be obtained very often in the most expensive parts of big cities. There has been an experiment made, which I believe the Postmaster General will be able to show has been of great advantage, and which has resulted, so far as London is concerned, in partially separating the great centre for the Parcels Post from those of the letter post and telegraphs. This expenditure will go on, and I am seriously afraid that the right hon. Gentleman's limit will become automatic from the extension of the Service itself. The right hon. Gentleman gives us figures from which he draws the comforting conclusion that the Post Office revenue is increasing at an enormous rate. He said, however, that in his opinion the Post Office was lagging behind. There is not a single piece of evidence in support of that statement. I do not believe the English Post Office lags behind. I have seen something of it both inside and outside, and I believe it keeps up with the times very well indeed. In the five years commencing 1879 and ending 1884, the total revenue of the Post Office was a little short of £37,000,000, and in the five years ending in the present year, the total revenue was a little over £45,000,000. Therefore, in that period there had been an increase on gross receipts of about £8,500,000. Very nearly the whole of that £8,500,000 has been given in improving the Postal Service, because the net Revenue during the same period has only increased by about £1,000,000. The money has been spent in increasing wages, increasing accommodation, increasing the Mail Service, increasing deliveries, and increasing expenditure in every way. This is a conclusive answer to the right hon. Gentleman, who says there has been nothing done for the improvement of the Postal Service. There has been a very large increase in the wages paid, and there have recently been changes which involve a very large additional outlay. If the right hon. Gentleman thinks the Treasury has within the last two years been exercising any pressure or unduly resisting any improvement which the Postmaster General recommends, and which, after full consideration, the Treasury think it possible to accept, I can assure him he is mistaken. The Treasury has always met the requirements of the Post Office in a reasonable spirit. I think we must, within the next few years, expect a large increase in expenditure; but as far as I know, the relations between the Treasury and the Post Office have never been marked by less friction than is now the case. The Treasury desires to supplement the efforts of the Postmaster General in giving to the country the benefit of an efficient and cheap Postal Service.

(7.55.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): To a large extent I share the sentiments of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. I think the Treasury acts as a very useful governor upon the expenditure of all the Government Departments. I have myself spent a longer time in Departments than at the Treasury, and I know it was the desire of my Department to get as much money as we could. I have no doubt that is more the case with the Post Office than in any other Department. Naturally, an enthusiastically patriotic Postmaster General desires to give the public as much accommodation as he can, and to derive as much credit as he can for so doing, and all the Departments are apt to make extraordinarily sanguine estimates of the results of reductions. Before I was a Member of this House I was counsel before the Parliamentary Committee which considered the purchase of telegraphs. Mr. Scudamore, the Secretary of the Post Office, was confident that he could buy the telegraphs for £3,000,000. I had the honour of being one of the counsel against him, and we took very good care that he did not purchase the telegraphs for less than £10,000,000. Since that time the telegraphs have never paid the interest on that expenditure. Then came our lamented friend, Mr. Fawcett, a great Post Office reformer, who was extremely sanguine as to the results of the Parcel Post in a pecuniary sense, and as to the receipts to be derived from the reduced telegraph rates. I do not know whether the revenue has yet recovered from these reforms. If so, it has barely done so, after the lapse of many years. It is necessary, therefore, to be cautious in these matters, and not to accept too readily estimates which are made as to the economical results of great reforms. Our experience shows that such reforms never have paid. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury has done scant justice to the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre). My right hon. Friend asks us that if a certain fixed sum is exceeded the surplus should go to the public. I think that is fair if the capital sum is fixed at a fair figure. The Post Office is conducted as a commercial concern, and it is the only commercial concern the Government have ever entered into without enormous loss. One peculiarity about the Post Office is that it is conducted with no working capital. In any other commercial concern any extraordinary demand is met from the capital account. The Post Office has always met capital charges out of its revenue. What I think the Government ought to try and do is to estimate what has been the capital expenditure upon the Post Office. I do not know whether it could be ascertained, but I daresay it could be approximately settled. Supposing the capital is fixed at £50,000,000, if you put the interest at 6 per cent. it would amount on the whole to £3,000,000 a year. The Government might very fairly say they were entitled to a commercial dividend of £3,000,000 a year, and that if they earned more than that the surplus should be given away in additional accommodation to the public. I am perfectly prepared to protect the revenue of the Post Office, and I think that, in a great commercial concern of this kind, there ought to be a fair commercial profit upon the money expended. At present the working expenses are about three-fourths of the gross receipts, and therefore it is a very expensive business to manage. Great demands are made upon the Post Office. I do not at all complain of those made by the hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Henniker Heaton). They are all in one direction. They are all abroad. I can understand that in view of his colonial connection; but I would ask the hon. Members to consider the interests of people at home.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: All their relations are abroad.

SIR W. HARCOURT: There is much to be done at home. Since the reforms of Mr. Fawcett, the telegraph system has not paid its working expenses until, I think, last year. A year or two ago I know it did not pay them by £100,000. The rule is, that telegraphic communication is not given except in places where it will pay. Well, in my opinion, if you have a surplus, your generosity should go rather in the direction of providing additional facilities at home than in giving reduced rates abroad.

Sir W. Harcourt

(8.11.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. Goschen, St. George's, Hanover Square): I certainly cannot complain of the tone of the two speeches made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and I am especially grateful for the support afforded to the Treasury by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. The relations between the Post Office and the Treasury, as my right hon. Friend (Mr. Jackson) has said, are extremely pleasant at present. Of course, there must occasionally be differences between a Department which is so extremely active and ambitious as the Post Office, and a Department that must have some regard for the public purse. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman who opened the Debate that the Post Office is not so entirely discouraged as he seemed to think. A great many applications, no doubt, are made to the Treasury. We have been able to grant many of them, and we have been compelled to refuse some. I would point out that there are other objections besides the objection of expense to the great extension of the Post Office, and to the adoption of all the plans proposed to them. I do not think it desirable to increase to any further extent the great army of those who are employed in the Service of the State. An increase of staff often involves an increase of space, and very often the very success of an experiment makes it necessary to secure additional accommodation with the result that any possible profit derived from the improvement itself is eaten up. Both the right hon. Gentlemen opposite have admitted that the sum of £3,000,000 would be a fair estimate of the revenue which might be reasonably claimed by the Post Office, and they have suggested that profits beyond that should be employed for the benefit of those who use the Post Office. But what would happen is this: If you gave away the surplus above £3,000,000, in one or two years, you would probably find in the third year that there was a large expenditure needed for buildings, and the revenue would fall below £3,000,000. There has recently been a great demand for sites, and great additional expense occasionally becomes necessary in connection with salaries. We have had to make considerable increases in the pay of telegraph clerks and in the remuneration of some of the Post Office employés. It has been shown that the growth of revenue has, in the main, been devoted to additional expenditure and not treated as additional profit. The net revenue was £3,000,000 five years ago, and it is now £3,340,000. Therefore, in the last five years the increase in the annual revenue has only been £300,000, while the amount that has properly gone in the improvement of the Service and to improving the position of the Post Office servants has been very much larger. I believe there has been a great misconception on this point. The opinion has been expressed that a very large portion of the increased revenue went to the State; but the figures I have given show that there has been much exaggeration on the subject. I really do not think there is much difference between ourselves on this side of the Committee and the right hon. Gentlemen opposite.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I rather gather from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that, in point of fact, the Post Office has been acting on the principle I laid down, because the profits were £3,000,000 some years ago, and they are about the same now.

MR. GOSCHEN: In 1881-1882 the net revenue was £2,000,987, while in 1882-1883 it was £3,037,000. Therefore, as a matter of fact, the Post Office has practically acted under the check of the Treasury very much as was suggested by the right hon. Gentleman, only they have not done so consciously. They have considered all the matters suggested, and they have assented to those which appear to be reasonable, while they have dissented from some which appear to be too costly. We cannot estimate in advance the cost of an improvement, seeing that the cost will increase with the additional hands required and the additional space which may have to be secured. I am inclined to think that there is force in the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion, that when there is money to spare, it is not at all so certain that the best means of appropriating it is to reduce the ocean postage to one penny. We have paid regard to the sentiment that colonial and Indian postage should be put on a reasonable footing. We have devoted a certain sum to that purpose, but I confess it is fairly open to question whether in some parts of the country there might be an extension of telegraphic communication, even though it was not absolutely remunerative. We have not arrived at a point when the Telegraph Service is remunerative, looking at the enormous sum paid for the telegraphs which was sanctioned by a Committee of the House of Commons on which I had the honour to serve, and on which I divided occasionally in minorities of one and two against the enormous sums which the eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby was unable to extract from the majority of the Committee. I have always held that the majority of the Committee was over-persuaded to pay twice for the same article. I hope that will be a warning to other Governments to be extremely careful before we embark upon the purchase of these gigantic undertakings.

*(8.23.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I have no doubt the few remarks I am about to make will be received with disapproval on both Front Benches; but, nevertheless, I think it is necessary to make them. I am one of those who hold the doctrine that the Post Office ought not to be a tax collecting machine; that it ought to make such charges as will prevent the transmission of communications between citizens, being a tax on those who send them. I contend that any surplus ought to be applied in improvements and not in relief of taxation. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby that facilities at home should be first of all afforded, but what I wish to particularly urge upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Postmaster General is that the wages paid to the lower class of servants in the Post Office are not such as ought to be paid. At present there are very great temptations placed before very poorly-paid men. These temptations are increased by the neglect by the public of the Post Office Regulations. Thefts take place, and expenditure is incurred in detecting and prosecuting thieves. I submit that while the institution is a paying institution, there ought not to be persons paid not only starvation wages, but exposed to special temptation by having valuable property intrusted to them for delivery. There is no real relief to the nation in getting £3,000,000 from the Post Office and relieving taxation to that extent. The sum would be much better expended in facilities in out of the way districts and on telegraphs in connection with fisheries and other industries which would enable persons to contribute to the wealth of the State, and would produce greater economy in the end. (8.30.)

(9.0.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*(9.3.) MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I have to make an appeal to the Postmaster General on behalf of a new Post Office for Liverpool. The case of Liverpool is a very urgent one. The grievance is one of old standing. The Liverpool Post Office is very much overcrowded, and, besides, it is placed in a very inconvenient situation for trade. The fact, too, that it is overcrowded, renders it very unhealthy for the employés. They are crowded together in a most uncomfortable manner, and although the Postmaster has done everything in his power to mitigate their discomfort, there is no doubt that the work has entirely overgrown the premises, and there is great discontent among the employés on account of the way they are unavoidably treated. I appeal to the Postmaster General to give serious attention to the grievance of Liverpool in this respect. It has been going on for many years, and has always been getting worse, as the traffic and the Post Office work have increased. I suppose there is no town in the Kingdom whose trade and commerce has increased to a greater extent of late years than Liverpool, and the Post Office work has increased accordingly. Not only is the Post Office overcrowded; it is in a very bad situation. It is situated in a very poor—I may say a low—quarter of the town. It lay close to the Sailors' Home, where seamen are discharged, and which is frequented by foreigners, and everyone knows the accompaniments of such people. It is surrounded by public houses, and all sorts of coarse accompaniments. Many of the telegraphists employed in the Post Office are women, and in leaving the place they are sometimes subjected to insult, many of them being positively in dread of going home in consequence of the character of the surroundings. These facts are already known both to the Secretary to the Treasury and to the Postmaster General, and I think it is time something should be done to provide Liverpool with a proper General Post Office. As regards the general question, I think the employés, as a rule, are overworked, and that they ought to be better paid. I do not think the State should employ the cheapest labour it can obtain, but that the wages paid by the State should be ideal wages. That would prevent strikes and disorganisation in Government Departments. I am glad that the Postmaster General has lately made some substantial concessions to this deserving body of public servants. It should be the aim of the heads of Departments to keep the men in a state of contentment, and I therefore rejoice at every improvement made in their status.

(9.11.) MR. ATKINSON (Boston): I was glad to hear the hon. Member testify to the good state of trade in Liverpool. It is a condition of things one might always expect when a Conservative Ministry is in power, and if my hon. Friend opposite will only assist in maintaining them in Office, I have no doubt he will continue to have cause for congratulation in this respect. I rose for the purpose of making one or two suggestions to the Postmaster General not of a local character. I wish to raise the question as to the manner in which we Members of Parliament are charged for letters which are re-addressed to us and by which the right hon. Gentleman is sweeping large profits into the common chest. I say it is unfair, especially to hard working Members of Parliament that not only should they be continually receiving letters from their constituents, asking them to vote in a particular way—although if those constituents would reflect upon the consistent speeches which were delivered at election times, as in my own case, they would know in which way the vote would be given—I repeat, I think it is rather hard on them that they should be charged for postage simply because those letters are re-addressed to them when their residence is outside the London area. In my case I have been subjected during the present Session to a fine of about £20 under these circumstances, and when we see the Department making profits to the extent of millions annually, I think we have a right to call on the Postmaster General to relieve us of that burden. It is his duty, I think, not to endeavour to make profits, but to transact the business of the country cheaply, and to devote any surplus which he may have to facilitate the mail traffic, and to decreasing postal rates.

*(9.15.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): A few weeks ago I addressed a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General in regard to the Petition which the counter-men had forwarded to him; and the right hon. Gentleman, in reply, courteously informed me that he was considering the claims of these men, claims which, I believe, to be just, because they have many thousands of pounds passing through their hands every week, and in the main they are a very high-minded, honourable, and trustworthy body of servants. They are badly paid at the present moment, and the right hon. Gentleman will, I think, admit that their demands are fair and just. I wish now to ask him what decision he has come to upon their Petition, and whether he is inclined to accede to the request which they have made. There are other matters which I desire to bring before the right hon. Gentleman in no spirit of complaint. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby was, I think, quite correct when he stated that many reforms in the Post Office were needed before we took in hand such changes as has been so frequently and strenuously urged by the hon. Member for Canterbury, who has so near his heart the question of Ocean Penny Postage. Now, I desire to ask the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the anomalous position in which the people of the United Kingdom are placed in regard to the book post. Hon. Members frequently receive from the Continent printed matter, enclosed in an envelope, which is not sealed, but which is left open in such a manner that officials of the Post Office can in an instant ascertain if the packet contains any written communication. Packages thus sent come at a cheap rate. Yet, if we desire to send similar packages from England to the Continent, we have to pay exactly double what Frenchmen and Germans have to pay in forwarding them to us. I cannot understand why the people in the United Kingdom should not have the same privileges, and not be able to address communications to friends on the Continent at the same rate as people living on the Continent are enabled to do, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give that question his serious consideration, and introduce this much-needed reform. A few weeks ago I happened to have occasion to address a few hundred communications to friends on the Continent, and I considered it sufficient for my purpose if the envelope in which the communications were enclosed was cut open as is the custom on the Continent, so as to enable any officials in connection with the Post Office to ascertain if the package contained any printed matter. Had the envelope been sealed, the cost of postage would have been 5d. each package, because it weighed a trifle over the half ounce, and I therefore resorted to this simple and ingenious plan of cutting open the envelope, thinking by that means to secure the privilege of the halfpenny post; but I was informed by the Postmaster in my district that this could not be allowed; that it was absolutely necessary for the envelope to be cut open from corner to corner. I declined naturally to go to the expense of 5d. for each package, and consequently the Post Office lost a revenue of several pounds, simply because this unfortunate restriction was enforced. Another question to which I wish to call attention is that of carte telegrams which are in vogue on the Continent, and by means of which a man can send a message for a charge, I believe, of 3d. to his friends through a pneumatic tube, the message being delivered in another part of the city within the hour. Could not we have some such system adopted in this country?

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That question must be raised on the Telegraph Vote.

*MR. CREMER: Of course, Sir, if you rule that this is out of order now, I will defer my remarks upon it until the Telegraph Vote comes before the Committee. In conclusion, I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether the enormous revenue which he derives for the working of the machinery of the Post Office cannot be utilised for some of these reforms? I admit that, in the main, his management of the institution is economical, although, I have had to complain once or twice of ukases which he has issued, and which I believe to be tyrannical to the employés. It was never contemplated that the Government should make a profit of two or three millions out of this Department. It was never intended that it should be worked for the mere purposes of profit. I think the men employed ought to be better paid than they are. I sometimes pity them for the work which they have to do. For instance, in the office which I occupy, they have to mount 40 or 50 steps in order to deliver my letters, and yet those letters are delivered with punctuality, and the men are remarkably courteous and obliging, although they are underpaid for the labours which they have to perform. We have been frequently told that the rate of wages should be governed by the law of supply and demand. If that doctrine were to be applied to the highest class of officials, as well as to the lowest ranks, well and good. If the right hon. Gentleman will permit me to say so, I think there are many men quite competent to discharge the duties of his office who would be willing to do so at a much lower remuneration than he receives. There are also many other very well paid officials in the Post Office, whose duties might be as efficiently performed at a less salaries than are now paid. I hold that we are not justified in applying this doctrine of political economy to the lower grade of servants in the Post Office and not to the higher grades. I appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to give me an answer to the questions I have raised, and to say whether he is prepared to give these hard-working men an increase of 2s. or 3s. a week in their wages. I should also like to know what step he intends to take with regard to the counter-men's Memorial—whether he will introduce the much-needed reform in the book post to which I have referred, and whether he will adopt the system of carte telegrams so advantageously and economically applied on the Continent of Europe?

*(9.28.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I wish to bring again before the
Mr. Cremer

Postmaster General the question which I raised last year, and to ask how far the reforms then promised with regard to the employment of postmen indoor and outdoor on Sundays have been carried into effect? I moved last year a reduction of the salary of the right hon. Gentleman, and he in reply made a very reassuring statement as to the policy of the Department. Will he now tell us what further steps he has taken in advance towards diminishing the labour of rural and urban messengers and of indoor officials on Sundays? The arguments I advanced last year were based on the statements of Sir Arthur Blackwood, that there were still between 1,000 and 1,200 rural messengers obliged to work every Sunday, and I then received an assurance from the right hon. Gentleman that certain sums had been set apart for diminishing still further the number of those employed on Sundays as rural messengers. I hope that to-night he will be able to announce that the Department has seen its way to further reduce the number of men so employed, and that the rule of alternate employment on Sundays has been generally adopted at but a trifling extra cost to the country. With regard to the indoor officials, the facts were still most striking. Of course, the difficulty of reform in their case was much greater, as the skill and knowledge possessed by those officials necessarily limits their number; but, still, we were told that in the provinces many of these officials were working seven Sundays out of eight, and three Sundays out of four, and obviously there was a large margin for reform in that respect. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be able to state that something more has been done in that direction. The general policy of the Department has been fully discussed, but I cannot part with this Vote without saying that, while I recognise that the Department has been vigorously and economically, and wisely managed in many ways, it is, nevertheless, the duty of any Member dealing with this question in this House to record his opinion that the right hon. Gentleman has not shown that promptitude and tact in dealing with the Post Office employés which would have prevented the irritation which has arisen, reaching the point it did; and that, probably, had he seen his way to the application of these remedies and reforms more rapidly, that action would have saved many good and honest men who went out on strike from being dismissed for insubordination; so that instead of running themselves as they have done, they might now have been earning a fair remuneration and living happily upon it. I sincerely regret that these reforms, good as they are, were not introduced in time to avoid the loss of these men's services. The hon. Member for Haggerston (Mr. Cremer) has made one or two practical suggestions as to the Post Office work I should like to ask one question of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the method of dealing with registered letters. In the United States, when a registered letter is sent, the sender receives back, through the Post Office, a signed receipt from the receiver. I wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman has considered the possibility of introducing such a practice into this country. I think that, if the difficulties in the way are not found to be insuperable, great advantage might be derived from the extra security afforded by this method.

(9.33.) GENERAL GOLDSWORTHY (Hammersmith): I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to go a step further, and do something that would place us in a better position in regard to the general delivery of letters. An hon. Member has said he did not think it desirable that the Government should pay large wages to the postmen; but, for my part, I regard it as somewhat mean on the part of the Government that they should pay the lowest market rate of wages to the servants they employ. I trust the Government will in future see their way to place these men in a somewhat better position. With regard to the remark of the last speaker, that the recent reforms might have been made earlier, I would point out that the time of the Postmaster General, and the heads of other Departments of the State, is so much occupied in this House in answering the wearisome iteration and reiteration of speeches by hon. Members opposite, that they are unable to give the requisite attention to the performance of the duties connected with their Departments. I regret, for my own part, that the Postmaster General could not see his way much earlier than he did to ameliorate the condition of the poorer class of employés in the Post Office, but, at the same time, I think there are great excuses for him and for other Members of the Government placed in a similar position. Although Ministers may, under such circumstances, make mistakes, I shall, nevertheless, support them [Laughter.] Hon. Members opposite may laugh, but, at the same time, what I have said is a fact which has been proved by experience, and one of which right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench have just reason to complain. Having said this, I merely wish to ask the Postmaster General whether he cannot go a little further in improving the position of the letter carriers, a matter which, I think, fairly demands his serious consideration.

*(9.35.) MR. J. C. STEVENSON (South Shields): I do not rise to urge the Postmaster General to do anything more than endeavour to make the public better acquainted with the accommodation which the Post Office already affords. I would call his attention to the Post Office Guide, a book which is issued by the Department for the information of the public. I think that if the right hon. Gentleman would issue a fresh edition of that book, containing information of a plainer and more simple character, much good would be done. The regulations as to the postal charges on letters are couched in language which is capable of great improvement. The public at present possess means of accommodation which they do not know of. For instance, it is not generally known that an arrangement exists whereby a person, having sent a letter to be forwarded by a foreign mail, may have an addition to that letter or an independent communication forwarded by telegraph at one half-penny a word on payment of the ocean letter postage. I myself sent a letter which left a provincial post office for the mail from Queenstown to America, and, when I asked if what I have just referred to could be done, the postmaster told me that no such arrangement existed, but it fortunately happened that one of the clerks did know of that arrangement, which will be found on p. 417 of the Post Office Guide. It is extremely useful that the public should know that by means of a telegram they may overtake letters going to foreign parts by adding the ocean postage to the inland telegraph charge, but no one would ever find this out by reading the paragraph relating to the matter which appears in the Post Office Guide.

(9.37.) MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I have spent much time in investigating the accounts of the Post Office, and I have found that for many years the Surplus Revenue has been nearer £4,000,000 than £3,000,000, as stated by the right hon. Member for Bradford. But the way in which the Post Office accounts are presented is so confusing that it is very difficult for an outsider to understand them. Matters that ought to be kept separate are mixed up with one another in a very unsatisfactory manner. The whole of the expenditure in regard to the purchase of sites, for instance, is charged to Revenue Account by the Post Office Department, a thing which no private firm would do. Again, in seeking to get at the exact accounts, I find that up to a certain period the whole of the packet service was charged to the Post Office General Account, whereas in other countries, such as France, Germany, and America, it is properly charged to a separate account. Another point to which I wish to draw attention is this—that the question of the payment of large sums to foreign Governments in connection with the mail service ought to be submitted to Parliament, which, under the present system, has no means practically of checking or dealing with them. I have no hesitation in asserting that the expenditure of that money without its being submitted to the House of Commons is illegal. The fact is that the Post Office plan of dealing with the accounts would not be tolerated in any large private firm. I am most anxious that the Department should present to the House of Commons a business-like and commercial statement of its transactions. If we had a statement of that character, showing the expenditure on buildings, and the absolute receipts from all quarters, we should have a more satisfactory state of things than at present. The actual Revenue receipts of the Post Office are £13,000,000 a year, while the actual expenditure does not amount to £9,000,000. These facts can be proved by the Treasury statement, but there were no fewer than three different statements of account in connection with the Post Office presented last year, and the whole three differed one from another. I think the suggestion that has been made by the right hon. Member for Bradford, that the surplus above a fixed sum of Revenue should be devoted to the improvement and cheapening of the Postal and Telegraph Services, is a fair one, and should be taken into consideration, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer has evaded the main point, and says it cannot be done, and points out that the Revenue is not so much as we say it is, and that if it amounts to less than £3,000,000, the proposition of the right hon. Member for Bradford would be of no avail. But if you fix the amount at £3,000,000, and the Revenue does not reach that amount, it is only fair to say there is nothing available for improvements; but, if on the contrary, that amount is exceeded, the excess ought to be devoted to improving and cheapening the Postal Telegraph Services. Some compliments have been paid by the right hon. Member for Bradford to the administration of the Post Office. I am not prepared to bring before the House the numerous grievances which justify me in differing from the right hon. Gentleman, but I venture to assert that any officer, however eminent, entering the Post Office, at once becomes as stubborn and obstinate as any official in the country. The moment Sir Rowland Hill entered the Post Office he became an official in every sense of the word—obstinate, obstructive, and objected to every proposal for affording facilities to the public. I need only point to the troubles which arose between Sir Rowland Hill and the Press, especially in the case of the Times, to indicate the way in which official obstruction operated. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby said that most of the reforms which I have advocated are directed to improving communication with our people abroad, but the right hon. Gentleman forgets that the profits we derive from such communication with our friends abroad are so large as amply to justify our asking for a small reduction of the rates. From Australia we receive £300,000 a year in small money orders, and from America as much as £1,250,000. I have not the slightest doubt that before another year is passed my right hon. Friend on the Treasury Bench will be willing to accede to my request for an Imperial penny postage. One of the local grievances we suffer from is the charge for re-addressing letters. Any foreign letter coming to England is re-addressed, if necessary, without charge, whereas an English letter requiring to be re-addressed in this country undergoes an extra charge of 50 or 100 per cent. I understand the Postmaster General is in favour of this change, but his applications on the subject have been refused by the Treasury. I believe it can be shown that considerably more than half the applications made to the Treasury, for even the most petty conveniences, have been refused. It was only in 1888 that I asked the Postmaster General to institute a very small reform, namely, that the charge of 2d. for the receipt of sixpenny telegrams should no longer be made. He promised that that should be done, but four months ago he wrote to me saying that, in accordance with his promise, he had made application to the Treasury, and that the Treasury had refused it. A more humiliating confession I never heard of the sort of petty annoyances to which the right hon. Gentleman is subjected by the Treasury. In another case, a stamp having fallen off a letter a charge of 2d. was made for fixing the unused stamp upon the letter. With regard to the sending of circulars in open envelopes, I have urged the right hon. Gentleman to introduce that reform, but he has been unable to do it. Another reform I wanted is, that the use of postal cards, upon which we can affix stamps, should be allowed. That is a common-sense reform, yet the Treasury will not grant it. I wish to know how long we are to wait for a reform with respect to the supplements to illustrated papers, which are required to bear a date before the Post Office will carry them. Before sitting down I wish to ask when will the reduced rate of postage with India and Australia come into operation? These parts of the Empire have agreed to it, and are anxiously waiting for the great boon to be conferred upon them. There is no difficulty in the matter, and yet we are told, in answer to repeated questions, that all the colonies in the British Empire must agree before it is carried out.

(10.0.) THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): I would point out to the Committee that, however interesting and attractive may be the principle that there should be no such thing as a Post Office Surplus, the question is whether the House of Commons would assent to such a principle when it is recognised that the adoption of the policy suggested means additional taxation to the extent of £3,000,000 a year. I must say I think the day is very distant when the House of Commons is likely to accept the very interesting and attractive theory that there should be no surplus derived from working the Post Office, when it is recognised that the adoption of the policy suggested would mean additional taxation to the extent of £3,000,000 a year. The hon. Member for Northampton used an expression with regard to the lower grades of postmen which was, perhaps, rather rhetorical; and he also suggested that their wages are too low to be compatible with honesty. I hope no wages can be too low for honesty in this country. I trust it will never be the case that there will be found working men who will put forward as an excuse for dishonesty that their wages are not so large as they should be.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I did not put it quite so broadly as that. I think I put it that the temptation to a poor man entrusted with articles of value was more than he could resist when he was underpaid.

MR. RAIKES: I appreciate that view of the case. There have been cases of dishonesty amongst the postmen, but those who are most experienced in these matters assure me that the cases of dishonesty in the service of the Post Office which can in any way be connected with absolute poverty are very rare. Cases of dishonesty are mostly to be traced to bad habits or bad company. Considering the extraordinary amount and value of the property passing through the Post Office the number of offences is extremely small, and the Post Office quite holds its own with the other Public Departments with regard to honesty. With regard to what fell from the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) his speech formed something of an object lesson illustrative of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir William Harcourt). The hon. Member found this a suitable occasion to press upon the Government the claims of Liverpool to be provided with a new Post Office, the site for which would cost something like £250,000, and the building £150,000 more. There is, therefore, a demand upon the Post Office surplus for something like £400,000 in respect of one great and wealthy community. I do not at all deny that the Post Office at Liverpool is not in the most convenient part of the town, and I do not believe that the Post Office buildings are the best adapted for the purpose. I should be extremely glad if I could see my way to find a better site, and provide better buildings for Liverpool, but I think that the hon. Member for Flintshire must remain satisfied with this general statement upon my part; and, at all events, it is well that Liverpool should bear in mind that it will be necessary that Liverpool itself should come forward with something in the shape of an offer to get rid of the premises at present occupied, and which, at all events, can be made to do for some years longer, before the Government can undertake the enormous expenditure of providing new premises. I am happy to take the opportunity of correcting the hon. Member's statement as to the insanitary condition of the present building. I have had inquiry made into the subject, and I find the health of the staff of Liverpool quite up to the average of the staffs of ordinary Post Offices. The hon. Member for Boston (Mr. Atkinson) referred to a question which he has frequently mooted in this House, namely, the charge for re-direction of inland letters. I cannot see why letters should be carried free a second journey, which involves exactly the same amount of cost to the Post Office as the first journey. I admit, however, that since letters coming from abroad can be re-directed free, there does seem some injustice in charging for re-direction in the case of home letters. This forms one of the subjects now being inquired into by a Departmental Committee, with a view to legislation early next Session. As to the London countermen, I am glad to inform the hon. Member who spoke from below the Gangway on the opposite side of the House, that, under the new regulations promulgated a few weeks ago, these men will reap substantial benefit, a higher maximum rate of pay being obtainable by those in both the first and second class. As to the question of open envelopes being conveyed at book post rates, the matter is being inquired into by the same Committee, and must, therefore, stand over until next year. I hope to be able next year to make some positive proposal on the matter. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, who pressed me as to Sunday labour, the policy of the Department is continually to diminish Sunday labour, and during the past year I have been steadily pursuing that policy in the case of certain classes of rural postmen. Indoor labour, being skilled, is not so easily dealt with; but, under the new arrangement which has just been sanctioned by the Treasury, sorting clerks in the provinces will, in future, receive extra pay for Sunday labour. There has been some misunderstanding as to the terms of the engagement of these clerks, which are different from those of their London brethren. The provincial clerks are engaged for 50 hours per week, 48 hours on week-days and two on Sundays, while the London clerks are engaged for 48 hours only, and receive extra pay for Sunday labour. Under the new arrangement, therefore, the provincial clerks may be said, in a sense, to be paid for Sunday labour twice over. With regard to the Hammersmith Post Office, which my hon. and gallant Friend (General Goldsworthy) wishes to see raised in rank, if I cannot do all the hon. and gallant Gentleman asks, I hope I shall be able to do something in the direction indicated. As to the question raised by the hon. Member for Shields, the question of simplifying and reducing the tables of postage was the raison d'être of the Departmental Committee I have already referred to, and was the first subject I asked them to inquire into. I hope that in that direction also I shall be able to introduce legislation next Session. I do not wish to revive the question of the position of the postmen. The hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Channing) thinks the recent unfortunate difficulties might have been avoided if I had had more tact. I daresay if the hon.

Member had been in my position a display of tact would not have been wanting. But, at all events, we do our best in the Public Service, and I am inclined to believe, now that we have got rid of the outside disturbing element, that the relations between the postmen and their official chiefs are likely to be of a harmonious and satisfactory character. I speak from the experience of the interviews I have had with the postmen. I think it necessary to say that before the late disturbances I had on the anvil a scheme for improving the position of the non-established Force, which was before the Treasury, and if the disturbances had not taken place it would have been promulgated some time ago. I am happy to say that I have obtained the sanction of the Treasury to my proposals, which I believe will tend to improve the position of the non-established postmen who have remained true and loyal. I wish to correct one misapprehension. It is supposed that the position of the Government is that only the market value should be paid for labour of this sort. Those who sat in the Committee will remember that I laid down a different doctrine the other day. My own view is, that while the market value must be the governing consideration, because we are not dealing with our own money, but with the money of the taxpayers, the taxpayers would wish that, in applying that standard to those in the Public Service, we should always bear in mind that a great Government should treat its employés liberally. I have long considered that the wages which the non-established men are receiving, though they may be suitable in the case of boys, are not adequate in the case of adults. The hon. Member for Canterbury (Mr. Henniker-Heaton) has gone over some familiar ground. The hon. Member has dealt with the question of account, which, I am afraid, must remain an open question between him and the Post Office. I only wish I had the surplus the hon. Member would give me. I have, however, to be content with the somewhat smaller surplus which is shown by the official figures. I am inclined to agree with the hon. Member that the purchase of sites should come from capital, but as we have no capital account, that charge must come out of the Revenue of the year. The question of half-penny stamps on cards is one which is occupying the attention of the Departmental Committee. I wish I could state when the new postal rates to the colonies and India will begin; but I am certain the time cannot be long deferred. Certain questions have arisen with regard to dealing with India, and the Committee will understand that if two mails travel together in the same ship, and form part of the same post, it is in the highest degree desirable to deal with them together. I hope that an arrangement with regard to India will be soon completed, and when it is, I shall be glad to announce to the House the beginning of the new rates. I will not inflict on the Committee a repetition of the reasons which have led the Government to decline to adopt a system of Ocean Penny Postage. I think it was rather unfortunate that in this year in particular, when the civilised world has been celebrating the jubilee of the Penny Post, which was established by the exertions of Sir Rowland Hill, the hon. Gentleman should have thought it his duty to speak of that great man as "an obstinate and obstructive official." I hope that those who appreciate the merits of that description of Sir Rowland Hill will be able to discount the value of any of the hon. Gentleman's statements with respect to the present Postmaster General. I thank the Committee for listening to this somewhat discursive speech, and I hope hon. Members will now allow the Vote to pass, particularly as we have before us another Post Office Vote which may give rise to some discussion.

(10.27.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I do not wish to detain the Committee long, but I think I am justified in occupying some little time on this occasion. I am glad to hear that the right hon. Gentleman has a scheme ready for dealing with the postmen not on the general staff, and I hope it will be a generous one. At the same time, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will bear in mind that there is a strong opinion that that portion of the Service should be kept as low as possible. I was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman say that good relations now exist between himself and the postmen. I would appeal to him to say whether, the outside element having now gone, he cannot treat the men who, unfortunately, forgot themselves on a recent occasion, in a generous spirit, and take a very large number of them back into the Service again. I want to know whether, within the past few days, men in the sorting service have been called upon to give an explanation of their conduct for having shown some sympathy with the postmen at the time of the strike. I desire also to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he can give me any information as to what progress is being made in the consideration of the Memorial which was presented to him by the London sorting staff. The staff are very anxious to have the questions raised in the Memorial settled, especially when they know that the Memorial of another Department, presented after theirs, has been dealt with. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will also say whether the female sorters in the Savings Bank and Postal Order Department will come within the scope of the alterations he proposes to make?

(10.34.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I wish to call attention to the transference of mails at Kingstown and Holyhead. I gathered from an answer made the other day by the President of the Local Board of Trade (Sir M. Hicks Beach), that the service cannot be perfected, because the Post Office and the Railway Companies are somewhat reluctant in assisting the Board of Trade in the matter. The boat service is at present one of the best carried out in the United Kingdom, and I do not think I need do more than call the attention of the Postmaster General to the delay which occurs very frequently on both sides of the Channel, owing to the means of transferring the mails from the trains to the steamers and from the steamers to the trains. I do not press my right hon. Friend for an answer at the present moment, but I would like to call his attention to the fact that passengers and the public at large are much inconvenienced by the present delay in the transfer of mails, and I earnestly hope the Post Office will see its way to use a little effort with the Railway Companies to induce them to carry out the improvement.

(10.35.) MR. BURT (Morpeth): I wish to join my hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. J. Rowlands) in his appeal with regard to the men who have recently been dismissed from the Post Office. A few days ago the Postmaster General promised to make an investigation into the case of these men, but he has not, in the speech he has just delivered, made any reference to the matter. Considering the result of that unfortunate dispute, I think the right hon. Gentleman is in a position to act with magnanimity and generosity, and I trust he may see his way to reinstate, if not the whole, a great number of the men dismissed.

*(10.37.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell): I am anxious to put a question to the Postmaster General with reference to the system of opening letters in the Post Office. Hon. Members sitting opposite are constantly in the habit of asserting that their letters are opened, and there are few who have at one time or another darkly hinted at something of the kind. The hon. Member for West Mayo (Mr. Deasy) has asserted that when he went to Australia his letters were opened, and the charge which he then made against a postmaster there had a singular and amusing result, as the Committee will remember. I, therefore, think I am justified in asking the Postmaster General whether there is any truth in these allegations. I feel all the more justified in putting the question because of the remarks of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) made at a banquet given in his honour, of the 28th June last. Speaking of the day of the memorable Division which took place on the 19th June (which he characterised as a critical and snatched Division), the hon. Member for the City of Cork said that had he and his Colleagues known the Division was to be taken they would have been present, and he added—

“ We could not send out a Whip because it is a notorious fact that Government open our letters, and if we had had the time to send out a Whip it would have defeated its object.”

There may be times when there is some justification for opening letters, but it is an act which the country would resent very bitterly if done when no real necessity existed for it. As I understand, the opening of letters can only be done on the warrant of the Home Secretary. No one can suggest that there is now the slightest ground for opening letters of hon. Members opposite, or, so far as I know, at any time since 1886. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman if it is a fact that the letters of hon. Members opposite are opened, and whether, since he has been Postmaster General, the Home Secretary has upon a single occasion given his warrant authorising the opening of any letter of any Irish Member?

(10.40.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I have put down an Amendment to the Supplementary Estimate, but I do not propose to move it, because, if I did, I should be precluded from drawing attention to a local grievance of my own, which I have already submitted to the Postmaster General. Burntisland is not a very large town, but it is a very important commercial place. As soon as the Forth Bridge was opened it was placed very much in the position of Aberystwith, that is to say, its letters were carried past it, and then sent back later in the day, but too late for business men. I am always for economy, and I know the difficulty the Postmaster General has in dealing with Railway Companies. But, at the same time, up to the present, Burntisland has enjoyed excellent postal facilities, and it is rather hard it should now be placed in a position of peculiar disadvantage. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will consider the matter as favourably as he can. With regard to the Motion I have on the Paper, let me say I think we ought to give to the Post Office servants something more than the market rate. We require these people to surrender a certain part of their civil rights, and we ought to bear that in mind in remunerating them. I have had some official experience, and I am ready to acknowledge that the Post Office took the best stand of all the Departments in the recent disputes. We have been given to understand that the Postmaster General has made some recommendation with regard to the salaries of the unestablished postmen. It is well the right hon. Gentleman should give us some information as to the nature of the increase in wages he proposes, and as to the reason for the proposal. There is one matter I have to express a little doubt in regard to, and that is his proposal that there should be no deduction in case of absence from sickness. I am inclined to think it is an excellent plan that in cases of short and casual absence from sickness no deduction should be made, but we know that people very often stop away on account of sickness, when they know that they are not to lose anything. People who have to make their money from day to day are very slow to lay up. Again, I think the Postmaster General will find that if there is no deduction, a good many men will not take care of their health. There are cases, for instance, in which sickness is caused by men's own fault.

(10.47.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I desire to elicit from the right hon. Gentleman a satisfactory explanation on a point in regard to which I gave him a notice some days ago: it relates to the conduct of the Secretary to the Post Office attending a meeting at Exeter Hall. Some months ago a considerable amount of litigation took place in connection with the detention of children by a Dr. Barnardo. The Court of Queen's Bench at last issued a writ of habeas corpus, and intimated to Dr. Barnardo that unless he surrendered or produced the body of a certain child, who had been removed through his instrumentality to Canada, he would be committed to prison. Upon that decision, an advertisement was issued to the effect that a mass meeting would be held in Exeter Hall, on the 10th December, 1889, that Sir Arthur Blackwood, K.C.B., would take the chair, and be supported by a great number of well known Christian workers, that the meeting would be addressed by Dr. Barnardo, who would place before the meeting all the facts in the Gossage case, and that it was earnestly desired that the meeting should be a triumphant rejoinder to the strictures so recently passed by the Court of Law, and re-echoed by the public Press, upon Dr. Barnardo. Knowing the position of Sir Arthur Blackwood, and the constitution in great part of the institution of which he was so important an official, I thought it incumbent upon me to write to the Postmaster General, drawing his attention to the matter. I pointed out in my letter that it was evident an attack was to be made on a portion of the community who are Catholics, and that I felt sure the right hon. Gentleman could not have been made aware of the contemplated action of the Secretary to the Post Office. The Postmaster

General replied to me from Wales. He said he had communicated with Sir Arthur Blackwood, and was good enough to comment upon the temperate and conciliatory tone of my communication. I received the right hon. Gentleman's letter on the 9th of December, and the meeting was held on the 10th. Sir Arthur Blackwood was in the chair, and had, of course, to listen to the speech of Dr. Barnardo. Dr. Barnardo said he was most anxious to avoid making the least reflection on the learned Judges, but he went on to name two Judges, and only two, whom a very large portion of the public knew very well to be Roman Catholics. Speaking of the case of one child, he said—

"In that particular case the mother was a Roman Catholic and the father was a Protestant, or had been before he died. Well, to cut a long story short, I was able to send that child away, so that he could not be got at. I did not break the law, but I got the child away, and he is away now and doing very well."

Further on he mentioned the name of Mr. Justice Day. He said—

"I went back into Court and said to Mr. Justice Day, 'My Lord, we have had these children for years: they are now going to leave us; cannot these lads have the privilege of three or four minutes conversation with them in the corridor alone?' Mr. Justice Day said, 'Certainly not, unless the Solicitor is present.' I put that to you to show that where religious feeling is strong you must remember—I say with all respect—even Judges are but men."

He added—

"If religious prejudice was not behind, you would never have the bitter strictures coming from the Bench that have got into the papers about me."

And so Dr. Barnardo redeemed his promise of making a triumphant rejoinder to the strictures of the Bench. I do not complain of Dr. Barnardo; what I complain of is, the conduct of Sir Arthur Blackwood attending the meeting. In fairness to Sir Arthur Blackwood, however, I am bound to say there is more than one passage in his speech which goes to deprecate any extreme view of his conduct. He said he felt obliged, as a Vice President of Dr. Barnardo's Homes, to be present to show and express his unabated confidence in Dr. Barnardo's work, to stand by his friend, even if he had made a mistake. He also said he had received warning that the leading Roman Catholic newspaper, the Tablet, had written to the effect that the facts would be laid before the House of Commons. [Cheers.] Well, I can assure the hon. Gentleman who cheers that passage that I am not here to defend the Tablet. I do not attach importance to it, and far from considering it a leading Catholic paper, I think it anti-Catholic, and that it has done immense damage to religion. Sir Arthur Blackwood went on to say that it mattered little to him that Roman Catholic Members had expressed an intention to take up the position that his taking part in a public meeting of this kind was evidence of his unfitness to hold the position of permanent head, under the Postmaster General, of a Department employing 100,000 servants, and to deal impartially with Roman Catholic servants of the Crown. He denied that anyone could charge him during the time he had held his official position with having allowed his deep, his extremely deep, religious convictions to interfere for one moment with the discharge of his duty to the State, or to influence him against impartial dealing with any man whose religious convictions happened to differ from his own. Well, I think I have stated the facts of the case. I do not want to blame Sir Arthur Blackwood for his deep religious convictions, and the fact that these convictions are of a particular complexion is nothing to me. On that account he will never meet with the slightest objection or blame from me. My point is this: here is a public official, almost supreme head of a Department in which, as he says, he has 100,000 men under him—and of these a very considerable number belong to that portion of the community which this meeting was called to denounce and charge with conspiracy. I ask, is it possible after this public manifestation of his feelings that officials under him can look to him with confidence, and trust to be dealt with impartially where their religious convictions are known to be different from his own? I do not think it is reasonable to expect it. As a fact, there exists among the Post Office staff very considerable distrust as to their prospects of promotion or fair treatment where the religious feelings and convictions Sir Arthur Blackwood mentioned have any room for play. I desire to emphasise the case in this respect. It was a case in which the head of the Department, the Postmaster General himself, had communicated to his subordinate in reference to the matter, and after that communication was made, rightly and courteously made—and so far as I am concerned I have nothing to complain of in the action of the Postmaster General—this meeting was held, a meeting which I say it was utterly unfit for a man in the position of Sir Arthur Blackwood to attend, having regard to the decision of Judges on a most important point affecting the liberty of the subject, and where they had threatened to exercise their jurisdiction in a very extreme manner. Sir Arthur Blackwood went out of his way to attend a meeting advertised as for the purpose of making what was described as “a triumphant rejoinder to some strictures recently passed by the Court of Queen’s Bench,” and I say that was a line of conduct highly improper. With all due respect to the observations of the Secretary to the Post Office, I beg the Committee to remember that within recent times officials have been subjected to reprimand and punishment because they ventured to openly manifest their presence at meetings of a political character. Not very long ago a customs officer in Norfolk was removed, at his own expense, because he addressed a question to a speaker at a Primrose meeting. Well, if this is the way subordinates are treated, why is the Secretary to the Post Office treated differently? At least there is as much objection to attending a meeting convened to denounce the findings of Judges on a subject which excited a great deal of feeling in the country, as in attending as an ordinary citizen a public meeting. Yet in the one case an insignificant offender is visited with pains and penalties, while Sir A. Blackwood is allowed to go scot free, after attending this meeting in spite of a communication which he had received from the head of his Department. I do not wish to move a reduction in the Estimate, certainly I do not want to embarrass the Postmaster General, or detain the Committee. I should be glad to relieve the right hon. Gentlemen from the many hours attention he has given to these discussions; yet I do wish for a few minutes to prevent this subject being crossed by a number of others of local interest, and to secure this I formally move a reduction of the Vote by £100 in respect to the salary of the Secretary to the Post Office.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Item A be reduced by £100, part of Salary of the Secretary to the Post Office.”—(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

*(11.10.) MR. RAIKES: I presume I should not be in order, after the Amendment has been moved, in replying to questions put by several hon. Members relating to other branches of the Vote, and, therefore, I will confine myself to this particular matter. I very well remember the correspondence with the hon. Member opposite on this subject last year, but I confess that until recently I had thought that the hon. Member would have been satisfied with having made a protest against what he regards as an improper proceeding, and that he would not have thought it necessary to bring the matter before the Committee. I am not here to defend the terms of the notice convening the meeting, but Sir A. Blackwood was not in any way responsible for them; he consented to occupy the chair on that occasion because the person in whose immediate interest the meeting had been called is one who is an old friend of his, with whom he has been largely associated in various philanthropic and benevolent works, and he considered that it would be an unmanly act on his part not to stand by his friend when, as he believed, that friend was exposed to a good deal of obloquy, and desired an opportunity of clearing his character. I think it is impossible for any impartial man, reading through Sir Arthur Blackwood’s speech, to come to the conclusion that he impugned the conduct of the Judges, or made random or reckless charges against our Catholic fellow-subjects, and I trust there is no such feeling as the hon. Member describes among Post Office employés of distrust of Sir Arthur Blackwood’s general action in the Department, in consequence of proceedings at that meeting. Roman Catholics in the Post Office have no reason whatever to suspect Sir A. Blackwood of being prejudiced against them. I know that, on a recent occasion, when his Private Secretary was disabled, he secured the services in that most confidential position of a Roman Catholic Member of the Post Office staff. I think that is sufficient evidence that members of that religion have no right to expect other than fair and generous treatment. I think the Committee will agree with me that, having regard to the feeling which is always excited if there is any attempt to draw tightly the rules which preclude Civil Servants from taking part in public meetings. I should certainly have rendered myself liable to a good deal of criticism, and, I think, just criticism, if I had called upon an eminent public servant to absent himself from a meeting of a non-political character in which he had personal reasons for wishing to make himself an active participator. If the fact of Sir A. Blackwood's presence at this meeting has given offence to any class of his fellow-citizens I much regret it, but I am not prepared to censure Sir A. Blackwood for having done nothing more than exercise one of the rights appertaining to every subject of the Queen.

(11.15.) SIR R. N. FOWLER (London): As I was present at the meeting and moved a resolution, I may be allowed a word or two. The hon. Member opposite seems to think it was a political meeting, but most emphatically it was not so.

MR. A. CONNOR: I never said it was.

SIR R. N. FOWLER: You may call it a religious meeting, and, to a certain extent, it was so. It was attended by gentlemen belonging to all Protestant denominations, and, politically, I suppose the majority were attached to the Party opposite. But it was not a political meeting in any sense. What Sir Arthur Blackwood's political views are I do not know, and as a Civil Servant he takes no active part in politics; but my impression is that his political views are largely in sympathy with those of hon. Gentlemen opposite. But this is only my impression. My personal acquaintance with Sir Arthur Blackwood is slight, but I feel it an honour to have been associated with one who has shown so much devotion to the good of his fellow men, and in promoting the best interests of his countrymen.

(11.16.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: I am afraid the hon. Baronet has misunderstood the drift of my observations. I do not want to raise any religious question, and I did not suppose that this was a political meeting. The meeting, no doubt, was attended by those who represented various shades of non-Catholic opinion. I do not object to that; they were acting as they thought fit. What I object to is, that a public servant in the position of Sir Arthur Blackwood could reconcile his action with that impartiality which a man in his position should maintain. He not only attended the meeting, but, as Chairman, he sat and listened while two Judges were denounced by name for the exercise of what they thought their duty on the Bench. That appears to me extraordinary conduct for a man in Sir Arthur Blackwood's position. Remember there are many men on these Benches who have been sent to prison in Ireland for words used by somebody else on the platforms where they happened to be, or for the language of the advertisement calling a meeting which they attended. I object to the different treatment in the case of a highly favoured public servant. I think it was an improper thing for Sir Arthur Blackwood to do to attend the meeting, and the right hon. Gentleman cannot gloss over the fact that a public servant in this prominent position should listen to public denunciation of two Judges by name simply because they happened to be of a religious complexion different to his own. As a protest against the manner in which this, my complaint, has been met, I think it my duty to take a division.

(11.20.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 64; Noes 185.—(Div. List, No. 217.)

Original Question again proposed.

(11.35.) DR. CLARK: I wish to call attention to the question of accelerating the Northern Mails. I understand that the North-Eastern Mails are to be accelerated, and I want our grievances in the far North to be also attended to. There are 3,000 or 4,000 fisher people on the North-West Coast, and a letter can go from England to America almost as quickly as one from Stornoway to the Coast of Caithness and the Orkney Islands. These people are practically as far from each other as they were 100 years ago. If a letter is posted at Stornoway for Caithness on Monday it is not delivered till the following Thursday, although the distance is only 100 miles.

The reason is that the Postmaster General has for years been fighting with the Highland Railway on this subject. At one time I sympathised with the right hon. Gentleman, but since then we have had the arbitration in which Lord Derby was umpire, and the decision went against the Postal Authorities, who had to pay the Highland Railway Company about £12,000 more than that Company offered to give them for the facilities they asked for. I hope they will soon come to terms with that Company. The whole thing is a perfect farce. There are 10 hours between the arrival of the morning and evening mails, and yet both are delivered at the same time. At least one of these mails ought to be abolished unless a better arrangement can be come to. At Thurso the local mails are detained in the post office from 12 to 18 hours. The reason is that the Postmaster at Thurso is interested in some of the coaches which run from that place to various towns in the country, and these are the only coaches which carry the mails. The consequence is that the mails are detained until the coaches in which the Postmaster is interested are able to start. I would suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should give us a Departmental Committee to inquire into these matters so that the people of the Highlands may obtain the same facilities as are afforded to the rest of the country.

MR. W. M'ARTHUR (Cornwall, St. Austell): I should like briefly to call the attention of the Postmaster General to the Postal Service between London and the West of England. It will be seen that the matter is one of great importance, when the population and interests of that part of the country are considered. Memorials have been presented to the right hon. Gentleman from the counties of Cornwall, Devon, Hampshire, Dorset, and Somerset, and I trust he will be enabled to come to some arrangement by which the service of that large district will be accelerated.

*(11.40.) MR. RAIKES: In reference to the remarks just made by the hon. Member opposite, I may inform him that the matter to which he refers has been thoroughly thrashed out in the Department, and that proposals in reference to it are now before the Treasury. I quite admit that the people of that district have special claims to consideration, but, as I have already stated, the matter has been thoroughly investigated. Allusion has been made to the opening of letters from Irish Members at the Post Office. In reply to that accusation, I have only to say that it has no foundation whatever. With regard to the service between Stornoway and the mainland, I admit that there is much delay, and I am in hopes that before long the arrangements may be materially improved. With reference to the Service between London and the West of England, I am sorry to say that I am not at present in a position to hold out any hope of its improvement. I trust that now the Committee may be enabled to agree to this Vote.

(11.31.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall Camborne): I cannot but express my surprise that the remarks of the hon. Member for St. Austell have not been received more favourably. The question of affording greater facilities for the Postal Service to Plymouth concerns the entire counties of Devon, Cornwall, Somerset, Hants, and Dorset, and their case has been represented to the right hon. Gentleman on behalf of no less than 300 Town Councils, Petty Sessional Divisions and Public Bodies generally in those counties, the deputation which waited on the Postmaster General having been described as the most numerous and influential ever received by the Department. Why cannot the Government arrange with the Great Western and South Western Companies to run midnight trains from Paddington and Waterloo to Plymouth? But I am mainly concerned in behalf of the population of the far West, where the population is very considerable, and the mining and other industries pursued are of great importance. The postal facilities afforded to that district cannot be described as superlatively good; in fact, they are far behind those that are afforded to any other part of the country. The amount required to effect the requisite improvement would be very small, and if the Government would only consider the propriety of giving us these facilities, instead of squandering money on persons like the Duke of St. Albans in the commutation of pensions which never ought to have been bestowed, they would be doing something that would meet with public approval. I am not anxious to delay the taking of this Vote, and, therefore, shall not detain the Committee by bringing forward another complaint on a subject as to which I will call attention at a later stage.

*(11.42.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I wish to call attention to a matter of some practical importance, namely, the absurdity, as admitted by the Postmaster General himself, of the existing regulations relative to the postage of invoices and voters' claims bearing certain directions at foot. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to introduce a Bill to deal with that question, and that Bill was introduced, but, before the House had had an opportunity of seeing it in print, it was withdrawn. I wish to ask whether the existing regulations are made under the provisions of an Act of Parliament or by the Postmaster General himself. If the latter, then the right hon. Gentleman has the power to institute the necessary reforms.

(11.45.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The right hon. Gentleman has stated that no letter from an Irish Member has been opened by the Post Office Authorities, but does he mean that no such letter has been opened under the sanction of the Home Secretary, who alone has authority in such cases?

MR. RAIKES: What I said was that no such letter had been opened. Of course the Committee is aware that no letter can be opened by the Postmaster General except under the authority of the Home Secretary. In reply to the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Causton), I have to say that I believe the regulations he refers to were made in accordance with the Statute under a Treasury Warrant, which has had to be interpreted by the legal advisers of the Department. I regret the interpretation that has been put upon this document, but I trust that no great length of time will elapse before I shall be able to deal with this question.

*(11.48.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Cirencester): I wish to make a claim on behalf of the rural postmen. At present they have to buy their own boots, which is a great hardship, because they have to walk enormous distances, and their wages are admittedly not very high. The concession I ask for would be a very small one; but, at the same time, it would be very popular with a very deserving body of public servants, namely, that their boots should be found, together with the rest of their uniforms. Another point I wish to bring forward is that, whereas in the West of England a letter may be posted to Dublin in the evening and delivered next morning, letters posted in Dublin in the evening are not delivered in the West of England until the following afternoon. In fact, the post one way is a day, and the reverse way a day and a half. This is a matter which ought to be looked into and remedied.

MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Gentleman, I have to inform him that, on the question of the postmen's boots, I promised the postmen the other day that this should be one of the many subjects I intend to take up.

Question put, and agreed to.

2. £539,829, to complete the sum for the Post Office Packet Service.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum not exceeding £1,583,845 (including a Supplementary sum of £50,000), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the Salaries and Working Expenses of the Post Office Telegraph Service."

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Sir Edward Reed,) —put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported to-morrow.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (MONEY) BILL.—(No. 388.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2.

*(12.5.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to move the omission of Sub-section (2). I wish it to be understood that in making this Motion I am not actuated by any hostility to the London County Council, though I am bound to admit that I think in some respects the Council has disappointed us. I remember distinctly that as candidates a great majority of the members of the London Council spoke very freely about economy. They told us there was to be an era of proper and reasonable economy; there was to be no paid Deputy Chairman and no palatial residence or Council Chamber. The first promise was, however, very soon forgotten, and this is not the first occasion on which we have seen this mysterious clause as to the acquisition of a site for a Council Chamber. With the hon. Member for North St. Pancras (Mr. T. H. Bolton). I hope and believe the day is not far distant when London will be one when we shall not have a Council for the City and another for London, but one Council for the whole Metropolis. I believe so completely that this will be the case that I think it would be absolute insanity to build a Council Chamber for the present London County Council. In time the County Council will have the Guildhall, a finer meeting place than anything they can build. I am reminded that this clause is guarded by the words "with the approval of the Treasury," but I think the Council would be well advised to postpone the question of a Council Chamber until they have learned what their constituents have to say upon the subject. Their constituents will not be likely to give them their votes again if they talked of spending £500,000 upon a palatial Council Chamber. I trust the Committee will omit this sub-section.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 2, to leave out sub-section (2).—(Mr. Kelly.)

Question proposed, "That sub-section (2) stands part of the Clause."

*(12.12.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I do not think the Committee will consider that, in the observations I am about to make, I have the slightest hostility to the London County Council. On the contrary, I very cordially support the general policy of that body. I feel, however, there is a great deal of force in the remarks of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Kelly). With him, I am of opinion that the County Council need not take power to raise a large sum of money for the purpose of acquiring a site for a new Council Chamber and offices. The Council have expended a very considerable sum of money—some thousands of pounds—in adapting the old Metropolitan Board Room and offices to their requirements, and I am told by members of the Council that the Board Room meets the reasonable requirements of the Council. I hear there are also lobbies, tea rooms, and every other convenience and accommodation for the members. It is suggested that the offices are dispersed; but the offices of Her Majesty's Government are dispersed. The business of the country is far more important than that of the County Council of London, and yet I do not understand that any inconvenience arises from the public offices not being all under one roof. I am sorry the County Council make this proposition, because it is a sort of admission that their present position will continue. I did hope they looked forward to the time when, by friendly union with the Corporation of the City, there would be one great Municipal Authority for the whole of the Metropolis. The necessary consequence of that would be, that the County Council would go to the centre of London: they would go to the Guildhall, and there merge the old traditions of the Corporation in the aspirations of the younger municipal life. I look forward to the time when this House will unite the two bodies. The County Council would be very unwise to spend a large sum of money upon a site involving as it would the expenditure of another large sum upon a meeting house, because, in that case, London would have more municipal offices than it could use. We do not want two sets of great buildings in London for municipal purposes. I trust the right hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir J. Lubbock), who so ably represents the County Council, will withdraw this section of the Bill, so that the House may indirectly express its opinion that the time is not far distant when we shall have one authority for the whole of London. I know that the other night the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. Fowler) suggested that it was proper we should leave the matters dealt with by this Bill to the representative body of London; but at present the responsibility of approving of this Bill lies with us, and we ought to fulfil our obligations as intelligent men.

Mr. T. H. Bolton

I believe I represent the feeling of a large number of the people of London—I certainly represent the feeling of a good many members of the County Council—[Sir J. LUBBOCK: [No, no.]—when I say they are not at all disposed to spend money in the erection of a new Council Chamber and of new offices. This point was only carried in the Council after discussion and division, and many of the best men on the Council are of opinion that the proposed outlay is unnecessary. Therefore, while I do not desire to assume any hostile attitude towards the County Council, I beg to support the proposition of the hon. Member for Camberwell.

*(12.18.) Sir J. LUBBOCK (London University): I quite appreciate the friendly spirit in which both my hon. Friends have addressed the Committee, and I entirely recognise that in the Motion they have no hostility to the County Council. With them I indulge the hope that our relations with the City may at no distant period be different to what they are at present; but, at the same time, those who most wish that a change should be effected will hardly advise us to wait until then, and it must be remembered that the Guildhall and the other offices belonging to the City will always be required for City purposes. My hon. Friend the Member for Camberwell (Mr. Kelly) laid great stress on the provision of a Council Chamber. That is not what we are anxious about. We have a Council Chamber, which I quite admit is suitable for the purpose: if it is not beautiful, it is very convenient, and we do not wish for any change on that score. But at the present time our staff is scattered over a number of separate buildings at some distance from one another. My hon. Friend behind me (Mr. T. H. Bolton) says that the different Departments of the Government are in different buildings. I am sure the Government have always felt it is most desirable and almost necessary for the economical conduct of business that each Department should have one building for itself. Nobody who has a large business of his own to transact can possibly do it effectively or economically if his clerks are distributed up and down several buildings. At the present moment, the County Councils have clerks in the attics of houses built as dwelling houses. In the interest of the ratepayers, it is desirable we should have a space of ground on which we can build offices for the accommodation of all our officers. Now, if I have occasion to consult the Comptroller, I have to send across the street to another house asking him to come and see me, or I have to go across to him. That is not a way in which business can be satisfactorily conducted. We believe the proposal we make in this Bill is one that will conduce to economy, and, therefore, I hope the Committee will assent to it. Surely in such a matter as this we must regard the County Council as the governing body of London, responsible to the ratepayers for the manner in which it discharges its duty. It is most difficult to go on with the work of the County Council with our offices scattered in several houses. There is nothing more wasteful than the distribution of clerks in small buildings, and it is clearly to the interests of economy to concentrate the work as much as possible. I would also call attention to the fact that nothing can be done without the special assent of the Treasury. I think the Committee might trust the Treasury not to sanction anything in the nature of extravagant expenditure.

(12.25.) MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I only rise to make a suggestion to my hon. Friend the Member for Camberwell (Mr. J. Kelly), namely, that he should be content with the omission of the words "Council Chamber," so as to let us get our clerks together. I think the vast majority of the Council are satisfied with the present Chamber, but it will be generally felt we are under great disadvantage with regard to our staff.

MR. TATTON EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford): If the present County Council had only attended to the business carried on by the Metropolitan Board of Works they would not have required their present exorbitant staff. There is really no work done by the County Council, except that of the Asylums Board, which was not carried on by the Metropolitan Board of Works. The offices of the County Council are at present perfectly sufficient for the work the Council has to do, and I think this is not the time to ask the House to grant powers for the expenditure of more of the ratepayers' money.

*(12.26.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I hope we shall hear a few words from the President of the Local Government Board. On these County Council matters I like to hear his voice, and I like to see him support by his vote the views he expresses at the Table. With regard to this particular Amendment, I shall vote against it. I am in favour of giving the Council power to spend the money they think necessary. I do not say I am in favour of their spending the money, but I have confidence in the Representatives of the people of London. Members opposite seek to thwart the action of the County Council in every possible way. There was considerable disappointment felt by hon. Gentlemen opposite at the result of the last election, and they now think that if they hold the Council up to ridicule and decline to give them necessary powers, they will succeed in making them unpopular. I hope the President of the Local Government Board will have the courage to say whether he thinks it right or wrong that the Council should have the powers asked for, and that he will support his opinion in the Lobby. We have had many instances lately of the right hon. Gentleman making a brave speech at that box, and then either walking out of the House or voting against the County Council. The right hon. Gentleman justly attains considerable credit for forming the County Council, and I think it is very hard on him to be placed in the position in which he has more than once been placed by his colleagues in this House with reference to the proposals of the London County Council.

*(12.29.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I am quite sure the hon. Gentleman who spoke just now (Mr. Tatton Egerton) could not have intended to mislead the Committee when he stated that the County Council did no more work than was done by the Metropolitan Board of Works. The London Council not only does a deal of work in connection with the Asylums, but its Fire Brigade work has something like doubled since the extinction of the Metropolitan Board of Works. Then there is the licensing question to deal with, and the inspection of buildings, while the area of the parks is about doubled since the Council came into existence. I would point out that even if we do take over the offices of the City at some future time, we shall have to provide more buildings. The work of the County Council is very much greater than anything the Board of Works had to do; and buildings that are ample for the City, and that would have been sufficient for the Metropolitan Board of Works, are entirely inadequate for the County Council. If in years to come it is necessary to buy a site, the ratepayers will look back to the present time and ask why we did not acquire one when the price was comparatively low compared with what it may be then. If the site were not required it could always be sold, and in the meantime it would be continually increasing in value.

*(12.33.) MR. CAUSTON: I would really ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to give us his views on the subject.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): Two appeals have been made by Metropolitan Members to the President of the Local Government Board. I think he might, at all events, have respectfully and courteously declined to reply. There is another official directly interested in this matter, and that is the right hon. Gentleman who represents the Treasury. I think we ought to know what the Treasury think about this clause, and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Jackson), upon whose courtesy we can always rely, to give us his views on the subject.

(12.34.) MR. JACKSON: I think the hon. Member must forget that this Bill has been approved by the Treasury, and is introduced by the Treasury.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): As an humble Irish Member who has listened to the Debate, I think it would be wise, judicious, and advisable on the part of the responsible and paid Ministers of the Crown to get up and remonstrate with their supporters for the obstruction they have been practising.

Question put, and agreed to.

Other Clauses agreed to.

Clause 11.

(12.37.) MR. DIXON HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I beg to move the omission of this clause, which proposes to lend money to the London School Board; and I do it on the ground of the carelessness of the London School Board in the matter of passing unsatisfactory school buildings. I hold that the carelessness of the Board itself is not less than that of its architects and surveyors, and the case I am about to present to the Committee I have made out from the Reports of the School Board itself.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): As a point of order, I would ask whether it is competent for the hon. Member to discuss the conduct of the London School Board?

(12.38.) THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member appears to be out of order, but I should have liked to hear him a little further before giving a definite ruling.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: I wished to draw attention to the fact that many of the schools under the London School Board are badly built, and that a charge of 3d. in the £1 will be levied on the ratepayers by the Board, all of which money will be advanced by the London County Council under this clause.

(12.39.) THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member's observations are no relevant to this clause.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: Part of this money is to be used for the repair of existing schools, but I will not persist in the matter against the ruling of the Chair.

*(1240.) SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): The hon. Member is under the impression that if he carried his Amendment that it would prevent the School Board from spending money, but that is not so. What the Countess is to give the London County Council power to lend money to the School Board. If it were not for loans through the County Council, the Board would have to pay a higher rate of interest, and the ratepayers would suffer.

(1240.) MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: My idea was, that if I brought forward certain facts, the ratepayers might recover money of which they have been defrauded from certain contractors.

Clause 11 agreed to.

Clauses 14.

Amendments proposed, in page 11, line 24, leave out from "Acts," to end of line 27; line 29, at end, insert—

"Shall be charged to the special county account to which the expenditure for the purposes of the said Acts is chargeable."—(Mr. Jackson.)

Amendments agreed to.

First Schedule:—

(1243.) MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I see here that the London County Council makes loans to Vestries and District Boards, but this Bill is introduced by the First Lord of the Treasury for the express purpose of giving Parliament a control over these borrowing powers. The Metropolitan Board of Works used to circulate with Money Bills the statements of accounts of Vestries and District Boards, and it is obvious that if the House is to exercise control, some such statements of accounts ought to be presented. The County Council does not give us these statements.

*(1245.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: I would point out to the hon. Member that this Bill is not introduced by the London

County Council, but by the Government and it must be assumed that the Government are satisfied with the information contained in it. The Bill does not give to Local Authorities any spending powers they do not possess at present. It gives the London County Council power to borrow, and enables the County Council to lend to the Local Authorities at a low rate of interest.

(1246.) MR. LAWSON: In the first table that accompanies the Bill there is a minute statement of the loans advanced.

(1246.) MR. BAUMANN: These particulars were given in the last Money Bill of the Metropolitan Board of Works.

*(1247.) MR. T. H. BOLTON: Some of these loans are borrowed with the sanction of the London County Council, but others are not. In the case of money borrowed by Boards of Guardians the public are protected, as there is an investigation by the Local Government Board; and I would put it to the Government whether similar precautions should not be taken in the case of all these loans. There was no proper investigation under the Metropolitan Board of Works, but there ought now to be one under the London County Council. [Cries of "Agreed!"]

*(1249.) SIR JOHN LUBBOCK: Though the hon. Gentleman opposite may have correctly explained the procedure of the Metropolitan Board of Works, he has not been so accurate as regards the proceedings of the London County Council. The applications for loans are carefully looked into by our Finance Committee, which is presided over by Lord Lingen, who is justly regarded in this House as a great authority. Loans are not granted on the recommendation of any particular member, but on the recommendation of the Finance Committee as a whole.

(1251.) MR. WEBSTER: It is not correct to say that no inquiry took place under the Metropolitan Board of Works in reference to loans. I remember on more than one occasion loans being refused to Vestries. On one occasion a Vestry wished to build a kind of music hall, and then application for a loan was refused.

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(12.54.) DR. TANNER: I beg to move, Mr. Chairman, that you do report Progress.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is impossible for the Government to proceed with this Bill if it is opposed.

DR. TANNER: My object in moving to report Progress was to obtain an explanation from the Minister in charge of the Bill as to its provisions. I would advise the Chief Secretary to shake off his nonchalance, and to give us some explanation as to what this Bill is intended to do. In the absence of some of my friends who represent the County of Clare, I object to the Bill. If the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary would be advised in time he would take a lesson in Ministerial manners. [Cries of "Order!"] I speak advisedly. I desire to have some explanation of this matter, believing that I am entitled to it. I do not wish to be continually throwing away my time in lecturing the Chief Secretary.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member has moved to report Progress, and he must confine himself to that.

DR. TANNER: Certainly, Sir. I think the Chief Secretary should have offered some explanation of the Bill; and if he had done that, I should have offered no opposition. In Land Bill. colleagues are satisfied with the Bill. I say no more.

(12.35.) MR. STON: I must say I think it would have been well if we had had some explanation of the Bill. I notice that the hon. Member for one of the Divisions of Dublin, who had an Amendment on the Paper, has withdrawn that Amendment; and as that hon. Member is thoroughly conversant with this subject, I have a right to assume that his withdrawal implies approval of the Bill. Furthermore, I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Clare is in favour of the Bill, and, under the circumstances, I trust that the measure will not meet with further opposition from these Benches.

(12.56.) DR. TANNER: I shall certainly offer no further opposition, but I must say I think the Chief Secretary should have explained the Bill.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

LONDON STREETS (REMOVAL OF GATES) BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

LORD MONKSWELL: In asking your Lordships to give a Third Reading to this Bill, I am desired on behalf of the London County Council to say a few words in support of it. This Bill, as your Lordships are aware, is a Bill to remove various gates which cause a very great obstruction to the traffic through the streets of a portion of the Metropolis. In fact, there is no doubt as a matter of public convenience the removal of these gates has become necessary; there is no doubt that they ought to be removed, and the only question is on what terms they should be removed. The noble Marquess (the Prime Minister) himself, it will be within your Lordships recollection, tion, stated that he has on some occasions used strong language in regard to these gates. Now, this compensation question has been referred to the usual tribunal both in this House and in the Commons House. It has been argued before two Committees, composed, as the noble and learned Lord (Lord Herschell) observed to your Lordships the other day, of Members who were not for the most part Radicals, the majority of them being good sound Conservatives; and both those Committees have come to the conclusion one after the other that no compensation ought to be granted. The matter has been argued before those Committees by counsel learned in the law to whom the usual honorarium has been given, a point to which the noble Marquess seems to attach great importance. Yet now we are asked on this Third Reading to reverse the decision of those two Committees upon the authority of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Bramwell), to whom no honorarium has been given, and who has not apparently listened to the evidence that has been given before the Committees, and I should like to mention to the noble and learned Lord that that evidence appears to me to establish beyond doubt four propositions, which are these: first, that the Act authorising the erection of these gates was passed at a time when there were various Paving Trusts in existence, and that the reason why, and the only reason why those gates were authorised to be erected was owing to difficulties in the matter of repairing such roads. It was thought to be grossly unfair that persons should be allowed to make a thoroughfare of those roads if they did not contribute to the maintenance of them. Those were the grounds on which the Act of Parliament was passed, and I think it is perfectly clear on reading the Act that on no other grounds was it passed. When the Vestry took over the roads in the year 1855, they made themselves responsible for their repair, and that being the case, the only object for which the Act of Parliament had permitted the erection of these gates, which were put up under it, was accomplished and was at an end. The third point is this, that the Duke of Bedford for the time being might at any time, at his own will and pleasure, do away with these gates, without giving one penny of compensation to the inhabitants of the district. The fourth point is this, that in no other case whatever has compensation been granted for turning a cul de sac into a thoroughfare for traffic. Now, if the facts be so, I would ask the noble and learned Lord who moves the rejection of this Bill, on what grounds he asks for compensation? I quite agree with him that while these Paving Trusts were in existence, supposing these gates had been taken down, the Legislature must have made some sort of provision for the repair of these roads. But, I submit, after the Act of 1855 was passed, whereby the Vestry undertook to repair the roads, no inhabitant had the slightest right to suppose he would in perpetuity be allowed to keep his privacy any more than the other inhabitants of London if these obstructions to the traffic had to be done away with. I venture to say that the case of Hamilton Place was a good deal stronger than this case, and yet I never heard of anybody getting compensation there for a cul de sac being turned into a thoroughfare for traffic, because the inhabitants of Hamilton Place could only have had their privacy interfered with by the action of the Legislature, whereas in this case the persons living in the district comprised within these bars could have had their privacy invaded by the action of a single individual—the Duke of Bedford. It does appear to me that what the Act which allowed these gates to be put up did was that it gave the inhabitants inside those gates the right to say, “You shall not take away these gates unless you do something reasonable towards the repair of the roads which you make subject to traffic from other parts of London.” But it seems to me that is the only right which is given, and the only right which was intended to be given by that Act of 1800. Of course, if, under the Act of 1800, it was proposed at any time to take away these gates, something would have been done by the Legislature with regard to the maintenance of the roads. But I say that no further right was given, or was intended to be given; that is to say, that these inhabitants who live inside these gates are now just in precisely the same position as the inhabitants in all other parts of London are, namely, that they are liable to have their privacy destroyed whenever the Legislature considers it to be for the interest of the general public that the public traffic should be allowed to go through their streets. In these circumstances, my Lords, I move the Third Reading of the Bill.

VOL. CCCXLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 3^d.”
—(The Lord Monkswell.)

LORD BRAMWELL: I move, your Lordships, that this Bill be read a third time this day three months, and I dare say many of your Lordships may think I have a difficult task before me, considering the Report of your Lordships' Committee, a Committee with which it is impossible not to be perfectly satisfied both of their competence and of their entire fairness. One has the satisfaction at least of knowing that if these ways are laid open to the public, it will not be for any consideration like this—

“Here is one man better off than another; let us equalise their positions by taking away the benefit which the one man has.”

That has not been at the bottom of their decision. I cannot agree with my noble Friend that the Committee were content with the condition of things; on the contrary, they have done their best to mitigate the mischief which will be done to these people, and I am pretty sure they would have been glad if they could to have awarded them some compensation, but they could not see their way to do it. I ask your Lordships, therefore, either to do that, or if no compensation can be given, to reject this Bill as an unwarrantable infringement on the rights of these people who are affected by this measure. My noble Friend has said he has read the evidence, Well, so have I, and I certainly do not agree with his version of it. I must ask your Lordships to permit me to state what I am afraid I said before of the Second Reading, what the truth of the matter is in this case. The freeholder—I will call him by that name for a reason which, I trust, your Lordships will appreciate—or the freeholder's predecessor in the year 1800, did not stand in need of the Act of Parliament to do that which was then done, and which has been perpetuated since with the sanction of two subsequent Acts of Parliament. He did it as owner of the soil. The estate was laid out in a particular way, and to ensure the privacy of the people who would build upon it and live, these gates were placed by the authority of the freeholder as such freeholder. It is true that the provisions of the Act of Parliament, no doubt out of greater caution, said that the gates might be there, and that there should be no interference with the gates; but the gates were put there by right of the freeholder as owner of the soil. And there is another matter to which I should like to call your Lordships' attention, which is this: this Bill talks of the removal of certain restrictions upon traffic through the streets of London, and talks of certain bars and gates as being restrictions upon the traffic. What the Bill really does in substance is this. There is some strange notion, I cannot tell how it could have got into anybody's head—it could have got into no lawyer's head, certainly—that the right of the freeholder is to the bars apparently, and to the ground on which they stand. The truth is the right is to the entire soil of these roads in full property, subject to such privileges as he may have granted to the public. Now, the only privileges which he has granted to the public, as far as I can see, is a right of footway. I do think he has granted that, because the footway has been used by the public for all these years without interference. I should think, therefore, there is the most cogent evidence of dedication to the public of a right of footway. But there has been no dedication to the public of a right of carriage way or horse way, or anything beyond the footway; and the gates and bars which are in particular positions at this moment might, if it suited the freeholder, be put in any other positions for the purpose of preserving the privacy of that district. What would in effect be done is this: practically the ownership in the soil would be taken from him. He could at this moment build a house upon any portion of the district which is affected by this Bill where there is no public right of way, and that power will be taken from him. Practically, therefore, his property will be taken from him. It was supposed—and let me particularly remind your Lordships of this—as my noble Friend says that these gates were put here for some strange purpose, which I confess I cannot understand. They were put up for the purpose of preventing the public gaining a right of way as they would have done if the gates had not been there, and for no other purpose. That was their object and intention, and when your Lordships are told—I am surprised it should be so—that it was on account of there being Paving Commissioners for this particular district that this was done, I say it is an entire mistake, because when these Paving Commissioners were put an end to by Act of Parliament, and it was thought better that the parish should take over and repair all the roads, whether public or private in the parish, of course it made no difference in the rates. The people had been rated before, and they were rated afterwards when it was thought that the parish should become responsible for repairing the roads. The Act of Parliament passed in the year 1855 expressly reserved to the freeholder the right to the soil of these streets, and the power of having gates there. But there is another thing which shows the correctness of what I am now stating to your Lordships. There is a recital in this Bill about the gates and bars being a restraint upon the traffic, and I should like to read this to the House—

“And whereas the continuance of such gates and bars and the restriction of the traffic through the said streets tend to the public inconvenience.”

Well, I daresay they do; that is to say, I daresay it would be very convenient to the public if these streets were opened. I daresay that is so. There is not one word said as to the convenience of those whose privacy is protected by these gates and bars. But the section goes on to say—that is to say, the County Council cannot, and nobody can, without the authority of Parliament, interfere with the ownership and the rights of ownership, which the freeholder possesses and exercises in the way which has been mentioned. Remember that, my Lords. I beg your Lordships to remember that it is recited here, and most truly recited, that without the authority of Parliament, what is sought to be done cannot be done. Now, I venture to say that if the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act had been incorporated in this Bill, the freeholder would have had a right to maintain a claim for compensation, not merely for the bare removal of the gates and bars, the value of the gates and bars, and the soil on which they stand, but he would have had a right to maintain a claim for compensation for that property, the loss of which I have described to your Lordships. He would have been entitled to maintain that claim according to a recent case of "Cowper Essex v. The Local Board of Acton." [14 Appeal cases, page 153.] I speak in the presence of two noble and learned Lords, who were parties to that Judgment—for such depreciation of the value of his property, on part of which these gates and bars stand. He would have been entitled to maintain a claim on those two heads. However, they did not think fit to put in a reference to the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. Now, one word with regard to the inhabitants. I see some of the witnesses, gentlemen whose opinion is of great value, stated that in their judgment the tenants of the freeholder's property, that is, of the houses, would have been entitled to maintain an action against him—the freeholder—if he had removed these gates. I do not like to put my judgment against that of others, but in addressing your Lordships, I must tell you what my opinion is, I do not think so. I do not think if it had pleased the freeholder of his own accord to take down these gates, that any of the tenants could have maintained an action against him for having done so. The case is not quite clear, for there are cases in some of which it has been held that the tenants have the benefit of a stipulation made by their landlord, and in others it has been held, and I think it would be held in this case, that the landlord's right is one which he has exercised by placing the gates there for his own advantage, and that whenever he thinks it expedient to remove those bars and gates, he is at liberty to do so without any action being brought against him. That is my judgment upon the matter, and I cannot say otherwise. There is not the slightest doubt in the world that these people are damaged. There is no doubt whatever about that. The Committee were of that opinion evidently, because they did all they could, and I firmly believe would have done more if they had seen their way to do it. The evidence is of the most convincing character. The first surveyors in London have been called to prove this damage, and they positively proved that at the north and west sides of one of these places, say Russell Square, the privacy of which is protected by these gates, rents are much higher than on the east and south sides, which are unprotected. It has been said, and I am really surprised at it that it should have been, I am not surprised that it should have been said in the first instance, stupid as it is, I cannot help saying so; but I am surprised that after the fallacy has been exposed it should have been repeated—it has been said, "Why the law never gives compensation for an increase of traffic." There is a line of noisy omnibuses passing on the west side of Grosvenor Square (it is rather remarkable, I think, that they should have furnished such evidence of what mischief they propose to do to these people in Russell Square), and it has been said that the people in Grosvenor Square have no right to compensation. Do your Lordships know why? Because they had no right to stop those omnibuses, and there was a public right to go along there. There is no public right to go along where these bars are placed. What the County Council say upon that point here is, that there is an impossibility of settling any Compensation Clause on a fair basis; and what also influenced the Council was the comparatively few persons who are resident in this district, and so forth. Therefore, it appears that the Council were influenced by the difficulty of settling the compensation on any fair basis. What would your Lordships think of anybody who would say, "I met a man coming along with a very nice-looking watch, and I wanted it: well, there was an impossibility of settling the compensation with him upon a fair basis, so I took it for nothing." That is what they are doing here; that is their argument, and that is their justification. Just consider for a moment the damage that would be done to these people. It cannot be estimated by thousands, nor even, I believe, by tens of thousands of pounds. It would be an enormous damage that would be done to them,

“It is expedient that provision should be made for their removal; and whereas the object aforesaid cannot be attained without the authority of Parliament;”

I speak in the presence of the Members of the Committee. Did anyone undertake to say in the evidence that the benefit to the public would be anything equal in value to the damage done to the tenants on this property? But if not, there is no justification for doing it. If you are to do more harm than good, valued in money, it ought not to be done. Well, it is said that these are restrictions and obstructions. I admit it; but I cannot help saying there is something rather curious in the sort of argument which is brought forward, because if there had been no road there, and if the place had been in the condition in which it was 90 years ago, that is to say, fields with no roads across them, there would have been nothing to obstruct, there would have been no necessity for any restriction there, because there would have been no way or track. Well, then, what is the complaint? But before I go on with that head of my remarks let me say this: I have told your Lordships I do not think the inhabitants would have any cause of action against the freeholder if he had removed these gates. No; but they are as safe as if they would have had a right of action, because the same reason that induced him originally to put these streets there with these bars would induce him to continue them there; that is say, for the purpose of keeping up the value of the property. I forget to mention that. Now, let me go on with what I was saying to your Lordships, that if there was no street there would be no obstruction, and the complaint, therefore, comes to this: "You have made a road for your own benefit, which you need not have made; had you not made it we should have had no right or power to go there; you have put up gates, and therefore we have got a cause of complaint against you." Are your Lordships prepared to say that? Are your Lordships prepared to say that if a man should make a way from a public road to a mine, or a farm, or an hotel, or a private house, and should make another way from the mine, farm, or what not, to another public road, and put up gates in order that the business of his mine, or farm, or the privacy of his house should not be interfered with, there would be a right in that case? Are your Lordships prepared to lay down as a great principle that in that case the public have a right to complain, if they are not let through by a short cut, to the interference and annoyance and loss of the person who has put up those gates? If that be so, let there be an Act of Parliament passed at once which will save the trouble of referring such matters to Committees, and the expense attending such references and the honoraria which my noble Friend spoke of, and lay down, as a general rule, that whenever anybody likes, no matter what damage it may do to the owner, wherever anybody is entitled to say, "Here is a short cut made not for the benefit of the public, but for the benefit of the man who made it, and who protected it by gates and bars. That is a thing which the public must have the enjoyment of, and the benefit of, at once." I do not think your Lordships will be prepared to say that. The noble Marquess gave some sort of evidence against the tenants by saying that he had sometimes been obstructed in going to the Great Northern Railway Station, and I think he said that when that happened to him he would have used an execration.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): An internal execration.

*LORD BRAMWELL: Yes; expressed internally. Well, if your Lordships reject this Bill, and if the noble Marquess is obstructed again, I hope he will neither internally nor aloud include me in the objects of his execration, for I am sure I would most willingly remove all obstruction from him. I know he suffers very considerably from it, and I would remove it, not only by throwing open these bars, but by closure if I could—very much I trust to his benefit, if it were in my power to do it. Now, my Lords, really the case comes to this: I do not want to say over and over again the same thing. That a deal of damage will be done to a number of people is beyond all doubt; it is proved by the best experts in the world. That some inconvenience is sustained at present by the public at large—I protest against it being called an inconvenience—that a convenience might be given to them to which they are not entitled, I confess at once; whether that convenience will be bought at a fair price to the inhabitants I know not. I am strongly inclined to think there will be more loss than gain in it, but, after all, whichever way it may be, it comes to this: that your Lordships are called upon to take away from the freeholder the right which he possesses to the consequent damage of the tenants for no other reason than because it is handy and because it is convenient to do it. As I said before, if your Lordships are prepared to say no matter what the right of the freeholder is, and it is a right as freeholder mind, no matter what the amount of damage that is done to others, if the public desire it that road which is a private road, and that property which is private property, shall become public, all protest would be unavailing. I move that the Bill should be read the third time this day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now,") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months.")—(The Lord Bramwell.)

THE BISHOP OF ROCHESTER: I would ask your Lordships to hear a few words from me on the ground that any Member of your Lordships' House who happens to possess local knowledge or local information on the subject under discussion is bound to give it for the benefit of the House. I think I may claim this advantage which perhaps few or none of your Lordships possess; that I have lived within the district comprised inside these gates for 10 years, and that it was all within the limits of my own parish. I may, therefore, be supposed to have some practical and considerable knowledge on the subject, both as to the inconvenience or otherwise of the gates, and also as to the feelings of the inhabitants in regard to their existence. No doubt there is a certain inconvenience from these gates, especially at one of them. I must not impute to your Lordships too intimate knowledge of the geography of that part of London; but there is inconvenience, especially at the Upper Woburn Place Gates, which are closed to traffic in hired carriages, and where anybody arriving in a hansom would be very reasonably surprised at being told he could not pass, but must go round by another way. None of the other gates are closed to light traffic, but only to traffic of a heavy character. Attendants are seated outside the gates ready when they see carriages or cabs coming to throw them open, and I have seldom, in my own experience, found myself delayed by them. I simply desire to infer from this fact, not that there is no inconvenience arising from the gates, but that the inconvenience said to arise from their position is somewhat exaggerated. If the great Railway Companies and the public require these gates and bars to be removed, no doubt it must be done, and Parliament must be asked for power to do it. There is no doubt about that. But the fact which I desire to put to your Lordships with great earnestness is this: that it is a very high-handed course to remove these gates and bars without some sort of compensation being made to the householders and leaseholders in the neighbourhood, who indisputably either bought or took their property on the undertaking that they would not be interfered with by the freeholder in the enjoyment of these valuable rights. Conceive what will happen to them if heavy traffic comes down through Upper Woburn Place or Tavistock Street. It will be impossible to use the bedrooms in front of the houses. Not only will the personal comfort of the inhabitants be interfered with, but they will not really be able to sleep. I have read the evidence given before your Lordships' Committee, and I am perfectly certain that the property in those houses will be very seriously diminished in value in that neighbourhood, where property is already not likely to increase in value. I should like to add that the neighbourhood is certainly not a fashionable one; it is inhabited by struggling professional men with limited incomes, who are not, perhaps, as well able to protect themselves as persons living in other parts of London might do, and on whose behalf there I appeal to your Lordships for protection. I do not live there now, and I have no property there, but I have some valued friends in the neighbourhood for whom I have a great regard, and I think, therefore, that your Lordships will pardon me for protesting against what I do feel to be an arbitrary invasion of the rights of private property. I do ask your Lordships to pause before passing a Bill which will inflict very serious injury and personal damage on those who have no right whatever to be treated in such a way as is proposed by the Bill.

LORD HERSCHELL: I should desire to call your Lordships' attention to the position of this Bill, and to the effect of the proposal of my noble and learned Friend. My noble and learned Friend admits that, if it is for the public interest that this change should be made, private interests or even private rights must necessarily give way.

*LORD BRAMWELL: I never said anything of the sort.

LORD HERSCHELL: I thought my noble and learned Friend so stated on the last occasion in the most distinct terms. I am sorry I have not his assent to that; but we have the admission made that the public can interfere with private rights, only they must do so upon terms of making proper compensation.

*LORD BRAMWELL: Yes.

LORD HERSCHELL: I had only half finished the statement of my proposition. My noble and learned Friend assumed that I was not going to say more than I had said at that moment. My noble and learned Friend admits that in the contest between public and private interest, the private interest must give way. What is the course which he and those whom he represents have taken with reference to this Bill? The Bill was discussed in the other House. It was sent to a Committee of that House; it was argued for a considerable time before that Committee; the Committee reported in favour of the Bill; the other House then passed it, and it came up to your Lordships' House. One would have thought that by that time, at least those who have been represented by my noble and learned Friend, would have come to see that the Bill is one to the principle of which, the Preamble of which, they should offer no objection. They might, of course, insist that they had a right to compensation, which claim to compensation might have been then considered. When the matter came to this House, my noble and learned Friend moved the rejection of the Bill, and then, when it went before the Committee, what position did the petitioners assume? Did they say: "We admit, of course, that our interests must give way in this matter of public concern, but we propose to insert a clause and ask that you should insert it in protection of our interests." Nothing of the kind. They did attempt to get the Committee to find the Preamble of the Bill not proved, and to get the Bill rejected by the Committee. The proposition was put in a most subsidiary manner. The first witness called had given a great part of his evidence—in fact, almost the whole of his evidence—before he came to the question of compensation at all. I do not say in the slightest that they abandoned or did not say if the Bill passes we ought to have compensation. But they cannot say that the Bill was not opposed. Then the Bill comes before your Lordships for Third Reading. It has been well discussed and considered; all the arguments of my noble and learned Friend on the other side have been fully canvassed by the Committee, and considered and weighed by them, and that Committee has found what my noble and learned Friend does not dispute is a conclusion arrived at by them perfectly honestly, and to the best of their judgment. But now my noble and learned Friend comes at this, the last stage, after the Bill has passed through those various stages, and asks your Lordships to reject this Bill on the Third Reading. And why, my Lords? Because, as he says, their claims to compensation have not been entertained by the Committee. In the first place, my noble and learned Friend asks your Lordships to reject this Bill, though as to one of the gates proposed to be removed by it there was no opposition. No objection whatever was made with regard to that, and yet my noble and learned Friend asks that the Bill should be rejected which will provide for that being done, to which nobody objected. That is the sort of wholesale way in which this Bill is treated, and after it has gone through all these stages, and after it has come to its present stage in your Lordships' House. These points, which have been referred to by my noble and learned Friend, and upon which he has argued in the interests of those whom he represents, were perfectly reasonable matters to be considered. I do not mean to say it was otherwise. The whole subject of claim to compensation was considered by this Committee most anxiously and most carefully, and, having considered it, they came to the conclusion that the proper course to take was to provide means of securing, by the silent paving of the streets, as far as possible against the inconvenience to the inhabitants of these streets being thrown open to public traffic; but that it would not be right to make a provision for a compensation. My noble and learned Friend has spoken as though this claim to compensation on behalf of the occupiers of these houses was a claim similar to those which have been hitherto recognised by the law. On the contrary, no such claim to compensate has, as far as I know, ever been recognised; and if this claim be recognised, I maintain that it will run counter to every principle which has regulated the law of compensation in similar cases. It has not been the case, as my noble and learned Friend has assumed, that wherever Parliament has interfered it has done so on the basis of compensating every person who would suffer inconvenience, or even pecuniary loss, by reason of the interference of the Legislature. I could give your Lordships abundance of illustrations of that. For example: you have bought a residence; a railway comes near the residence. The railway does not take any of your land, but it interferes with your privacy; it certainly diminishes the comfort of your house, and would very likely diminish its selling value, and yet, beyond question, no compensation could be claimed by the person who suffered that direct pecuniary loss by reason of the railway having come there. Though he has been subjected to inconvenience, loss of privacy, and even diminution of the value of the premises, yet he has no right to compensation. That is a great deal more analogous to the case we are dealing with than any of the cases to which my noble and learned Friend has alluded. I give this instance only, because I maintain that compensation is never given unless for interference with some legal right. However great the inconvenience, however unquestionable the pecuniary loss, unless that can be established, there is no claim to compensation, with perhaps this exception to which my noble and learned Friend has alluded. If you take a portion of a man's land, and have to compensate him for that, he may, in some cases, get consequential damages, which other persons whose land had not been taken would not be entitled to claim, and, therefore, I ought to limit my general proposition in that way, although it is not really relevant to the point we are discussing. In that way, it seems to me, my noble and learned Friend abandoned the whole case when he admitted that these occupiers and lessees had no legal right to enforce the continuance of the gates and bars in the position in which they are. The whole case was gone, as it seemed to me, when my noble and learned Friend made that admission. I do not allude to his argument as regards the freeholder, because the freeholder did not petition against this Bill, and he has not asked for any compensation clause to be inserted. He is the only person whose legal rights will be in any way interfered with by this Bill, and, he certainly, not having asked for compensation, it would be out of all reason to reject this Bill because there is no provision made for compensation in his case. We have, therefore, only to deal with the case of lessees and occupiers. I am not going for a moment to dispute that there are many people whose convenience and comfort would be diminished by these streets becoming subject to more traffic than had hitherto passed through them, although I cannot help thinking that the reality would turn out to be as bad as the anticipation, and that people will not find that the traffic, divided as it will be among several streets, will be anything like so burdensome as they imagine. The right rev. Prelate has alluded to his personal experience of this neighbourhood. I may claim to have even greater experience in these matters, because I lived a great deal nearer to a railway station than probably anyone who objects to this Bill. I do not mean to say that there is not a great deal of traffic occasioned by the neighbourhood of a railway station, and perhaps some prefer that there should be less; but when the change is made, people will not, perhaps, find it so bad as they suppose at the present time. Still, making all allowances, no doubt they would prefer that there should be less rather than more traffic through their streets. But, my Lords, that difference by the admission of traffic through streets which have hitherto been protected from it, has never been regarded as a subject of compensation, and, if it were to be so regarded, it would land you with an endless vista of compensation claims. In the present case the petitioners are not persons residing in the streets where these gates are; they are people residing at a considerable distance. They say if you render this particular street an open thoroughfare, then more traffic will come into the street which leads to that street, and more traffic will come into other streets which lead to the street which leads into the first street, and all these people will suggest that they are entitled to compensation. My Lords, it is a claim which has never been admitted. We have had numberless improvements in London which have produced that result. Take, for example, the opening of Hamilton Place. All the persons residing along Park Lane could, if my noble and learned Friend makes out this case, have said when you have opened Hamilton Place (which was done under statutory authority) you have induced more traffic to pass down along the thoroughfare than when there was only the narrow outlet at Park Lane. No doubt there has been an increase of traffic there, and yet no suggestion of this kind was ever made in that case. As far as I know it has never been made before.

LORD BRAMWELL: Was there any right to stop it?

LORD HERSCHELL: There was no right to stop it, nor is there here any right to stop it in the case of the persons whose interest my noble and learned Friend has been advocating. That was the point to which I was referring. My noble and learned Friend admits that there is no right in any of these occupiers who are petitioning to insist that these bars should be kept there. Well, then, it comes exactly to this: it is a parallel case. They were just in the same position as the people in Park Lane and Hamilton Place, when there was a house, I believe, at the end of Hamilton Place; the people there might have quite relied that nobody would voluntarily remove the house for the purpose of making it a thoroughfare. I do not know whether there really was a house there, but, at all events, the way was closed, and they had to obtain an Act of Parliament to enable Hamilton Place to be opened. Just in the same way as the people here might have relied upon these gates remaining to prevent traffic, the people in Hamilton Place might have relied upon the obstruction remaining there as it was,

and yet no compensation was paid. My proposition is shortly this: that no compensation is ever paid where all you do is to interfere with an expectation which people might reasonably have entertained, but where is no interference with any legal rights which they possess. If you interfere with legal rights, of course, they have a right to compensation, but not otherwise. My noble and learned Friend seems to have left out of sight one view of this case which impresses me strongly. He says these are not public streets but private streets, and I see that was very strongly put forward in evidence, by one of the witnesses. All I can say is that it is a most astounding thing, if they are private streets, to think that ever since 1855 these private streets have been repaired entirely at the public expense. I can understand the case of private streets which the people themselves keep up and bear the expense of, but private streets which they insist the public have no right to use, but which nevertheless the public have repaired just as much as they have repaired all the other streets in the Metropolis, appears to me a very strange anomaly, and I was astonished to find, when I read the evidence, that from one of those streets there is actually excluded all traffic except gentlemen's carriages, a street which has for 35 years been repaired just as all the other streets in London have been at the public expense. What does that come to? That the inhabitants of other parts of London have to bear the inconvenience arising from the noise of traffic through their streets, and as to those streets they have to share the expense with people who do not live in them. The streets are repaired for the benefit of people living in them without the public having the full rights which they have over other streets in the Metropolis. What strikes me is this: that if for 35 years this state of things has gone on there is a large debit in favour of the people due from whoever is interested in these private streets, which, if it were set off against the claim for compensation, would, I think, hugely outweigh them. It is, I think, very difficult to say that they are private streets. No doubt, passage through them was limited, but to say that beyond those gates these were not public streets is a proposition which, I think, it would be rather difficult to establish, considering the way in which they have been dealt with during all these years. I must demur to one observation which has been made by my noble and learned Friend, because I do not think it is accurate. He says these gates were put up for the protection of the privacy of the inhabitants. I have looked through the Acts of Parliament, and I cannot come to that conclusion. I believe they were put up, in the first instance, without any thought of the kind, but simply to secure that the roads on the Bedford estate should not be unduly used by your neighbouring estates not then laid out for building, so that when they rested entirely, as they then did, upon the people on the Bedford estate, those streets should not be used by people who did not contribute to them, and who wanted to develop their rival estates. The effect of their securing privacy has been an accidental effect which has subsequently resulted. People, I, do not dispute, may have gone to live in some of these streets relying on the fact that these bars existed, and were likely to continue to exist, but that in itself cannot give any claim to compensation on any principle which has been hitherto recognised by the law, and it would be, as it seems to me, a very dangerous precedent if you were to introduce any new principle which would permit new heads of compensation to arise. It would render very difficult many public works which would be of advantage to the community. The principle hitherto has been that persons must take their chance of any changes which may happen, owing to improvements in the public streets, and that those changes and improvements may be made without compensation of this kind being paid. No doubt, if you could work out complete justice, what you might like to do would be to say this traffic which will go through these streets when they are opened goes somewhere else now, and therefore the streets where it now passes will be rendered quieter to the extent that the others will be rendered more noisy; and if you could devise some means of making the people whose streets thus become quieter provide means for paying compensation to the people whose streets become noisier, that might be a very equitable arrangement, and I, personally, should see no objection to it, though I do not mean to suggest that it would be a very practicable one. But in this case, just as in the case of a railway passing near your house, or, in many other cases, the only way of dealing with these matters is to stand by the principle that unless you can establish that a legal right has been interfered with, you cannot establish a like right to compensation.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I confess I am a little astonished at the principles which have been enunciated by the noble and learned Lord who has just sat down, because it strikes me he has entirely forgotten to notice the fact that the freeholder and the tenants are the persons who alone could regulate between themselves the relations under which the bars and gates exist, and that an Act of Parliament is required to deal with the interest of the freeholder and leaseholder, because the freeholder and leaseholders if left to themselves would keep matters in the position in which they are now, and would keep their property as it is. For the sake of public convenience you are to force the freeholder and leaseholders to place their property in a different condition to that in which it is at present, and in which they desire to have it remain. I do not desire to discuss the questions which have been raised between the two noble and learned Lords, but this I think will not be disputed by anyone: a great many people have thought that the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act has been very harshly construed in respect of some rights; but whether it is so or not, the principle on which that Act rests is that you should not take for public purposes that which we do not pay for, and that if you take away something which I will not say a person has a right to; but if he has it, and if he is in such relations with his landlord that he is likely to retain it, and if a third person for public purposes chooses to take it away, that you must pay for it. I desire to say that I am afraid in that respect I may be found a little in conflict with my noble and learned Friend at the head of the Government; but I do not think the inconvenience which is caused by these gates is so great as has been represented. Like the right rev. Prelate, I can speak from personal knowledge, having lived within the ambit of these gates. I have not taken the trouble to go again to look at the place ; but as far as my knowledge of it goes, the inconvenience is that you must go round by Tottenham Court Road on the west, or by Burton Crescent on the east. That is the whole inconvenience ; and if you measure it, it is not a question of miles or half miles, but merely of yards. That is the supposed inconvenience. The traffic which comes up from the east can very readily go up by the Bagnigge Wells Road ; and the traffic from the west by the Tottenham Court Road ; but because there is this little "short cut," which might be made available, it is supposed that there is great inconvenience to the public in the existence of these gates. I remember hearing in the course of my professional experience of a very curious case of an effort which was made to establish a right of way between two of the doors of a public house which stood between two roads. There was a passage through from one road to the other, and there was no doubt that the public had been accustomed to go through the two flap doors as a short cut. We know that a short cut is a most fascinating thing, and accordingly an effort was made to establish that a public right of way had been acquired between those two flap doors of the public house. I am happy to say the effort failed, but that is a singular instance of this kind of claim. If a third person is to come forward and set aside the rights of the freeholder and the leaseholders, where is the interference to stop ? My noble and learned Friend has said he does not recognise the claim to compensation, except where a legal right is invaded. But the legal right of the leaseholder here is certainly invaded.

LORD HERSCHELL : The leaseholder asked for no compensation.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR : I think my noble and learned Friend was not quite accurate. The freeholder did not oppose in the other House—so I am told, and I believe accurately. That he does not think it worth while to oppose the Bill may be very well understood, after the decision in the other House and in the Committees ; but he opposed the Bill in the other House, and, therefore, that shows that he does not assent to it, though he has not thought it worth his while to continue his opposition in this House. You have, therefore, the legal right of the freeholder interfered with and invaded. Is it not a reasonable thing for the tenants, the leaseholders, and others, all of whom desire to maintain the privacy of this district, to say, "You are taking away the legal right of the freeholder, on which we were perfectly justified in relying ; and we knew we could rely upon it, for he would not changed the position in which the property now stands ; you have taken away from us the protection we have now ; you have taken away these restrictions ; it rests entirely upon the state of good feeling between tenants and lessees and their landlord ; and if you are going to take this course, which the right rev. Prelate has designated as a high-handed measure, you must provide some kind of compensation for those who are injured ?" I do not understand the argument which my noble and learned Friend used with reference to the remoteness of the compensation which might be claimed—that persons in one street would claim because their street let into another street which was affected by this throwing open to public traffic. This claim could only be made by persons within the protected district. Persons who are not within the district have not paid extra prices for their leases or houses, and they are not entitled, in point of justice, to compensation. They have taken their houses like others in the Metropolis. But there is here a real case for compensation. People have gone to this place for privacy, and have paid for it, and the persons letting the houses have let them on such terms as represent that price. They would now have to pay the same rates as before, in addition to the sums which they had so paid.

LORD HERSCHELL : Would the noble and learned Lord allow me to ask him to define what he means by "protected district ?"

THE LORD CHANCELLOR : The district protected by these gates. My noble and learned Friend does not seem to be aware that there are gates on four sides. For instance, the gate at Gower Street shuts out the traffic from St. Pancras, and practically it comes to this : that there is an area which is completely protected against heavy traffic passing through it.

LORD HERSCHELL: I believe there is nothing on the south of Russell Square.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: There is nothing on the south of Russell Square, I agree; but persons going through and looking at the physical condition of the neighbourhood can see that it is a protected district, heavy traffic being prevented passing through it to the London and North-Western and St. Pancras Stations. I am quite aware that the London and North-Western Railway was not in existence at the time these gates were put up; but I say it is an extraordinary thing to claim that these gates should be thrown down because the London and North-Western Railway is there now, and has established a large station for the reception of traffic. That, I should think, is one of the things which the persons clamouring to keep this district private would insist upon us showing the equity of this claim. My noble and learned Friend said that he has lived in a place near a railway station. So have I. In fact, I lived within the protected district, in Bedford Place, at one time, and subsequently outside it, in the neighbourhood of the Great Western Railway, where there was no protection. In the former place there was perfect quiet, but in the latter I found that it was impossible after 4 o'clock in the morning to get anything like sleep on account of the noise made by vans and carts. That seems to me to constitute a serious grievance, and not at all a fanciful one. I cannot help surmising that my noble and learned Friend's reference to the gentleman's carriage being allowed to pass the gates is explained by the fact that it was not by reason of social considerations, but because it was not a heavy vehicle.

LORD HERSCHELL: I beg the noble and learned Lord's pardon; but even in that case some were turned back, and when the explanation was given it was found that they were thought to be hired cabs.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The argument founded upon this is, that for 35 years these streets have been paved and repaired at the public expense. When those who made that arrangement made it, they agreed to pay, and did pay, with the gates there. If that was an improvident bargain to make, as it is now thought apparently according to this Bill, looking to its terms, it was an improvident bargain made 35 years ago, and since kept. It seems to me that is rather an additional objection to this sort of legislation than anything else, and that you have here a bargain made which has received the sanction of the Legislature itself; but now, without compensation, you are asked to take away that advantage which the Legislature secured at first. My Lords, I confess I regard, with great jealousy, attempts of this sort to interfere with the comfort and convenience of persons who have been guilty of no wrong, who have paid their money for the purpose of obtaining that protection which they have received, and which you now propose to take away simply because it is said the public suffer some additional inconvenience by being obliged to go round, really a distance of a few yards by Tottenham Court Road, or Judd Street, or Burton Crescent. I should have been much better pleased, I confess, if the Committee could have seen their way to do that which would have prevented all question by recognising the right of the inhabitants of this district to compensation. I think it might very well have recorded an opinion in favour of the claims to compensation which my noble and learned Friend has put forward; but as the Committee have refused to take any such course, I shall vote with my noble and learned Friend in moving the rejection of the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: As my noble and learned Friend has rather challenged me in regard to the inconvenience, which I have myself experienced from the existence of these gates, I wish merely to say that the inconvenience seems to me to be not merely that the public have to go round, but that the traffic through the streets remaining open is so congested in consequence of so many streets being withdrawn from traffic, that a very serious impediment to the traffic of London has resulted. I merely wish to make that little correction, because I confess to be in some little difficulty as to the vote I shall give, because the issue which my noble and learned Friend has put forward is not the issue on which I should have liked to vote. If he had produced a compensation clause, I should have been very glad to consider it, and it is very possible we might have seen our way to sanction the introduction of something of the kind into the Bill which would have satisfied us; but he has not done so, and he proposes that after the Bill has been considered in two Houses, after the Bill has been submitted to the proper tribunal, and the proper tribunal has determined that there shall be no compensation, and that the Bill shall pass, we shall reject the Bill altogether on account of that decision. I think that is leaning rather heavily against the public in this matter, and that, on the whole, as my noble and learned Friend has not given us the opportunity of voting upon the question of this compensation, I think we are bound to pass the Third Reading of the Bill. I do not wish to be the cause of continuing this Debate, but I should have been glad to hear from some Member of the Committee the reason for the views which they took in deciding that no compensation was justly to be paid. With regard to the argument of the noble Lord opposite, Lord Herschell, the point on which he seemed to rely was that of estoppel against the freeholder, because he did not appear in this House, but I can quite understand his objection. He is a great London landowner, and he might very well think that it would put him in an invidious position to renew here the opposition which he offered in the other House of Parliament. I do not think that could be made a ground of estoppel against the freeholder for refusing him his just right. I should have been glad to have had the opportunity of voting upon a compensation clause; but when the question is put to me whether I shall vote for the Third Reading, or throw out the Bill, I see no alternative but to support the Bill, and I am consoled by the reflection that if we granted compensation after all, it would have to be decided by a jury, and I do not know that a jury is a superior institution to the five Members of this House and four Gentlemen of the other who have decided against compensation.

LORD HERSCHELL: I should like to be permitted to add one word by way of explanation. I certainly did not intend to be understood as arguing that the noble Duke by not opposing the Bill here would lose his claim to compensation. What I said was, that when he petitioned in the other House he did not petition on the ground that he was aggrieved, but entirely on the ground that he appeared in the interests of his leasees and tenants.

LORD HOUGHTON: My Lords, as I had the honour of acting as Chairman of the Committee which considered this Bill, and reported upon it to the House in its present shape, I think it will be most convenient to the noble Marquess if I rise at once to state what our reasons were in coming to the decision at which we arrived. In speaking of the Committee, I should like to state frankly at once that our decision was not arrived at without some discussion, and although, for reasons which your Lordships will quite appreciate, none of my noble Friends attempted to divide the Committee, yet their opinion was not entirely unanimous. I only say that, so that when I speak of the decision of the Committee I may be understood as speaking of the decision at which the majority ultimately arrived. Something fell from the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack as to the great necessity for the Bill not having been, in his opinion, entirely proved. I am bound to say the evidence given before us on that point seemed absolutely overwhelming. We had the evidence, in the first place, of the officials of the County Council, who perhaps the noble Lord would say were not unbiased, but we also had the evidence of one of the Superintendents of the North-Western Railway, the Secretary of the Cab Proprietors' Association, a representative of the St. Pancras Vestry, Inspectors from two divisions of police, the Parcels Delivery manager, and Messrs. Shoolbred, and other van proprietors in the neighbourhood, and I believe that we might have been hearing evidence of that kind still had we not concluded that we did not consider it necessary to be further informed on the subject. I am told that attention has been drawn to that point by the noble Marquess, but I should like to impress upon your Lordships that owing to the form which my noble and learned Friend has employed on this occasion, if he succeeds, the Bill will be absolutely lost. There is no question of its Amendment; and the public will still have to suffer what I think I may say was unanimously regarded by the Committee, after a hearing extending over some days, was a very great inconvenience indeed to the public. Therefore, I may say that the only point we had to decide was the question of compensation. That question of compensation was rather presented to us in two different points of view. In the first place, from what I may call the good-natured point of view, it was urged very strongly that these people might suffer inconvenience; that London is a very rich town; that it is desirable to make everybody as happy as possible; and that, therefore, it would be much better to give compensation. But, my Lords, we do not live in Arcadia, where everybody may be supposed to be to be made perfectly happy, but we live in London, and in London, as my noble and learned Friend behind me has shown, people are often put to great inconveniences in these matters of street improvements and opening streets for traffic without receiving any compensation at all. However, I need hardly say that was not the point of view in which the learned counsel who conducted to case with great ability presented it, but that they pressed it from the practical point of view of the question. We had to go back to what we considered was the original intention with which these gates were erected. The noble and learned Lord said that if the then Duke of Bedford, at the end of last century, had wished, he need not have erected gates at all, but might have put walls or houses there, and he need not have made roads. I suppose there would have been nothing to prevent the then Duke of Bedford laying out his estate, if he had chosen, on something like the principle of the maze at Hampton Court, with all the streets culs de sac, and all the squares only approachable by balloons, but it was of, course, very unlikely that he would do anything of that kind, and what he did was to lay out the estate to the best advantage. The contention of the petitioners was that the gates were placed there with the object of making the estate a private and residential estate. That point was at once taken issue upon, and we decided it was not by any means proved. Your Lordships have heard that the Paving Commissioners were appointed at that time in connection with the building-estates, and were entitled to rate the inhabitants for paving purposes. Adjoining the Duke of Bedford's estate was an estate of the Skinners' Company on the east, and another belonging to a Mr. Mortimer on the west. These estates are specially mentioned in the Act of Parliament to which my noble and learned Friend alluded, as being the estates to secure protection against which, these gates had been set up, and the inference seemed to him absolutely certain that the intention with which those gates were then erected was to prevent, when the time came for laying out those adjacent estates, the carts filled with heavy materials passing over those roads on the Bedford estate which were to be made by the inhabitants of that estate alone. Not to detain your Lordships too long on this point, matters went on as they were, and several other Acts were passed which left matters very much in the same position until the year 1855, when the Metropolis Management Act was passed. There were then over 300 of these little Paving Trusts in London, and the time had then come to consolidate the paving of the whole Metropolis, and, as your Lordships are aware, it was then handed over to the different vestries. Then my noble and learned Friend says if that was the only reason, why were the gates not taken down at that time? My answer, like that of the noble and learned Lord, is that they most certainly ought to have been taken down, but there are, I think, two reasons why they were not; one was suggested by the learned Council, who appeared before the Committee, and it is to the effect that this Metropolis Management Act was rather in the nature of an experiment. It might not have succeeded, and it might have been found necessary to go back to the Paving Trusts, and in that case the loss of the gates might have been a serious matter to them. But I think in reality what weighed more with Parliament was that at that time the gates were not a serious nuisance, that 35 years ago there was by no means the same amount of traffic as there is now, and, as your Lordships are well aware, Parliament is very timid of touching anything of that kind, or of interfering with legal rights, unless a strong case is made out for doing so. On that point we arrived at this conclusion, that, in the first place, the gates were put up to save the roads, and not to keep them private, and that the roads were, therefore, to all intents and purposes, and ought to be treated for all intents and purposes as public roads; and we also arrived at the conclusion, which I may say was very hotly contested by the petitioners, and appeared to them to be a very strong point, although we did not give it as much weight as they desired, namely, that the Duke of Bedford was the sole proprietor of these gates, that he had power either to take them away, or to alter their present position or to remove them without asking his leaseholders. That was hotly contested, but as the noble and learned Lord has conceded the point I do not know that I need say anything more about it. Supposing my contention to be correct, that the gates ought to be taken away, then the real fact is that these people have had thirty-five years more of privacy than they were really entitled to. I was told of a case the other day of a man who had kindly allowed some friends to live for three years in his house, which they did with great apparent satisfaction, but at the end of that time they went to live elsewhere, and sent him in a claim for £2,000 compensation. It seems that is rather the manner in which the inhabitants of these squares are acting towards the public at this moment. Then we come to the point that these houses were taken on the faith of these gates being there. All I can say is there is nothing to show it. I could understand it if there had been covenants in the leases to the effect that if these gates were taken away the lessees would have had a claim, then the Duke of Bedford could have come to the Committee and said, "You see what you are doing; you are diminishing the value of my property." I think in that case the Duke could have made out a claim to compensation, but there are no such covenants in the leases, and how the Duke, except under those circumstances, could have asked for compensation I fail to understand. I do not want to lay too much stress on the fact that the Duke of Bedford did not appear before us. I think the reason given by the noble Marquess may very likely be the right

one. As the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack drew attention to the fact that he did appear in the other House, it is only fair for me to say that he did so only to say what he could for his lessees, and I have no doubt that being on good terms with them he would have liked to say what he could for them. But what I want your Lordships to do is to regard very carefully the possibility of these houses having been taken on such a distinct understanding as mentioned. Take the case of Carlton House Terrace. Supposing one of your Lordships took a house there. I am not sure of my facts here; but I think there would be nothing to prevent the Crown turning Carlton House Terrace into a thoroughfare tomorrow if they chose, and if they considered Pall Mall so congested as to require that to be done. I do not imagine that in such a case the inhabitants of Carlton House Terrace would have a claim to compensation, and yet their expectation of continuing to enjoy their privacy is quite as reasonable as any which these people living in Upper Woburn Place could have had by the maintenance of these gates. Once you concede that they had not a right to maintain these gates themselves, and that the Duke of Bedford could not do so either, I cannot see where their claim for compensation comes in. I should like once more to impress upon your Lordships what has been often said, that claims for compensation for annoyance, as conceded by the petitioner's own witnesses in the case, cannot be maintained or defended. All they claimed was compensation for deterioration of property, and even if they were entitled to make out their case upon that they did not make it out on the ground of annoyance. Of course, if we could have given it them it would have been much more agreeable to us. It is very nice to sit on a Committee and please everybody, if that is not done at the public expense; but we did not desire to confiscate anybody's property. The reason why we did not assent to the claim for compensation was simply because we did not think anybody had made out a claim to compensation.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE: My Lords, I should like to state in a very few words the reasons which bring me to the same conclusion as the noble Marquess opposite, a conclusion which I confess I have reached with very great difficulty, because now that we have heard from the Chairman of the Committee the reasons which induced the Committee to give no compensation, I am bound to say that so far as the freeholders are concerned those reasons seem to me to be quite insufficient and quite unsatisfactory. That is my only reason for voting in favour of the Bill. I think the leaseholders have not, strictly speaking, any legal locus standi in this matter. The rule about compensation in Acts of Parliament where the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act applies is that unless an action could have been brought in the absence of an authority given by the Act of Parliament there is no right. Having heard this debated fully it does seem to me perfectly clear that the occupiers of these houses would have no right to bring any action at all. They have no contract with the freeholder, and it seems to me that the freeholder could, without giving them any right of action, have consented to the removal of these gates, and that if he has consented to it they are entirely out of Court. The reasons urged in connection with the paving of the streets, and so on, seem to me, if I may say so with respect, to be irrelevant. I do not think they would have the least tendency to bar any right to compensation, which would otherwise exist. In this stage of the matter what effect ought to be given to the action of the freeholder in not appearing before the Committee to ask for compensation? Upon the whole I cannot but come to this conclusion, that it must be interpreted as a virtual consent by the freeholder to leave the matter in the hands of the Committee. The Committee have apparently acted upon that principal, and upon that I have been unable from any of the reasons suggested, except those which affect the freeholder, to say that compensation ought to have been given. I think, therefore, the best way of arriving at a just conclusion is to assume that the freeholder did not wish to press his claims.

LORD HOUGHTON: I should desire, my Lords, to say one word in explanation. I carefully intended to guard myself against saying anything as to whether the freeholder waived his right to claim compensation or not. All I said was that he did not ask for it, and that seemed to us on the Committee to be absolutely conclusive.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE: If the freeholder had asked for compensation it seems to me his right to compensation would have been as clear as any that has ever been brought before Parliament.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I do not rise to add anything the discussion of a subject which, I think, has now been pretty well threshed out. I am perfectly satisfied from what has been said by my noble Friends, Lord Herschell, Lord Houghton, Lord Salisbury, and Lord Selborne, as to the vote which I shall give. My reason for rising is to give a short and, perhaps, not very unimportant explanation. I find that I was reported on the Second Reading to give my opinion in favour of compensation. Now, I gave no such opinion at all, and I was quoted afterwards as having done so. What I stated was this: that by general consent the present state of things is an inconvenience to the public: that the removal of the gates would be a convenience to the public—everybody was agreed upon that; that with regard to compensation there was a difference of opinion, and that if the Bill had been rejected on Second Reading your Lordships would have destroyed the chance of removing an inconvenience to the public, and would have left undecided the question of compensation, which appeared to me to be a very fitting one to go to a Committee. The Committee, as my noble Friend has very fairly described, came to the conclusion that compensation is undesirable, but if they had proposed a clause of a practical character I should certainly not have been one to oppose their decision. However, as this Committee has, after very carefully hearing evidence, and having discussed the whole matter, come to the contrary opinion, I should extremely regret that this House—I do not wish to dwell on the reasons why I think so—should pass over the judgments of the Select Committee of the House of Commons and the Select Committee of your own body, that an end ought to be put to what is on all hands regarded as a great inconvenience to the public.

*LORD ZOUCHE: My Lords, as a Member of the Committee before which this matter was brought, perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words. It has been stated with great candour by my noble Friend opposite, Lord Houghton, that, although we did not actually divide on the question, yet that we were by no means unanimous as to the questions involved, particularly that of compensation. We discussed this question at very great length, and I can assure your Lordships we gave every attention to it. I should be the very last to make light of the decision of a Committee, or to say that their verdict should be lightly set aside. They occupy a position of very great trust; they have important matters to deal with; they have a high reputation in your Lordships' House, and admittedly do their work well; but I do not mean to say that under no circumstances ought the verdict of a Select Committee, such as this, to be passed in review before your Lordships' House. In fact, in this case, there were somewhat unusual difficulties presented to us. Although, when looked at in one sense—perhaps what I may call the common sense view of the matter—it was extremely clear, yet there were technical points raised which, although we gave great attention to them, were far fitter to be dealt with by a tribunal composed of men possessing legal training, than by an entirely lay tribunal. Besides that, there was a further difficulty which, I think, has been admitted several times in your Lordships' House, and that was the non-appearance of the freeholder, the owner of these gates, either as a claimant for compensation, or as opposing the Bill in any way. Of course, my Lords, this was, so to speak, the trump card in the hands of the London County Council. All reference to the Duke of Bedford, who happened to be the freeholder in this case, was immediately stopped, and there was a point connected with that which I ventured to raise in the Committee which I considered relevant, and I will leave your Lordships to judge whether it was so or not. I ventured to inquire whether, because in this particular case an owner of property (because it was admitted there was an owner of property here) makes no particular objection to having his property taken away in one particular instance, Parliament should on that account sanction a Bill giving to a Municipal Body like the London County Council, or to any Municipal Body, power to act in such a sweeping manner, and to take away a man's property without giving him a shilling of compensation for it. That is a point which I venture to think is extremely relevant to the issue which you have to determine to-night. It was admitted, after a few moments of the opening statement of counsel, that these gates were the property of the freeholder, and then there was this curious statement made: Supposing instead of there being gates here there had been a house built across the street, then, of course, proper steps would have had to be taken to purchase. But it was said you may take away a man's gates, and it is nonsense to say you do not injure the property by doing that; but that if it happens to be a house, you must give him something for it. It was contended, also, that there was no claim for the freeholder because his property was not injured; but it was proved over and over again,—in fact, it was sufficiently obvious that if you take away the protection which these gates give to these houses, the property would suffer. Then came the other case put forward—how far the lessees and occupiers were entitled to compensation. There was a great deal of technical reasoning about it; but the main argument was that these people had not really any vested interest in the gates. That was one of the great arguments for compensation; not only were they protected and their property made of greater value by the existence of these gates, but these gates were put there by the freeholder under an Act of Parliament—were kept up by him under a series of Acts of Parliament. But it was contended on the other side that as these gates were not to be removed without the consent of the owner, therefore the owner could at any time give that consent, and that in that case these unfortunate people would have no redress whatever. But it was somewhat necessary for that contention to ascertain whether the freeholder did in fact give his consent or not. It was never for one single instant contended, although the freeholder had not chosen to appear for reasons of his own against the Bill, that he had in any sort of way given his consent to these gates being taken away. I do not wish to detain your Lordships after so long a Debate as has taken place, but I think for these and many other reasons it would be unwise to establish such a precedent, and that by admitting this principle you would be establishing a very dangerous precedent. I think in this case especially it is somewhat advisable that your Lordships should review the decision of the Committee, and I would submit that your Lordships should now carefully consider whether you will allow this Bill to proceed or not.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, I have risen more than once to address the House, and I apologise for speaking so late, but I have only a few words to say. It appears to me this is not a question which is at all involved in any legal technicalities, but that, on the contrary, it is one of the simplest questions ever submitted to your Lordships' House. To my mind it is simply this: will your Lordships sanction what the right rev. Prelate has called a high-handed and arbitrary proceeding, namely, the overthrowing of existing recognised rights without any compensation being made. That is the simple question. All other questions as to whether the proprietor, the Duke in this case, has done this or that sink into nothingness compared with that simple proposition. It turns, therefore, upon this: are there existing rights; are they recognised; have they been acknowledged? Having read the statements made by the promoters and by the opponents of this Bill respectively, and having read the evidence, it appears to me that these rights have been recognised over and over again. They have been recognised in Acts of Parliament; they were recognised by the Act of 1855, to which the noble and learned Lord the ex-Lord Chancellor referred, which constituted the Metropolitan Board; they were recognised by Lord Magheramorne in the House of Commons when he was at the head of the Metropolitan Board. He was asked a question on this subject by Mr. Montagu Guest, whether they would bring in a Bill to do away with all gates and obstructions in the Metropolis. Lord Magheramorne's answer was that it was a question involving great rights and claims to compensation. Sir William Harcourt was asked in the House of Commons at the same time—this was in the year 1884—a question on the same subject by Mr. Montagu Guest, and what was his answer? I will give it as it was given in evidence before this very Committee, which reported in favour of this measure. Sir William Harcourt, in reply to the question of Mr. Montagu Guest, on behalf of the Government, said he "Did not think the matter was one which the Government ought to undertake; that owners of land and residences were interested in the maintenance of these gates, bars, and posts; and that it was impossible to destroy these interests without making compensation."

I would then refer the noble and learned Lord the ex-Lord Chancellor to the language used by the late Home Secretary upon this question of compensation for the reply to his argument. Therefore, I submit that it is thus distinctly shown that the principle of the right to compensation has been fully recognised and accepted. But more than that. These statements which I have quoted were made, as I have said, in the year 1884. What happened in the year 1885? Why, the Metropolitan Board of Works, as it then was, which has now been succeeded, as we know, by this London County Council, brought in a general Bill, and in that general Bill they had a clause accepting the principle of compensation and making provision for it. That Bill was for taking away all such bars, gates, and obstructions and it provided that the owner of any such bar, gate, or other obstruction was entitled to receive from the Board compensation in respect of the taking down and removal of such bar, gate, rails, or other obstruction. And that was a Bill brought in by the London County Council of the day only five years ago. Further than that, I maintain that the promoters of this Bill have shown that they know the principle of compensation is at stake, because they have declined to put in this Bill the Lands Clauses Act Compensation Clauses, because they knew, of course, that if they had incorporated and adopted that clause they would have had to give compensation. I will go further on this question of compensation, and say that this very

Committee, although apparently unanimous in its Report, certainly appears from the speech of the noble Lord who has just sat down not to have been at all unanimous in the view which it took of this question, because there were statements made as to what an important question this was in dealing with property and the danger there was of this London County Council in other cases dealing with property without making compensation. That is what the noble Lord tells us. I say that the Committee has itself shown that this case admits of the application of the principle of compensation by the suggestion they have made with regard to repaving these streets. That shows clearly that they admit this principle of compensation, and that they recognise that this measure will be an injury to these inhabitants. The surveyors who gave evidence say that it will lower the value of their property 25 per cent., and the Committee accordingly propose this new idea for the first time: they propose that the compensation, instead of being paid as it should be in current coin of the realm, is to be paid in wooden blocks, with, I suppose, the image and superscription of Lord Rosebery on one side—whom we may look upon as the “Hadji-baba” of modern Metropolitan municipalism—and with the figure of Lord Houghton as “Britannia” on the other. And what is the reason given for all this? Public convenience! Nobody doubts that it may be a convenience to have these gates and bars removed, but that is no reason why property should be confiscated; and if these streets are to be thrown open, the noble Marquess, when he is in a hurry to catch a train to get to Hatfield, may find himself more obstructed and impeded by the carts and waggons passing along them than ever he has been by these gates. But I quite admit that the existence of bars of this kind in the centre of a great Metropolis is in these days an anomaly, and that they constitute an obstruction which ought to be swept away; but not without compensation. And what is the reason given for it? We have heard nothing from the promoters of the Bill of the rights which, as I have pointed out, have been recognised so frequently; but we have had, instead, false analogies drawn between this district and parts of the town which have nothing whatever to do with the question, such as Hamilton Place and other districts which had not the guarantee of Acts of Parliament. Your Lordships have had an argument used to-night by the noble and learned Lord the ex-Lord Chancellor, which he used on a former occasion and which has also been used by Lord Rosebery, which goes very far, namely, that those persons who claim to be compensated may be very thankful that they have had the use and enjoyment of this privacy for so many years. Why, my Lords, what is that but Henry George's argument with regard to land? It may be applied in the same way to every estate possessed by any one of your Lordships, as proposed by Mr. Hyndman and the Socialists. But Mr. Hyndman and the Socialists go further; they would strike against pensions and property of all kinds; and how will my noble and learned Friend like it when they come and propose to take away his pension on the ground that he has enjoyed it for so many years? There is no half way. The true principle is, that if the public wants something for which they require to get an Act of Parliament, in order to take it from the owner, or lessees or whoever it is, compensation ought to be given; and it is with something more than astonishment—I may say it was with consternation—that I heard the noble Marquess at the head of the Government, from whom we might have looked for protection in these matters, declare that he would vote for this Bill. I heard with far greater pleasure the speech of the Lord Chancellor, and I hope that the majority of this House will on this occasion follow the Lord Chancellor rather than the Prime Minister into the Lobby.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: My Lords, I will not detain the House more than a few moments, but I should wish to add my own humble contribution to the remarks of those who have urged your Lordships to pause before you reverse the decisions which have been come to by the Committees of your Lordships' House and of the other House of Parliament, and adopt the Resolution moved by the noble and learned Lord behind me. I do not for a moment mean to assert that it is never proper to review the decision of a Committee of your Lordships' House; but the occasions when we do so are generally when it is found either that fresh evidence has been obtained, or that evidence which has been offered has not been received. In this case no fresh evidence has been brought forward, and no occasion of that kind has arisen. It has been admitted, I believe on all hands, that the inquiry into the Bill was conducted with great care, patience, and ability; and I venture to say that the House would incur no little responsibility if it now reversed the decision of the Committee, arrived at after hearing evidence on the matter for no less than three days. I do not wish for a moment to traverse again all the ground which has been gone over by the noble Lords who have already spoken; but this I would say, that it appears to me at the present time an entirely false issue is placed before the House. It is admitted on all hands that the Bill which you are now asked to throw out will be for the public convenience. There is no doubt whatever about that. Then, why did not the noble and learned Lord bring forward a Motion which would agree with the argument he used, namely, that although good was to be obtained by the Bill, it should be paid for? If the noble and learned Lord had brought forward a clause proposing that compensation should be given in certain cases and in certain ways, I think it would have been perfectly open to the House to have discussed the matter; but now, to throw out this Bill at its Third Reading, after it has been fought through both Houses and threshed out with the greatest care in both Houses, is a course which your Lordships ought not hastily to adopt. With great humility I would venture to urge that the House ought not to take that step without great and careful consideration. The noble Lord who last addressed the House has spoken of the recognised rights which are taken away and not compensated for. I really think the noble Lord cannot have risen to the weighty argument which has been presented by the noble and learned Lord, Lord Selborne, who said, and with perfect justice if I may be allowed to say so, that the leaseholders who petitioned against this Bill had really no legal rights whatever on which you could base compensation. I do not wish to argue the subject over again; but I thought it right to say those few words in the endeavour to induce your Lordships to pause, at any rate, before you assent to the proposition of my noble and learned Friend.

On Question whether the word ("now") shall stand part of the Motion, their Lordships divided:—Contents 38; Not-Contents 29.

Resolved in the affirmative.

Bill read 3^a accordingly, with the amendment.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: I beg to move the postponement of the last stage of this Bill until Tuesday next. The noble Marquess the Prime Minister has not, I think, disputed the reasonableness of compensation; but on the occasion of the Second Reading he said he thought the Second Reading ought to be passed, and I believe if the noble Marquess had not intervened on that occasion it would not have passed. He suggested that it ought to be sent to a Select Committee, and that in Select Committee it could be considered whether a Compensation Clause ought not to be put in. He said that if a Compensation Clause had been put in he would have considered it. I venture, therefore, to propose a postponement in order to give an opportunity for the adoption of a clause of that kind. There are precedents for it, and there is no hurry for the last stage. A postponement until Tuesday would give an opportunity for following the course proposed by the Prime Minister.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: As my noble Friend has mentioned me specially I will say a word. I see no objection to the postponement. I believe that if there is to be a practical clause of compensation brought forward, which approves itself to the majority of the House, I am sure it would be very satisfactory that it should be proposed. After having been told that such a clause is contemplated, it would, I think, hardly be just—especially as there is no hurry in the matter—if we insist on now passing the Bill.

EARL GRANVILLE: But surely this is a very unusual practice, suggesting in this way a clause at the last moment.

Why did not my noble Friend prepare a clause ready for insertion in the Bill? I think we were entitled to have had the clause prepared at the last stage of the Bill. If my noble Friend thought that course desirable why did he not prepare a clause?

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: The proposed clause was not prepared by me, and it may not, perhaps, be exactly the clause that ought to be put in. Whether it is put in to-day or on Tuesday really cannot matter, as the noble Earl knows perfectly well; and I think, with the view of justice being done to all parties, it had better be postponed. Therefore, I still adhere to my Motion, that this last stage of the Bill be postponed.

Bill to be further proceeded with on Tuesday next.

ALLOTMENTS ACT (1887) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No 151.)

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Bill read 3^a (according to order.)

Clause 5.

*THE PAYMASTER GENERAL (The Earl of Jersey): I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment moved, in page 3, line 37, after ("meeting") insert—

"Nothing in this section shall give any right to hold a public meeting in the school-room (a) unless not less than six days before the meeting a notice of the intention to hold the meeting on the day and at the time specified in the notice, signed by the persons calling the meeting, being not less than six in number, and being persons qualified to make a representation to the Local Authority under the principal Act, has been given, if the school is under a School Board, to the clerk of the Board, and in any other case to one of the managers of the school; nor (b) if the use of the schoolroom on the said day and at the same time has previously to the receipt of the notice of the meeting been granted for some other purpose; but in that case the clerk or manager, or someone on his behalf, shall forthwith after the receipt of the notice, inform in writing one of the persons signing it that the use of the school has been so granted for some other purpose, and name some other day on which the schoolroom can be used for the meeting.—(The Earl of Jersey.)

Agreed to.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: I have to move, your Lordships, in line 32, after the words "the Act or," to insert the words "with the consent of the managers."

This clause was introduced at the last stage of the Bill in the discussion in the House of Commons. It was introduced late at night and with the result of raising, as I am informed, a long and rather animated discussion. I do not think those who framed the clause or who agreed to it had taken the pains to work out to its ultimate conclusion the clause which they accepted, and I am confirmed in that opinion by the fact that the noble Lord who has charge of the Bill himself proposes an Amendment which materially alters the operation of this Clause 5; but it will be my object to show your Lordships that no Amendment would be satisfactory which gives the control of the school-rooms in others than those in whose charge they are at present vested by law, that is the managers. I leave out of consideration at present how far it is wise to import into the purposes for which school-rooms may be used their employment for the discussion of debateable questions, such as the adoption of the Allotments Act. I will assume that is all quite right and proper, though something might be said on the other side. But I pass that by, because I am anxious that your Lordships should not throw any difficulty in the way in the working of the Allotments Act, and that you should afford full facilities for giving effect to it. Your Lordships must know that as regards schools built entirely with public money, as in the case of schools erected under the School Boards Act, they are under the management of a Board, though I think there, again, Parliament has a right to control the arrangements of the School Boards, and to dictate the terms under which use shall be made of the schools. But as it stands, this clause is in a very crude and imperfect state, because whatever arrangements may have been made by those who have the charge of the schools at the present moment, whether they have let them for any parochial purposes, or for parochial meetings, as is often the case, those arrangements will be likely to be disturbed by the machinery provided in Clause 5. I think your Lordships will see that when there have been arrangements made for the regular and orderly use of a school, it should not be open to any body of unauthorised and irresponsible persons to come forward and claim the use of that room, and to upset and thwart and multiply the arrangements which have been made for its use. Therefore, it is that I propose the words "with the consent of the managers" should be introduced. Even in the case of Board Schools the inconvenience would be very great, but it must be intensified in the case of voluntary schools, under the control of voluntary managers. The noble Earl proposes, as an Amendment, a proviso at the end of the clause which is wholly inadequate to cure the evil which it recognises; he proposes that notice shall be given to the clerk of the School Board (that is all right, no doubt), and also to one of the managers. That may be a very convenient arrangement, but it may turn out to be a very inconvenient and unworkable arrangement, because you must assume, for the purpose of argument, that the use of the school is not one which is generally viewed with favour by the managers, because, of course, if everybody is agreed there is no need of any compulsory arrangement. This clause would only come into operation when there is a difference of opinion. Your Lordships will see how, by this clause, the power is put into operation: that notice should be given to one of the managers. Some managers do not even reside in the parish. I am myself manager of a school in Dorsetshire, 18 miles from where I reside, and it might so happen that notice might be sent to me. I might be away, and the necessary notice would have been given behind the back of the ordinary manager of the school, who would be ousted from all voice in the matter. That is not all: because as the clause stands in all its nakedness it would compel a manager whose school may be his own property to give up the use of the school-room for the purpose of carrying out the Allotments Act without giving him any control, or chance of appeal, or of making any arrangements at all. I am quite aware that the noble Earl who has charge of the Bill is going to propose that there shall be an appeal, and when that is proposed I think I can show your Lordships how badly it will work; but I would point out that if there is to be harmonious co-operation there must be some determining authority. When two people ride on a horse one must ride behind the other. The schools, in fact, are not to be retained in the control of the managers, they are to be handed over to the control of irresponsible persons. I put it to your Lordships whether it will not contribute much more to the harmony and peace of the parish if the control of the schools is left where it is now with the managers, subject to a reasonable appeal, which could be easily arranged, to the control of some body known to the law and not to one of the managers. I have mentioned the case of one manager being non-resident; I will now take the case of a notorious difference existing between managers, there being, for instance, one person who is not on good terms with the others, who may have made himself obnoxious, and who is, perhaps, anxious to pose as a popular demagogue, or who may be in known hostility to the other managers of the schools. It is to be supposed that the peace and harmony of the parish and the proper working of the schools will be promoted if the clause as it stands passes into law, even with the modifications to be subsequently proposed by the noble Earl who has charge of the Bill. There is another point to which my attention has been called, and that is that there is no limitation with regard to the point of time. The persons who may claim to make use of schools may claim it on Sundays, or on any other day of the week; there is no limitation at all. As I have observed, the whole object of this clause of the Bill is to provide for cases where dissension exists. How much more will dissension be promoted when you leave it open to those who claim the use of schools to claim it for themselves if they like on Sundays; and it is quite possible, as far as I see, if they claim it that their claim might be enforced. In the Amendment proposed by the noble Earl it is said that six persons qualified to vote must apply; but those persons may not necessarily be substantial people, and I cannot help thinking that, in view of the fact that these buildings may have been built mainly by the munificence of those who are anxious in the cause of education, and who have impressed those buildings primarily with a Trust for education, for in many cases they have been built gratuitously, and do not belong even to a public body, it is desirable, in the interests of the parish, and in the interests of peace, in the interests of harmony, in the interests of the harmonious working of the Allotments Act, that you should not provide such a means of strife, and such an opportunity for discord, as will be provided if the Bill as it stands passes into law, even with the safeguards proposed by the noble Lord. Therefore, I hope your Lordships will maintain the managers of the schools in the position in which they are placed by law, that there shall not be the consent of this or that manager required, but of the managers generally, a body well known to the law, subject, if the Government pleases, to an appeal which shall not aggravate the offence complained of. I quite agree that the County Council is a responsible body which is not likely to misuse the powers entrusted to it. As far as the County Councils are concerned there is, perhaps, no grave objection; but I do see a very grave objection indeed to delegating the power to any one member of the County Council. The Committee of the Council charged with the administration of the Act will take care to make the Act work smoothly. I do not distrust them, but I do distrust one of the managers alone being picked out, in the first instance, and then that the matter is to be decided by one member of the County Council, who may happen to be a fanatic on the subject, who would not bring to the decision of the question that calm and balanced mind which might be required. It may be said that it will take some time to get the decision of the County Council, but I do not know that that in itself is a serious objection. The matter is not one which presses seriously for decision. Arrangements as to allotments cannot be made in the twinkling of an eye, and if a week or a fortnight, or even a month, may elapse before the appeal goes to the County Council. I do not know that it would be a very serious misfortune. I think it might probably give time to those of opposing views to come to an arrangement, or some compromise which could enable all parties to work harmoniously together. As it is, I feel sure the Bill, as it stands in its present shape, is certain to be a fertile source of annoyance and disturbance in parishes, and, therefore, I hope your Lordships will accept the Amendment which I propose. If the consent of the managers is required for the purpose of holding public meetings, the legitimate purpose of the clause will be fully preserved. The use of the schoolrooms can be obtained with the consent of the managers, and if a proviso is added at the end giving the right of an appeal to the Allotments Committee of the County Council, I do not know that there will be any objection to that; but I do earnestly hope your Lordships will maintain in the first place the right of control which is now held by the managers over the buildings for which they are responsible, and that certainly you will not adopt the clause in its present shape. Therefore, I ask your Lordships to consent to the Amendment I propose.

Amendment moved, in line 32, after ("or") to insert ("with the consent of the managers.")—(The Earl Beauchamp.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I do not know that the dangers which my noble Friend has in view strike me as being dangers of any great magnitude; but in these matters I am all for peace, and I would suggest to my noble Friend to consider as an offer for a compromise, as he suggests the desirability of an opportunity for compromise, the adoption of the words "with the consent of any two of the managers." The difference between my noble Friend and the Government is reduced to a rather narrow point. He wants the consents of all the managers to be obtained, which might, under certain circumstances, be difficult and inconvenient, and, on the other hand, it is suggested that the consent of one manager would be enough. But as it is suggested that there may be managers of somewhat eccentric minds, I would suggest that if the consent of two managers were obtained it might be safer.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Where there are two.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: There are always more than one, I think.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I may be wrong, but I think not.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: There must be three to sign the papers.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Well I do not think it is a matter of first-rate importance, but I think any two managers will be sufficient for my noble Friend. To require the consent of all the managers would be very inconvenient. A man may be ill, or away, or in a lunatic asylum, and it may be impossible to get at him.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I am sorry to hear that the clause is to be introduced in any form, because I think the result will be exactly the contrary of that which the noble Earl desires, namely, that it will, in fact, introduce dissension. I do not think there would have been any differences occasioned if the schools had been left to be so used; but I am afraid if the managers are to be consulted and to refuse the only result will be that very great annoyance, controversy, ill-feeling, and disturbance will take place in the parish where it is refused, and the result will be what we should all dislike and deplore.

*THE PAYMASTER GENERAL (The Earl of JERSEY): I propose to ask the House to insert words which would give the right of appeal to the County Council, or to one member chosen by the County Council for that purpose. The effect would be that supposing the one or two managers refused to give their consent to the use of a school, the people who were applying for the use of the school could then make an appeal to the Committee of the Council, or to some member of the Council who would be chosen for that purpose by the County Council. Probably if this Amendment were accepted by the House it would meet the objection of the noble Earl opposite, Lord Kimberley.

*EARL FORTESCUE: My Lords I must express my regret at the delay in passing a measure desirable in itself, though far less desirable in its present shape, in my opinion, since it has been altered, I will not say amended, in the other House, than it was as originally introduced by the Government. I should be sorry to think that the passage of this, on the whole, desirable measure should be jeopardised by our sending it back to the Commons with some small alteration or amendment, whichever it is, to arouse further discussion in the other House, and which, seeing what indications there are of a readiness to delay the progress of measures, might to a certain degree endanger its passing. If it had not been from a dread of delaying and possibly endangering the passing of this Bill I should have introduced an Amendment which I think would have been of some more importance than this about the managers of the schools, because I tried to persuade the House to restore the Bill more nearly to what it was when it was introduced into the other House by the Government. If the Amendment is not really, in your Lordships' view, an important one, I venture to hope the House will not encumber the Bill with it. I cannot say it commends itself to my judgment. This supposed Amendment, I agree with my noble Friend who spoke last, is not likely to smooth matters in the parishes where there is a difficulty about allotments; but even if the Amendment was desirable it seems to me, in the present state of public business, it would be a misfortune to send down the Bill for fresh discussion in the other House. Before the measure finally quits your Lordships' hands I should desire to make a few remarks, which nothing but my imperfect sight and hearing prevented my making on the Third Reading, before we came to clauses.

*LORD NORTON: It seems to me this is not a very small point of principle which is raised: it is the question of enacting that private property may be used by the public or anybody else without the consent of the owners. In many cases these schools belong to the managers, and are as much private property as your Lordships' own houses. The noble Earl opposite gives, as a very good reason for throwing them open to the public, that the public will be very much disappointed if that is not done; but I do not think that will serve generally as a reason for throwing private property open to the public use. That involves a very wide principle indeed. Then, I must say with regard to the proposal of the noble Marquess the Prime Minister as a compromise that two managers should be able to give consent that is no compromise at all. Two managers are not competent to act for the managers who are a body corporate, and they cannot be represented by one or two of their number. Either the managers must give their consent or not; nobody else can give it. To say that two instead of one of the managers shall be able to act as the managers is the most inefficient compromise I ever heard of. To say that one, two, three, or any other number, of them can act as their majority is illusory. The question is, Can the private property of school managers be safely thrown open by this Bill for the use of the public without the consent of those to whom it belongs? and I think anybody who knows how Board Schools are used throughout the country for all sorts of purposes will see that there is no small principle at stake here in opening private schools alike.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: Of course, the consent of two managers would be better than one. There seems to be a misconception in the mind of the noble Marquess that the consent of all the managers would be required if my Amendment were adopted. That is not at all the case. School managers act in the way in which all managers act everywhere. I suppose there may be differences of opinion between them, as in the case of the appointment of the teachers. It is not necessary that the managers should be unanimous in opinion in England to the appointment of teachers; they act jointly, as all Public Bodies do, and, therefore, I do not see why in this particular instance you are to introduce a new mode of consulting the managers rather than leave them to their ordinary jurisdiction of acting by a majority, especially if you guard it by an appeal to the Allotments Committee of the County Council. I hope, therefore, on consideration, the noble Marquess will see the object and purpose desired will really be more conveniently carried out by the way I propose of ensuring that the consent of the managers shall be given in the ordinary way, and not by any new-fangled limitation to one, two, three, or four. The other objection of the noble Marquess will come in later when we come to consider the terms of the appeal. I hope he will agree to my words, because it seems to me you are proposing new restrictions on the managers, which puts the whole thing in a new and strange light, and will not conduce to the harmonious or efficient working of the Act.

LORD HERSCHELL: I do not understand that this introduces any new principle, inasmuch as, under Section 5, it is already provided that the school-rooms may be used for the purposes of this Act by the County Councils.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: And that is not proposed to be affected by this?

EARL BEAUCHAMP: That is my share of the compromise.

LORD HERSCHELL: I understood my noble Friend opposite in his previous remarks to suggest that this clause introduced a new and dangerous principle, namely, authorising the use of private property by other persons, and I was pointing out that that had already been done by a clause to which no objections had been taken.

On Question, "That those words be there inserted," their Lordships divided:—Contents 12; Not Contents 21.

Resolved in the negative.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I will now move my Amendment, but I do not know that I am bound to move it exactly as I offered it, to insert after the word "or" in line 32, the words "with the consent of any two managers." May I be allowed to say that the reason why I move this is, that I was told by a very distinguished authority that in a place in the south of England there was a meeting held for the purpose, as announced, of discussing allotments; but no sooner had they got the candles lit and the doors shut than they turned it into a meeting for organising a strike of barges. I think we ought to have some kind of responsible authority, I do not care what, to prevent action of that kind.

Moved, in line 32, Clause 5, to insert after the word ("or") the words ("with the assent of any two managers.")—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

Agreed to.

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: Then, at all-end of Clause 5, I move the Amendment

who may be authorised by that Committee to determine appeals under this section, who may forthwith decide such appeal and make such order respecting the use of the room as to them seem just."

EARL BEAUCHAMP: I would point out that, in accordance with the Amendment we have just made, the notice ought to be given to the two managers, not to one, because there are, as some of your Lordships are aware, three managers—there must be three, and the Amendment proposed by the noble Earl must be taken to read on all fours with the Amendment we have just agreed to with regard to the two managers.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It seems to me that one manager may very well take a notice on behalf of the whole body. It cannot be necessary that the two should be there at once.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: May I again be allowed to point out that one manager may be non-resident, and very often is. The notice ought to be given to the two managers whose consent is asked; otherwise where are you?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I would call the noble Lord's attention to the fact that the Amendment is now agreed to.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: Quite so; and, therefore, I say that the notice ought to be given to the two managers, and not to one, who, in fact, might not even be one of the two whose consent has been asked. It is only to make the thing run in common-sense.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: What can be the necessity of giving notice to two managers? One manager cannot act by himself. He would, of course, have to call in another manager to decide the question; obviously he cannot act alone under what has been put in by the noble Marquess. There must be two managers to act, and the notice being given to one, he will have to communicate with the others. I do not see the difficulty. Besides which, there may be several managers, and if you are not satisfied with one, you may go to another.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN): Would the words "the aforesaid managers" do?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUTSFORD): That is not necessary, one is quite enough.

The Earl of Jersey

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: May I make a suggestion? I think, on consideration, it will be found that the whole of this clause is unnecessary. It was necessary when the managers had no option, and when there was no provision that they should have notice of what was going to be done, but, inasmuch as no use can be made of the school by persons who wish to hold meetings about allotments, without the consent of the managers, the managers may require as much notice as they please. It will be in their own hands, because they will have full control over the whole arrangements. The part about the appeal stands separately. No doubt the observation is true as regards the County Council holding an inquiry, but in the other case no further notice is required.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: It is to prevent, for instance, the County Council coming down on a particular day with some literary representation.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: What I meant is that they will have it in their own hands; but perhaps it can do no harm.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: No, it can do no harm.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM: I propose to move the exclusion of the words "or to any members of the Council." It is rather extraordinary that when any dispute arises with regard to the use of the schools it should go before the County Council. That does not seem a very desirable thing, but to say that it should be decided by any single member of the Council appears very unwise. I think it might not give satisfaction to those who have the management of the schools if there was any dispute in the matter. Surely it would be sufficient to say that appeals should be decided by the whole Standing Committee. To say that any one member should decide would, I think, be very impolitic. I hope, therefore, that my noble Friend will agree that those words should be left out.

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: I am afraid I cannot agree that those words should be omitted. The fact is, that the matter would be left to the Committee of the County Council to decide if they chose, or, if not, they would appoint some one, and certainly they would not appoint anybody who would be likely to give an unfair decision. If there was nobody in whom they had full confidence, they would decide it themselves, and I, therefore, think it is as well to leave those words in.

*THE EARL OF POWIS: It appears to me if those words are inserted the County Council would have to appoint one man, who would be a sort of standing arbitrator with regard to the use of these schools. As the noble Earl suggests, if they could not decide themselves, they would depute one of their number to do it. That at once makes him the representative merely of the majority of the Council, and brings the spirit of Party conflict into the Council upon the question of the use of these schools.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: I would point out that we have already struck out the words "or to any member of the Council."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Yes, those words have been struck out.

On question agreed to.

*EARL FORTESCUE: My Lords, before the Bill passes I would say a few words, which my unfortunate blindness and deafness prevented my saying to you before, when the Bill was read a third time. I do not wish to detain you many moments. I should have much wished to introduce an Amendment which would have restored the Bill more nearly to the much more desirable form in which it was presented to the other House. It had an effect of giving an appeal to the County Council from the decision of the Sanitary Authority, and, in the case of very large towns, or even of populous towns, there was an obvious unfairness and unreasonableness in giving an appeal from the Urban Authority, we will say of Manchester to the County Council of Lancashire. But the Bill, as it stands, excludes an appeal to the County Council from any municipality—that is as I read it. Now, I think a number of municipalities—I speak coming from a county which has a multitude of very small ones, are so constituted that their decisions should be unsusceptible of being appealed against, and that being so, that an appeal should be given against the decision of the Rural Sanitary Authorities is, I think, most unreasonable, and I am afraid will work very unfairly. In Devonshire there are a number of small ancient municipalities; there are four of them, the smallest with a population of only 2,200. Now, I think the Rural Sanitary Authority for a great number of parishes round the Okehampton Union is much more likely to come to a much better and much more influential decision than the petty parish of Okehampton. There are two more under 3,500, South Molton and Torrington; and Totnes is the only one of these small places which reached 4,000—according to the last Census its population was 4,089. Now, all those places are centres of Unions, and there is practically no appeal against them, as there was against the Urban Authorities upon the far better principle adopted as the Bill stood when introduced by the Government. Now, the authority representing a single small urban parish cannot be appealed against; the authority representing 12 or 20 parishes with, in some instances, ten times the population, can be appealed against. My only reason for not trying to reverse the mischievous alteration made since the introduction of the Bill into the other House—and I hold the Bill in my hand as it was originally introduced—was the fear of endangering or causing a delay in a measure which, even as it stands with all its imperfections, is, I think, a very useful and desirable one, and I only wish the Government had been able to carry it more nearly in the shape in which they introduced it.

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: In answer to the noble Earl I desire merely to say that it was the original intention of the Government that the appeal should lie to the County Council from the Municipal Authorities other than the County Boroughs; but then, representations were made in the other House upon the matter, and the Government were reluctantly obliged to give way upon the point, and, therefore, the appeal does not lie at the present time. But, at the same time, I would point out to him that the authorities in these small boroughs have very close relations with the people who would ask for allotments, and to whom they would certainly be amenable supposing they did not act properly.

Bill passed, and returned to the Commons; and to be printed, as amended.—(No. 243.)

HOUSE OF LORDS OFFICES.

Second Report from the Select Committee considered (according to order), and agreed to.

PHARMACY ACT (IRELAND) (1875)

AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 172.)

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to order).

THE EARL OF ERNE: It appears to be convenient that these Amendments which stand in my name which, though in appearance formidable, are really only drafting Amendments, should be inserted. The Bill underwent considerable changes in Committee, both in form and substance, and these Amendments are necessary in order to make the measure workable. I may say they have been agreed to in connection with the Amendments which were moved by my noble Friend the Marquess of Waterford in Standing Committee.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: As Chairman of the Standing Committee, I may say that I have looked through the Amendments, and that they are quite in accordance with what has been stated by the noble Lord, that is to say, to carry out what was agreed between my noble Friend the Marquess of Waterford and those who supported the Bill. I think, therefore, the House should agree to them.

*EARL CADOGAN: There are two Amendments of which I am sorry I was unable to give notice on behalf of the Government. One is in Clause 7, page 3, line 6. I wish simply to amend the form of the Amendment of my noble Friend. He has used the words "the Act to regulate the sale of poisons in Ireland." Now, there is no such Act, and I propose to put in "33 & 34 Vict. cap. 26." It is really only a drafting Amendment. There is one more. It is to amend the words of Schedule C in which the form of statement appears, "I hereby declare that I have completed the full term of apprenticeship" to a registered druggist "who has been duly registered," and so on. I move after the word "been" to insert the words "or would have been entitled to be."

Amendment agreed to.

Report of Amendment to be received on Monday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 244.)

TENANTS' COMPENSATION BILL.

(No. 240.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

A noble LORD: I have not given any explanation of this Bill, to which I did not think there was the smallest objection. It is a Bill with a very desirable object, and I think it would be as well that it should go to Standing Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I think it is a very desirable measure; but it should be compared with the Agricultural Holdings Act, and carefully brought into line with it.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Quite so. The object will, I think, be regarded as desirable.

LORD HERSCHELL: I have looked into the Bill, and I quite agree with the object of it. With regard to the suggestion of the noble Marquess, my attention was called to the necessity of that being done, and I think, therefore, it is very desirable that the Bill should be sent to a Committee.

LORD HARLECH: Then I will move that it be sent to the General Committee.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for General Bills.

CENSUS (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL.

(No. 226.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: My Lords, I need only point out that this Bill is the same as that which was passed ten years ago, with the exception of three new points. A Committee was appointed to draw up the Bill, and they recommended that the following additions should be made in it: that in addition to the information hitherto obtained a column should be added to the Householders' Schedule which enables persons to be returned either as employers or employed, or as being neither employers nor employed; secondly, that persons living on their means should be enabled to state the fact in the Return; thirdly, that the number of rooms occupied by a family, where less than five rooms, should be stated. Those recommendations are carried out in the Bill. I should also say that no provision has been made suggested in some quarters for a Quinquennial Census, or for a permanent Census Office, not because those might not be desirable objects, but because they would cause increased expenditure.

*THE EARL OF POWIS: I would call attention to Clause 14. It is intended that this census should be on the lines of the Act of 1880. Here it says, in line 24, that the constables or peace-officers in every parish shall be compelled to act as enumerators under this Act. The words used in the Act of 1880 are—"constables or other peace-officers for such parishes," which limits the employment, as is quite proper, to the parochial constables. Now, the words used here might mean county or other constables living in a particular parish. I do not believe it was intended to mix up the County Constabulary with the census; and, therefore, I would ask the noble Earl to consider whether he would not use the same language as is adopted in the Act of 1880, and say "for" every parish, instead of "in."

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: I will inquire into the matter.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

CENSUS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 227.)

Read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

MARRIAGES IN BRITISH EMBASSIES, &c. BILL.—(No. 167.)

House in Committee (on Re-commitment) (according to order).

Clause 3.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I wish merely to move the adoption of this clause in a somewhat altered form. It is really the same in meaning, but it has, in consequence of difficulties, been somewhat altered in wording. There will be one or two Consequential Amendments in form, which I shall have to move in consequence of the insertion of the words,

"High Commissioner and Resident." There are parts of the world now coming under Her Majesty's dominion, especially in the Pacific, where High Commissioners are very important persons.

EARL GRANVILLE: I have no objection whatever, but I think it may require some consideration.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Certainly.

Clause 4.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I move to insert after the words, "before a Governor," in two places in the clause, the words "High Commissioner or Resident," and the same words will require to be afterwards inserted in Clause 10.

The Report of Amendments to be received on Monday next; and Bill to be printed as amended.—(No. 245.)

FOREIGN PAUPER IMMIGRATION.

QUESTIONS—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF MEATH, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government whether it is true that an edict has been issued in Russia forbidding Jews to hold or farm land; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will take measures to prevent a wholesale invasion of Great Britain by Jewish Russian paupers, said: My Lords, in accordance with the notice which I gave yesterday, I hope Her Majesty's Government will be able to inform the House whether there is any truth in the somewhat sensational statements which have appeared in the public Press in reference to an Imperial edict which has been promulgated in Russia against the Jews. If true, 1,000,000 of people will be reduced to the condition of paupers and will be obliged to leave the country, and I should be glad to know whether in that case Her Majesty's Government will take such steps as will prevent a pauper invasion of this country, which would tend to the serious detriment of our working classes and lead to an increase of the rates. One can hardly believe that in Europe at the latter end of the 19th Century it is possible we should hear of wholesale religious persecutions. It is hardly possible to think that in these days we are going to hear of repetitions of the dreadful persecutions which took place in the Middle Ages or the dragonnades of Louis XIV. It is a cardinal axiom of British jurisprudence that every man should be considered innocent until he is proved guilty, and, therefore, we are bound to believe, until otherwise informed, that the Government of Russia has not issued any such barbarous edict as that to which I refer; but I am perfectly confident that if any such edict has been issued, Her Majesty's Government will use their best efforts to prevent the working classes of this country being overwhelmed by an influx of pauper labour, for I think, however much we must sympathise with these unfortunate victims, of persecution, if this should turn out to be true, it is a bounden duty to think first of those at home. I feel confident that, in the first place, Her Majesty's Government would find means to convey to the Russian Government an intimation of the feeling of indignation which must spread through the length and breadth of the country if these statements are true.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY
Her Majesty's Government have no information whatever in confirmation of the statements to which the noble Lord has referred, and we have no ground for thinking that the emigrants to whom the noble Lord refers would come to this country. I will not enter into the economic question which the noble Lord has raised until we have some ground for believing that it will be so.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 1st August, 1890.

REMOVAL TERMS (SCOTLAND) ACT
(1886) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 342.)

(3.10.) Lords Amendments to be considered forthwith; considered, and agreed to.

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILL
[LORDS].—(No. 251.)

Lords Reason for disagreeing with certain of the Amendments made by the Commons, and the Lords Amendments to the Commons Amendments, and the Consequential Amendments to the Bill to be considered forthwith.

Lords Reason and Amendments and Consequential Amendments considered.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth not insist on the Amendments to which the Lords have disagreed; and doth agree to the Lords Amendments to the Commons Amendments, and to the Consequential Amendments made by the Lords to the Bill."—(Mr. Bryce.)

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): As there is no notice on the Paper in reference to this Bill, I should like to know whether the alterations which were made were considerable or not?

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): The Amendments related simply to technical matters. The Bill repeals certain obsolete laws, and the Amendments by the Committee of this House, and to which the Lords have disagreed, are very few and not of sufficient importance to require that we should insist upon them. In all matters of any consequence, the Lords have agreed to the Amendments made here.

Question put, and agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

INDIAN RAILWAYS.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether it is purposed to discontinue the construction of railways on the metre gauge; whether a proposal has been made to change existing metre-gauge lines throughout India into broad-gauge lines; whether the Secretary of State has recently received a Despatch on the subject from the Government of India; whether he has seen the estimate of General Trevor, C.S.I., Chairman of the Southern Maharashtra Railway, that this reversal of policy will probably cost about £20,000,000, as the change alone will cost £3,500 a mile; and whether he will lay Papers upon the Table relating to that subject?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The answer to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question is, No. The answer to the second paragraph is, No. To the third paragraph the answer is, Yes. The Secretary of State has received a Despatch on the question of the gauges from the Government of India. The answer to the fourth paragraph is, No, and to the last paragraph, Yes, when the correspondence is complete.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that he is not aware that the reversal of policy will entail an enormous loss, amounting to many millions sterling?

SIR J. GORST: The hon. Member refers to the fourth paragraph of the question. My answer was, No. That means that the Secretary of State has not seen the estimates of General Trevor.

THE LUNACY ACT.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that under Section 9, Sub-section (2), of "The Lunacy Act, 1890," there appears to be no provision for payment of the expenses incurred in the exercise of the jurisdiction therein conferred on the judicial authority; and, if so, upon whom the order for such payment should be made?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): There appears to be nothing on the subject of expenses in the section referred to by my hon. Friend, except the words which give to the judicial authority the same powers as if he were acting in the exercise of his ordinary jurisdiction, and which provides for the remuneration of his officers. I have no authority to give a legal opinion, but I apprehend that any expenses not covered by those words must fall upon the person presenting the petition.

THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether steam colliers are to accompany any of the divisions of the Manœuvring Squadrons for the purpose of testing and ascertaining the possibility of coaling ships at sea, or is it intended that both the supposed hostile and defending forces are to be supplied with coal as though no experimental Naval War existed?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Steam colliers are assigned to each of the Manœuvring Squadrons, and the arrangements have been devised so as to represent the actual conditions of war as far as peace manœuvres render it possible. No special arrangements have been made for testing the coaling of ships at sea.

TRAMWAY FARES.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any control over the fares which may be charged by Tramway Companies having a monopoly of running their cars on the Queen's highway?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no control of any kind over the fares of stage carriages.

MR. COX: Can these companies make any charge they like?

MR. MATTHEWS: They can make any charge they are authorised to make by Act of Parliament.

MR. COX: How can it be ascertained what charges they are entitled to make?

MR. MATTHEWS: By referring to the Acts.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether there is in the right hon. Gentleman's Department, or in any other Department of the Executive, authority to require proprietors of tramcars and omnibuses to exhibit outside the vehicles in legible figures and letters every fare chargeable?

MR. MATTHEWS: No such authority exists in 6 & 7 Vict., c. 86, which is the controlling Act.

THE ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what are the portions of the German sphere of influence in Africa, referred to in Article VIII. of the Anglo-German Agreement, within which the German Government engages under that Article to apply the Free Trade provisions of the Berlin Act of 1885?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The whole of the German sphere in East Africa, with the exception of the strip of territory on the coast, 10 miles deep, now belonging to Zanzibar.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when Great Britain is to assume the Protectorate over Zanzibar under the Anglo-German Agreement; and whether he will promise that when that Protectorate is assumed, slavery shall cease to be legal within the limits of the British Protectorate?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No date is fixed for the assumption of the Protectorate. As regards the second paragraph, it would be unjust and impolitic to demand the confiscation of domestic slaves in a Mohammedan country as soon as it is placed under British protection; but it will be our duty to guard by all means in our power against abuses, and provide for the effectual working of the Act of Brussels, which will ensure its gradual extinction.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what steps the Government propose to take, in assuming the Protectorate of Zanzibar, to bring gradually to an end the system of domestic slavery prevailing in the country?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The matter is occupying the attentive consideration of the Sultan and the Consul General.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that under Article VIII. of the Anglo-German Agreement, the two Powers engaged to apply the Berlin Act in all the portions of their respective spheres where the first five Articles are applicable "at the date of the present Agreement"; whether it was intended by these words to contract the two Governments, being signatories of the Berlin Act, out of that Act as regards territories which might come into possession or under the influence of either Power after the date of the signing of the Anglo-German Agreement; and whether under this arrangement the German Government can allow German goods to enter the mainland portion of the Zanzibar Sultanate duty free should the coast line be ceded by the Sultan, while maintaining duties which will then be differential against British trade?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: That was certainly not the intention. Great Britain and Germany have neither the wish nor the power to contract themselves out of any of the obligations of the Berlin Act. No such arrangement as that referred to in the last paragraph is practicable, as has been fully explained in other answers.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, by Article VIII. of the Anglo-German Agreement regarding freedom of trade in East Africa, permission is given to the German Government, if and when it obtains that part of the present Zanzibar Sultanate which is situate on the mainland, to establish a protective tariff there; and whether this permission will in fact have the effect of evading and cancelling the provisions of the Berlin Act of 1885, under which Great Britain and Germany bound themselves, not only to apply the Free Trade system themselves, but to use their best endeavours to have it applied in the dominions of Native Sovereigns also?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No such permission is given by the Article. Either the Treaty with Zanzibar must be maintained, or the coast must be brought under the Free Trade provision of the Act of Berlin. In either case British trade is fully protected against excessive or differential treatment. The 4th Article of the Zanzibar Treaty, which provides for perfect freedom of commerce and navigation between the contracting parties, contains this provision:—

"The Sultan of Zanzibar binds himself not to allow or recognise the establishment of any kind of monopoly or exclusive privilege of trade within his dominions to any Government, Association, or individual."

MR. BRYCE: Is it not the case that under Article VIII. of the Agreement it will be in the power of Germany, when she acquires a narrow strip of territory on the mainland, to establish a protective tariff?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Only within the limit settled by the Zanzibar Treaty or the Act of Brussels—that is, 5 per cent. in the one case, and 10 per cent. in the other.

MR. BRYCE: Will not that permission have the effect of cancelling the provisions of the Berlin Act of 1885?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hon. Member will, I think, perceive that that is superseded by the Act of Brussels.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): Have Turkey and Holland yet given in their adhesion to the Brussels Act?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Turkey has adhered. Holland has not yet given her adhesion.

In answer to a question from Mr. O'KELLY (Roscommon) as to the adhesion of the United States.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON said: If I remember rightly, the United States took an exceptional position at the Conference.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON: May I ask whether, in the event of the mainland portion of the Sultanate of Zanzibar being ceded to Germany, the statement that "trade is protected from any differential treatment there" signifies that no heavier Customs Duties will be levied upon British than upon German goods?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: That is certainly the interpretation.

HONORARY COLONELCIES.

CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that Honorary Colonels of regiments are not in any degree responsible for the discipline and efficiency of the regiments they are by a fiction supposed to command, and whence they draw their full pay, he will take into consideration the desirability of discontinuing this illusory title, and of granting these pensions, if at all, under some designation which shall not disguise their real significance?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The hon. Member ought to be well aware that these honorary appointments are immensely prized by general officers; and the connection of these officers with the regiments in which they have in most cases served not infrequently in the field, is very highly appreciated by the regiments themselves. The hon. Member is also doubtless aware that the paid Honorary Colonels are an expiring class.

FREE TRADE IN AFRICA.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the resolutions of the Brussels Conference, modifying the provisions of the Berlin Act regarding Free Trade in Africa, have come into force or will come into force at once, in the absence of an agreement of all the Powers parties to the Berlin Act?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Act provides that it shall come into force after all the ratifications shall have been deposited at Brussels. This must take place within a year at the latest. It is, consequently, not at present in force.

THE EX-SULTAN OF PERAK.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether any communication has been received from the ex-Sultan Abdullah of Perak, now detained in the Seychelles Islands, requesting that he may be allowed to visit England; and what objection the Colonial Office have to that course being adopted?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Such a communication has been received, but the Secretary of State considers that no advantage would be gained by a visit of the ex-Sultan to England; and that if he were permitted to do so, false hopes might be given to him as to any re-opening of his case.

SAVINGS BANKS—TRADES UNIONS DEPOSITS.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that in some 15 or 16 cases within a recent period Trade Unions, most of whom are registered under the Trade Union Acts, and all of whom have sick benefit, funeral allowance, and superannuation benefit, several of whom have accident benefit and out-of-work benefit, and some of whom have enjoyed, for from 20 to 26 years, the privilege of banking their moneys in the Post Office Savings Banks or in the Trustee Savings Banks, have been revoked, cancelled, withdrawn, or refused; whether it is part of the settled policy of Her Majesty's Government to revoke or cancel a privilege existing without challenge for over a quarter of a century, and confirmed within the tenure of office of the present Government; and whether he will explain to the House the reason or reasons for this new departure from a practice which has conferred and is conferring so many benefits upon the members of Trade Unions throughout the country?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The question of the hon. Member raises a very important issue. Let me, in the first instance, state the law with reference to deposits by Friendly Societies. The unusual privilege of depositing funds without limit of amount has been conceded by Act of Parliament to Friendly Societies registered under the Friendly Societies Act, but not to Trade Unions. The Postmaster General only has the power under the Savings Bank Act to accept funds from Provident or Charitable Societies not "legally established Friendly Societies" within the limits of £100 in one year, and £300 in all. Above these limits the consent of the National Debt Commissioners is required. Now, the question arises whether, by the insertion of rules which have sick or superannuation benefits, Trade Unions should be allowed to secure the privilege of depositing funds to an unlimited extent in the Government Savings Banks. Such an inclusion is, in my judgment, both contrary to law and to public policy; to law, because it is only to purely Provident or Charitable Societies that the privilege is extended; to public policy, because there is an illegitimate risk to the Public Exchequer in accepting as deposits an unlimited amount of strike money. The sudden withdrawal of such deposits might expose the State to the loss involved in selling stock at a time when the funds might be peculiarly depressed. While the number of applications were few, the Post Office closed its eyes, and to a certain extent so did the National Debt Commissioners. The Post Office was ready to accept deposits from any Society not flagrantly outside the legal definition. But as these applications multiplied, the matter came before me for decision, and I recognised the inexpediency of acting contrary to the letter and the spirit of the law. Hence, some applications have been refused. I believe the privilege has not been withdrawn from any branch of any Trade Union Society which has made deposits; but the acceptance of new deposits has been refused, and I am glad that the matter should receive attention. I have before now communicated with the hon. Member for West Nottingham on the subject, and I will communicate with the hon. Member who has put the question to-day if he wishes it. I am quite ready to accept some compromise by which a reasonable limit should be imposed, either of amount or by extending the period for notice of withdrawal, or by both. But I am not prepared to receive unlimited funds from the Trade Unions which might put the Exchequer in times of strike or commercial distress to any great disadvantage.

MR. HOWELL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the special branches to which I have called attention were registered as Friendly Societies in 1883, and is he aware that the Amalgamated Society of Painters and Decorators have more than 100 branches, and that they pay sick, funeral, accident, out of work, and other benefits? Does he not think that that fact brings it within the provisions of the Friendly Societies Act? May I ask whether the Operative Bricklayers' Society is not also included in the list of these Friendly Societies; whether it has not, for more than 25 years, deposited money in the Post Office Savings Bank; and whether it has not branches all over the country? [Cries of "Order!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: I am afraid that the hon. Member is exceeding the limits of a supplementary question. He had better put the question down on the Paper.

MR. HOWELL: I bow to your ruling, Sir; but it is a most important question, and I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will give it his most careful consideration.

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I quite appreciate the great difficulty in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be placed in being required, without notice, to answer in detail a number of questions of this kind, the particulars of which it is almost impossible he can be acquainted with at the moment. I entirely sympathise with the anxiety of my hon. Friend, but, at the same time, I think the spirit of the answer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to encourage us to believe that he will not grudge any amount of trouble which the careful consideration of the question will involve. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman to say, either now or at some future time, whether he has ascertained that the actual or probable amounts of the deposits from Trades Unions are such as to afford a ground for the serious and solid opinion that the withdrawal of those deposits at the time of a strike would cause public inconvenience? Looking at the vast importance—and, happily, the vast importance—of the Post Office Savings Banks I am afraid that I am extremely sceptical as to whether such inconvenience would actually arise.

Mr. GOSCHEN: I do not say that any public inconvenience has arisen, although, no doubt, there has been a wide extension of the deposits in the Post Office Savings Banks and the Trustees Savings Banks, and there has, occasionally, been a loss to the Exchequer. But the question is whether, if the Trades Unions funds were included, more serious inconveniences might not arise. My attention has been drawn to the rapidity with which the extension of the deposits has been made, but I think I have offered to meet the difficulty fairly by undertaking to make arrangements with the representatives of Trades Unions in regard to the meeting of all ordinary claims. If such an arrangement were made, we might be able to accept these funds, but only to such a limited extent as I have suggested.

Mr. HOWELL: I beg to give notice that upon the Vote for the National Debt Office I will call attention to the subject.

*Mr. BRADLAUGH: Is not the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Reports of the Friendly Societies Registrar show that the money utilised for purposes which seem to meet with his disapproval are in some cases kept separately? I refer to the distinguishment of Strike Fund from Benefit Fund.

Mr. GOSCHEN: I will inquire into that point. The only supplement I wish to make to the answer I have already given is, that there are £110,000,000 lying at call, and, although no insurmountable inconvenience might be occasioned by the Friendly Societies withdrawing the whole of their money in a time of pressure, there would, undoubtedly, be a certain amount of inconvenience; and that is why I suggest a limitation of the amount.

Mr. HOWELL: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that the Post Office Savings Bank Department has refused to accept the transfer of moneys deposited by the Trustees of the Camberwell Branch of the Amalgamated Society of Painters and Decorators with the Trustees of the Camberwell Savings Bank to the Post Office Savings Bank; and, if so, on what grounds the refusal is based; whether he is aware that the moneys aforesaid, amounting to £118 ls. 3d., were deposited in the Camberwell Savings Bank under the Friendly Societies' Clause, as a Friendly Society, and was entered as G 583 in the said Bank; whether the Amalgamated Society of Painters and Decorators is a Friendly Society within the meaning of the Act, and has been allowed, as such, to deposit its funds in Trustee or Post Office Savings Banks for many years, and has now deposited funds in the Post Office Savings Banks of the country; whether he is aware that this branch of the Amalgamated Society of Painters and Decorators is unable, by reason of the closing of the Camberwell Savings Bank and the refusal of the Post Office to accept the transfer of its funds, to make payments to its members for sickness, funeral, accident, out of work, and other benefits; and whether he will cause such transfer to be accepted without delay, in accordance with the existing law and practice in similar cases? The principal part of this question has already been announced, but I wish to have some further information in regard to the acceptance of the transfer of funds.

Mr. GOSCHEN: This is not a Society, as the question implies, registered under the Friendly Societies Act, but it is registered under the Trades Unions Act. With regard to the 4th paragraph of the question I will confer with the hon. Member and see whether an arrangement cannot be made to transfer this sum of £118. The hon. Member will see, however, that the Post Office Savings Banks Department is not the only Department that must be taken into consideration.

CHATHAM CONVICT PRISON.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with regard to the recommendation of the visitors of Her Majesty's Convict Prison at Chatham, contained in paragraph 149 of their Report, that Durbin, the compounder of medicines, should have his case re-considered when opportunity arises, whether Durbin had been degraded and removed to another prison on the Report of the Medical Officials of Chatham Prison; and, if he has been re-instated in his former position, is he now serving in Chatham Prison, and does he compound medicines for the treason-felony prisoners confined there; has the recommendation of the visitors, contained in paragraph 13 of the Report, in respect of the Scotch prisoners, been carried out, and have they been advised that they might have letters in lieu of visits when their friends could not visit them, by reason of the long distance they would be obliged to travel; and would he apply the suggestion of the visitors to other prisoners whose friends live in Ireland or America?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir. Compounder Durbin was reduced in rank and removed to Portsmouth Prison, but subsequent investigations having satisfied the Prison Directors that he was free from blame he has been re-instated, and will be employed as compounder at Dartmoor Prison, his place at Chatham being taken by the officer now employed at Dartmoor. The recommendation in paragraph 13 has been always the practice of the prison, and a special letter, in lieu of a visit, where relatives are distant, is always granted as a matter of course on application. The rule applies to prisoners whose relatives live in Ireland or America, as well as in Scotland.

Mr. Goschen

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Did not a further analysis prove that the original analysis was correct, and did it justify Durbin's re-instatement?

MR. MATTHEWS: The medicine was compounded from a store bottle and supplied to Daly, and there was no suspicion at the time that the contents had been improperly prepared.

GROWTH OF SUGAR BEET.

MR. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether his attention has been drawn to the suitability of large tracts of land in Great Britain and Ireland to the growth of sugar beet; whether he is aware that the necessary capital for promoting the establishment of such an industry would be immediately forthcoming upon the ratification of the Sugar Convention, and the consequent abolition of bounties; and whether, in view of the existing agricultural depression, and the fact that few crops would give so large a profit per acre and open up such extensive employment to the agricultural population as sugar beet, Her Majesty's Government would give the matter their serious consideration?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I believe there is no doubt that there are large tracts of land suitable to the growth of sugar beet in England and Ireland. Experiments have been made from time to time in both countries, and there is ground for believing that where the climate is suitable, especially in the southern parts of England and Ireland, it can be grown with success, provided the price is sufficiently remunerative. I apprehend that capital in this country would be always forthcoming to promote the establishment of any industry which offered reliable security for a remunerative interest. I have no special information as to capital being forthcoming in this case, and whether such security would be offered by the ratification of the Sugar Convention I am really unable to say. That is a question, I think, which can only be settled by experience. It is, however, a subject of great interest. I am endeavouring to make myself more fully informed than I am at present as to the conditions required for the successful cultivation of sugar beet in the United Kingdom; and my hon. Friend may be assured that anything which promises a successful opening for British agriculture will at all times command my serious attention.

THE CESSION OF THE GAMBIA.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the fact that when it was under consideration to cede the Gambia to France in 1870, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs made specific reservation that no cession of that territory could be made without the consent of Parliament, and subsequently alluded to the introduction of a Bill necessary for that purpose; and whether these circumstances were considered by Her Majesty's Government when they introduced the Bill for the cession of Heligoland?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes, Sir; the answer to both questions is in the affirmative.

BRITISH GUIANA—THE LATE MR. DE SOUZA.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, with reference to a Despatch from Lord Knutsford to Viscount Gormanston, then Governor of British Guiana, dated 4th September, 1889, which contained the following statements—

"I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Despatch, No. 282, of the 29th July, enclosing a letter from Sir D. Chalmers on the subject of the Appeal of the late Mr. De Souza to the Queen in Council. I consider that the payment of the fine of 500 dols. imposed on Mr. De Souza ought not to be enforced against his estate, and that notice of the decision not to enforce it should be given to his executors."

whether the Sir D. Chalmers therein referred to is the Chief Justice of the Colony who sentenced Mr. De Souza to fine and imprisonment, and against whose sentence the appeal above referred to was pending; whether the letter alleged to have been written by the said Sir D. Chalmers on the subject of the appeal in question was written while the appeal was still before the Privy Council, and while, therefore, the conduct of the said Sir D. Chalmers was under judicial investigation; what was the purport of such letter, and whether the Government will lay it upon the Table of the House; whether any representation was made on the part of Mr. De Souza's executors to have the fine remitted; on what ground did the Government interfere with the action of the Privy Council on the subject of such appeal; and whether, in view of the Constitutional importance of the questions involved in the case as bearing on the liberty of the subject and the freedom of the press, and the fact that the Judges still claim to exercise a power the legality of which is denied, he will cause a full inquiry to be made into the conduct of the Judges and the facts of the case?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Sir D. Chalmers, the writer of the letter quoted, is the Chief Justice who sentenced Mr. De Souza. His letter was written after Mr. De Souza's death, and at a time when it was open to his executors to apply for leave to proceed with his appeal. The letter conveyed a request that if an order for revival of the appeal were granted, appearance might be entered for the Attorney General, as representing the interest of the Crown in the appeal, as well as for the Judges, and gave reasons for this recommendation. No application was made, so far as the Secretary of State is aware, by Mr. De Souza's executors to have the fine remitted. The Government have not interfered with the action of the Privy Council on the subject of the appeal. The Secretary of State is not prepared to make the inquiry suggested by the hon. Member.

THE CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

MR. MC CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether among the 192 clerks employed at the Central Telegraph Office who are suspended from all benefits under the new scheme because they were off duty at 4 p.m. on the day when an officer temporarily employed at that office was hooted at, are clerks of 20 years' service and upwards; whether these clerks have severally proved that they had nothing to do with the matter referred to; and whether, when the inquiry now proceeding is finished, he will compensate these clerks for the withholding from them of moneys earned under the new scheme, and which is now received by all their colleagues?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): I have not yet received the Report of the result of the investigation which is being made, and I am not, therefore, in a position to announce what my decision will be when that investigation is concluded. I need not say that I shall be glad if the officers to whom the hon. Member refers are able to prove that they were not implicated in the occurrence. I have certainly no wish to withhold any of the benefits of the new scheme from any officer who was not concerned in the outrage to which the hon. Member refers.

MALTA.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Ecclesiastical Courts in Malta have been suppressed; and, if so, at what date and under what circumstances?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I do not know what Courts the hon. Member refers to without further inquiry in the island. That inquiry shall be made if the hon. Member desires it, but I really must ask him to give longer notice of questions of this nature.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he is aware of any case of a mixed marriage celebrated in Malta under licences from the Governor or from the Bishop of Gibraltar being declared invalid by the Maltese or English Courts on the ground that it was not celebrated according to the form prescribed by the decrees of the Council of Trent?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I am not aware of any such case; but as far back as 1865, and since, the practice in case of mixed marriages was to have the marriage solemnised either by the Roman Catholic priest alone or by both the Roman Catholic priest and the Protestant minister, but the celebration of such marriages before the Roman Catholic priest has always been deemed indispensable to give validity to such marriages.

THE WATERWAY OF THE THAMES

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether there is any law to restrain the occupation of the waterway of the Thames by advertisement boats, such as the one which is now moored opposite the terrace of this House?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Thames Conservators are the Authority having charge of the river. I am not aware of any law on the subject referred to in the hon. Member's question, but I will communicate with the Conservators on the matter.

WIDTH OF POST LETTERS.

MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, for the accommodation of the legal profession and the public generally, he will consider the desirability of extending the limit of width of post letters from 9 to 12 inches?

MR. RAIKES: I shall have no objection to consider whether the limit of width of post letters can properly be extended as suggested by the hon. Member, but I may say, generally, that bulky packets are not only inconvenient to deal with, but are much more liable to become damaged themselves, and to cause damage to other packets of moderate size, especially in mails, which are delivered from the trains by the Mail Bag Apparatus.

CONSTITUTION HILL.

MR. T. W. LEGH (Lancashire, S.W., Newton): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if he will consider the advisability of placing a quadriga or classical group upon the arch at Constitution Hill?

DR. TANNER: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question will he say whether he is prepared to put the obstruction now at Temple Bar upon Constitution Hill?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I think it is very desirable that the arch at Constitution Hill should be surmounted by a quadriga, but any artistic group worthy of such a position would cost a great deal of money, and I am not prepared at present to make such a demand upon the Treasury.

BECHUANALAND.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it is the fact that, by an Order in Council, the Governor of Bechuanaland has been empowered to proclaim the Queen's jurisdiction over the territory lying to the north, of Bechuanaland, west of the Transvaal and Matabeleland, east of the German Protectorate, and south of the Zambesi; whether this means the annexation of the Bechuana Protectorate; whether this territory is in future to be administered as a Crown Colony; and whether, in this event, the Crown will respect the rights of those who have obtained concessions from the Chiefs?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The answer to my hon. Friend's question is in the negative. If he will refer to the Foreign Jurisdiction Acts he will see that he has misapprehended the effect of the Order in Council. The Queen has certain powers and jurisdiction within the territories named, and the Order empowers the Governor of British Bechuanaland to give effect to those powers and jurisdiction by means of legislative proclamations. The primary object of this proceeding is to provide proper means of enforcing discipline in the Police Force.

NAVAL EXPERIMENTS.

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what steps have been taken to give practical effect to the information gained by the experiments carried on against H.M.S. Resistance; and has information been obtained by Her Majesty's Government relative to the experiments carried on at Toulon on the same lines as the Resistance experiments?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The Admiralty have given full consideration to the valuable results of the experiments made upon the Resistance, and have taken such steps as appear desirable, more especially as regards the defence of gun crews and the improvement of ammunition. It is not, however, desirable in the public interests that I should give particulars.

SLAVERY.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether slavery is recognised as a legal status in any British Protectorate?

SIR R. WEBSTER: Assuming slavery to be lawful according to the law of the country over which the Protectorate is assumed, it would be recognised as a legal status. But British subjects would, of course, be prohibited from dealing or trading in, purchasing, selling, or transferring slaves.

IRELAND—CASE OF MR. OWEN QUIN.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the case of Mr. Owen Quin, of Dorsey, County Armagh, who applied for compensation to the Castleblaney Board of Guardians, under the Animals Contagious Diseases Act, for the loss of a cow which had been shot by the police as infected with a contagious disease, and whose application was refused; and if the Authorities will consider the matter?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am informed that the Veterinary Inspector for the Board of Guardians pronounced the cow to be affected with rabies and ordered it to be slaughtered, and that the slaughter was carried out by the owner in the presence of the constabulary. There is no legal power to award compensation for the loss of animals affected with rabies.

USE OF GOVERNMENT BOATS AT EVICTIONS.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Irish Executive is bound to furnish Government boats, free of charge, to the Sheriff when going to carry out evictions on islands of the Irish Coast?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir. The object of providing Government boats in connection with the duty in question is the conveyance of the police party requisitioned by the Sheriff for his protection, and the conveyance of the Sheriff and his bailiffs in such boats is only permitted in cases where that course is absolutely necessary for the carrying out of the law. When such a course arises the Sheriff has to pay for the subsistence of himself and his bailiffs.

Mr. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that persons conveyed in Her Majesty's gunboats to the islands on the West Coast of Ireland have seized the boats belonging to the fishermen, which form their only means of obtaining a living? I wish to know whether that is not an illegal act, and what means will be taken to enable these poor people to pursue their ordinary avocations?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not acquainted with any such circumstance.

Mr. DILLON: The right hon. Gentleman says that boats have only been supplied for the purpose of carrying a necessary police escort for the protection of persons engaged in executing the law. Is it not the fact that in some cases they have carried also emergency men, and agents of the landlords? I wish to know if this is legal, and whether such persons ought not to be required to furnish their own means of transit?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe that when Sheriffs' officers and bailiffs have been taken they have paid their own expenses.

Mr. SEXTON: I think it is important that the seizure of the fishermen's boats, if illegal, should not be repeated, and I should like to know from the Attorney General for Ireland if it is not provided by enactment that wearing apparel, bedding, tools, and implements of trade, if they do not exceed £5 in value, shall not be liable to seizure? These boats were the implements of the trade of the fishermen, and was it legal to seize them?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I am not acquainted with the section of the Act referred to, but if the hon. Member will put a question on the Paper I will obtain the information.

Mr. SEXTON: I will repeat the question on Monday.

THE LURGAN POST OFFICE.

Mr. BLANE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether complaints have reached him that a postal order drawn in Edinburgh, No. 21,191, payable to Mary Ann M'Ilmurray, was intercepted in the Lurgan Post Office, County Armagh, and cashed with the signature of "Mary Ann M'Ilmurray"; and if the Lurgan postmaster made payment notwithstanding the different spelling in signature, will the Postal Authorities refund the amount to Mrs. M'Ilmurray?

Mr. RAIKES: A complaint reached the General Post Office some time ago that a postal order, which I have no doubt is that referred to by the hon. Member, had been lost in the post, and, although there was no blame whatever on the part of the postmaster at Lurgan in respect of the payment of the order, there were circumstances which seemed to justify the repayment of the amount to Mrs. M'Ilmurray as an act of grace, and it was so repaid some weeks ago.

ASSAULTING AN IRISH POLICE CONSTABLE.

Mr. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the prosecution of Mr. James Maye before Messrs. Longbourne and Hodder, Resident Magistrates, in Fermoy, on a charge of "having assaulted Constable Denis Lane in the execution of his duty, on 17th September, 1889;" and why was this prosecution brought after such a long time had elapsed?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that the proceedings were instituted on the 18th September, 1889, the day after the assault on the constable. The defendant was at the time under sentence of imprisonment on another charge. Upon his release from prison in April last the proceedings were gone on with, but in consequence of the illness of the constable, and subsequently of the defendant, the case was not finally disposed of until 28th July.

BALLYGORIANMORE SCHOOL.

Mr. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that three applications have been made to the Board of National Education in Ireland for a grant in favour of the school at Ballygorianmore, near Hilltown, County Down; and if he will state the grounds for refusing same; whether his attention has been called to a resolution unanimously adopted by the committee under the presidency of Rev. H. H. Moore, M.A., the Presbyterian minister, on the 22nd July, in which it is stated that the school fulfils all the conditions required by the rules of the Board for making such a grant; and whether he will inquire into the matter, with the view of redressing the grievance of which the Presbyterians of the district complain?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Commissioners of National Education report that this school had been in connection with the Board until the 31st December, 1886, from which date the grants were cancelled, the average attendance having fallen below the minimum required to warrant their continuance. Two applications appear to have been subsequently made for restoration of the grant, but, there being no evidence that the required attendance would be secured, and as it was strongly felt that there was no need for the school, there being within one mile of the place a school under a Presbyterian manager (the Rev. Dr. Wilson), with a Presbyterian teacher, and as the Commissioners' Inspector declined to recommend the aid, the Commissioners do not feel warranted in making a grant.

"SHADOWING."

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has seen the reports in the local papers that at Killeagh Fair, on 28th July, several Nationalist dealers were shadowed by police constables throughout the day, and also that Mr. Edward O'Brien, P.L.G., James O'Brien, and Charles O'Brien, were

"all day persistently followed by policemen, who pryed into their affairs, and rendered it difficult for those men to transact their business;"

and, if so, will instructions be issued by the Constabulary Authorities to policemen not to carry the practice of shadowing to the extent of interfering with the transactions of men engaged in business at fairs and markets in Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed by the Constabulary Authorities that on the occasion referred to three persons were watched by the police, but that not one of these persons was a dealer. They were James O'Brien, Charles O'Brien, and a man named Lynch, all of whom are known to the police to be employed in attempting to boycott the sale of cattle. Mr. Edward O'Brien, who, as a matter of fact, does not appear to have arrived until the fair was over, was not shadowed. The police did not in any way interfere so as to render difficult the transaction of any legitimate business.

MR. FLYNN: In a recent case did not the right hon. Gentleman promise that the constabulary should not shadow men who had business at a fair. In this case the men shadowed had business which was seriously interfered with. Will the right hon. Gentleman issue stringent orders to that effect?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The police will not interfere with any men who are legitimately carrying on lawful business.

MR. FLYNN: Unfortunately they do.

IRISH FISHERIES.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the last Report of the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries, where it is shown, at page 11, that, of the 62,952 mease of herrings captured along the Irish Coast during the year 1889, there were landed at Ardglass, Annalong, and Kilkeel, on the County Down Coast, 29,732, or nearly one-half of the total number captured; whether he is aware that Newcastle is situated between Kilkeel and Ardglass, and, though well adapted for a good fishing station, it has now no harbour accommodation; whether he has seen the Report of the Divisional Officer of Coastguards (page 41), in which he states—

"At Newcastle there are the ruined remains of a harbour, at present almost useless, which might at a moderate expenditure be made useful for fishermen and others;"

And whether, considering the Report of this officer, and that Newcastle is situated at the very centre of the Irish herring fishery district, he will consider the desirability of providing harbour accommodation, to enable the fishermen of the district to follow and develop the fishing industry there with some degree of safety to their lives?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I have seen the report referred to, but I think, as far as I can judge, it indicates that the line which it is proposed should be made to Ardglass will, perhaps, tap the traffic better than to any other point; but I am afraid I cannot hold out any hope as to the expenditure of money for the proposed Newcastle line.

MR. McCARTAN: The reply of the right hon. Gentleman does not touch the real point at all.

*MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member is aware that I visited Newcastle, and went into the whole question whether I ought to recommend any expenditure of the public money in connection with the harbour. I came to the conclusion that I could not, and I am afraid that I cannot depart from that decision.

MR. McCARTAN: Were there any local Representatives to meet the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. JACKSON: I think I can depend upon my own power of seeing what was necessary in the case.

MR. JAMES WALSH.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is true that Mr. James Walsh was arrested, in Queenstown, on the 20th June last, confined in the police cells for the greater part of the day, and then sent as a prisoner to Cork; whether it is true the prison officials refused to receive him from the police, who then set him at liberty; who is responsible for the arrest; and whether an inquiry will be made into the circumstances of the case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that the man was not confined in the police cells at all, and was only detained in the barracks about 10 minutes. He was then sent to Cork, and the prison officials refusing to receive him he was discharged. The ground of the refusal appears to have been that the warrant outstanding against him in respect of a fine did not contain an alternative term of imprisonment. The arrest was made by Sergeant Shea in the belief that the warrant, as is usual in such cases, contained that alternative. The man absconded when the warrant was originally issued in December last.

DR. TANNER: How long was Mr. Walsh under arrest?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot answer that question, but he was apparently detained only for a few minutes.

DR. TANNER: Was he not arrested in the morning and not taken before a Magistrate until the afternoon?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I gather from the information I have received that that is not correct. He was only detained for 10 minutes.

KILMALLOCK ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.

MR. FINUCANE (Limerick, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the County Limerick Grand Jury, at the last Assizes, rejected a presentment for laying down with ferrumite a footway to the Roman Catholic Church of Kilmallock, against the unanimous wish of the ratepayers of the barony, as expressed at two Road Sessions; and whether, in view of the fact that the Grand Jury consists of 23 men, mostly landlords, nominated by the High Sheriff, who do not pay more than 5 per cent. of the county cess, the Government will consider the advisability of introducing a Bill to take away from the Grand Jury the power of stopping the construction of useful and necessary works?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no official information on the subject of this question, which does not come under the cognizance of the Irish Government, but the Secretary to the Grand Jury informs me that the presentment referred to was rejected by the Grand Jury, not because it led to the Roman Catholic Chapel at Kilmallock, but because the cost of a ferrumite footpath would mean a tax of 4½d. in the £1 on the valuation of the barony of Kilmallock. It was proposed by the cesspayers at Road Sessions to levy half the expense on the county at large, and members of the Grand Jury from other baronies objected to have it so levied. The Grand Jury was quite willing to agree to a flagged footpath, and so intimated before rejecting the application for ferrumite.

THE ROYAL IRISH FUSILIERS.

MR. BLANE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, during the training of the 3rd battalion of the Royal Irish Fusiliers, at Holywood, two Catholic bandmen were required every Sunday to play in the regimental band to and from the Protestant Episcopal Church, at the very time that the Catholic service for the soldiers was taking place, and were thus prevented from being present at their own place of worship; and whether, in view of the fact that the Catholics in the battalion outnumber any of the other religious denominations, and largely contribute to the profits of the canteen, which bears most of the expenses of the regimental band, it can be arranged that the Catholics of the regiment may have the band to their church on alternate Sundays?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am unable to answer the question of the hon. Member at present. I must ask him to put it down for another day.

MR. BLANE: I will repeat it on this day week.

EX-CONSTABLE PETER BRENNAN.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether ex-Constable Peter Brennan, late of the Royal Irish Constabulary, who was convicted by a Coroner's Jury of "wilful murder," has been allowed or encouraged to retire from the police, and granted a pension of £72 per annum; and whether Brennan, having failed in business as a publican in Kinsale, has been recently employed as a bailiff by the Sheriff for the County of Cork?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I only received notice of this question this morning. I must ask the hon. Member to defer it until Monday.

DR. TANNER: I will repeat it tomorrow.

IRISH MODEL SCHOOLS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what was the proportion of local support to the total expenditure in Irish model schools for the year ending 31st March, 1889; what was the corresponding figure for all other Irish national schools; and can he state what objection the Government have to local support for national schools in Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Commissioners of National Education report that, for the year ended March 31, 1889, their total expenditure in respect to model schools was £27,358, and the total local aid (including school fees and rates in contributory unions) in support of model schools was £6,766. Their total expenditure in respect to ordinary national schools was £701,220, and the total local aid in support of ordinary national schools was £188,218. The above figures do not include expenditure by Board of Public Works on ordinary national schools or model schools. The Commissioners, far from having an objection to local support for national schools, have laid down in their rules that applicants for a grant to build a school must satisfy the Board that they—

"Are prepared to raise by local contribution at least one-third of the whole sum which the Commissioners may deem necessary for the erection of the house, and providing furniture; and that when the school comes into operation, adequate local aid will be provided in augmentation of the teachers' emoluments from the Board."

THE PORTUGUESE IN AFRICA—
SEIZURE OF THE JAMES STEVENSON.

In reply to Mr. BUCHANAN,

SIR J. FERGUSSON said: A report was received from Her Majesty's Consul at Mozambique that an African Lakes Company's steamer had been seized, and the officers and crew sent under arrest to Quilimane. He immediately communicated the report to the Governor General, who assured him that any interference with British subjects north of the Rio would be severely censured. Her Majesty's Minister at Lisbon has been instructed to make an urgent representation to the Portuguese Government, who have sent orders by telegraph to Mozambique to punish with severity those who have been guilty of infraction of orders. The officer who is said to have made the seizure had, previously to these events, been removed from command.

FINANCIAL RELATIONS OF THE THREE KINGDOMS.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he intends to take for the appointment of the Select Committee on the financial relations of the three Kingdoms?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have taken steps in the direction of finding persons who might have influence with gentlemen who have put down Amendments to withdraw them, and then the Committee could be appointed. But the Government cannot put off the discussion of Supply, even for so interesting a subject. Perhaps the hon. Member can use his influence to induce gentlemen to withdraw their Amendments.

MR. SEXTON: I have no control over hon. Members.

MR. GOSCHEN: Nor have I.

MR. SEXTON: But the right hon. Gentleman has control over the time of the House.

GLASGOW CEMETERIES.

Return ordered—

"Showing (1) names and situations of Cemeteries situated within the present municipal boundaries of Glasgow, or within a distance of three miles thereof, excluding burial grounds closed permanently by order of the Sheriff in May, 1870; (2) distances from Glasgow Cross; (3) the number of dwelling-houses within 100 yards of walls of each Cemetery; (4) where the drainage of each Cemetery is led to; (5) the nature of the subsoil, whether clayey, sand, loam, or otherwise; (6) name of owner or Company drawing revenue; (7) extent of each ground; (8) the date of the first interment in each; (9) for each of the years 1887, 1888, and 1889, the number of bodies buried in each class of grave known as (a) private lairs, (b) dressed ground, (c) common ground, and (d) parochial ground; (10) the average depth and surface space allowed for each selected or private grave; (11) the average depth and surface space of each common grave and the unoccupied space left between each common grave; (12) the average number of bodies buried in each common grave, including bodies of children, stating also the highest and lowest individual case; (13) the total charge made by the proprietor of the Cemetery for an interment in common ground; and (14) whether bodies are removed after burial from common to private ground upon the relatives paying an additional sum, if so, how many bodies have been so transferred."—(Dr. Cameron.)

RATES (LIVERPOOL AND CERTAIN OTHER MUNICIPAL BOROUGHES).

Return ordered—

"Showing the rate in the pound of all Rates, other than Water and Gas Rates, or Rates for private improvement works, levied in the Municipal Boroughs of Liverpool, Birmingham, Manchester, Leeds, Sheffield, Bristol, Nottingham, Bradford, Salford, Kingston-upon-Hull, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, West Ham, Portsmouth, and Leicester, in each of the years ended Lady Day, 1870, 1880, and 1890."—(Mr. Lewis Fry.)

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

CHILDREN'S LIFE INSURANCE BILL.

That they do communicate Copy of Report, &c., of the Select Committee, appointed by their Lordships in the present Session of Parliament, on the Children's Life Insurance Bill, as desired by this House.

MOTION.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (SATURDAY SITTING).

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Sitting of the House to-morrow be subject to the Rules in force regulating the Sitting of the House on Wednesday."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

In answer to Mr. SEXTON,

* (4.25.) MR. W. H. SMITH said: If the business with regard to Nos. 1 and 2 on the Paper and the Report of Supply are concluded to-night, the substantial business to-morrow will be the Police Bill and the Police (Scot'and) Bill.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I protest against taking the Police Bill on Saturday. It is a Bill which affects all the constituencies, a Bill which neither the House nor the country has had an opportunity of understanding—[Cries of "Agreed!"]—a Bill which, in my opinion, is of such a wide character, and involves the interests of so many constituencies, that it ought not to be taken at a Saturday Sitting.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not in order in discussing a measure which is to be brought on upon another day.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: May I ask whether we cannot shorten the rest of the Session. If the Government will only let the House clearly know what is the minimum with which they will be satisfied, so that Members may know precisely where they are placed, the business would go on with considerable alacrity.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The House has already been informed on the subject. I said that it would be necessary to pass the Local Taxation Bill, the Police Bill, the Irish Census Bill — ["No."] — I think Members from Ireland generally desire to see it passed, as well as the Census Bills for England and Scotland — the Public Works Loans Bill, and the Savings Banks Bill, which, I believe, there is only one Member opposed to in this House — [Mr. STOREY: That is not so] — I have endeavoured to ascertain, and I believe the hon. Member is the only opponent. It may require that we should sit a day or two longer, but the Government think it right to persevere with a measure which, as I stated yesterday, is for the protection of the working classes. These are the measures which the Government think it necessary to proceed with, and having stated that twice, three times, or four times already, I think I am not unreasonable in asking that we may be allowed to proceed with the business without undue delay.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I assure the right hon. Gentleman that I know from personal contact with Gentlemen not only on this, but on the other side of the House, that there are very considerable objections to the Savings Banks Bill. ["No."] If instead of adding burdens to the Savings Banks the right hon. Gentleman would give additional powers for receiving money, he would have no difficulty in passing the Bill. As one connected with Savings Banks for 25 years, I can say that the Bill in its present shape is absolutely useless.

*MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I should like to urge the claims of the Registration of Titles Bill and the Registration of Assurances Bill, which would be of the greatest value in connection with the Land Purchase Bill.

MR. DILLON: Great discussion may arise on the Registration of Titles Bill, and unless the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to give ample time for such discussion it would be better to postpone the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): Although the general principles of the Local Registration of Titles Bill, and the Bill dealing with the Registry of Deeds, have been accepted by Members on both sides of the House, I fully recognise that these measures raise important questions of detail. It would be unreasonable to expect that time should be given for them during the present Session, but I propose to introduce them at the very earliest period next Session.

In answer to Mr. HUNTER (Aberdeen, S.),

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute) said: The Report of the Select Committee on the Scotch Police Bill will be circulated immediately, but not with the documents which were to form appendices. These will be circulated as soon as possible.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): May I ask when Scotch Supply will be taken. A number of Members have been compelled to remain in town on account of it. If we could only get a pledge that Scotch Supply would not be considered while Scotch Members are away there would not be much trouble. The Irish Estimates have been taken some time ago, and Irish Members have not troubled the House since.

MR. SPEAKER: The question before the House is not Scotch Supply, but that the sitting to-morrow be subject to the rules regulating the sitting of the House on Wednesday.

Question put, and agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

RESERVE FORCES BILL.—(No. 272.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [4th July], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

(4.31.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): May I ask for some explanation of the 2nd clause? I do think the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill should make some explanatory statement, however brief. It appears to me ridiculous to enlist men, and then immediately transfer them to the Reserve without first giving them some suitable training.

(4.31.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I wish to ask whether the War Office Authorities have considered the legal effect of the Bill in respect of the men who, intending only to be Volunteers, have enlisted in the Army, and who are liable to be sent on foreign service or to be ordered out of their own districts?

* (4.32.) MR. E. STANHOPE: The hon. Member for Mid-Cork has evidently forgotten that he made the same request before, and that I have explained the object of the Bill to him. It is desired in a case of emergency to have the services of certain telegraph, postal, and railway men, and it is found to be the cheapest way to draw them from the Volunteers. One object of the Bill is to enable these men to be employed abroad if necessary in case of emergency.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL.—(No. 404.)

Bill, as amended, considered.

Clause 1.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Sub-section ii.—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section ii. stand part of the Clause."

(4.35.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I wish a Motion had been made to re-commit the Bill in order that we might briefly discuss the entire re-construction of this Bill which is now going to take place on the Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I have no wish to delay the House by any unnecessary remarks, but I rise for the purpose of making a final, if an unavailing, protest against what I consider to be the disastrous finance which this clause will now give effect to as altered by the present Amendment. We are no doubt dealing with the last stage of the Bill, and I should like to call attention to the fact that this is the 25th night on which the House has been discussing the financial arrangements of the present year. There is no precedent for this in modern times—at any rate, since the repeal of the Corn Laws. The House has been sitting between 110 and 120 days up to this evening; and, therefore, one-fourth of the time of the House of Commons has been consumed in discussing what now turn out to be practically abortive financial proposals. But much more important than this is the principle which the Chancellor of the Exchequer is now asking the House of Commons to put its seal of approval upon, and this is the enormous additional subvention proposed to be given to the Local Authorities. I have been looking into the figures as they now stand regarding this question. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer has amended this Bill, there will be added for the purpose of local subvention £1,300,000; yet the Chancellor of the Exchequer, only two years ago, said that, so far as the Government were concerned, they had shown their whole hand, and they had no further proposals to make. But within two and a half years from the time the right hon. Gentleman made that statement he proposes to take £1,300,000 from what I may call essentially Imperial taxation in order to place it in the hands of the Local Authorities.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must remind the right hon. Gentleman that the House is not now discussing the principle of the Bill. He is really delivering a Second Reading speech.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Of course, Sir, I at once bow to your ruling. I only wish to submit that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is now proposing to add £350,000 to the general subvention of the Local Authorities; and I object to that, because I consider that the Local Authorities have already too much. This £350,000 will make the total sum granted this year in aid of local taxation over £9,000,000. I have no wish to deal further with the general question, but I entertain a most strong opinion that these large local subventions are not justified by the state of local finance; they are premiums upon mismanagement and extravagance; and they revive the old system of subventions in its worst form, because they make the Local Authorities practically reckless as to how the money is spent. In raising a protest against this enormous additional subvention, I wish to say that arrangements of this kind cannot be regarded as binding, and we shall claim for ourselves the right to re-consider this question when the proper time arrives.

Question put, and negatived.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 20, after the word "shall," to insert the words "until Parliament otherwise determine."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

(4.40.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby):

I do not know whether we are to expect any answer from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but I do submit that the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman deserve some notice. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has refrained from answering the speech of my right hon. Friend. We had some discussion on these words when they were proposed to be inserted by the right hon. Gentleman in the clause applicable to Scotland. What is meant by inserting these words? The Chancellor of the Exchequer must have some special object in introducing them. What is it? Do the words apply to the additional duty on beer, or do they not? The other day the right hon. Gentleman told us the object was to impart a flavour of uncertainty. But the whole financial policy of the right hon. Gentleman this year has had such a flavour of uncertainty, that I think it is a work of supererogation to introduce these words. The right hon. Gentleman was good enough to give me credit for having sufficient acuteness to understand the meaning, but I confess I am not entitled to that credit, for I have unsuccessfully endeavoured to define the meaning of introducing the words. In his original Budget the right hon. Gentleman held out a curious hope to the brewers. He said he had half promised to take off the additional tax on beer, and he would fulfil that promise, but he intended to put it on again, and give them the benefit of the proceeds. He did so, but now he has struck out the clause which was to secure the benefit to the brewers. Now, I again ask, do these words apply to the Beer Duty or the extra Spirit Duty? I think we are entitled to hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the uncertainty which these words point to—in short, what is the intention of inserting them?

(4.45.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The right hon. Gentleman began his observations with a complaint that I had not answered the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton. I am free to be criticised in many things, but I am seldom criticised for not being ready to take up a challenge that is thrown down. I did not rise to answer the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton, because I understood I could not do so without offending against order. The whole of the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman seemed to be directed against the Bill generally, and I could not reply to them without being out of order, otherwise I should have longed to be able to comment on the astounding charge against the Government that this Bill has been discussed for 25 days. I should have liked to refer to some of the minute points which were discussed for hours and hours with a most fearful waste of the time of the House. I shall be called to order by the Speaker if I pursue that topic. In reply to the right hon. Member for Derby I have to say that I have twice dealt with this matter—once in the case of Scotland, and once in the case of Ireland. In the case of Scotland the right hon. Gentleman misunderstood me, and in the case of Ireland he did not hear me at all. The right hon. Gentleman asks, Why are the words introduced here? The answer is that the residue is in a different position now from what it was, and my anxiety has been that Parliament shall not give an absolutely permanent character to the sum which has become available through the dropping of the licensing clauses. The right hon. Gentleman made merry over the phrase used by me, "the flavour of uncertainty"; what I meant was that the Local Authorities should have notice that there is, in the language of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton, a prospect of revision as regards that particular sum. It seems to me right that the question should be left open whether there shall be any revision of the additional taxes imposed in consequence of the dropping of a portion of the scheme. That is the object with which the words have been inserted, and I think it more candid to the Local Authorities and to the House generally that such notice should be given.

(4.50.) MR. A. ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): Will the right hon. Gentleman accept the word "unless" instead of "until"?

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes; I do not think it much matters.

Question put, and agreed to.

(4.51.) MR. A. ACLAND: In moving the Amendment which stands in my name, I will endeavour to be as brief as possible. The right hon. Gentleman has put down an Amendment which meets the wishes of the people of Wales, and he has done the same for Ireland. The Members for Scotland have to some extent fought out their case. In the case of England, if the Bill passes in its present form it will not contain a word about the definite appropriation of the money for educational purposes. There is nothing beyond the right hon. Gentleman's intimation that by and by some new charges may be thrown on the County Councils in connection with intermediate and technical education. I wish to get rid of some of that uncertainty. While Scotland and Ireland get each a large share of the money set free by the dropping of the licensing proposals, England, if the Bill stand as now, will secure nothing at all, whereas, supposing that England gets the same share as Scotland, she will have nearly £2,000,000, if the same share as Ireland nearly £1,000,000, and if the same share as Wales will assuredly get about £750,000. I think we are putting the cart before the horse. We ought to get free education, but first we must have our District Councils; we ought to have uniform School Boards, and we ought to have a well organised elementary system. Scotland, no doubt, has gone the right way to put the horse before the cart by securing free education first, and when we get our money out of the Exchequer for free education for England, Scotland will put in a claim for another £250,000. It will be impossible to withhold it, and then she can complete her system of secondary and intermediate education. I think the adoption of my Amendment will be a step in the right direction. The local Universities of England have been pleading for grants of money for many years; the Chancellor of the Exchequer has met them with £15,000. The agricultural interest has again and again cried out for assistance towards dairy schools and agricultural teaching; the amount the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been able to give has been £5,000, although Prussia, the population of which is not so great as the United Kingdom, gives ten times that amount for agricultural education alone. But these sums are perfectly trifling as compared with the amount which the House is compelled to deal with by a kind of side-wind, and which it is now proposed shall disappear into the great river of rates, never perhaps to appear on the surface again. I propose that the money shall be applied under the Technical Instruction Act of last year, and though the machinery of that Act is not the best for the purpose, it is better than none at all. Already some of our large towns have made grants in aid of this education. Manchester has given £4,000 and Bolton £2,000, and nobody can doubt that assistance from the Government would be greatly valued. I have added to my Amendment that the remainder of the moiety, which is not applied, may be an educational endowment within the meaning of the Endowed Schools Act, because I believe that technical education is no good unless based upon a sound general education, and we shall not get a good general secondary education in England until we set to work, as we are now doing in Wales, and establish a network of good, cheap, secondary schools throughout the whole country. The Endowed Schools Commissioners 20 years ago said that even after they had dealt with the whole re-organisation of endowments the work was only begun, and that what was necessary was a systematic provision for secondary instruction. Since then, however, we have never taken a step towards re-organising our secondary education. I may be told that under the Endowed Schools Act this cannot be done at all, but I hold that our experience in Wales shows that it can be done. Our Committees in Wales are largely composed of members of County Councils, and I imagine that the Vice President of the Council and the Chairman of the Endowed Schools Commissioners will not deny that under the existing Endowed Schools Act schemes could be worked out which would develop secondary education in a very excellent way in England. I know it is said that the Charity Commissioners are unpopular, but in my experience they have acted in a cordial spirit of co-operation with popular bodies like our Committees. The reason they have been unpopular is because they have interfered with local endowments, but when they are following popular bodies, and not leading, but trying to assist and help, there is no reason why they should not occupy the position of friendly advisers. I lay stress upon that part of my Amendment which has reference to the complete organisation of intermediate education, because I know the admirable work which has been done in Wales. It will be a great misfortune if the opportunity that now presents itself is not taken advantage of; for if the question is not taken in hand, other business in future Sessions may postpone its settlement indefinitely. Scotland and Wales and Ireland are far better off than England in respect of secondary education, and the consequence is, that this country is being invaded by clever Scotchmen, Welshmen, and Irishmen, in ever-increasing numbers. The hon. Member for Roxburghshire the other day made an allusion to the moderate invasion of English Members into Scotland. Well, I imagine that if we in this country were to raise a cry of England for the English, and drive out all the Scotchmen who hold important positions of all kinds here, we should return on the hands of the hon. Member and his friends a great many men whom they do not wish to see back again, but who are doing extremely valuable work. As to the question of shifting the burden of the rates and so forth—as if it were the alpha and omega of the progress of the working classes—no doubt a great deal has been done; but if all the dogmas of the Radicals were realised, there would still remain a great deal to be done in the way of elevating the working classes after they have received all the advantages which can be received from elementary education. That the great dock strike last year was conducted so quietly and successfully was mainly due to the fact that the leaders were educated men, capable of studying and understanding economical and industrial questions. It would be well to have thousands more such men. Let the House, therefore, make provision for their education. In England we are in this position: that the wealthy people, who are largely represented in this House, and who are able to send their sons to the great public schools, do not care much about middle-class education. Then we have the elementary schools, which carry on a useful work; but there is a large middle region which we do not hear much about, which is of the utmost importance, untouched, and it is for the purpose of helping to fill up that gap that I move my Amendment. I admit that the machinery I suggest—namely, some scheme under the Endowed Schools Act and the Technical Instruction Act—is not the best I could desire, but, at the same time, I believe that by these means much good may be done to the working and the middle classes.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 20, at the end of Clause 1, to insert the words—

“The council of any such county or county borough may contribute any sum received by such council in respect of the residue under this section, not exceeding a moiety of the residue or any part of that moiety, for the purposes of technical (including agricultural and commercial) education within the meaning of ‘The Technical Instruction Act, 1889,’ and may make that contribution over and above any sum that may be raised by rate under that Act.

The remainder of the said moiety, which shall not be applied within the meaning of ‘The Technical Instruction Act, 1889,’ may be an educational endowment within the meaning of the Endowed Schools Acts, and the County Council shall be the governing body of the endowment within the meaning of those Acts.”—(Mr. Arthur Acland.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

(5.17.) MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member rested his case upon two grounds, one the desirableness of spending this money on intermediate education, as compared with relieving the rates, and the other a contrast between the educational advantages of this country and those of Scotland and Ireland and Wales. Well, I would point out that if, in educational matters, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland are, in some respects, better off than England, this country certainly has the advantage of having greater endowments. In the course of the proceedings on this Bill the hon. Gentleman proposed a somewhat similar Amendment to this. He was anxious that a sum should be absolutely set aside and spent in all cases upon technical education; but he proposes now an Amendment of a much more moderate nature. If the County Councils choose to employ a moiety of the increased resources which are placed at their disposal towards technical, including agricultural and commercial education, within the meaning of the Technical Instruction Act of 1889, the Government certainly will not wish to place any fetters whatever on their taking such action, and accordingly we shall be prepared to accept the first portion of the Amendment—namely, that the County Councils or the County Boroughs may contribute in respect of the moiety of the residue towards technical, agricultural, or commercial education. The Government are quite as much aware as hon. Members opposite of the desire which is springing up in the country with regard both to technical and agricultural education. The hon. Member speaks of the desirability of assisting agricultural schools. Many hon. Friends of my own behind me have pleaded in the same direction, and have been anxious that the sum placed at the disposal of the authorities for establishing agricultural schools should be increased. Then the hon. Member suggested that a portion of the money should be devoted to intermediate education, and he drew a contrast between intermediate and technical education, suggesting that much progress could not be made with technical education without intermediate education. The Technical Instruction Act defines technical instruction as including instruction in the branches of science and art, in respect of which grants are, for the time being, made by the Department of Science and Art, and any other form of instruction, including modern languages and commercial and agricultural subjects, which may, from time to time, be sanctioned by that Department. But we have not got schools organised for the purpose, and that is why I object to the other part of the Amendment. We have an Intermediate Education Act for Wales which, I believe, is operating very beneficially, but we have not worked out such an Act for this country, nor is there any organised system of intermediate education in England. How can the County Councils, with these optional powers, some of them working on one principle and some on another, bring forward an organised system of intermediate education for the country? By passing the first part of the Amendment we do not preclude subsequent consideration of a portion of this money going to intermediate education, and the hon.

Mr. Goschen

Gentleman need not fear that funds for that purpose will be found when an organised plan is established. I should have no objection, on principle, to the second part of the Amendment; but having carefully considered the way in which this money will be employed, under the terms of the Amendment, without any general organised system, I cannot undertake to accept that portion of the Amendment. I would ask that we should treat the two parts of the Amendment separately, unless the hon. Member, after the readiness I have shown to adopt his views as regards the first part, feels disposed to withdraw the second. The first part runs on all fours with the Amendment I have myself put on the Paper with regard to Wales, and I should be glad if we had a uniform system, as far as possible, in England and Wales as regards technical education.

(5.23.) Mr. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): We have all heard with satisfaction of the readiness of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to accept a part of the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham. I regret that the right hon. Gentleman does not see his way to accept the whole, and I do not think there are those difficulties with respect to organisation which the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to foreshadow. Why should it not be possible for the Endowed School Commissioners, upon application from the County Councils, to prepare a scheme for intermediate education as well as for any other subject? In a former Debate on the subject two years ago the Leader of the House promised that what was done for Scotland in respect of intermediate education, and every branch of education, should be done for England. In Scotland the ordinary schools are not called elementary, but public, schools, and the Government make grants in all these schools for Latin, Greek, Mathematics, and other subjects, which are in themselves part of the curriculum of intermediate education, for which no corresponding grant is made in England. It is the fact that large numbers of the youth of Scotland go from the parochial and public schools direct to the Universities. I am rejoiced that that is so. But why should England be deprived of these advantages? The whole of the higher schools of Scotland are under the control of the School Board, and they receive grants from the rates for what they call the common fund. I do not say the intermediate education of Scotland is all that Scotchmen desire. They are anxious to have it improved, and they are improving it at an enormous rate, and, as compared with England, they are at an enormous advantage. I doubt whether, according to its population, England has as many endowments as Scotland. The Universities of England have great endowments, but not for intermediate education. Under the Endowed Schools Commission Act of 1883 all the endowments of Scotland have undergone revision, and on the governing bodies of the endowed schools in Scotland there is some public representation. We have nothing corresponding to that in England. Why is it that England should be placed in this disadvantageous position as compared with Scotland? I would ask the First Lord of the Treasury when will he fulfil his promise, made more than two years ago, with respect to intermediate education. The whole of the intermediate and endowed schools in Scotland are examined by examiners appointed by the Scotch Educational Department, and attached to every school there are "leaving certificates," which admit the scholars to a great variety of educational advantages. We have nothing corresponding to that in England. We have no public examinations at the expense of the State, as in Scotland. Now, supposing the first part of the Resolution is to be accepted there are certain words which should be omitted—I mean the words "not exceeding a certain moiety of the residue." These words must undoubtedly come out, so that it would apply to technical, commercial, and agricultural education.

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The hon. Member says that if not the whole of the moiety then that a portion of it shall be used.

MR. MUNDELLA: If you take the second proposal, and strike out these words, then you could apply the whole of it to technical, commercial, and agricultural schools. I want to point out to the right hon. Gentleman the importance of adopting the second part of the Resolution.

Nobody knows better than the First Lord of the Treasury the great inequality of endowments in this country. He knows that there are some localities which are positively enriched by endowments, and others in which they have no endowments whatever. But suppose the County Council had power to apply part of the residue to intermediate education, how largely they might extend it. In our large towns, with their rapid growth, it would be an enormous boon if they could have some aid, some beginning of intermediate education. And my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham has pointed out that small State aid is an enormous stimulus for the Local Authority. It always evokes and develops a large amount of local effort. It has already done so in Wales in respect to technical education. With respect to the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that we have no organised intermediate education in England, I must take exception to that. There is scarcely a town in England where the Charity Commissioners have not framed schemes of intermediate education. Why, if there are a thousand or two a year to be devoted to intermediate education, should not the Charity Commissioners enlarge these schemes, and place some members of the County Councils on the governing bodies, and so give increased utility and increased representation at the same time? I do hope that the Government will not, in this respect, place us in a worse position than Scotland, Wales, and Ireland. At present we do not get a farthing grant; but here is the first opportunity the Government have had of rendering some service, and helping forward the work of intermediate education, the great desideratum of the present time. The Government have accepted the first part of my hon. Friend's proposal. I do trust that they will accept the remainder, and that we shall be able to make a start in the way of helping ourselves with intermediate education.

*(5.35.) SIR W. HART DYKE: I would like to say one or two words in no contentious spirit. I am perfectly ready to admit that in England we are somewhat at a disadvantage with respect to intermediate education. The greater portion of the speech of the hon. Member for Rotherham was directed, and fairly, to showing that there was such a deficiency, and it was essentially a speech in favour of an Intermediate Education Act for England. I wish to mention one or two reasons which ought to make the House satisfied with the way in which Her Majesty's Government have met this Amendment. Here is a sum of money to be disposed of. At first the Chancellor of the Exchequer said it would be used for education, and then the hon. Member for Rotherham suggests that it may be applied to technical and intermediate education. Now, I am anxious that we should not accept the second portion of this Amendment, because there is a distinction between it and the first. About the first proposal there is this excellent characteristic, that the machinery is ready to hand. Considering how slow people are to move in matters of education, it is obviously of great advantage to have the machinery ready to hand. What is happening with regard to our Technical Instruction Act? It is at work, and it has been taken up warmly in most of our large industrial centres, Manchester, Sheffield, Burnley, Rochdale, Stockport, Macclesfield, Maidstone, Rotherham, Wakefield, Bingley, Bolton, Nottingham, Leeds, Newcastle, Blackburn, Reading, and many other places, where Committees have been at work some time to bring it into active operation. I am now merely pleading for the best use that can be made to-day of this money. All this is going on already with regard to secondary education and technical instruction, and why, therefore, should we not have this money applied swiftly? What is the initial difficulty? The initial difficulty is getting a lump sum for building purposes. Most of these localities will face the rate necessary for the maintenance of an institution, but they will not undertake the initial expenditure which is required to obtain a building. Now, this sum of money will precisely fit into the groove, precisely fill up the gap, and furnish to these localities the amount of the initial expenditure which I think can be most usefully and beneficially applied. I am willing to concede that it is possible to frame an Intermediate Education Act for England, as has been done in Wales, and no man in this House would be more ready to avail himself of time and opportunity to do so than myself. But if this money were to be applied as suggested by the second portion of the Amendment, and if it were handed over to the County Councils, there would be absolutely no machinery whatever. In the case of the Welsh Act, Committees were appointed, composed of three representatives of the County Council, and two members nominated by the Lord President of the Council—gentlemen connected with the county selected for their educational standing and position. But, in the present instance, I do not think it would be fair to hand this money to the County Councils without their having that machinery which the Welsh Education Act supplied. It is because there is this want of machinery, that I am unable, without further consideration, to assent to what would be virtually the introduction by a side wind of an Intermediate Education Act for England.

MR. MUNDELLA: I am afraid there is some misunderstanding. What is the difference between the machinery for the first part of the Amendment, and the machinery for the second?

*(5.45.) SIR W. HART DYKE: The County Council has no machinery, except under the Technical Instruction Act in connection with the Science and Art Department.

SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): Mr. Speaker, a short time ago the House appointed a Select Committee upon endowed schools, and I had the honour to be Chairman of that Committee, and my right hon. Friend was a Member of it. He will remember the great difficulty we had in examining how endowed schools could be made of greater use to the public, because these endowed schools had no means of getting properly equipped. They were proceeding very much on the old lines—Latin and Greek and general education, but they had no support for scientific education. Now, I am very grateful to the Government for having adopted the first part of the Amendment, but the second part is also of very great importance, and if my right hon. Friend will only recollect the recommendations as to the endowed schools he must himself admit what important measures might be brought under this Amendment. In the first place you have taken great trouble to establish endowed schools throughout the country, but you leave them entirely unconnected with any Local Authority, except Local Boards, to manage them, and without any knowledge on the part of this House as to whether they are failures or successes. Now, this Amendment offers you an organisation. The County Council may move the Charity Commissioners, with the funds at their disposal, to equip these schools and make them suitable for scientific instruction. It may enable them to provide funds out of which the teachers of science might be paid, and it might, in this way, re-organise the schools throughout the country, and produce the greatest results upon secondary education throughout the country, in the way of meeting modern requirements for scientific teaching. Without money they cannot do this. They have no funds to equip laboratories and workshops, and it is better to leave science alone if it is to be mere book-learning. Here you have an admirable opportunity for authorising the County Councils to act along with the Charity Commissioners, with a view to satisfying the strong wishes in the country for scientific teaching. There is nothing in this proposal that would prejudice the Government in the future in bringing in a Bill for intermediate education. The Government have gone half way very liberally, and I thank them very much for adopting the first half of the Amendment. But they will confer a benefit on the country if they adopt also the second half. They would enable the Charity Commissioners, with the assistance of the County Councils, to equip those schools, and they would make a large stride towards intermediate education.

(5.55.) MR. HERBERT GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I am sure all who sit on this side of the House must congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham on the success which has attended his efforts in the direction of education, and especially for having given the right hon. Gentleman, who professes to be the friend of the agriculturist, the opportunity of sweeping away the shame of having given only £5,000 towards agricultural education, while smaller countries, like Sweden, have been able to devote a much larger sum to that object. I regret that the Government have not found it possible to accept the second part of my hon. Friend's Amendment. It has been said that it is impossible to carry out the idea; but the two right hon. Gentlemen below me, who both have been Vice Presidents of the Council, say that it is quite possible to carry out this scheme. I rise for the purpose of asking my right hon. Friend to leave out the words "not exceeding the moiety of the residue, or any part of that moiety," so that the whole of the residue might be taken for this very desirable object. That course has already been adopted in Wales, where the residue has been practically devoted to technical education. For my part, I do not see why the whole of this sum should not be utilised.

*(6.0.) SIR WALTER BARTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman has accepted the first part of the Amendment, because I believe that nothing is required more than technical education in this country. We have been lamentably behind many other countries with regard to that. We give a good education in our schools, but at the same time we ought to impart that which will enable the boy to get his living in the future. One word more before I speak of the second portion of the Amendment. I think anyone who knows the country districts well, will recognise the difficulty of getting children living at long distances to attend in all weathers. I must say I was sorry to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield condemn my county, and I think he most unfairly and unjustly overstated the case when he said it was one of the most backward counties in England, and that it was a perfect disgrace.

MR. MUNDELLA: Perhaps my hon. Friend will allow me to say that what I said was that in a large portion of the rural districts Standard IV. was the standard of full time, and I complained that, whether in Sussex or elsewhere, it was a discredit.

*MR. W. BARTELOT: I do not want, after what the right hon. Gentleman has said, to go into that matter more fully, but it was said in regard to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer living in Sussex. We have got so good an education in our rural schools that a large number of the farmers are sending their children to them, because there are scarcely any good intermediate schools. I think it is a discredit that we have not better intermediate schools, and I hope my right hon. Friend will be able to see his way to having intermediate education extended throughout the country.

(6.5.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I think we ought to acknowledge the manner in which the Government have met the Amendment of my hon. Friend. If the Government do not wish to accept the whole of it, I do not think he could, after the discussion which has taken place, carry the controversy any further. I will show what can be done under the first part of the Amendment. In the Technical Instruction Act, the interpretation clause states that technical instruction shall mean instruction in science and art, applicable to industries, including modern languages, and commercial and agricultural subjects, which may for the time being be sanctioned by the Department. That, really, covers a great part of what we mean by technical education. I hope that intermediate education will not be neglected in the future. I gather, from what the Vice President has said, that was a subject the Government viewed with favour, and were willing at an early period to make provision for. That being so, if my hon. Friend takes my advice he will be content with the acceptance of the first part of this Amendment.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The right hon. Gentleman is mistaken. The hon. Member in his Amendment only speaks of one moiety, but I understand he suggests that if the whole moiety is not applied to the first part of his Amendment, then that a portion of it should be applied to the second portion of his Amendment.

SIR W. HARCOURT: This clause is permissive, and I do not see what is the use of the retention of these words. The County Council would be able to judge whether less or more—probably it would be less—than the moiety was required, and, therefore, I do not see the necessity of introducing these words at all. You can leave absolute freedom to the County

Sir W. Barttelot

Council to use as much or as little as they please of the moiety. The only disadvantage that we may expect by not taking the second part of the Amendment is, that the County Council may appropriate all the rest of the money in a manner that would exclude intermediate education in the future, when the machinery was created. I hope that may not be so, and that the County Council, especially in boroughs where the larger demand for this kind of school would arise, would keep their hands upon a sufficient sum of money to be used in future when the machinery was devised.

MR. A. ACLAND: I beg to withdraw the second part of the Amendment, and I beg to suggest that with regard to the moiety, the second part might be made to read the same as the Welsh Clause.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): The Vice President has mentioned the difficulty with regard to the initial expense of instituting technical instruction. His remark was well founded, and suggests a reason for not limiting too strictly the powers of the County Council. It might well be that more than the moiety was spent on these initial expenses, and, therefore, there seems to be ground for letting the County Councils, in some cases, spend more than the moiety.

MR. GOSCHEN: I am not indisposed to assent to the omission of the words as to the moiety, as the matter rests entirely with the County Council.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): A little alteration is wanted. If these words were struck out, power would be given to the County Council to contribute only the moiety of the residue. You will have to insert the words "or any part thereof."

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): Any sum going to a borough might impair the authority of that borough, and so cause jealousy because of the interference of the County Council.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have an Amendment to add to the present Amendment which will meet that objection.

*(6.12.) SIR HENRY ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I am anxious to say how gratified I am at the acceptance by the Government of the first part of my hon. Friend's Amendment. To the great centres of industries, where the work of technical education is already in progress, it will be of great importance. The money will be available in large centres of industry, not only for assisting existing institutions, but for aiding the establishment of new ones. Where the Act is not already in operation the Amendment will be of great benefit by placing money at the disposal of the County Councils, by giving a start to the adoption of the Act. The Committee, which was presided over by the hon. Baronet the Member for the Wells Division, pointed out how important it was that in the rural districts money should be available for this purpose. We all know that farmers are inclined to complain, but it is a new thing that they should attribute a great deal of what may be called their misfortune to their having had no technical education. Therefore, both in large industrial centres and in agricultural districts, we may look forward to the money now to be applied being productive of a great deal of good. I regret, with most Members interested in education, that the second part of the Amendment has not been accepted by the Government, although I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby that really the scope of the technical instruction which can be given under the Act includes a great deal of what is classified as intermediate education. In the City of London the subject, which has not yet come under the County Council, is one of vast importance, and we may hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London, who is Chairman of the County Council, and who takes a deep interest in all educational matters, will see that this great Metropolis takes advantage of the Act, as our great provincial industrial centres certainly will.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, at end of Clause, add—

"The Council of any such county or county borough may contribute any sum received by such council in respect of the residue under this section, or any part of that sum, for the purposes of technical (including agricultural and commercial) education within the meaning of the Technical Instruction Act, 1889, and may make that contribution over and above any sum that may be raised by rate under that Act."—(Mr. Arthur Acland.)

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

(6.17.) MR. RITCHIE: I understand that hon. Gentlemen who represent boroughs in counties are very anxious that power should be conferred upon the County Council to pay any money which they may contribute towards technical education to the governing authority of a town or urban district instead of to the schools in those areas. Therefore, I propose—

"That the County Council may make any such contribution by giving the amount thereof to any Council or Urban Sanitary Authority in their county for the purpose of the same being applied by such Council or Authority under the Technical Instruction Act, 1889, over and above any sum raised by rate by such Council or Authority."

Question put, "That those words be there added."

MR. COURTNEY: I think those words would only enable the County Council to make one contribution to one authority.

MR. SAMUELSON (Gloucester, Forest of Dean): I was going to point out that the words appear to mean that the contribution shall be made only where a rate has been raised.

MR. RITCHIE: I think it will meet the objection of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney) if I insert the words "the amount, or any part of the amount."

MR. SAMUELSON: The point I put was that the contribution might be regarded as necessarily one in aid.

MR. RITCHIE: I do not think that would be so. This is "over and above" the amount raised by rate. It does not imply that they must raise a rate.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I confess it seems to me that is so. I do not know whether it is the intention of the Government.

MR. RITCHIE: No.

SIR W. HARCOURT: That is the meaning of the words "may contribute in addition to the sum which the Council give." You can only give when a sum has been already raised. I am afraid that has been already done under the first part of the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham. I read it that there must be a sum raised by the rate; and, unless something had been raised by the rate, there could be nothing "over and above" that.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It can be altered in another place.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): It is important that it should not be made to depend on the raising of a rate. I know some places where the Local Authorities would be extremely slow to levy a rate, perhaps not for many years, and I hope the County Council will be enabled to make the grant without that condition.

*MR. RITCHIE: I hope the House will allow the Amendment to be put in this form—

"The County Council may make any such contribution by giving such amount or any part of that amount to any Council or Urban Sanitary Authority in that county for the purpose of the sum being applied by such Council or Authority under the Technical Instruction Act, 1889, over and above any sum which can be raised by rate by such Council or Authority."

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. COURTNEY: I am afraid that my objection still applies to the first part, that as the words now run they confine the contribution to one contribution.

*MR. RITCHIE: I will take care to see that it is set right.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 29, at end, add—

"The Council for any county to which the Welsh Intermediate Education Act, 1889, applies may contribute any sum received by such Council under this section in respect of the said residue or any part of that sum towards intermediate and technical education under that Act, in addition to the amount which the Council can under that Act contribute for such education."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): As already has been said by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Intermediate Education Act has worked exceedingly well in Wales, though in the poorer districts difficulty has been experienced in obtaining the necessary funds. That difficulty will now be got over now this money is to be provided. But I would point out to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in connection with the Beer and Spirit Duty, that Wales does not get her fair proportion. The population of England is 27,000,000, and of Wales and Monmouth 1,700,000. The sum which England gets is £709,000, and Wales £34,000—or England gets 6½d. and Wales 4½d.—a very considerable difference, considering the smallness of the sum. Wales really ought to get £44,000.

Question put, and agreed to.

(6.23.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): Mr. Speaker, I cannot help expressing a sanguine hope and expectation that the Government, having treated in so conciliatory a spirit the claims of England and Wales, will now proceed to regard our claims in the same favourable light. We have to bear in mind the very extraordinary indications of Scotch political and parliamentary feeling which the divisions taken in Committee disclosed. On two main propositions in opposition to the scheme of the Government we find, in one case, the Amendment supported by 42 to 14 of Scotch Members, and in the other by 44 to 11. We can hardly, therefore, be supposed unduly obstinate or persistent if we take this opportunity of inviting the House and the Government to reconsider the situation. The hon. Member for Roxburghshire scouted the idea that the vote of the majority of Scotch Members ought to be regarded, and I am not saying for one moment that Irish and English Members ought to bow to that majority. That would be simply absurd, but I do think that some deference ought to be paid to such a remarkable expression of opinion. Now, the Amendment which I am going to move places the issue between us in a very straight way. On the one hand it is relief of the rates, and on the other free education. I will content myself by saying, in regard to the relief of the rates, that there are four objections to which that disposition of this money is open. In the first place, the money will be handed over to the authorities as a vague kind of subsidy with no guarantee for its economical administration. Then, the relief of rates has not been asked for by the people of Scotland. My hon. Friend brought forward again the other day his old friend the blacksmith, and he said that the abolition of fees in primary schools would be a good thing in large towns, but was there nothing to be done for the relief of small rate-payers? What I would point out to my hon. Friend is this, that he greatly exaggerates the benefit to be conferred on the blacksmiths. My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen showed that the money to be given, if divided, would only be 3d. in the year in the greater part of the constituencies, and 6d. in others, and the amount of money given in the counties would be larger than in the boroughs. But I suppose the blacksmith is subject to the ordinary incidents of human life, and that he has his share of children, and in that respect there is no comparison between the benefit conferred by the proposal of the Government and the one I support by my Amendment. My last objection to the proposal is that the great bulk of the money will go in all probability to the owners of the soil, and not to the occupiers. We must recognise the undoubted feeling of the Scotch people in favour of education. They are not possessed, as some others are, with any dread of over-education. They are not afraid of the children of the humbler classes being educated, as it is called, above their station. That, I believe, is at the bottom of a great deal of the resistance to the policy of free education which exists in England. But there is no trace of any such feeling among the great body of the Scotch people. We claim that primary education shall be free all along the line. The Chancellor of the Exchequer with some plausibility taunted us with lack of faith in the love of our countrymen for education. He says it is a poor compliment to pay them to say they will be deterred by the imposition of a fee from having their children educated in the higher standards. If it is said that the Scotch people, since they value education so highly, will not be deterred from continuing their children at school by the imposition of a fee, I reply that that is no argument for adding to the temptation by imposing a fee. We ought, I say, to encourage the idea that the same moral obligation rests upon the parent to send his children to school in the voluntary as in the compulsory standards. The latter standards represent merely the minimum of education which is regarded as necessary in the interests of society. But the best answer to that argument is to be found in the Report of the Scotch Education Department for this year, which complains of the very evil which the Scotch Members wish to remedy, namely, that the attendance becomes irregular the moment the voluntary or higher standards are reached. In 1888 there were 61,612 scholars in Standard V., but in 1889 there were only 28,939 in the higher standards. Now, the Scotch Members wish to remove the discouragement to parents against keeping their children at school when they reach the higher standards, by getting rid of the fees now charged. I have in my hand a letter received by my right hon. Friend the Member for Berwickshire, which puts our case very clearly. The writer, Mr. W. Alexander, head master of Loith Walk Public School, the largest Board school in Edinburgh, says that, during the past two years, the average attendance in that school has been 1,472, and the grants earned £1,543 in one year and £1,545 in the other. He continues—

“The Board do not pay us on result, but give all the teachers a fixed salary. I mention this to show that there is no self-interest in our wishing to have the upper standards made free. In my school I have 120 pupils in Standard V., and 80 in Examination 6. My experience this year has been that these standards have melted away, and will continue to disintegrate, in the course of the year, much more than in former years, and solely because no sooner do the children pass out of Standard V. than a fee is charged. Freeing the compulsory standards, a good thing in itself, has, indirectly, done harm. It has created in the minds of most parents the idea that their children have got a complete education in those standards, whereas they have only got the bare necessities of the elements of education. The Sixth Standard and Examination 6 are the crowning of the whole. The freeing of the compulsory standards has created a gap which did not exist before, but which the freeing of the voluntary standards would have filled up and restored to the former status quo. The people are greatly governed by habit, and in money matters more than in most things, and this habit of paying nothing until the Sixth Standard is reached has made them indifferent to keeping the child any longer at school. The argument that the Scotch people have always valued education so much that they are willing to pay for it, is not to the point here. The conditions have been altered, and with the new condition of things, new habits are formed. Will it not be possible, even yet, to carry this proposal on Report? This is the critical year. If the Government can be got to yield, the tendency to withdraw scholars from the higher standards will be checked in time, but if it goes on the difficulty will be all the greater when the concession is made afterwards."

This letter leaves nothing more to be said on the subject; it gives the views of a man thoroughly conversant with the practical working of the educational system. There is still another point in which this sudden interposition of a fee works harm. Under an Act passed in 1883, no child under 13 years of age can be employed in a factory or workshop. Now, there is scarcely any half-time employment in Scotland, so what occurs? Take, first, the case of a clever boy. By the time he is 10 years of age, he passes the Fifth Standard, and from that until he is 13 years old he cannot go to work, so he must either remain idle or his father must pay the fees in the higher standards. But the stupid boy who can never get beyond the Fifth Standard can remain at the school free of expense until he is 13 years old. Surely this is an inducement upon parents to keep back the education of their children. The interposition of a fee just when the child is beginning to derive the greatest benefit from education has a most evil effect from an educational point of view. The remission of the fee would, at the same time, give a large pecuniary relief to the great body of hardly-pressed working people; and on these grounds I hope it is not too late to hope that the Government will re-consider the matter. They must know that the great majority of the Scotch people are in favour of what we are asking.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 1, to leave out the words "a sum not exceeding 40," and insert the words "the sum of 90."—(Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'a sum not exceeding 40' stand part of the Bill."

(6.45.)* MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): I took but little part in the discussion when the education question was being debated in Committee, because I thought the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Advocate had very fully answered the objections made to the Government proposals on this side of the House. But now, Sir, that the question has been again raised, I crave the indulgence of the House while I endeavour to state as briefly as possible the reasons why I prefer the Government proposal and why I cannot support the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stirling Burghs. We have heard very frequently in this Debate that the people of Scotland are very much in favour of education. I entirely agree with that sentiment. We are also told that they are very much in favour, not only of freeing compulsory education, but that they think the burden of education, instead of devolving to some extent on the parents as hitherto, should be entirely paid for out of taxation, either local or Imperial. Some Members have gone so far as to say that the people of Scotland are hostile to the idea of fees being paid by wealthy parents able and willing to pay. I do not profess to speak for the people of Scotland, but I may be allowed to indicate my views on the state of public opinion in that country. I have not seen in the public prints reports of meetings and discussions such as justify the statements of some hon. Members as to what public opinion there is. I think the people of Scotland are prepared to accept the principle that the fees for education in the compulsory standards should be paid out of taxation, but I do not think they are prepared to accept without further discussion and consideration the principle that the fees in the High Schools of Scotland and in the Universities should also be paid out of taxation, either local or Imperial. That is the view which I understood the Member for Stirling Burghs enunciated.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I never said anything of the kind, nor did I say anything that could bear that interpretation.

*MR. BARCLAY: I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he and his Party were in favour of the widest diffusion of knowledge at the expense of the rates.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, not at the expense of the rates.

*MR. BARCLAY: Then the right hon. Gentleman was merely stating a platitude which hon. Members on both sides of the House are prepared to support. All the Members for Scotland are in favour of the widest diffusion of knowledge. The question which is at issue is whether that knowledge is to be paid for by the parents of the children, or whether it is to be paid for out of taxation, either local or Imperial. If the right hon. Gentleman will say he did not mean that it should be paid for out of taxation, I do not think there is any difference between us on the point.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I said nothing as to the payment out of the public money of fees, or of any other expenses in Universities, or in the case of middle-class education. I was dealing only with the fees for primary education, and I referred in my speech to the extraordinary zeal always shown by the Scotch people for the widest diffusion of knowledge, as showing that they would have no jealousy of the extension of primary education to any length we chose to go.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: For primary education, certainly.

*MR. BARCLAY: Now, there are 21 schools in my county giving primary education to the fullest extent without payment of fees, and with the additional grant proposed to be handed over, I fully believe that the whole of the schools in that county will be able to give free education. I will now deal with the proposal of the Government. During last Session a sum of £250,000 was voted for the reduction of school fees in Scotland, the method of distribution being left to be decided by the Scotch Education Department. That Department came to the conclusion that the money should be divided by means of a uniform Capitation Grant on the average school attendance. I do not see how it could have been proceeded with on different lines without inflicting great injustice on many districts. My hon. Friend the Member for North Aberdeen, who has devoted so much valuable attention to this question, asserts that the high fees which are charged in some districts are due to the action of the School Boards in saving the rates; and that those bodies, instead of levying a fair amount of rates upon the ratepayers, have chosen to exact very high school fees, and thus saved the rates. I believe the mode of distribution adopted by the Department was universally approved in Scotland and by this House. What is the new proposal the Government is now making? They find that the sum of £283,000 would, taking Scotland as a whole, pay the fees in all the compulsory standards. That is about £40,000 beyond what was previously voted, and they now propose to make this further grant of £40,000 to provide for the payment of fees in the compulsory standards. They have also undertaken to lay on the Table of the House a Minute of the Scotch Education Department providing that the money shall be distributed in the same way as the previous grant. What will be the result? In my own constituency I find that in the School Board schools there are 21 schools in which no fees whatever are charged. Our portion of the additional grant of £40,000 will be sufficient to increase the Capitation Grant to about 11s. per head, and that sum I believe will be adequate to abolish school fees in all the schools. Therefore, we have no more to ask to have free education in Forfarshire. In addition to that, my constituency will now receive a share of the £50,000 which is to be applied in reduction of the rates. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Stirling Burghs that the people of Scotland are very tolerant of taxation, that they are willing to pay when they see there is good reason for the payment, and that the money is economically and judiciously expended. But it has always been the characteristic of the people of Scotland that they have strong ideas of economy. I cannot believe that they have now lost those ideas, and that they will not avail themselves with satisfaction of this assistance which it is proposed to give in aid of local taxation. Turning now to the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs, my right hon. Friend has referred to the Education Statistics, and has found that the total amount paid in school fees in Scotland is between £330,000 and £340,000. He says that if the Government, instead of giving the £50,000 in relief of local taxation, will hand it over for educational purposes it will be ample to give free education to Scotland, and to abolish fees altogether. But if the right hon. Gentleman is going to abolish school fees with this sum he must do it on a different principle from that which has been adopted in the distribution of money by the Education Department.

He cannot abolish school fees and distribute this money in the form of a uniform Capitation Grant. He must distribute it amongst the School Boards in proportion to the fees previously exacted. The sum at his disposition would be equal to an average Capitation Grant of 13s. But 13s. would not suffice to pay the high fees exacted in some places, such as in Glasgow, for example, where they amount to 17s. 6d. or 18s. per head. The right hon. Gentleman would have to reverse the policy of the Education Department, or the sum he would want to entirely abolish fees would amount to £450,000, instead of £340,000. He has to level up School Boards from almost nothing per scholar to 18s. He must distribute a sum of money equal to this to poor schools, before he can abolish school fees in Scotland on the principle adopted by the Education Department. In my own constituency there are 21 schools which are already without any fees, and I fully expect the additional £40,000 now voted will raise the Capitation Grant to 11s., and will enable the whole of the fees in my constituency to be abolished. But, according to the right hon. Gentleman, my constituency would receive no further amount of money; it would all go to the large constituencies, such as Glasgow and Edinburgh. The problem to solve is, how the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) is going to abolish school fees throughout Scotland with this money, on the principle which has been adopted by the Education Department. I know, in my own constituency, the result would be we should get no portion of this £50,000, but it would be devoted to other parts of Scotland, in order that high school fees might be abolished. So far as my own constituency is concerned, it would deprive them of any share of this £50,000, giving it to Glasgow and Edinburgh. For these reasons I do submit that any proposal, to divide the money according to fees exacted by School Boards, which is the only way it appears to me the right hon. Gentleman can carry out his object of abolishing school fees, would be a great injustice to those parts of the country which have levied high rates and kept down fees. These are some of the reasons which induce me to prefer the proposal of the Government. My constituents, under this proposal, will have full payment of school fees, and they will have, in addition, a share in the reduction of local rates out of this £50,000. If the right hon. Gentleman can continue these benefits, and, at the same time, abolish payment of fees in Glasgow and Edinburgh, I have no objection. I shall have much pleasure in supporting the proposal of the Government.

*(7.15.) MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): Certainly, the last Division shows that the House is not unfavourably inclined to the views of Scotch Members, and I cannot help hoping that even yet, at the last moment, the Government will not persist in the disastrous course of treating Scotland in a way altogether different from the other parts of the United Kingdom, paying no regard to the advice of her Representatives as regards the application of her share of the funds. The Government have, I think, given Scotch Members some reason to complain that after the careful speech, no one can say it was a Party speech, in which my right hon. Friend went into the educational part of the question, the Government sat in silence and allowed a Division to be taken. My right hon. Friend dealt ably with practical details, quoting opinions of experts, and I do think, under the circumstances, for the Front Bench to treat his arguments with absolute silence and contempt is—well, a course of conduct it is not easy properly to describe. I shall detain the House but a few minutes with the Amendment I now have to propose. It is perfectly simple, and I wish the House to understand how the case lies. Last year we voted £240,000 for application in Scotland to the reduction of fees, and there was a difference in two respects from the arrangement of this year; one was that School Boards were left in the position of being residuary legatees instead of being left a definite sum. The other difference is, there was no attempt made, in either the Act of Parliament or the Minute of the Education Department, which applied that Act, to run counter to the feeling in Scotland by drawing a mischievous distinction between compulsory standards and voluntary standards in the same school. It is not much to ask that we should have our £40,000 not clogged with a condition which we say, on educational grounds, is mischievous in Scotland. I hope the House will agree to omit the words, and leave the money in the same position as the money voted last year. It is the less concession because, upon the Lord Advocate's own showing, there are only 98 schools in all Scotland where the compulsory standards are not now free. Therefore, there is this sum of £40,000 going to Scotland, and going to be distributed, as it was last year, throughout all the districts, including 3,000 schools, in which compulsory standard fees no longer exist. And yet we are to say it is only for the compulsory standards. It is most illusory that an Act of Parliament should be passed for devoting £40,000 to the compulsory standard fees, and yet we are told there are only 98 schools where the abolition has not been carried out. If the money were to go to these 98 schools, it would be an extravagant grant of £400 or more to each. But that is not what is proposed, the distribution is to be made in proportion to average attendance. For instance, in Forfar, to which the last speaker has referred, the effect will simply be that the money will go to the schools according to the number of children, and be applied as the managers think fit in improving the educational arrangements, in raising the masters' salaries, or in reducing the school rate. We are told, indeed, that these words are, in fact, inoperative. With these words in, or leaving them out, we are told, on the high authority of the legal adviser of the Government for Scotland, it will be perfectly competent and legal for a School Board to take their full share nominally for the compulsory standards, and so pass on the money they derive from the Probate Duty and from the rates to relieve the voluntary standards. Therefore, it is not a question of substance; it is a question of form, but it is misleading to the people of Scotland to put such words into the Bill, and it is the more vexatious as there are no such words in the Act of last year. I hope the Government will have the grace to make this small concession to us.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 1, to leave out the words "of children in the compulsory standards of the Scotch Code."—(Mr. Charles Parker.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

(7.23.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I rise, not to argue this question, because the Government are not here to argue the question at all. During all the time that I have been in Parliament I have never seen a piece of more unexampled insolence. ["Order, order!"] unexampled insolence—

MR. W. H. SMITH: I rise to order, Sir. I ask you, Sir, whether the right hon. Gentleman is entitled to use that term in this House?

MR. SPEAKER: Insolence is a word which I do not think should be employed. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not insist on the use of the word.

SIR W. HARCOURT: It is quite enough for me, Sir, that you should suggest that I should not use that word, but I will say that a method of more unexampled contempt exhibited towards opponents I have never known in Parliament. There was a speech made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Stirling Burghs which deserved an answer. It was a speech of a conciliatory character; it was following up a conciliatory Debate upon the English and Welsh Clauses; it was an appeal to the Government to act in the same spirit towards Scotland as towards England and Wales, and the Government stood by and treated it with contempt. Yes, and that spirit of contempt is approved. We are quite ready to take it up, but do not you talk to us of obstruction, when that is the spirit in which the Government act! Have we been obstructing your business to-day? Have we not been assisting you to come to an honourable and favourable settlement with the people of England and Wales? And this is the manner in which you meet us! It is a spirit of contempt to this House, as well as to your opponents. It is a spirit of contempt exhibited towards the majority of the people of Scotland, and you were punished as you deserved to be punished by the fact that in the Division you could not command one quarter of your normal majority. If that is the manner in which you choose to treat a matter of this description, all I can say is that you will be encountered by a vehement and obstinate resistance; and a Government which chooses to handle the House of Commons in that way deserves any amount of opposition that we can offer to it.

*(7.27.) MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, I think the House has never listened to a more extraordinary performance than that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, and he has at times indulged in extraordinary language in this House. He has charged us with having treated the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs with contempt.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: Not me; I make no complaint.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No; if the right hon. Gentleman had made any complaint he would not certainly have indulged in such language.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN: The right hon. Gentleman imputes things to me. I make no complaint personally as to the way in which I was treated myself, but I join completely and heartily with my right hon. Friend.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is not in accordance with the right hon. Gentleman's usual courteous habit in this House to associate himself with such language as the right hon. Gentleman has seen fit to employ. Now, Sir, what are the facts of the case? We listened attentively to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. It was a temperate and a moderate speech. It conveyed a large amount of information to the House, and it was treated with respect on this side of the House. The hon. Member for Forfarshire got up and made a reasoned answer to that speech. I will not say that if there had not been cries of "Divide" from the Opposition side of the House, it would not have been reasonable for the Government to give an answer to the right hon. Gentleman's speech. But the House must remember that for three days we have been discussing these questions in Committee. We have answered speech for speech with the greatest respect for hon. Gentlemen, and especially the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby himself. He cannot say that he and the Scotch Members, and the arguments advanced by them, have not been treated with respect. It is true that we have not yielded to them, because we did not think it right to do so; but now we are charged with contempt, simply because at the last, when we had reason to believe that there was a strong desire on the part of the House to go to a Division, we do not repeat the arguments and statements of fact which we advanced during three nights in the Committee. If that is contempt, all I can say is, that I express the greatest regret for being guilty of it. I thought to save the time of the House, and I certainly desired to be respectful to the House; and I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman, when he returns to a cool state of mind, will feel that an exhibition such as we have had this afternoon is not calculated to raise the reputation of the House of Commons or insure for him a happier course in the responsible position which he holds on that Bench.

(7.30.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down does not, I think, see the real gravity of the situation which so affects hon. Members on this side of the House. The right hon. Gentleman has not followed the Debate quite closely enough or he would have seen that my right hon. Friend the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) brought forward new matter of the very gravest importance. The most important point of all these Debates has been this: whether or not by making the compulsory standards free, and leaving the voluntary standards still to pay, you will not afford an excuse to parents to withdraw their children when they come to that point in their education where real education begins—when they have passed through the compulsory standards. The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied that there is no such danger, and that confidence ought to be placed in the Scotch parents, amongst whom there is such a feeling in favour of education that they are quite sure not to withdraw their children on account of the fees. Since the former discussions two things have happened. The Government have themselves published a Report which states that since the fees have been abolished in the lower standards children have been sent earlier to school. The deduction from that is necessarily this: that if you retain the fees for the higher standards, the children will be withdrawn earlier from school. But a much more important thing than that has happened, which I hope will be allowed to weigh with the Government even at the eleventh hour. The best new point was the letter which my right hon. Friend read from a schoolmaster in one of the greatest schools in Edinburgh, one of the most eminent practical educationalists in Scotland. That great authority earnestly entreates Parliament and the Government to change their policy, because already the most fatal effects are occurring from the withdrawal of children from the higher standards, and because he is satisfied that, if the matter is not mended within the next year, the very gravest results will occur to Scotch education. That is the gist of the whole question we have been discussing for the last three nights. The Scottish people understand the matter thoroughly. They understand it far better than the hon. Gentlemen who come in to vote when the Division bell rings, but who were not sitting in the House during my right hon. Friend's speech. During that speech the Benches opposite were almost empty, and I am quite certain that unless that letter in which our whole case is stated is answered the result will give as much dissatisfaction to the people of Scotland as it will be fatal and ruinous to all that is characteristic in Scottish education.

(7.35.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I am one of those who found it my duty to go against the Government in the last Division; but though that is the case, I must say that in the Lobby I heard distinct statements that it was the desire of those opposed to the Government on the Opposition side of the House to have an early Division, and I think that entirely corroborates the statement of the leader of the House that it was courtesy to those who opposed the Government to at once—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I am bound to say that the particular Amendment before the House is being lost sight of, and I hope the hon. Gentleman will not pursue the subject further. A particular statement has been made and answered, and I think the House ought now to pursue the particular matter of the Amendment.

MR. SINCLAIR: I will do so, Sir. I think the answer to the Member for Bridgeton is this: It is in the knowledge of the House that the whole question of education in relation to Scotland will have to be re-considered by the Government. When that takes place, the amount now devoted to Scottish education will be necessarily released from its present particular allotment, and then we may fairly claim that the Government will see that the desire of the people of Scotland to have all the standards free shall be given effect to.

*(7.40.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (MR. M. T. STORMONTH DARLING, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): The precise Amendment under the consideration of the House is whether the words "in the compulsory standards of the Scotch Code" are to remain or are to be omitted, and that Amendment must be viewed, in my opinion, in connection with the decision the House arrived at a few minutes ago, which was that the sum to be allotted for the purpose in view shall be £40,000. That being so, the only practical question is not whether more can be done for free education than is proposed by the Government, but whether the retention of the words "in the compulsory standards of the Scotch Code" can possibly do any harm. It was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division that an important new fact has arisen in the shape of the Annual Report of the Scottish Education Department, but the right hon. Gentleman can hardly have noticed that the Report deals with the period before free education was introduced in Scotland. It only comes down to September, 1889.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN: I think the Solicitor General is mistaken. [The right hon. Gentleman handed a copy of the Report across the Table.]

*MR. M. T. STORMONTH DARLING (after examining the extract): It may be that I have made a mistake, and, if so, I am sorry that I have made it; but the statistics in the Report only come down to the date I have mentioned, and therefore nothing is actually known of the working of free education. Accordingly, it is too soon to dogmatise as to the results of that change. But the right hon. Gentleman referred to a letter from an educational authority in Leith. I should have thought, looking at the right hon. Gentleman to whom it was addressed, that the writer was not altogether unacquainted with political subjects, and that impression was confirmed by the fact that the writer seemed to be correctly informed as to the rules of Parliamentary procedure, because he refers to the Report stage of this Bill. I have no doubt that the views of the writer of the letter reflect a certain apprehension in the minds of some teachers that the imposition of fees beyond the compulsory standards may have the effect of discouraging attendance beyond the compulsory standards; but it is too soon to judge of that, and again I would ask the House to come back to the real question—Will the retention of those words do any possible harm to education? Last year a grant of £250,000 was confessedly made for the purpose solely of freeing the compulsory standards; and when the Minute of the Education Department came to be framed, it was framed not on the footing of dictating to the School Boards what they were to do, but of merely making it a condition of the receipt of the money that they should free the first three standards and provide a certain number of free places in the Fourth and Fifth Standards. That is exactly what will be done in the new Minute; that is to say, the new Minute will do nothing more than require as a condition the freeing of the compulsory standards. But the School Boards, who are best able to judge of the matter, are perfectly free to act as they may think fit; if they choose to put the money into their pockets because they do not require it, they may do so. If they choose to improve the facilities and appliances for education, they may do that. If they choose to free more than the compulsory standards, they may do that. All that Parliament says is, that as a condition of receiving this money they must free the compulsory standards.

*MR. C. S. PARKER: What is the meaning of putting in these words, then?

*MR. M. T. STORMONTH DARLING: The meaning is nothing more than the meaning of last year, when the same or corresponding words were put into the Minute. Therefore, the Member for Perth has failed entirely to show that the retention of the words can have any possible effect in tying the hands of the School Boards. The House may rest assured that the meaning is that Parliament requires the freeing of the compulsory standards, and does not seek to go further. The reason of that I take to be that free education is as yet in a tentative stage, and that we shall be in a better position in a few years to judge of its operation, and then to decide whether it is desirable to go further.

Mr. M. T. Stormonth Darling

(7.46.) SIR L. PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): I desire to say a few words before the Division is taken, because I think the right hon. Gentleman does not understand the position we take up as to these words. It has been shown that there are only 98 schools which can use this £40,000 to free the compulsory standards. What is to become of the surplus? You say you are going to leave the School Boards free to use the money as they like, but to leave the School Boards to do as they like with the money is utterly inconsistent with the words you are putting into the Act of Parliament. You put into the Act words declaring that the money shall only be used for the compulsory standards, and you confirm that by a Minute of the Education Department. The position in which the Government have put this matter is most ludicrous, and why they do not seek to get it out of such a position I cannot understand. I cannot agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman that these words will do no harm. They will fetter the County Councils. They are inconsistent with the declarations of the Government, and under these circumstances I hope the Government will accept the Amendment, and thus escape from a paradoxical position.

(7.48.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): There is still something mysterious about this matter that has not been explained. No one who applies the words of the clause to the existing state of things in Scotland can understand them—everyone who tries to do so gets deeper and deeper in difficulty. This sum is to be applied in relief of fees of children in the compulsory standards of the Scotch Code. Will the House believe the manner in which this £40,000 is to be distributed? There are 2,981 schools in Scotland in which all the compulsory standards are already free, and these schools will absorb more than

£38,000 of the £40,000. The position of the Government is, therefore, absurd, because they profess to give the money to free the compulsory standards, when, with the exception of 98 schools, which cannot absorb £2,000, all the schools in Scotland are already free in the five compulsory standards. But there is this other point. The Lord Advocate and the Solicitor General for Scotland tonight have said in a somewhat airy and indecisive fashion that they know perfectly well that the bulk of these schools in Scotland cannot use the money for this ostensible purpose, but that it can be used to reduce fees in the higher standards or to reduce the rates. But there is another class of schools which share in this grant, namely, the voluntary schools. Under this grant 466 voluntary schools will be entitled to a share of this £40,000, and in round numbers these will absorb £6,000. Each and every one of these voluntary schools has already freed all the five compulsory standards, and, therefore, the money will have to be applied either to the compulsory standards, which are already provided for, or to the higher standards. The whole of the voluntary contributions in Scotland do not exceed £28,000 a year. Under this clause of the Bill it will be in the power of the managers of voluntary schools to take £6,000 and apply it to the reduction of the infinitesimal subscriptions now obtained by these schools. A more monstrous use of public money was never heard of. This £40,000 increases the 10s. grant of last year to 11s. 6d. All that is necessary now is that this grant should be supplemented by a sum that will give 1s. 6d. per annum additional. The Government have debated this question as if it were possible to draw distinctions between standards in the Scotch system. It is absolutely impossible, because the Government have distributed this money on the principle of a capitation grant. Unless the fees for all the standards were uniform it is impossible that the capitation grant could agree with the actual division into standards. Before the last Division we were asked how provision could be made for the abolition of fees in all schools. Why, simply in the manner the Government have already provided. The only difference would be that the grant would be made on condition that the school authority abolished all fees in the schools. I really hope the Government will explain why they find something sacred in 11s. 6d. and something wicked in 13s. It was contended by the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Advocate that the total sum of £283,000 corresponded with the total sum charged in the five lower standards. That must be an entire error. The sum you now place at the disposal of the School Authorities in Scotland is equal to freeing entirely 450,000 of the average attendance, whereas 420,000 represents the attendance in the five standards. Now, why on earth were these words put into this clause? They were not in the clause last year, and they have no relation to the existing state of facts in Scotland. They are put in with the sole purpose of setting the plain meaning of the clause at absolute defiance.

(7.54.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): We have a curious condition of things in some parts of the northern counties. In some parishes of Ross-shire, where there are deer forests and large farms, there is a 2d. rate, and I am afraid the School Board in some of such parishes will require to dine in order to get rid of this money. I am very sorry the Government are so obstinate on this question. We are only fighting for the old use and wont in Scotland. We want a condition of things in which all the classes of elementary education will be free, as they were before the old system John Knox established was modified in the interests of the landlords. What the Government want to do is to vote a large sum to the landlords by whom the principal rates in all the counties are paid.

*(8.10.) MR. C. S. PARKER: The next Amendment which stands in my name was intended simply as an alternative in case the Government, instead of giving a definite sum, preferred to give the residue. Having regard to the result of the Division the House has just taken, it is not my intention to press the Amendment.

*(8.11.) MR. BRYCE: I rise to move an Amendment which I hope the Government will be able to see their way to accept. We want to have the extinction of fees in elementary schools completed. That is what we have urgently pressed for, but if we cannot get that I think it is fair that the Government should at least consent to let us do for Scotland what they have agreed to do for England. I propose, therefore, to add words to the end of the clause empowering the Councils of Counties and Burghs and Commissioners of the Police Burghs to make contributions for the purpose of technical education, as already provided in the case of England and Wales. The Amendment I have to propose is exactly the same as that already adopted by the House, mutatis mutandis, and it leaves the making of contributions purely optional with the Local Authority.

Amendment proposed, at the end of Clause 2, to insert the words—

"Provided, nevertheless, that the Council of any such county or burgh, and the Commissioners of any such Police Burgh may contribute any sum received by such county or Commissioners, as the case may be, with respect to the said residue or any part of that sum, for the purposes of technical, including agricultural and commercial education, within the meaning of the Technical Schools (Scotland) Act, 1887, and may make that contribution over and above any sum that may be paid out of any school fund under that Act, whether or not any such sum has been paid out of such fund."—(Mr Bryce.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(8.13.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government have no objection to this Amendment of the Bill, which gives to the Scotch County Councils precisely the same powers which the English County Councils have received. It is possible it may be necessary to amend the precise words; if so, the Amendment can be made in another place.

Question put, and agreed to.

(8.14.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The House, or those who were present, will recollect that the other day the hon. Member for West Belfast (MR. SEXTON) suggested certain Amendments with regard to model schools in Ireland. The Amendments were not on the Paper, and, therefore, I had not time to consider them, but I have had time since; and I think his view will be carried out by adopting a certain number of Amendments, chiefly consequential Amendments, the first of which occurs in page 2, line 38. I have to move to leave out there the words "excluding model schools." If that is not done those Unions in which there are model schools will get less than their fair share of the money. I propose that the money shall be distributed according to the number of scholars. I propose to leave Sub-section A substantially as it is now, though there will be some verbal alterations made. With regard to Sub-section B, I propose to move to leave out the words "not being model schools," because those words would practically deprive contributory Unions that come under the Act of 1875 of their fair share of the money. I have other Amendments of a somewhat different character to Sub-section D, which are intended to carry out more completely the view expressed by the hon. Member for West Belfast, and were accepted by the Government the day before yesterday. I beg to move the omission of the words "excluding model schools."

Amendment proposed, in page 2, lines 38 and 39, to omit the words "excluding model schools."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

(8.15.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The meaning of the right hon. Gentleman is, no doubt, clear to his own mind, but it is not clear to mine. Of course, the first operation of the clause will be that you must take the whole number of children attending the schools and divide it into the gross amount of the grant in order to obtain the capitation rate. If the children attending the model schools are left out, of course, the Capitation Grant will be higher. Then, with regard to Sub-section A, I understand the right hon. Gentleman agrees to leave it substantially as it is [MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!] and that I take to mean this. But in cases of contributory Unions that come under the Act of 1875 the Board of Guardians are bound to contribute to every school in the Union, model or otherwise [MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!] as much as will make up the local aid. I confess, in that case, as the principle of the Act is to recoup the Union, it would not be possible to recoup the Union unless the model schools are excluded.

(8.17.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will just explain the point. FOUR: I will was this: Take a Union. What I meant are a thousand children in which there whom attend children, two hundred of give this county model school. You only number of contribution in respect of the ordinary children who attend the (8.19) schools.

that the) MR. SEXTON: I understand respect £78,000 is to be divided in respect of the 500,000 children attending primary national schools. If we add the model school children the effect will be that the grant for the individual child all over Ireland will be diminished. At any rate the operation will be infinitesimal, and I do not think it worth while to press the point.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 5, to leave out the word "such."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Question, "That the word 'such' stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 5, to leave out from the word "not," in line 5, to the word "school," in line 6, inclusive.—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. SEXTON: I think it well the right hon. Gentleman should explain by what means he proposes to accomplish the end I suggested by the insertion of these words.

(8.20.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps it would be convenient to the House if I read the section as it will stand after the Amendments I suggest. The section will read—

"In the case of every national school in a Union which is not a contributory Union, shall be paid for the benefit of schools which are not model schools, as an addition to the local contributions to, or in respect of, such schools, within the financial year fixed by the last mentioned rules; and"

I admit that it does not read very smoothly, but, at the same time, I think it is perfectly clear, and explicitly carries out the views which the hon. Member for Belfast embodied in the Amendments he laid before the House the other day.

MR. SEXTON: Yes, the object is clear; but there is a hopeless infirmity about the grammar.

Question put, and agreed to.

Consequentia Amendments made.

Bill to be read the third time tomorrow.

SUPPLY — REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,583,845 (including a Supplementary sum of £50,000), be granted to Her Majesty to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1891, for the Salaries and Working Expenses of the Post Office Telegraph Service."

(8.25.) MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I desire to ask the Postmaster General to consider a matter of some importance to rural districts: it relates to cases in which private individuals have agreed to guarantee certain sums for seven years in order that postal telegraph offices may be established in certain places. My contention is not so much that the money required is too much, though in a great number of cases I think it is excessive, but that the guarantee has to be given for seven years. I complain that, although in the first two years the guarantors may be called upon to make good a deficiency, say, of £10, it is possible that in the succeeding years there may be a profit of £20 a year, and that in such a case the money previously paid is not refunded. The effect of this is a check upon local enterprise. It is especially hard that one or two individuals who are inclined for the benefit of the neighbourhood to introduce the telegraph should be mulcted in a substantial sum of money. It is of great importance that out-of-the-way places should be brought into communication by means of the telegraph. I think the least the Postmaster General can do is to consider what can be done, guarding himself, of course, against loss. My chief objection is the deterrent that the system is to local enterprise. I know more than one case where the guarantors have been out of pocket, although they have been the means of earning considerable revenue for the Department.

(8.30.) MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I wish to say a word or two in a similar spirit to that which animated the remarks of the hon. Member opposite. A similar state of things exists in Scotland in many districts to which the extension of the telegraph system is necessary for the development of the local trade and industry. I am perfectly well aware, from information the Postmaster General has given me, that the obstacle to telegraphic extension and any change in the present system comes rather from the Treasury than from his own Department. As regards extension in the Highlands of Scotland, provision was made giving power to the Government to provide themselves with a guarantee from the surplus fund derived from the branding of herrings; but now I understand that fund is exhausted, and so extension of the telegraphic system in the Highlands is not going on. I suppose the right hon. Gentleman will still tell me that the Rules of the Treasury preclude extensions in the absence of adequate local guarantees; but I hope he will bring his influence to bear to obtain some relaxation of Rules which, by preventing these extensions, check the development of trade in the fishery districts and elsewhere.

(8.32.) MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): I quite agree with what has been urged by the hon. Gentleman opposite that these Treasury Rules often prevent the earning of revenue by extensions of the telegraphic system. It is, I think, a poor and mean policy for a great Government Department to pursue to exact these local guarantees out of which ultimately a profitable branch of the Post Office business arises. It is not the way in which such a business should be managed.

(8.35.) THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): I do not know that I can say very much in addition to what I have said in former years upon this question. The complaint made by my hon. Friend the Member for North Somerset (Mr. Llewellyn) certainly deserves consideration. The position which I understand him to take up is this: that in places where a guarantee is given for seven years, and where the guarantors have to make good the deficiency in revenue for one, two, or three years, when the Telegraph

Office comes more than self-supporting, the guarantors should have some claim on a part of the profit which is earned. I do I think he has made out something of a case. I am not prepared to say this view will be accepted absolutely by the Treasury; but, at all events, I do not think it can be denied that it is something of a hardship if public gentlemen living in a locality put their hands in their pockets to support a telegraph for the convenience of themselves and their neighbours find that while they have protected the Government against loss, the Government, by the force of the guarantee, make a profit in which they have no share. The case, as fairly stated by my hon. Friend, is more of a Treasury than a Post Office question, and the Treasury, as is well known, are governed by rules which experience has shown are advantageous to the public service, and which, of course, it is not in my power to call upon the Treasury to relax. At the same time I am bound to say I think the hon. Member has done good service in calling attention to the subject, and I will not lose sight of it, and if the system by which the Treasury balances its accounts will allow of some change being made in this direction, I shall be glad to find myself in a position to announce such an alteration. The hon. Member for Sutherland takes rather a different line and a very natural line, considering the constituency he represents. The distant parts of the Highlands, of course, are not in a position to support their own telegraphs; they are not in a position to guarantee a revenue from their own telegraph stations; yet in many cases the existence of a telegraph station in one of these out-of-the-way places is almost indispensable for the prosperity of the locality. This subject was brought under my notice two years ago by the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, who took an active interest in it, and who pressed on the Government the importance of dispensing with the guarantee usually required in view of the absolute necessity for a telegraph station in a locality where the people are unable to pay for the advantage. For instance, the right hon. Gentleman referred to fishing stations, where it is a matter of the utmost importance, when there happens to be a great catch of fish, to communicate with fish-curers and others that the fish may be at once dealt with. This principle, I think I may say, has been accepted in a modified degree by the Government. I have had the fortune to extend to several places, particularly in the West and North-West Highlands, telegraph stations outside the strict Treasury rule. I have no doubt that other stations think they have an equal claim on the benevolence of the State. Everything, however, cannot be done at once, and I must content myself by saying that I shall have great pleasure in continuing to administer the policy which has been followed in this respect, and of seeing what amount of assistance can be rendered out of the Post Office surplus in instances where a good case can be made out for giving telegraphic facilities, even where a guarantee is not forthcoming. But I must remind hon. Members that the Post Office surplus is not derived from the telegraphic branch. It is hardly, I think, a just claim that the surplus from the Post Office branch of the Department should be used to provide telegraphic facilities. They are separate Services though under one administration. I am always anxious to extend telegraphic facilities, and I am disposed to think that, at the present time, rather too hard a bargain is made with guarantors. I hope I may be able during the recess to make some arrangement by which, to some extent, the objections which have been raised may be met, and the Department present itself to the public in a more liberal spirit.

(8.40.) MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS: I am very glad to have this assurance. Without going into the question of policy, I do not hesitate to say the Department may be managed in a thoroughly commercial spirit without exacting these payments from guarantors.

*(8.45.) EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): In the form of a reduction of the Vote by £150, I have to bring forward a subject of great interest to the general public. During the discussion on the Post Office Estimates, I confess I was rather amused at one remark from the Postmaster General in regard to myself. I had sat quite silent during the discussion, and I do not know why the right hon.

Gentleman suddenly addressed me, and said he excluded me from the disapproval he was expressing in very decided terms of certain fiery orators who had been doing something wrong. I accept his kind exemption, and certainly I cannot blame myself for any fiery oratorical interference in matters in which telegraphists have been concerned. If there has been any fiery feeling in the Department during the last few months it certainly has not been incited by myself, but has rather been due to the action of the right hon. Gentleman himself. The case of the telegraphists and the Telegraph Department is entirely different to the case of the Post Office employés which was discussed the other day. Both sections have reason to complain, but after that similarity ceases. As regards the agitation among the telegraphists there has been, I understand and believe, no intervention of political or paid agitators. The employés of the Postmaster General in the Telegraph Department have managed their case for themselves. In the case of the postmen, I believe an outsider has been appointed Secretary, and with that I do not concern myself now, but as regards the telegraphists, they appointed two of their own number as Secretaries, and I believe in all the action they have taken since I began to interest myself in their affairs, they have acted in a perfectly constitutional, and, more than that, in an extremely moderate manner. I know there was an exception lately as regards their behaviour, and that I will bring before the Committee before I conclude my remarks. I wish to point out to the Postmaster General that the course I am taking now is made imperatively necessary because of the evasive answers given from time to time, and in spite of the strong hints from the right hon. Gentleman and the First Lord of the Treasury that the interference of third persons was not at all desirable between the heads of Departments and those under them. But, unless there is some interference, I do not see how the public can be made aware of what is going on in what is, after all, a public Department. Those who are serving under the Postmaster General at the moment are not his servants in any sense whatever; they are the servants of the public, and the public have a right to make remarks in regard to the manner in which their servants are treated, and we have a right to bring any complaints of these servants before this House. We have a right and a duty in the matter. If a public man, who aspires to do the duties attaching to his position, is made aware that the servants of a great State Department are not being treated as he considers fairly, it is the duty of that public man to take the opportunity of bringing the case of these public servants before the House of Commons and the country. I am very much afraid that, in all these matters, the Postmaster General has been rather led away by that fatal sentiment so often expressed from the Government Bench in favour of "firm and resolute government." In my opinion, firmness and resolution are splendid qualities, administered in a proper manner, and with due regard to the complaints and grievances which are brought before the man who, by accident, at the moment, happens to be at the head of the Department. But when firmness and resolution have been exercised for four years the employees in a great State Department are found to be in a state of discontent, amounting almost to insubordination. Firmness may mean petty tyranny, and resoluteness may mean oppression. The man who shows firmness and resolution is he who attacks discontent at the time it first shows itself, and tries his best to remove the cause, if the discontent is just, as, in this case, I believe it is. Before I proceed further let me say I am glad the Postmaster General has acknowledged that this is not a case in which agitators and agitation have bred discontent; it is discontent which has bred the agitation. Also, I should like to say that in any remarks I make I entirely absolve the officials of the Telegraph Department, and I am sure the Postmaster General will be glad to hear me say that it is particularly owing to the great tact shown by Sir Arthur Blackwood that matters have not been more serious than they have been during the last few months. I will endeavour shortly to show the Committee how, in my opinion, the discontent which had long given evidence of its existence, ought to have been taken in hand long ago. Last year I asked questions on the subject, and I must say, with frankness, that I received evasive replies. We can well understand how men having a grievance, and seeing questions have been asked in respect to their complaints, and direct answers avoided have their feeling of grievance intensified. Then I gave notice last year to the Postmaster General, through the mouth of an hon. Friend, that I would bring forward this matter by Motion this year. I gave a careful examination to all the details, and collected as much evidence as I could from all sides, and I can honestly say that there has been absolutely nothing whatever of a political nature in any action I have taken. I am told that the majority of those men employed in Post Office and Telegraph Departments differ from me in politics, but of course that would have no influence with me in taking up their case. Let me also say that I have been extremely careful not to put myself in the wrong, not to damage the case of these men which I bring forward by engaging in any heated controversy. I have endeavoured to keep the case out of this. I was once asked to attend a meeting on the subject, and I said immediately I believed it was against the regulations for anyone, even a Member of Parliament, to take the chair. I believe it is the rule, absurd though I think it is, and I declined to attend the meeting. When it came to my knowledge, through the daily Press, that there was a chance of something like a strike—or it could scarcely be called that—at any rate, of a little bother, trouble, and difficulty in the Central Telegraph Department, I wrote to those whom I knew, begging them to use influence to restrain their colleagues, and giving my strongest advice not to pursue such a course, because, in my opinion, it would put them in the wrong before the House of Commons and the country. I mention this as regards myself, as I wish it to be clearly understood that I have been actuated by motives to secure redress of grievances simply, and have no political or other objects to serve. The proper mode of proceeding, I understand, for public servants to take if they have any grievances and wish to obtain redress, is to petition the official heads of the Department. Now, the telegraphists most properly observed this Regulation, and carried it out. For years they have addressed the Postmaster General and other officials in the most respectful manner, and I believe Petitions have been sent during a number of years, but, of course, at the present moment I shall only speak of the years during which the present Postmaster General has held office. I have here a list of Petitions, but I do not intend to go through the whole list, but I only wish to show why it is that I now appeal from the Postmaster General to the House. In 1886, there was a Petition, which was answered by the Postmaster General, from the second class clerks. In 1887 there was a Petition from the male staff, which was answered by the Controller. Then I find in the same year, there was a Petition from the female staff to the Postmaster General, and that, I believe, was never answered. There was a question asked in this House by Lord Charles Beresford, who, as a Naval man, is naturally a champion of the fair sex, and the noble Lord received an answer in this House, and that, I believe, was the only reply the female staff received to their Petition. Then the male staff petitioned again in January, 1888, and received no answer, and again a question was asked and answered here. In December, 1888, some members of the Telegraph Department asked whether they might lay their case before the Treasury, and were told by the Postmaster General that he was the supreme authority for officers of the Department. Exactly, but why did the Postmaster General not even give an answer to some of these Petitions? Perhaps he may say that he received so many that he could not answer them all. But does the right hon. Gentleman not understand how the feelings of discontent and irritation increase when men find their representations, made in the regular and proper way, are met with neglect and silent contempt? Now, let me say, that on the last occasion when I brought this matter before the Postmaster General, I was astonished at the reply he made, that the full statement of the grievances complained of had not been brought before him. I do not bring this forward as a grievance, but only to show how it is that these clerks have found that their cases were not receiving much attention at the hands of the Postmaster General. The right hon. Gentleman said he could hardly understand how I could reconcile it with my duty to bring forward the Motion without having previously given the Department an opportunity of investigating the grievance. But it has been the case, over and over again, since the right hon. Gentleman has held office, that representations from the servants of the Department have not even been answered. I must say I have noticed at the same time a strange difference between the report of the right hon. Gentleman's answer as appearing in Hansard and the report which appeared in the Times. I am quoting the former, but I should have preferred to have quoted the latter. There are certain additions in Hansard which I, personally, have no recollection of, and the passages in the Times are a great deal more forcible than those which appear in Hansard. I do not know what the custom is among Members generally as regards the alteration of speeches for Hansard; personally I always preserve the sense, though I may try here and there to make the language a little better than I may have used in the course of a long speech. Now, with regard to the statement which the telegraphists drew up, the right hon. Gentleman said that a printed pamphlet purporting to present the case of the telegraphists was said to have been brought under the notice of the Royal Commission on Civil Servants.

"Will it be believed," he proceeded, "that the first opportunity I have had of seeing that statement was this very morning, when it reached me through the post. I had been unable before to obtain a copy."

Then Hansard goes on to make the right hon. Gentleman to say there was no proof of the statement that the document was laid before the Royal Commission, and certainly they had expressed no opinion on it; whereas the words in the Times report, and which I heard, were that there was no truth in the statement that the Royal Commission received it. It is these declarations on the part of the Postmaster General which have been causing irritation in the Telegraph Department. A letter was sent in the ordinary and proper way by certain telegraphists on September 12th, 1887, asking the Controller to appoint a day on which he would receive the statement which was to be presented to the Royal Commission. The statement which the telegraphists drew up was received and retained by the Secretary, or Controller, and was ultimately handed back, presumably after having been seen by the Postmaster General. The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but seeing it is a fact that it was handed to the Secretary or Controller, and was given back to the men, is the right hon. Gentleman justified in saying he never had a chance of seeing it? In returning it the Secretary said that the telegraphists were at liberty themselves to send the statement to the Royal Commission; yet the right hon. Gentleman enters the House and states he had no knowledge of it.

MR. RAIKES: Certainly.

*EARL COMPTON: The right hon. Gentleman says, Certainly. But these are the very matters which have caused the irritation. Why was the Postmaster General unaware of the statement? Of course, if the right hon. Gentleman was able to say he had not been told about the statement, and that, therefore, he was able to come to the House and say he had no knowledge of it, then we shall understand the kind of machinery at work in the Post Office, and also why there are so many people discontented in that particular Department. The right hon. Gentleman has brought forward a scheme to remedy some of the just grievances of the men. Let me say that that scheme is infinitely better than I expected, considering the huge financial difficulties. Those who have interested themselves in the matter ought to say frankly that the right hon. Gentleman has done as much as could be expected at present, although, in some points, it may be desirable to alter the scheme. Another great cause of discontent has reference to the right of the servants in the Post Office and Telegraph Office to meet and discuss matters without the presence of a reporter. So far as I am aware, there is no great objection on the part of a large majority of the civil servants to a reporter always attending at their meetings. Probably it would be rather disagreeable for the Postmaster General to read the transcript of the shorthand notes, as he might come across remarks not very flattering to himself.

Earl Compton

A good deal of attention has been drawn to the Circular of the April 19th, on this matter, but very little has been said as to that of May 21st, which shows that the Post Office authorities felt they had gone a little too far, for they desired to make it understood that there was no desire to interfere with purely social gatherings, and suggested that notices of meetings should state the object, and should notify if the promoters were prepared to assent to conditions which would make it unnecessary for a shorthand writer to attend. I wonder if the Postmaster General had in view meetings of the Primrose League, when he issued that second Circular. I believe the chief objection is not to the presence of the reporter so much as that the reporter is always accompanied by somebody else. I want to know whether anyone has the authority or order of the Postmaster General, besides the reporter, to attend in order to take down the names of the speakers and report as regards the meeting. I submit it would be a wise thing for the Government to take this question in hand, and allow the Civil servants to meet, so long as they behave themselves, without interference in any way whatever. I hope the right hon. Gentleman, before the Division on this Vote is taken, will give us more satisfactory assurances on this point. And now as to the question of overtime. I suppose the Postmaster General will agree with me it is not well that the servants of any public Department should be overworked. I wish to know whether it is true that any men in the service of the State have worked at night for 11 consecutive hours, and have, after an interval of four hours, resumed work. I have been told that lately men have been working for 14 and 15 hours a day, with one half-hour's rest a day. If that is true I consider the State at the present moment ought to stand in no better position, in the eyes of the public, than one of the sweaters about whom we have heard so much in the course of the inquiry by the Royal Commission on Sweating. Again, I want to know whether overtime is going on in the Post Office as it used to do. It is said that this labour is voluntary; but if the men refuse to perform this voluntary work they will be punished. It is a perfect absurdity to imagine that there is anything voluntary in it. You will always find a certain number of men ready to work overtime for the sake of the money they get. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will promise to lay on the Table a distinct account of the amount of work performed by the members of the Telegraph Service and the Post Office. I would also ask the right hon. Gentleman to make a statement regarding the scale of pay of the superior officers. He knew that at the present moment only three of the large centres had been touched.

MR. RAIKES: Six.

*EARL COMPTON: There were only three a week ago. Those who are waiting will only get the benefit when the adjustment comes into force; but why is not the pay of all of them increased on the same day? Then, what did the new scheme of the Postmaster General do as regards the maximum sum? There was a first-class maximum up to £190. I understand that the right hon. Gentleman means to do away with the senior class, and make his first class a class of what are called supervisors. The consequence will be that the vast majority of the men who entered the Service with the hope of rising to a maximum of £190 will, under the new regulations, only be able to rise to £160. So far as I understand it, the Postmaster General has rather gone back on Mr. Fawcett's scheme on this point. I now propose to give the House a short account of what has been the result of the discontent in the Telegraph Department. A telegraphist who managed a private wire was introduced into the Department at a moment when the discontent had almost broken out, and the men feared that a lot of strangers were to be imported in order that their own services might be dispensed with. It was very much like applying a lighted match to a cask of gunpowder. When duty was over a few of the men waited for this telegraphist—a man named Henderson—to come out. No doubt they behaved extremely badly, for they hustled him. Two or three of the telegraphists, however, interfered and got him away quietly. The Postmaster General instituted an inquiry into the matter, and 192 men have been cut out from all the advantages of the new scheme owing to this occurrence. I have a letter written by one who was looking on all the time, and whose testimony I can believe. He took no part in the hustling. I do not think it wise to give his name, because it might get him into trouble. It appears that the row took place two or three minutes past 4 o'clock, at which hour a good many men go away. In fact, a good many who had gone away were punished for what took place in their absence. The outsider Henderson came downstairs, and then there arose cries of "blackleg." Henderson was hustled, but no one struck him or spat upon him. He was not seriously hurt, but only hustled badly; and in proof of that I may mention that the man's "top hat" was unruffled and smooth. If the row had been serious, if the man had been struck or spat upon, his hat would probably have been the first thing to suffer. So far as I can see, there has been a little exaggeration as to what took place. But how can the right hon. Gentleman expect any of these men to prove themselves innocent. Some of the 192 men who have been punished must be innocent, as only six or seven hustled actively. I should like to know whether, during the inquiry, any of the 192 were proved innocent, and, if so, whether they will be reinstated as regards the scale of pay to which they were entitled before the disturbance. The Postmaster General has had a great deal of trouble, but I think I may say with candour that it is partly owing to the attitude the right hon. Gentleman has himself assumed. If he had shown more sympathy with those under him there would probably not have been so much disturbance and discontent. He has now a great opportunity, by being merciful to those whom he has punished, of reinstating himself in the affections of those over whom he is placed. I think he must admit that there have been errors on both sides. There would not have been all this discontent had he taken these matters in hand in his first year of office instead of in his fourth. I think, too, he will admit that the conduct of the telegraphists has, on the whole, been most praiseworthy, and surely his best course now is to let bygones be bygones. Let him replace the men who are now suffering punishment, and see if his scheme, when it has had a fair trial, will not produce a better and healthier condition of affairs in the Department. If the right hon. Gentleman could only see his way to some relaxation of the rules such as has been pointed out, I feel certain that he would give pleasure to a large number of the general public who have been watching most anxiously the case of the telegraphists, while he will also have a great opportunity of re-instating himself in the affections of those over whom he is placed. I beg to move the reduction of the Vote in the sum of £150.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A (Salaries), be reduced by £150, part of the Salary of the Postmaster General."—(Earl Compton.)

(9.31.) SIR E. J. REED (Cardiff): I have thought it might be convenient to the Committee if I were to avail myself of the opportunity afforded by the Motion of the noble Lord to bring forward a case which I have had in my mind for some months past. I am very sorry to have to make a complaint, because I am bound to say that personally, in connection with the town I represent, which makes not only numerous but almost continual demands on the attention of the Postmaster General, I have always received from him the most prompt and courteous consideration. Moreover, I happen to know that the Postmaster General is detained in this House at a time when he ought to be elsewhere, and I am, therefore, sorry to be obliged to add in any degree to the trouble he is put to and to delay his departure. Although it is so late in the Session, I feel it necessary to occupy the time of the Committee for a few moments while I lay before it the Cardiff telegraph case. If the treatment of other Members of the Civil Service is to be the same as has been meted out to certain gentlemen on the staff of the Cardiff Telegraph Office, I have no hesitation in saying that they might as well belong to the Civil Service of Russia as to the Civil Service of England. This matter came to my knowledge in an accidental manner, and I will endeavour to state the facts as they arose. I heard that certain gentlemen belonging to the Cardiff Telegraph Staff were suddenly and peremptorily ordered away from their homes to other towns. So short was the notice given to them that it amounted in one case to less than a day, and the gentlemen who have been so punished are men against whom not only has no offence been proved, but against whom no offence or charge has been even alleged. What happened was this: Owing to the enormous growth of Cardiff in recent years, the Telegraph Department of the town, like other Departments, had fallen behind the demands made upon it. The growth of telegraphic business at Cardiff was unexampled in Great Britain, and that except in the United States there is nothing analogous to it. As an illustration of the rapidity of the growth of Cardiff, I may state that whereas in 1876 the rateable value of the town was £260,000, it is now £744,000, so that it has increased threefold during that period. It is not unnatural that the Telegraph Service should fail to keep pace with the demands of the town, but the complaints of the commercial classes in the town were such that last August I was compelled to address a letter to the Postmaster General on the subject. The staff at the Telegraph Office had been enormously overworked, and the public complained that boys were brought in to do telegraphic work, for which they were unqualified, while men in high stations had to do the ordinary work of the office, and that, generally speaking, the whole staff was in a state of dissatisfaction and irritation. Of course, the telegraphists had no knowledge of my letter to the Postmaster General, though they were the persons on whom long hours and personal sacrifices had fallen for a long time past. Letters and articles began to appear in a local paper—a Tory journal, which shows that there was no political significance in the correspondence—setting forth the grievances of the telegraphists. At the same time, the Postmaster General, in answer to the appeal which had been addressed to him, undertook to add very largely to the Staff, and to make several promotions. Then the superintendent of the Telegraph Office, after direct communication with the Postmaster General, sent for eight of the staff and told them that they would be promoted if they had had nothing to do with the letters which had appeared in the local paper. The eight men disclaimed any complicity in the matter, and five were duly promoted. The other three, however, were informed that they knew, or could readily find out, who was responsible for the letters to the newspaper, and they were given 48 hours in which to report to the superintendent. Public servants are put in rather an awkward position by the attitude taken by the Postmaster General and other of her Majesty's Ministers. The doctrine of the Government seems to be that Civil servants must, above all things, suffer in silence. If they appeal to a newspaper, they are severely punished; and if they appeal to a Member of Parliament the hon. Gentleman is told that such action is subversive of the discipline of the Service. I have no desire to interfere between the heads of Departments and their subordinates; and in proof of this I will mention that I have never before brought any grievance such as that I am now referring to to the notice of the House of Commons, though I have often been requested to do so. At the end of the 48 hours the men reported to the superintendent that they considered it no part of their duty to obtain the information required. The promotion that it had been intended to give these men proved that they were efficient. They had all been long in the service, and they had been resident many years in Cardiff. No one will deny the right of the Postmaster General to order them to other towns if their removal was called for by the exigencies of the Public Service; but the removal of these men at extremely short notice was a penal sentence for not having ascertained and disclosed who were the authors of these communications to the local newspaper. Hearing of the matter, I went to them myself to try to get information from them; but such was their loyalty to the Department, or else their terror of the rule under which they lived, that they were indisposed to make any statement to me, and I had great difficulty in eliciting any facts from them. The Postmaster General has said that their removal was not a punishment; but that he found a state of things which seemed to indicate a lack of discipline, and he thought it best to disperse those who were suspected. That might be a step quite within his right if it was taken in good faith in the interest of the Service; but these removals came upon the men as penal sentences, and feelings of sympathy and indignation spread like wildfire throughout the Telegraph Services of the country. I have received hundreds of communications from all parts of the country showing the interest that was felt in the case, and expressing the opinion that these men had been dealt with unrighteously. Some of these men have been moved more than once, and one several times; and they have also been refused the usual extra allowance for temporary residence on the plea that their removals were permanent. I have a number of facts which go to show that these men were not wanted at the places to which they were sent; indeed, in some instances, they have been idling away their time. All the surrounding circumstances went to show that the men were being punished. One of them wrote to the Postmaster General to ask him what the punishment was for; and the answer made was that he was not being punished at all. Not being punished! Why, the men were put to great expense, and one of them had been reduced to almost absolute want. Two of them have since been promoted in the towns to which they were sent. Admitting that the Postmaster General must have the power of removal, and must exercise it, still, it ought not to be abused in such a way as to make removals a very severe punishment. I have not been very anxious to bring the case on, because I believe very little good comes of bringing such cases before the House, particularly during the régimes of the present Government. It has been made manifest in many cases that there is no idea of making public servants satisfied and content, and that the main idea is to exercise arbitrary authority and to expect men to yield to it at once; but in this age discipline is not to be maintained in that way. I admit that the Government is unduly harassed by the claims of public servants. Yesterday in the Lobby I met several gentlemen who had come to press claims on the Government, which I decline to recognise. Some men seem to have the idea that they are to give the public a few years' labour and that they are to be kept in idleness for the rest of their lives. Others, if they are introduced temporarily into the Public Service, set up claims of a permanent character. The State ought to be able, like a private individual, to obtain temporary service; and if it becomes continuous, those who are employed ought to be grateful. Nevertheless, all ought to feel that they are considerably treated; and I have submitted a case in which men were dealt with most improperly. Why should civil servants be ordered about like slaves, without any charge being made against them? On this subject I have had a correspondence with the Postmaster General, who, in the course of it, did what I suggest was not magnanimous. Here was an office of which complaint was made, not that the staff was inefficient, but that it was overworked, and that men were struggling manfully with their duties. The Postmaster General turned round and made a general, broad accusation against the Cardiff office, that it was occupied by a set of demoralised public servants; and he stated among other things that the privacy of telegrams was not respected, but that their purport was published. That was a strong charge to make, and I have made it my duty to inquire into it. The only thing to be found against them was that when the right hon. Gentleman himself visited Cardiff, he had occasion to telegraph to a local friend, and that friend telegraphed to his wife that the right hon. Gentleman was coming, and the fact got into the local newspapers. This was not a very awful revelation of a private telegram in itself, and I would point out that before the right hon. Gentleman made the charge he had discovered the guilty person. The person who disclosed the telegram was found not to be a telegraph clerk at all, but a postal official high up in the office. He had to leave in consequence of the disclosure. On this occurrence was based a general statement with regard to all the officials, and all the foundation for it was a simple incident of the kind I mention. My noble Friend (Lord Compton) in his speech said he had declined to participate in any meetings which had been held. But I found myself in a position to take the chair at a meeting of the telegraph clerks held in London.

EARL COMPTON: I am afraid my hon. Friend misunderstood what I said. I did not preside at any of the meetings of the officials because I thought it would be better for them if I did not do so. In fact, I thought it better that Members of this House should not take part in these meetings, owing to the danger of transgressing the regulations of the Postmaster General.

SIR E. J. REED: I was in sympathy with the men who had been improperly punished at Cardiff, and it seemed to me a very natural thing that I should preside at a meeting of sympathising officials. I took the chair also for another reason, that I had never heard, or dreamed, or imagined that the right of men to meet to discuss their grievances in this country would be questioned. The regulation that the right hon. Gentleman claims to have modified was of such a nature that it would make liable to punishment any servant of the Post Office who invited half a dozen of his colleagues to dinner, and afterwards discussed the question of their salaries. Everyone, even the right hon. Gentleman himself, can see the gross absurdity of that regulation. It would be all very well to prohibit meetings of civil servants at which their grievances are discussed if the public could be assured that those servants are always treated fairly and righteously; but I am sorry to say that that is not the case. And I fail to see what gain there is to be obtained from thrusting a reporter into meetings of men when assembled to discuss their grievances. I cannot but regard it as a frightful mistake. The men in the case I have complained of were treated merely upon suspicion. No personal allegations were made against them, and in cases of that kind is it right that a reporter in the interest of the Postmaster General should be thrust into their meetings? The right hon. Gentleman always succeeds in making a very temperate and successful speech in this House. I am glad that that is the case, because I think it desirable that the heads of Departments should be able to justify their conduct. I am rather disposed to follow the line taken by my noble Friend at the end of his remarks. If he chooses to go to a Division I shall certainly go into the Lobby with him, but I see no good to come from a Division. I rather think it would be wiser to content ourselves with appealing to the right hon. Gentleman to remove the sense of injustice which rankles in the breasts of hundreds and thousands of his employés throughout the country. I trust the Postmaster General will save us the trouble of dividing, by responding to the appeal that has been made to him to do his best to examine into, and, if necessary, to remove the grievances which the Post Office employés are suffering under. I am glad to know from a recent speech of the Postmaster General that he is prepared to consider all the cases of the men with the view of remedying their grievances, but, certainly, unless the men are treated with more consideration it will be necessary for the House of Commons to take into its own hands in some degree the regulation of such State Departments.

*(10.9.) MR. ARTHUR WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): I will not deal with the claims of the Cardiff telegraphists which have been so amply discussed by the noble Lord and the Member for Cardiff. It is clear that during the past three or four months the deplorable state of discontent and dissatisfaction described by the hon. Member for Cardiff has prevailed, not only there, but in other towns. I do not hesitate to say that officialism has interfered with the men in discussing their grievances in a manner which is absolutely foreign in this country. The telegraph servants have a right to discuss their grievances, and I insist upon that right in their behalf. Do not let me be misunderstood. I do not consider this as a matter of personal treatment, but as a matter of public policy, and that alone; and I venture to say that the policy adopted by the Post Office in its treatment of all its servants has been quite as bad as that which has characterised its treatment of the telegraph clerks. The right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, as we all know, in April placed restrictions upon the men holding meetings. My attention was drawn to it, and I at once gave notice that I would, if I could get a chance, move that this House affirm the right of all Civil servants to meet freely without interference from the heads of the Department, and I put a question to the right hon. Gentleman as to whether any previous regulations existed. I want to draw attention to the terms of an Order of 1866, issued by the then Postmaster General, Lord Stanley of Alderley. He issued an Order prohibiting the men from meeting on pain of dismissal; but that Order has never been acted upon until the present year, and

I do not think the Postmaster General was ever aware of its existence until he hunted it up to justify the Circular of April 19 last. The late Mr. Fawcett was a great enemy in public life of the fetish of officialism. He had difficulties with the Telegraphic Department, but he never did anything to restrain the men from meeting to discuss their grievances. They had the most perfect freedom in the way of petitioning and in holding consultations with Mr. Fawcett, who lost no opportunity of finding out what he considered was wrong in the Department. I do not think Mr. Fawcett knew about that Order of 1866; and if he had known about it, I feel confident that he would have treated it as an absurdity. In March, 1881, in reply to a question put in the House, Mr. Fawcett declared that "he would spare no effort to arrive at a fair conclusion as to the complaints of the telegraphists, and that he was very anxious to hear from the men themselves their accounts of their alleged grievances."

He did not issue an Order to forbid the men from holding meetings. Not at all. On one occasion he asked 12 representatives—seven males and five females—to see him. They waited upon him, and he asked them to speak to him without reservation. They did so, and they gave him some very useful information; and at the end of an interview which lasted over five hours—after this long friendly intercourse with his employés, meeting them face to face, exchanging views, giving and receiving information—the deputation withdrew, warmly thanking the right hon. Gentleman for the manner in which they had been received. To show that he did not interfere with the perfect freedom of public meeting of his employés, in answer to another question on March 24th, 1881, asking whether his attention had been drawn to meetings which had taken place of Post Office clerks and telegraph clerks, Mr. Fawcett expressed himself cognisant of these meetings. On the 13th May also, he admitted that he had seen reports of these meetings, and stated that directly a decision was arrived at as to the matters in dispute he would make it known to the Post Office servants. The only other quotation I have to make is that of an answer to the hon. Member for Derry, who asked whether Mr. Fawcett's attention had been drawn to a meeting of the Cork telegraph clerks, the object of which was to act in conjunction with the clerks of the various offices throughout the Kingdom; and whether the Postmaster of Cork, on seeing a report of the meeting in the Cork papers, gave instructions that any clerk who had taken a prominent part in the meeting should not be engaged on any duties which involved extra pay. Mr. Fawcett's reply was that "no such instruction was ever acted on." It is quite clear that that distinguished Postmaster General never for a moment suggested interference with the most complete freedom of action on the part of any telegraph clerk. I agree that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Raikes) has shown a studied courtesy to Members of this House, and we have no wish to make this a personal matter. It is a question of policy. We are now approaching a great crisis in the management of the affairs of this country. Democracy has become the mistress of this country. Democracy will no doubt make many mistakes; but I would ask whether we are likely to prevent it making mistakes by arbitrary and fussy interference with the individual liberty of our own servants. It is the duty of every Member of this House to see that those servants have fair play. I would earnestly entreat the Postmaster General to withdraw the irritating and annoying Order he has issued, and to let the postal servants be free to discuss their grievances, and to have immediate and ready access to him.

(10.22.) MR. RAIKES: As the discussion has gone on at considerable length, and as my own conduct has been freely criticised, I hope the Committee will allow me some latitude in defending myself from the attack which has been made upon me. I hope to maintain the temperate tone which has been displayed by the noble Lord. The noble Lord, who has constituted himself in this House one of the representatives of the Telegraphic Service, seems to think that unfair comment has been made by me; but I can only say that I was referring at that time to certain outside speakers who, by their incendiary language, provoke public servants to neglect their duties. The noble Lord has spoken of the moderate manner adopted by the telegraphists in pressing forward certain complaints they made; but if he had seen as much as I have of the manner in which the telegraphists press forward certain complaints, I think the noble Lord would have adopted a different phrase. I have mentioned before that many of the complaints deserve, and will receive, the favourable consideration of the Government. I only refer to the incident as an example of the very worst way in which any public servants could hope to obtain consideration for their complaints—that is to say, by a canonade of constant reiteration, hurled at the head of the Department for months before he has had the opportunity of obtaining the best advice. I hope that, for my part, I have altogether abstained from the use of irritating language, and I think that if the noble Lord had had the opportunity of studying the shorthand writer's report of the Leicester Conference, he would have found that language was used such as would not have been tolerated by any Department anxious to promote the interests of the men. I do not mean to say that because this language has been used, and because the complaints have been ventilated in a studiously offensive manner, they ought, therefore, not to receive attention. I have sought to give, and have given, consideration to them, and I think it is rather singular that I who have been the only Postmaster General who, since Mr. Fawcett, has been able to secure for the men substantial permanent benefits, should have been singled out for attack in this manner as guilty of unsympathetic and arbitrary dealing. It is quite true that they adopted a course which greatly increased the difficulties which stood in the way of their obtaining those benefits—but let bygones be bygones. I am glad to think I have been able to give the telegraphists more substantial proof of my consideration for them than could have been afforded by any number of speeches delivered by fiery orators. I am glad the noble Lord did justice to my friend Sir Arthur Blackwood, but I cannot admit that in any official action he takes Sir Arthur Blackwood is to be severed from myself. I am prepared to bear the responsibility for all he does. He, on the other hand, would be the first to admit that to me belongs the credit of any course that may be regarded as beneficial. Therefore, although I am glad to recognise the position of Sir Arthur Blackwood and to do justice to a very able and distinguished public servant, I must enter my protest against any attempt to set up the doctrine that the Secretary of the Post Office may take a particular line without having the sanction and support of his Parliamentary chief. The noble Lord has taken credit—and I think he richly deserves it—for his attitude in regard to the meetings held by the telegraphists in London. I think he acted as any public-spirited friend of the men would have acted in telling them he would be no party to their taking any action which would amount to a breach of official rules. I am not able to approve of several parts of his speech, but I am compelled to bear this testimony to his endeavour to be a true friend to the men whose cause he has espoused. The noble Lord made a sort of reply to a speech made by me, I think, in June last. I find this difficulty in dealing with the noble Lord—that he is not willing to accept statements of fact from those with whom he differs. If the noble Lord were prepared, as Members generally are, to accept statements of fact from those opposed to him in controversy he would save himself a great deal of trouble, and render greater service to any cause he attempts to advocate. I have never denied that in the early years of my administration there were a great number of petitions and memorials. There have always been a great number of them, and I think it will be plain that it is something not to be encouraged if the servants of a Public Department, having had their applications carefully considered and, for good reason in the eyes of the Department, rejected, immediately return to the charge and present the same memorials over again in the course of a few months. The particular memorial to which I understood the noble Lord mainly to refer was a petition which had been before the public in all the newspapers, which had been the subject of leading articles and impassioned speeches, but which had never been presented to the Minister responsible for dealing with it. The noble Lord came in just at that inconvenient moment when I had appointed a committee to consider the grievances generally alleged by the provincial telegraphists, but when I had not received the petition from the London telegraphists, the noble Lord's especial clients.

*EARL COMPTON: As a matter of fact, I had not seen that petition when I got up my case.

MR. RAIKES: It is a curious thing that in presenting his case the noble Lord should have omitted to avail himself of reports readily accessible, and which had formed the subject of much public comment. Of course, however, I fully accept the explanation. The noble Lord went on to make insinuations which I think he will some day be sorry for. He was pleased to insinuate—and no one who heard him could fail to see he insinuated it—that I had been a party in some way or other to producing misrepresentations in Hansard of the speech I delivered on a particular occasion. Now, I should like to know, yes or no, is that what the noble Lord meant?

*EARL COMPTON: I am very glad indeed to answer. What I meant by my speech was that the right hon. Gentleman's language, according to the Times and my own recollection of it, was entirely different from that which I found in Hansard, and I imagined, as I saw an asterisk before his name, that he supplied the speech, as produced in Hansard, with one or two particular points.

MR. RAIKES: I understand the noble Lord to say he charges me with having deliberately falsified the report of my speech in Hansard.

*EARL COMPTON: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon; I never used the word "falsified." What I did say was that I saw a distinct alteration in the two accounts, and I should have preferred to use the account in the Times and also my memory which served me as regarded what took place. I found in Hansard a modification, as I understand the word, of the language actually used in the House.

MR. RAIKES: Then I wish the noble Lord had had the manliness to charge me with falsification, because it appears to me there is no other meaning which can be put on the language he uses. I will take an instance, because the noble Lord was good enough to supply instances. The noble Lord said he found reported in Hansard that there was no "proof" of the statement that a Memorial had been presented to the Royal Commission, and the noble Lord was pleased to say that, as far as his recollection served him, what I had said was that there was no "truth" in that statement. Now, I have a very accurate recollection of that particular passage in my speech, and I can assure the Committee—I do not think I can satisfy the noble Lord—that the word "proof" was the word I used, and that the word "truth" would have been extremely out of place, because what I was endeavouring to show was that we had no evidence of the presentation of the Memorial to the Royal Commission. I said there was no proof of that statement having reached me, and I went on to say there was no record of it in the proceedings of the Royal Commission. I think anybody who studied the context of that speech would see there was no other word I could reasonably use except the word "proof."

*EARL COMPTON: As this comes close to being a personal matter, the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to explain. He will recollect I had a private correspondence with him. I sent to him an extract from the Times in which the words were "he knew there was no truth in the statement." I sent that extract to the right hon. Gentleman; he made no remark with regard to it. He did not say it was a mis-statement, and, as he had not denied it, I was a little surprised to find the word "proof" in Hansard.

MR. RAIKES: Of course, the correspondence had reference to other matters, and I had to combat so many errors in the noble Lord's letter, that, perhaps, I did not combat all. Having made this statement relating to the fact, I leave it there. The noble Lord was pleased to assume that the Memorial of the telegraphists to the Royal Commission having been submitted to the Controller, I must necessarily have been possessed of its contents. The noble Lord is pleased not to accept my disclaimer. What happened was this. The telegraphists were anxious to present a communication to the Royal Commission. They came to the Controller and asked whether it should be sent through the Postmaster General or through the Treasury. I believe the Controller never saw the communication at all—so far as I know, at all events, he made no report on the subject—but he told the telegraphists they were perfectly free to present their Memorial to the Royal Commission direct.

*EARL COMPTON: That distinctly contradicts the statement I have made. The Memorial was presented to the Controller; it was not returned at once, but the Controller told them they could present it themselves. The idea was that the Controller had taken it to the Postmaster General.

MR. RAIKES: That is precisely what I say is not the fact. What I said was that I had no knowledge whatever of the existence of this document at all. These are all examples of the way in which arguments are put together, and charges are made upon them. I am told that my attitude towards my subordinates has been unconciliatory and unsympathetic; the evidence on which these charges are made crumbles to pieces, and the charges based upon them fall with the statements that have been made. The noble Lord has been good enough to give some commendation to the scheme framed for the benefit of the telegraphists. I am sorry to detain the Committee with these personal matters, but I should have thought any one claiming to be in any sense a representative of the telegraphists would have made the burden of his speech one of congratulation upon the very great advantages which it has been my good fortune, as Postmaster General, to obtain for those officers. I do not want to dwell upon them. I think it sufficient to point out that it has been under my administration of the Post Office that the desired boon of payment at the rate of time and a quarter for overtime has been conceded, that it has been on my advice that the Government have consented to pay extra for Sunday labour in the case of provincial telegraphists, and to pay for the work done on Bank Holiday, and that it has been on my advice that sick absence is now to carry full pay in cases where it is certified by the superior officer. The cost of these changes will not be less than £100,000 a year. It is not encouraging to a Minister who does his best to promote the interests of his subordinate officers to find that those who hold a brief for them in this House have only petty personal accusations to make in consequence. There has been something said by the noble Lord with regard to the Circulars of April 19 and May 21. I have so often made statements upon this subject that I am almost ashamed to trouble the Committee with regard to it again. But to-night I am able to deal also with the point raised by the hon. and learned Member for Glamorganshire, who spoke about these Circulars as having infringed the right of public meeting. There cannot be a greater mistake than to connect these Circulars with the phrase public meeting. These Circulars have no reference whatever to what are understood as public meetings. They have reference to the action of official persons discussing official questions. The meetings in question can only by a most egregious misnomer be called public meetings. Reporters are occasionally present at such meetings, but as their reports are often most inaccurate and incorrect, and likely to mislead the public and the Department, I cannot understand how any man can feel himself aggrieved if the head of the Department takes steps to ascertain the real truth and the real grievances complained of. The Circular of May 21 was intended to make plainer to the minds of the servants of the Department the benevolent disposition of their superior officers in framing the Circular of April 19, because the question had arisen with regard to a public dinner that was going to be held at Leicester in connection with an assembly of telegraphists there, as to whether that was a meeting at which a shorthand writer should be present. Having regard to the value of after dinner oratory, I was glad to assure my correspondent that there was not the smallest wish on the part of the Department to be informed as to what the telegraphists might say in their cups. It was supposed I was desirous of prying into the secrets of the men in the committee meetings they might hold to consider the course they should take in framing any particular Memorial, or in framing Resolutions to be submitted to meetings of the general body. I was anxious to disabuse their minds of that suspicion also, and the Circular of May 21 was issued to point out to them that the Regulations only had reference to meetings held by official persons for the discussion of official questions with the object of influencing public opinion. That is the only instance in which I have desired to be furnished with information as to what took place, and I think that the men themselves will recognise that it was well to guard them against the misrepresentations which frequently arise in newspaper reports. The noble Lord has asked whether any telegraphist has worked for 11 hours consecutively, and, after a short break, for four hours more. I am afraid that they do occasionally work so long, but the men who perform this extra duty are not merely volunteers, but as a rule are very desirous to do the work, and their readiness will now probably be greater than ever, because overtime is to be paid at a higher rate. I agree with the noble Lord that these hours are too long, and I shall be glad to do what I can in reason to mitigate the pressure of long hours of duty, but I fancy that the first persons to object to the compulsory curtailment of the hours will be the telegraphists themselves. The noble Lord, of course, would not like to do the work himself, nor should I; but men who are familiar with the business and anxious to increase their incomes are very ready to work a considerable amount of overtime in order to earn extra remuneration. I shall be very glad if it is possible to reduce these hours, and to bring the duties of the men within a more reasonable compass. Now, with regard to the question of the maximum of the first-class, the noble Lord has said that the new superior class is likely to be much smaller than the class at present existing. No definite conclusion has yet been arrived at on this subject, but I think that the telegraphists will find that, whatever change is approved by the Treasury, their position will not be damaged, but improved. The noble Lord has said a word or two with reference to the recent lamentable occurrence at the Central Telegraph Office. I have this afternoon received the Report of the officers deputed to inquire into the matter, and I certainly expected to find that the great majority of the men who have been excluded from the benefit of the new scheme in consequence of a possible participation in this occurrence would be able to satisfy the Department of their innocence of complicity in the outrage. In that case they would be restored and would receive the full benefits of the scheme, just as if they had not been suspended. The conduct of the men concerned in the outrage was rather worse than the noble Lord seems to suppose. There is no doubt that the injured party was struck with a big stick, and he believes he can recognise the man who struck him. It is also a fact that he was spat upon in the course of the fracas. I have only a few words to say with regard to Cardiff. The hon. Member for Cardiff (Sir E. J. Reed) has dealt with the subject in a tone of great moderation, but I think the hon. Member is himself conscious of the false position which he has taken up in bringing the question forward at all. The hon. Member admitted the absolute right of the Postmaster General to move the servants of the Department from one place to another, and admitted that the Postmaster General must be the judge of what removals are for the good of the public service. I have acted entirely within those limits. I found a state of things prevailing at Cardiff in the course of the last autumn which was extremely unsatisfactory. I do not expressly blame the telegraphists for it. They had a Postmaster who had not been able to exercise proper control. His place had been filled by a chief clerk, who certainly in one respect showed he was not at all equal to the duties which he ought to perform, and the office had got out of hand. The result of this was that communications took place between the telegraph office and an infamous print styled the Western Mail, the editor of which journal appears to me to have done his best to decoy the servants of the Post Office into supplying him with information, in order to improve the circulation of his paper. I am glad to believe that in the main, as far as I can judge, the telegraphists turned out to be proof against such solicitations, but there is no doubt that at least one official document was published in the Western Mail, and no doubt the public servant who published that official document in the Western Mail ought not only to be subject to removal or to dismissal, but he ought to be prosecuted for having so betrayed his duty to the State. I came to the conclusion it was desirable to make a considerable number of promotions to the first-class at Cardiff. I was very anxious in making the promotions that I should not promote to higher and more important places in that office the person who had been guilty of this offence, and I therefore instructed the Surveyor to be very careful in the recommendations he made, and not to give me any men's names for promotion to the first-class whom he had just reason to suppose had been connected with this scandalous breach of official duty. The Surveyor seems to me to have rather blundered in the execution of his task, and he put the men to their purgation by demanding from them statements which, I think, they were perfectly justified in refusing to make. The result was that five of the eight men who were so questioned were promoted by me. Three were transferred to other offices; two of these have since been promoted, but, in view of such suspicion as attached to these officers, I could not feel it my duty to promote them while they remained at Cardiff. It has been to the interest of the men that they have been transferred to other offices, where I believe it possible, without prejudices to the Public Service, to put them in more important and responsible positions. With regard to one other man—for so this mountain subsides to a molehill—of the second class, who was transferred when he otherwise might have expected promotion, the hon. Member for Cardiff has spoken of him as being in absolute want. That is hardly a correct description; but I fear that the man's circumstances are not as good as could be wished, because, on a salary of 23s. 6d. per week, he has felt himself entitled to commit matrimony. This telegraphist is, perhaps, rather a subject for pity than otherwise. I am not aware that by so acting this gentleman has established any special claim on the Department. I have, however, given this officer an opportunity of entering the first class should his conduct be good. I have not punished these men. I found the office in a bad state, and I thought it desirable to fill it with new blood, and to transfer to other offices young men who, placed perhaps in circumstances calculated to cause them to yield to temptation, were led to manifest an unruly spirit. I think that I have done the best thing in their interests, as I am sure I have done the best thing in the interests of the Service, and I have no doubt as to the wisdom and propriety of the course I have pursued in causing the transfer of these eight men. I have to thank the Committee for listening to a longer speech than I intended to make, but I had to cover a good deal of ground. The noble Lord very kindly advised me to gain the affections of my subordinate officers. I do not know that I have done anything to forfeit the regard of any subordinate officer in my Department. Certainly I have done all that I could to show my regard for them. If any kind of estrangement has arisen, is it not rather due to the perhaps well meant endeavours of philanthropic politicians who go about encouraging people in making demands which may perhaps be extravagant, and certainly in a way which is wrong and improper? I prefer to think that I shall win the esteem and the confidence of the great Department, which, however unworthily, I administer, by showing justice tempered with kindness, and a constant goodwill towards the men in my employment, whatever provocation I may receive in this House or elsewhere.

*(11.5.) EARL COMPTON: I will not detain the Committee beyond a few minutes, but I feel, after what has taken place, that it will be expected I should say a few words. I have been under a disadvantage as regards this Debate. I brought forward my case in what I believed to be a very temperate manner, and I did my best not to insinuate anything that would in any way hurt the tender susceptibilities of the right hon. Gentleman. I spoke during the dinner hour, when the House was practically empty, and there are very few Members now present who heard my speech and the arguments with which I supported my case. Members came in to hear the answer of the Postmaster General, and they have applauded that answer as they had a right to do, for it was a very clever answer indeed. One part of it I wish to allude to. I have no intention of imputing to a political adversary words which were never used, or meanings which were never intended. But I draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to one point. In his speech the right hon. Gentleman referred to a certain statement of the telegraphists which was to be handed to the Royal Commission. My contention through the whole of my speech was that, owing to what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman, and the attitude he had taken up, he was himself, to a great extent, the cause of the discontent among the telegraphists. In enforcing this point I explained carefully what had taken place; I explained that the men had, as was their duty, approached the proper official at the Telegraph Department, asked him to receive a deputation and placed a statement in his hand, and this was ultimately returned with the remark that they might present it themselves. Now I draw attention to the words of the right hon. Gentleman when I first brought the matter before the House. He said, amongst other things, "I have been unable to obtain a copy of this Memorial, and have not, of course, been able to give it any consideration." The right hon. Gentleman seemed to be quite unaware that the statement had been presented, and I quite admit that when he says it was so. But, in addition, the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that, in fact, the matter had been "sprung upon the Department in the last moment," whereas it had been handed to the Controller at the end of last year.

MR. RAIKES: In saying that, I referred to the fact that I for the first time received a copy that very morning.

*EARL COMPTON: I am quite aware that the right hon. Gentleman said that at the time, but he informed the House that it had been "sprung upon the Department." I daresay it had not been submitted to the right hon. Gentleman.

I daresay that this may have been a little mistake on the part of the Controller, but I do not wish to say a word against any official. Let me also say that I did express satisfaction at what has been done for the telegraphists under the new plan. I offered a few harmless criticisms on minor points, but I said that, on the whole, the right hon. Gentleman had done well. I expressed my personal thanks, and said I thought it would create contentment among the telegraphists. But this was not what the right hon. Gentleman represented in his speech. He gave the Committee to understand that I had not said anything in favour of what the right hon. Gentleman has done. Let me say at once it is exactly this attitude taken at the moment towards myself—which is a very small matter—it is exactly this attitude persevered in towards those under him which has caused so much discontent, and for a long time has caused so much trouble in the Department. The right hon. Gentleman is free to make what remarks he pleases about philanthropic politicians; my anxiety is that he should turn over a new leaf, and treat those under him, who are not his servants, but the servants of the public, with a little sympathy and consideration. That is all I ask. From the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman to-night he evidently intends to do his best to ameliorate the condition of those who are placed under him for a time—a very short time—longer. After what the right hon. Gentleman has said, and seeing that he is really anxious now, in his fourth year of office, to redress the just grievances of the telegraphists, it is not my intention to carry my Motion to a Division. Again, let me say I am very glad indeed that at length the right hon. Gentleman has seen the necessity that something should be done for what I consider a most deserving class of public servants who have been underpaid and overworked for so long.

*(11.11.) SIR E. J. REED: The reply of the Postmaster General is, on the whole, satisfactory—at any rate, it is such as to lead me to believe that the men whom he has not “punished,” but who have suffered severely, will receive some consideration at his hands in future. The right hon. Gentleman has admitted that the Surveyor at Cardiff blundered in dealing with these men, and I am fully prepared to accept that statement, but I must say it is not quite satisfactory that public servants should be made to suffer for the blunders of those placed over them. I took the opportunity at an early stage to ask the right hon. Gentleman to remove the injurious effect of the errors made, to which these men were made victims; but I do not think any useful end will be served by pressing this matter to a Division if the noble Lord does not desire to do so. I have no doubt the Postmaster General acted in the matter as regards the Cardiff telegraphists, as he thought, fairly, and with the best intentions, but his action has been harsh in its effect upon these men.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

(11.12.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I believe I am in order in raising a question about which I do not think there will be much difference of opinion—the Telephone Service as it exists in this country. I think every Member of the House who has occasion to use the telephone in the Metropolis will admit that it is far from being perfect or from giving satisfaction. Indeed, I think it will be admitted that in London the service is both expensive and bad. The cost to an ordinary subscriber is £20 a year. Now, I believe in any other capital in Europe there is a much better service for £6 a year. Let any hon. Member try to talk between the West End and the City and say whether the service is worth calling a service. The first great error of the service is that it is conducted on a single wire instead of a double-wire system.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman must not enter into the details of the Telephone Service upon this vote.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: I am going to point out that the service is bad, and how for this the Post Office is responsible. If the Post Office had taken a reasonable view that the telegraph is to the telephone what stage coaches are to railways, instead of jealously shutting out the telephone for the advantage of the telegraph, then possibly there would be no cause to complain; at all events, if the Post Office had assumed more responsibility, it is probable we should have had a better service. What is the policy of the Government as to the future? I believe the Postmaster General has large ideas on the subject, and if I am not misinformed he applied to the Treasury to place at his disposal this year the sum of £3,000,000 in order to purchase the telephone system of the Metropolis in June last, when it was in their power to buy it. I do not know whether this is true or not; but it is a question I should like to put to the right hon. Gentleman, whether for the improvement of the system reliance is to be placed upon the granting of licences to rival Telephone Companies? I want to know whether the right hon. Gentleman thinks that this is fair to shareholders in the present National Company, and whether he thinks Parliament will consent to allowing competing companies to interfere with the existing company in this manner? How soon is it proposed to give a licence to a rival company, or are we to go on from year to year shutting out improvements and leaving ourselves in the hands of the National Company? It has practically got a monopoly of the Telephone Service all over the country. It has absorbed, by methods I do not stop to characterise, various enterprises. What I want to press upon the right hon. Gentleman is simply this: that he should tell us clearly what is to be the policy of the Post Office towards the telephone in the future; whether he is going to allow the present Company to continue the present bad system which is so expensive? Then, I would like to know what are the right hon. Gentleman's views in regard to what I may call the trunk lines which, I suppose, will be established throughout the country. Will these be in the hands of the Post Office, allowing local companies to develop local business in various towns? These are points upon which I shall be glad if the right hon. Gentleman can give us some definite information.

(11.20.) MR. RAIKES: I am very sorry I am not in a position to answer all these questions. It is quite true the Government had to consider this year whether they would purchase the undertaking of the National Company or not; and, after full and careful consideration, they came to the conclusion that it was not desirable to purchase that undertaking. That is generally known. Most of the patents held by the National Company will expire this year or next, and the whole position will then be radically changed. The question of the trunk lines and many other points are also under consideration. I hope I may rely upon the Committee not to seek to precipitate any statement at present, because the Government are not yet in a position to arrive at a definite policy, and as soon as possible I shall make an explanation to the House.

*(11.22.) SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I wish to ask for an explanation on one point of detail. Before the new regulations the scale of pay for certain towns was equal, but since the grouping of the towns there have arisen differences and anomalies which some of the telegraphists do not understand. In the case of Hull and Sheffield, for example, the maximum rate of pay is 54s. in Sheffield and 52s. in Hull, while the staff in Hull numbers 87 and in Sheffield only 75. There is no reason to believe that the expense of living is any greater in Sheffield than in Hull, and, on the face of it, the matter seems to be one for explanation.

(11.24.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I wish to draw attention to the fact that some of the railway stations in Ireland are without any Telegraph Service. I recently drew attention to one instance in which there were telegraph wires and an operator who was willing to be employed; but the right hon. Gentleman rather spoiled my case by sending down a special messenger to take away the instrument. I do not think any railway station ought to be without the telegraph. At the very station of which I speak there was a collision some time ago. Even if the Post Office loses £5 or £10 in the first year, I do not think that ought to prevent the establishment of a Telegraph Service.

(11.27.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): The right hon. Gentleman is no doubt aware that at the conference held at Paris in June this year a desire was expressed that an international signalling system should be established with uniform prices. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether anything can be done for bringing the British telegraph system into uniformity with the Continental system, and with a uniform charge. I believe Lloyd's Agency is considerably interested in the matter, and that the adoption of the suggestion would be of great benefit to ship-owners.

(11.28.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has turned his attention to the question of introducing the carte system of telegrams which obtains in the City of Paris and elsewhere on the Continent. You can go into a Post Office in Paris and write at considerable length on a card or envelope, and in an hour or less you can have your message delivered at the cost of 3d. No doubt the adoption of the system would mean a considerable outlay at first. I hope the right hon. Gentleman if he has not yet heard of this wonderful method of communication will very soon hear of it, and that before long it may be introduced into this country.

*(11.31.) MR. RAIKES: In reply to the question raised by the hon. Member for South Islington (Sir A. Rollit), I may state that I have asked for particulars as to the relative number of the staff in Hull and Sheffield, and I hope soon to have information on that point. With regard to what has fallen from the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite, I can assure him that I quite take his view, but I am afraid I have no power to compel a Railway Company to open a telegraph station. I shall, however, be glad to communicate with the Railway Company on the subject. In reply to the question of the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire with regard to the signalling of ships, I am sure the Committee will be glad to know that one of the results of the Telegraphic Congress at Paris a month ago has been that the charge in such cases is to be reduced from two francs to one franc, which is to be a uniform charge. In answer to the question raised by the hon. Member for the Haggerston Division (Mr. Cremer), relative to the carte system of telegrams, that matter is one that has been carefully considered by the Department, and information has been obtained on the subject. I should be glad if the hon. Member would come down to the Post Office and see the Report which has been furnished to the office with regard to that system by two of the most experienced officers of the Telegraph Department, so that he might be able to give his candid consideration to the objections that have been raised against it. I should be glad to introduce that or any other system which would be advantageous to the Service but so far as the evidence goes, I am inclined to think that the carte system is less rapid and efficient than the ordinary Telegraph Service of London, and that, on the whole, the Telegraph Service of Paris is not so expeditious as our own.

MR. CREMER: I did not claim for the carte system that it is more expeditious than ours, but I said it was very much cheaper, the charge being only 3d. I have had experience of the working of the system in Paris, having sent hundreds of messages by it, and in no instance has there been any failure. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will undertake to make further inquiry into a system which has produced such excellent results on the other side of the Channel where everyone is satisfied with it, not only as regards expedition, but also in respect of the remarkably low charges that are made.

(11.38.) MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for some further explanation with regard to the non-purchase of the telephones. About a month ago I asked a question as to whether a Treasury Minute would be issued before the end of the Session; and I now wish to know whether, if it cannot be issued so soon, the Government will raise any objection to my moving for a Return of any prospective character, so that it may be circulated during the Recess?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I can readily understand that a good many people may be anxious to know the exact policy of the Government on such a question as this. We are not, however, in a position to say what our exact policy will be; but I think it will interest many persons to know that the Government have absolutely made up their minds that they will not purchase the telephones, and that there is no chance of the telephones being dealt with as the telegraphs have been. If the right hon. Gentleman will move for the Return he has mentioned, I will see whether it will be possible to circulate such a Return during the Recess. The right hon. Gentleman will, however, understand that in the last weeks of the Session when there is a particular stress of business both Parliamentary and Departmental, it would be difficult to issue a Treasury Minute on the subject.

*MR. CHILDERS: I will gladly move for the Return assented to by the right hon. Gentleman. I may add that I have merely asked the question solely in the interest of the public, and not in that of any sellers or companies.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see the desirability of so arranging the accounts of the Telegraph Service that they will show the difference between capital expenditure on new works and other expenditure. If the accounts are made up in that way, I think they would show that the Telegraph Service is now worked at an ample profit, although it has been said that it has been carried on at a loss. No doubt that was the case immediately after the sixpence telegrams were instituted, and in 1887 there was a loss of £105,000; but in 1890 the account shows a surplus of £144,000, owing to the great increase of business. I find that in the expenditure of that year there was included £81,000 for the purchase of submarine telegraphs and other capital expenditure, bringing the total up to £189,000, so that, adding that to the surplus of £144,000, there was, in point of fact, a real surplus of £333,000—quite enough to pay the interest on the capital value of the Telegraph Service plant.

*MR. GOSCHEN: The point referred to by the right hon. Gentleman is one which the Government will, of course, give every consideration to, but it is very difficult to settle what particular amount ought to be carried to the capital account.

MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I should like to offer a remark with regard to the carrying of the telegraph wires overhead. I wish to know whether wires now carried overhead could not, to a large extent, be conveyed in tubes underground. My attention was called to this matter by what I saw the other day in the County of Sussex, where the effect of the erection of a long line of black poles, carrying a single overhead wire, was positively disfiguring to a very beautiful and picturesque bit of scenery, and to that extent, of course, depreciated the property. I would suggest that where wires can be carried underground, they should be so laid down.

MR. RAIKES: I will see what can be done in reference to this matter, but I would remind the hon. Gentleman that it is always competent to the owner of a property to have the wires carried underground at his own cost.

Vote agreed to.

Resolution to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £714,027, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1891, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Customs Department."

MR. J. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I desire to call attention to the case of the writers in the statistical branch of the Customs. That branch presented a unique, if not, indeed, a really lamentable aspect. Its work was of a most important character, but was not known to the public, inasmuch as its Returns appeared in Reports issued by the Board of Trade. Of the whole staff, 54 out of 111 were persons on temporary employ. Sixteen years ago there were 20 writers in it; and 10 years ago, when the branch was re-organised, the number of writers was fixed at eight. So little had the basis of that re-organisation been regarded that actually almost 50 per cent. of the staff were now men on purely temporary employ—in name at least. The truth was, that the writers were in continuous employ there, for many regularly doing the work of second-class (and indeed, in several instances of first-class) clerks had been in the office for 10 whole years. It had been admitted that only the best writers found employment in the Statistical Department of the Customs.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I may remind the hon. Member that I am, at the present moment, conducting an inquiry into the Customs Service, and in the course of that inquiry I shall have representatives of various classes of employés before me, and those of the writers might be included, who would then have an opportunity of stating their case.

MR. KELLY: I feel bound, nevertheless, to bring this case before the Committee. The evidence of Mr. Stephen Bourne before the Playfair Commission showed that so far back as 1874 there was a deliberate conviction in the minds of the writers in the Statistical Department of the Customs that the result of inquiries being made into their position would be their being put upon the Establishment. He stated in his evidence that many of them did the work of second and even first class clerks. In 1880 the office was re-organised, and the number of writers for it fixed at eight. In October, 1888, a tardy and small concession was made to the writers, numbering over 50, in this branch, an addition of 2d. per hour having then been conceded to a certain number of them. It could not be supposed that they would rest with this paltry concession made to these few men, though it was no doubt the fact that the concession was anti-dated to the beginning of the year, and the accruing arrears were paid from January to October in that year.

It being midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Resolution to be reported this day; Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolutions [31st July] reported.

REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

1. "That a sum, not exceeding £4,898,561 (including a Supplementary sum of £50,000), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Post Office Services, the Expenses of Post Office Savings Banks, and Government Annuities and Insurances, and the Collection of the Post Office Revenue."

(12.2.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I have to bring forward a case which I should not mention were it not for the fact that other cases have from time to time occurred. It argues a very bad system that postmen against whom no complaint can be made and who are credited by the Post Office itself with a clean record, may on some pretence—it may be on a false accusation made by persons having a grudge against them—be deprived of their means of livelihood without being allowed a chance of clearing themselves or having the case properly investigated. A man named Cornwell had been engaged in a Department of the Post Office in which it was his duty to investigate cases of theft. He served the Post Office so faithfully that in a particular case of robbery he was complimented at the trial, I think by the Judge, upon his skill in unravelling the plot. At a later period, when he was in a different position, and had to supervise the transmission of parcels, a certain parcel was found to be missing. Some months afterwards the loss of that parcel was attributed to him. Cornwell alleges that the charge was trumped up against him by certain other officials whom he had offended when on detective duty. After the parcel had passed through his hands it was placed in an ordinary basket, and he received no receipt to show that he had properly handed it over. On the charge against him being made, a detective went to his house, and, after treating him with something like contumely, actually carried away the keys of his desk. As I understand, no inquiry has been vouchsafed to this gentleman, and he was simply dismissed the Service. Surely, in such a case, it is only right that a man should have the opportunity of clearing himself of the charge made against him.

(12.10.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I should like the right hon. Gentleman to give me an answer to the question I have addressed to him regarding the mail service in the North of Ireland. The matter was fully explained to the right hon. Gentleman by a very powerful deputation representing every class in the North of Ireland; and the right hon. Gentleman made so satisfactory and significant a reply that there was the very general belief that the case would be promptly dealt with. In order to emphasise the urgency of the case, let me say that twice this very week in Belfast letters which ought to have been delivered at noon were not delivered until 2 o'clock in the afternoon. The outward mail leaves at 2.55 p.m., so that there were only 55 minutes on these two days to answer the general and commercial correspondence in that great community. In several other towns in the North of Ireland the inward mails are not delivered until the outward mails have left. The City of Belfast is a most important contribution to the Customs Revenue of the United Kingdom—it is next to London and Liverpool—and taking all the circumstances into account, I do trust the right hon. Gentleman will lose no time in dealing with the case.

(12.14.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): There has been a grievance of a local character brought to my notice, and

I desire to lay it before the Postmaster General. It relates to the allowance of overtime to postmen in some districts in the North of Ireland. Owing to the difficulties of the sea passage, the delivery of the Scotch mails in Belfast and along the Great Northern line is sometimes extremely irregular, and the postmen who are charged with the delivery of the letters in Belfast and Lurgan and other towns receive an allowance for overtime. I have been informed that in Lisburn there is no allowance for overtime. The postmen charged with the delivery of these letters in Lisburn have to wait on two or three occasions during the week for an hour or an hour and a half before they can get the letters. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will inquire into the matter, and that, if he finds my statement to be correct, he will place the postmen of Lisburn on the same footing as the postmen of Belfast and other towns.

(12.16.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I trust the right hon. Gentleman will soon be able to see his way to effect an improvement in the postal arrangements at Macroom. I have brought the matter under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman before, and, therefore, there is no necessity that I should say more now.

(12.17) MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I only wish to say one word with regard to the Stranraer service. We hope the right hon. Gentleman will take steps as soon as possible to improve the Mail Service from England to the North of Ireland.

MR. McCARTAN (Down, S.): It is a matter of paramount urgency to the commercial community of Belfast that the evening Service from Stranraer should be improved. The community are inconvenienced very much by the lateness of the mails. The deputation which waited upon the Postmaster General was influential and representative of all classes and of all shades of politics. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will be able to act upon their suggestions, and thus afford the commercial community of Belfast the postal facilities they are justly entitled to.

(12.18.) MR. RAIKES: The hon. Member for Camborne has brought forward the case of a man named Cornwell, who has recently been dismissed from the Post Office service. The hon. Gentleman has been misinformed. The case is one to which I have given a great deal of personal attention; indeed, I may say that in cases of dismissal or punishment I have always endeavoured to satisfy myself thoroughly as to the facts, and to mitigate, if I can, the effect of the regulations of the Department. Cornwell has now been dismissed for the second time. He was dismissed two years ago for making extremely glaring false statements relating to a brother officer, who is since deceased, and I have always regretted that I was induced to reinstate him upon his making a very full apology and retraction of the charge, because I had great doubt at the time as to whether he was a fit person, under the circumstances, to remain in the Service. Cornwell had a superabundant opportunity of stating his case, and I could come to no other conclusion than that it was necessary, in the interest not merely of the Service at large, but especially in that of the other men employed on the same duty, that his case should be dealt with in an exemplary manner. Therefore, it is impossible to hold out any hope that Cornwell will be restored to the Service. The hon. Members for West Belfast and Down have very naturally pressed for some further statement as regards the Mail Service to the North of Ireland. I admit all that has been said by the hon. Members, both as to the importance of the interests involved and as to the influential and representative character of the deputation I had the honour to receive. I have lost no time in endeavouring to obtain the necessary data on which to form an opinion. As soon as I have those data I will lose no time in arriving at a decision in the matter. The hon. Member for Antrim has called attention to some inequality which exists in regard to the pay of postmen in Ulster. I will see whether there is any foundation for the complaint. I have to thank the hon.

Mr. Raikes

Member for Mid Cork for the patience he has shown in dealing with the question of Macroom, which he brought under my notice two years ago. If I am able to do anything in the direction he desires, I shall be most happy to do so.

Resolution agreed to.

2 "That a sum, not exceeding £539,829 (including an additional sum of £37,169), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the Expense of the Post Office Packet Service."

Resolution agreed to.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (MONEY) BILL.—(No. 388.)

Order for consideration of Bill, as amended, read.

(12.25.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell): I beg to propose the Amendment which stands in my name. I think the right hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir J. Lubbock) has expressed his willingness to accept this slight Amendment.

Amendment proposed. Clause 6, page 6, line 30, to omit the words "Council Chamber and."—(Mr. Kelly.)

*(12.26.) SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): The object of the clause is to enable the Council to purchase a site for their offices, so that they may be able to bring the whole staff together. If the effect of the Amendment would be to prevent the Council Chamber and offices being on the same site, of course, I must oppose it, as that would defeat the very object of the clause. I understand, however, that the Amendment is merely a drafting Amendment, as the word "offices" includes Council Chamber. Under these circumstances, if the hon. Member cares to press his Amendment I shall not oppose it.

Question put and negatived.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I beg to move "That the Bill be now read the third time."

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

*(12.27.) MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): I wish to take this opportunity of protesting against the doctrine advanced on the Second Reading by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler). That right hon. Gentleman seems to think it is not in the province of the House to discuss any of the proceedings of the County Council. So far as I am able to understand, the County Council represents the late Metropolitan Board of Works. [Cries of "No."]

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I rise to order. I believe that this a money Bill, and that it is a Rule of the House that only one stage of a money Bill can be taken at one sitting.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is not strictly a Money Bill. The assent of the House to its provisions are necessary under a Statute, and that is the reason why it is exempt from the Rule.

*MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: I was about to say that the proceedings of the Metropolitan Board of Works were discussed in the House, and I think the proceedings of the County Council may very properly be subject to discussion here. I may also take this opportunity of protesting against the charge made by some Members opposite as to the alleged hostility to the County Council on the part of Members on this side of the House, because the sentiments which they hold as to the inefficiency of the County Council are shared unanimously by all the intelligent ratepayers residing in Bond Street, Piccadilly, Oxford Street, and Regent Street. The scenes which have lately occurred there have been condemned even by the hon. Member for St. Pancras (Mr. H. L. Lawson), who has compared them to the proceedings of a Clerkenwell or St. Pancras Vestry. I am very much afraid that when any question affecting the County Council of London comes before the House, the interests of the ratepayers are apt to be forgotten in the discussion. In my own part of London the ratepayers protest very much against the mode in which the business of the County Council has been conducted. I hope the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir J. Lubbock) will endeavour to keep order in the Council.

*(12.32.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I do not agree in the construction put upon the Amendment by the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Lubbock). I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) will understand that the alteration which has been made is with the view of restricting the application of the money to additional offices, and to prevents its being used for a new Council Chamber, which many of us consider to be unnecessary.

*(12.33.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: If the statement of my hon. Friend who has just sat down had been the case, I should have been compelled to object to this Amendment. I distinctly stated, however, that I accepted it because it had no practical effect, but was a mere question of drafting. Our object is to get the officers of the Council together. We are not anxious to do anything with regard to the Council chamber itself, except in the event of being able to acquire a sufficiently large site to get all the staff together. With regard to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck), I shall be prepared to answer any attack that may be made upon us, and, I hope, to the satisfaction of the House. I can only say that the Council will maintain its own order; and considering the lateness of the hour, and the vague character of the right hon. Gentleman's remarks—I hope the right hon. Gentleman will excuse me—I do not think the House would expect me to enter into any further defence of the Council.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

TRAMWAYS ORDER IN COUNCIL (IRELAND) (SOUTH CLARE RAILWAYS)
BILL.—(No. 301.)

As amended, considered; Bill read the third time, and passed.

PARLIAMENTARY REGISTRATION EXPENSES (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 401.)
COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee).

Clause 1.

Question proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

(12.35.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I wish to ask for an explanation of one or two points. Has any estimate been formed of the probable amount that will be expended in any one year in consequence of the passing of this measure, and what is the probable maximum rate which will be imposed in consequence? I find clerks and collectors of poor rates mentioned in the 1st clause. I wish to ask whether these are the only officials who render services in connection with the Parliamentary franchise.

(12.36.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I have not full information to give on the first point, but the charge thrown on the Unions under the Bill will be very small. As to the second question, the definition given in the first line of the clause is actually exhaustive.

DR. TANNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman be able to afford us any information before the Third Reading of the Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will make inquiries. In the meantime I will put down the Bill for this day week.

(12.37.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Is it desirable to postpone this stage?

MR. SEXTON: I shall be satisfied if an answer can be given to a question next week. I do not think it is necessary to delay this stage.

(12.38.) DR. TANNER: As my hon. Friend does not object to the passing of the Bill, I will not take exception to it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill reported, without Amendment; read the third time, and passed.

NORTH-EASTERN SEA FISHERIES DISTRICT ORDER (LINDSEY).

Resolved, That this House resolves, pursuant to section 1, sub-section (4), of "The Sea Fisheries Regulation Act, 1888," that such part of the Order for the creation of the North-Eastern Sea Fisheries District as relates to any part of the sea or coast lying to the south of a line drawn true east from Donna Nook Beacon, in the Parts of Lindsey, in Lincolnshire, ought not to be in force.—(Mr. Secretary Stanhope.)

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE
BILL.—(No. 245.)

Lords Amendments to be considered forthwith; considered, and agreed to.

COMPANIES (MEMORANDUM OF ASSOCIATION) BILL.—(No. 114.)

Lords Amendments to be considered upon Friday next, and to be printed. [Bill 407.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Motion for Adjournment:—

(12.43.) MR. MARJORIBANKS: When will the Foreign Office Vote be taken?

MR. JACKSON: I am not able to say.

MR. SEXTON: The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the other day that the information for which we asked relative to the contribution of £40,000 to Ireland would be issued in a day or two. We have not yet received that information, and I desire to ask when we may expect it?

(12.44.) MR. JACKSON: My right hon. Friend said it would be given in the course of the financial year, but I do not know that he promised it on any specific day.

MR. SEXTON: He said in a day or two.

MR. JACKSON: I will inquire about it to-morrow.

SIR W. LAWSON: What will be the first business to-morrow?

MR. JACKSON: The Police Bill.

SIR W. LAWSON: That will occupy the whole day.

MR. JACKSON: I hope not.

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Saturday, 2nd August, 1890.

The House met at Twelve of the clock.

QUESTION.

THE FOREIGN OFFICE VOTE.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I wish to ask when the Foreign Office Vote is likely to be taken?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am afraid that I cannot say.

INFANT LIFE PROTECTION BILL.

(No. 142.)

Reported from the Select Committee, with Minutes of Evidence;

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 346.]

Bill re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House for Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 408.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

RESERVE FORCES BILL.—(No. 272.)

Bill considered in Committee, and reported without Amendment.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I hope that I may be allowed to move that the Bill be now read a third time.

Question, "That the Bill be now read a third time," put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

POLICE BILL.—(No. 392.)

Order for Consideration, as amended by the Standing Committee, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now Considered."

(12.23.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.), who had a Notice on the Paper of his intention to move, "That the Bill be considered on this day three months," said: I wish to state my reasons for arriving at the conclusion that the

Bill ought not to be considered at the present time. It is a measure which has been very little discussed, and I do not think that the House ought to be called upon to consider it at a Saturday Sitting. No one knows better the importance of the measure than the Home Secretary. It is a Bill which introduces a bad principle, and its financial arrangements are extravagant to a degree which the House and the country can scarcely realise. The Home Secretary, however, is fully aware of all its defects, seeing that he has had a Report upon it from an actuary of his own choosing. I say advisedly that if the same principle is to be applied to other portions of the United Kingdom the result will be to impose upon the ratepayers an effective charge for the expense of the police very considerably exceeding £2,000,000 per annum. [Cries of "Agreed!"] Hon. Members say "Agreed!" Do they think that we are going to allow this Bill to pass without discussion? [Cries of "Divide!"] Hon. Members may cry "Divide!" but they will be very much mistaken if they think they are going to put me down. They should remember how they treated one of their own friends last night. [Cries of "Divide!"]

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must invite the hon. Member to confine himself to the Question before the House.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Certainly, Sir; but, at the same time, I think that the interruptions from the other side of the House are most irregular. I was going to say—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is out of order.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I bow to your ruling, Sir; but I was only appealing to you for protection against the interruptions to which I have been subjected from hon. Gentlemen opposite.

*MR. SPEAKER: It is my duty to keep order. I called for order on behalf of the hon. Gentleman, and silence was restored.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I quite feel, Sir, that I am safe in your hands, and I apologise for having made any suggestion that it was necessary for me to appeal to you for protection. What I was anxious to say was this: That the actuary to whom the Home Secretary referred the question of cost made an elaborate Report, and explained that under the present extravagant system which exists as to pensions in the Metropolitan Police Force, the expenditure would come eventually to £520,000 per annum, and that the changes which are proposed to be made will increase that amount to at least £600,000 per annum. Broadly speaking, we may take it that the number of the Provincial Police exceed those of the Metropolitan Police by 60 or 70 per cent., and, therefore, if the same system is to be enforced in the provinces, the result will be to give a matured pension system of about £1,000,000 there. I am willing, however, to estimate it at £800,000, so that the two together, the Metropolitan and Provincial Police superannuation allowances will come to about £1,400,000, or, in round numbers, to £1,500,000 per annum. In addition, there are the Irish Police, which already cost £300,000 a year, as against £200,000 for the Metropolitan Police, so that we may safely estimate another £600,000 a year in that case, and, including also the Scotch Police, I think it will be admitted that I am much within the mark when I say that the eventual cost of these police superannuation allowances will amount to more than £2,000,000 per annum. Now, I do not think that that is a matter to be disposed of with a light heart at a Saturday Sitting; nor is it a charge which we can impose to day and alter to-morrow. When once imposed, according to the doctrine of vested interests, it will become an irrevocable charge, and will be settled, like the Old Man of the Sea in the case of Sinbad the Sailor, upon the shoulders of the nation. One great reason why we should refuse to dispose of so important a Bill at a Saturday Sitting, is that neither the House nor the country understands the frightful effect which this proposal will have upon the rates. The constituencies and the Municipal Authorities have had no real opportunity of considering and discussing the measure. Many hon. Members whose constituencies are deeply interested in the question abstain from attending a Saturday Sitting, and the result is that the Government and their majority will be able to do as they like. When I say that the Government will have their own way I do not mean to suggest that it is a wicked Government, or that the Home Secretary is a wicked man, or that he is inclined to do wicked things. On the contrary, I believe that he dislikes this Bill as much as I do, but I am afraid that he does not possess sufficient firmness to enable him to resist pressure. He has "wobbled" in the matter and given away far too much to agitation of the higher officers of the police. He proposes now to concede to the police that which the Committee refused, and I think in a thin house like this that is a very serious state of things. Then again, if the Government rush this Bill through the House without considering the wishes of the Scotch people, they will do much to imperil the Scotch Bill when it is brought forward. That Bill, also, was considered by a Committee in which the Government had a majority. Most of the Members of the Committee were Scotch Members, but even the Scotch Tories upon it were independent, and they managed to alter the measure in various material points. But if this English Bill is carried we shall be told that we cannot refuse to Scotland the gift which has been made to England, with the result that the Scotch Bill will be restored to its original form. I confess that I never liked the Bill, I always thought it a very extravagant measure, and a very centralising measure. When, however, I went into the Committee I gained some additional information, and I was soon satisfied that not only was the Bill extravagant and undesirable, but that there is no reason why we should be in a great hurry to pass it. It seems to me that we require no Bill at all, but simply a declaration as to the manner in which the gift of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to be distributed among the localities. Why is it that this Bill is pressed forward? [Cries of "Agreed" and "Divide!"]

Sir G. Campbell

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I believe the reason is very simple. The Government have altogether failed this year to do anything in the shape of legislation. [Loud cries of "Divide!"] I am afraid that hon. Members by these continued interruptions are simply delaying the proceedings. As I was saying, the Government have effected nothing in the shape of legislation, but in order to show the country that they have done something, they are pressing forward this Superannuation Bill. It is a measure which has been forced upon the Government by the police officers themselves. The Metropolitan officers have combined together to force upon the Government the excessively liberal terms which it is now proposed to give. Hon. Members will have seen a Circular from the Chief Constable at Hull, stating that in the opinion of that gentleman the police require an increase of pay, and calling upon the Members of this House to vote for it. In other cases I believe the Members of the Government have found themselves able to resist pressure of this kind, and I very much wish that the Home Secretary in this instance had shown similar firmness. The doctrine now acted upon appears to be that the country is made for the Services and not the Services for the country. I know I shall be told that this is not altogether the Bill of the Government, but that something of a similar nature was brought in by the late Government at the instance of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), whom I am sorry not to see in his place to-day. No doubt the Bill does bear a certain amount of resemblance to the Bill brought in by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, but it is a resemblance only. Radical changes have been made in it, and all of them, without exception, are changes in favour of the police, while none of them are in the public interest. No doubt, seeing the agitation which has been going on, it is desirable that something should be done to settle it, but I deny that this Bill will settle it either one way or the other. I am sorry to see so few of the Metropolitan Members present, but they told the Committee that the men of the police are not interested in the superannuation fund to the same extent as the officers. On the contrary, the men complain that the officers are trying to get this Superannuation Bill for their own ends, and they say that it is not really for superannuation, but for an increase of pay. Therefore, the measure is not likely to settle the agitation on the part of the police, but there will be continued agitation and discontent. There is one question which I wish to put to the Home Secretary. [Cries of "Divide!"] I can assure hon. Members that they are only wasting time by endeavouring to interrupt me. The question I wish to put to the right hon. Gentleman is this: He referred the question of superannuation, as far as the Metropolis is concerned, to a strong Departmental Committee, which sat and took evidence. I want to know why they should not report, and why we have not the advantage of the evidence of the eminent Civil servants who were examined? I believe the reason was that the Chief Commissioner of Police, representing the interests of the officers, would not agree to the Report. He insisted upon having his own way, and the result is that we are not favoured with the opinion of the Committee. Then again, the Local Authorities have had no opportunity of expressing an opinion upon the Bill. In the case of my own constituency I sent a copy of the Bill, late as it was in being introduced, down to Kirkcaldy, and asked for an opinion upon it. There was a meeting to consider it, and the reply I got was that the matter was so complicated and difficult that they must decline to express any opinion upon it, and must leave it to my own discretion. I must confess that that is a discretion I am not very willing to exercise. At first I was inclined to blame the Town Council, believing that with the acumen which Scotchmen enjoy they were fitted to express an opinion; but, after re-considering the matter, I have come to the conclusion that, on the whole, they were right, because, although shrewd and able, they are also cautious Scotchmen, and had really no data before them upon which they could form an opinion. In the exercise of my discretion on their behalf I appeal to the House not to act hurriedly, but to postpone the consideration of the Bill until adequate time shall have been afforded for its consideration. The Government will, doubtless, say that the Bill has been before a Grand Committee. I admit that Grand Committees are an excellent institution, and I should have been prepared to accept the Bill if it had been referred to a Grand Committee early in the Session, with a thorough opportunity of considering it. But, in this case, the measure was thrown at the heads of the Grand Committee in the middle of July, when most hon. Members wanted to get away from London, and when, out of the 80 Members who composed the Committee, it was very difficult to get together a quorum of 20. [Loud cries of "Divide."]

(12.54.) Mr. LAFONE (Southwark, Bermondsey), rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is, no doubt, within his right in speaking on the Bill, but I cannot wonder at the impatience with which the House has listened to him. It must be evident to the hon. Member that he has been for the last half-hour discussing the subject in a manner which it is undesirable to adopt with a measure which has been debated in a Grand Committee.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I bow to your ruling, Sir. In my opinion the measure is a most important one, and I thought I was within my right in discussing it. But as you, Sir, express an opinion that it is not desirable to discuss it—

*MR. SPEAKER: I did not say so.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Or, at any rate, that the way in which I was discussing it was not a proper one, I submit at once to your ruling. At the same time, I confess that I fail to see that I have exceeded the ordinary bounds of debate. I had intended to move the Motion which stands in my name on the Paper, but I will do no more than say that the measure is one which introduces radical changes into the system of superannuation; that it adopts in favour of the police a system which is unknown in any other Department; and that we are in danger of passing an ill-digested scheme in a hurry, forced on by the Government majority at a Saturday sitting.

(12.56.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is not expedient that police pensions in England should be on a higher scale than in Scotland, and that it is desirable that this Bill be re-committed to the same Committee of the Whole House to which the Police (Scotland) Bill has been committed."

*MR. SPEAKER: It would be out of order to put that Motion, because it contains two very distinct propositions, which cannot be taken together.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Then I will move the first part of the Resolution—

Sir G. Campbell

"That in the opinion of this House, it is not expedient that police pensions in England should be on a higher scale than in Scotland."

I see that the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Howard Vincent) proposes to move as an Amendment to my Resolution—

"That the Scottish police should not be placed, as regards pensions, on an inferior scale to the police of England and Wales."

*MR. SPEAKER: That Amendment will be out of order, because it is impossible in a discussion upon one Bill to refer to another.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I am much obliged to you, Sir, for your ruling. It is a point which I was going myself to submit. I do not propose to occupy much of the time of the House in moving this Resolution, and it would be most agreeable to me to withdraw it altogether if the Government will consent to postpone the Scotch Police Bill for the present Session, so that, before it becomes law, the people of Scotland may have an opportunity of considering its provisions. After the important Amendment which was effected yesterday by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Local Taxation Bill, it will be easy for the Government to withdraw the measure for the present Session, and allow it to go before the Scotch people during the Recess. If there is any hope of the Government accepting that compromise, I will not move my Motion now; but, if not, I am afraid that I shall find myself compelled to move it. Between the Schedules of the Scotch and English Bills, there is a remarkable divergency. I will take that as a basis of fact, and proceed, as I understand the Home Secretary is placing Amendments on the Paper which will have the effect of making this divergency still greater. The proposition which I invite assent to is that it is not desirable that the Police Pension scale should be higher in England than it is in Scotland, for this, among other reasons: that the Members of the Scotch Police, after being trained, are attracted to the English Police Force by the higher pay and the better scale of superannuation. We had thoroughly conclusive evidence to that effect before the Committee from the Government witness, Captain Monro, Inspector General of the Scotch police, who said that it would be desirable to have a uniform scale of pensions between the English provinces and Scotland. "Why do you say the English provinces?" "Because there must be a superior scale for a part of England other than the provinces." "Do I understand you to mean that the competition comes more from the provinces than from the Metropolis?" "Naturally, because they are nearer." That is evidence so strong, and from a person so well qualified to speak, that I am sure the Home Secretary would not dream, for a moment, of passing it by without an answer. I have had communications sent to me saying that the competition is disastrous to the Scotch Police Force. I wish to refer to the Amendment put down by the hon. Member (Mr. W. F. Lawrence), about which he consulted me, and in reference to which I understand he has official authority. What he proposes is this: that where a policeman removes from a Scotch to an English Force to get the higher scale of pay and pension, the Scotch Authority should have the right of giving him the higher rate. I understand that to be a serious Amendment with official countenance.

*MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): The hon. Member has misunderstood me as to having had official authority.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: If I misunderstood what the hon. Member said, I am very sorry for it. But if that is so, I think it adds to the gravity of the proposition which I intend to submit to the House. I wish the First Lord of the Treasury to consider whether he cannot assent to the Motion to re-commit the Scotch Bill, or whether, at all events, he will not purchase some facilities for the passage of the English Bill by withdrawing the Scotch Bill for the present Session, in order to give the Scotch people time to consider it.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the first word 'That,' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'in the opinion of this House, it is not expedient that police pensions in England should be on a higher scale than in Scotland.'"
—(Mr. Edmund Robertson.)

*(1.10.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Mr. Speaker, the hon. and learned Gentleman appeals to me whether we will not purchase facilities for the English Bill by the withdrawal of the Scotch Bill. Undoubtedly it would be a great temptation to the Government and the House of Commons to obtain facilities for the passing of a Bill which must become law. But we have endeavoured, with the assistance of right hon. Gentlemen opposite and the Lord Advocate, to ascertain the views of Scotch Members on both sides of the House, and the overwhelming majority have conveyed an expression of their desire to the Government that the Scotch Bill should be passed this Session. I believe only some three or four Scotch Members took the other view. I think the hon. and learned Gentleman will see that, under the circumstances, the Government are bound to meet the wishes of Scotch Members, an important section of the House, on a matter which concerns the security and interests of the Scotch Police Force, and the peace of that part of the United Kingdom. Under these circumstances, I am afraid that I cannot purchase the facilities which the hon. and learned Member offers, and if he and his friends do insist upon protracting the Debate upon this measure, and upon the Scotch Bill which is to follow, I am afraid that the result will be that hon. Members will be subjected to the inconvenience and exhaustion of a further few days' sitting.

*MR. E. ROBERTSON: I only alluded to my own Motion.

MR. W. H. SMITH: The invitation of the hon. and learned Gentleman was of a very clear character, and I think the House will see that it is important, even at the cost of inconvenience to hon. Members, that we should decline the invitation offered to us.

*(1.15.) MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I should like to say a few words in confirmation of what the right hon. Gentleman has said. My right hon. Friend (Sir G. Trevelyan) and I endeavoured yesterday to ascertain the views of Scotch Members. We obtained, as carefully as we could, the views of Scotch Members on this side of the House, and certainly four out of five of them desired that the Bill should proceed immediately after the English Bill. We could only find at the outside about six who held a different view. Under these circumstances, and seeing that the Committee has introduced considerable Amendments, and finally put the Bill into a shape for favourable discussion, I hope that the House will not take any steps to postpone unnecessarily the discussion of this Bill.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the House that the question before it is the re-committal of this Bill and the question of making a bargain by giving facilities, for the English Bill is not one which can be discussed, and I hope the House will not pursue that course.

(1.12.) MR. S. STOREY (Sunderland): I certainly shall not pursue that course further. I am extremely glad that the Government will have no trafficking in the matter. Upon the Motion before the House, I can well understand that we English Members ought not to object to Scotch policemen coming in large numbers to England. In the North of England very good policemen are obtained from Scotland because of the better terms offered. But I want to look fairly at the matter. Some of us are extremely anxious that this Bill should be held over, because we believe that, if the opportunity were afforded, we should be able to introduce into the English Bill economical results similar to those which have been achieved by the Committee on the Scotch Bill. I would put this argument to the First Lord of the Treasury: Supposing the Scotch Bill offered as good terms as does the English Bill, does he think that one out of ten Scotch Members would desire the Scotch Bill to pass? The Scotch Members are satisfied with their Bill in its present form, because they have got a very much lower scale of pensions than is proposed in the English Bill. The right hon. Gentleman stated that we may be kept here a few days longer. The right hon. Gentleman is constantly throwing out threats or innuendos, but it is our business to stay here and to see that Bills are put into proper form; and we can trust hon. Members opposite to give us fair-play if we discuss practical proposals in a practical spirit. Our protest is altogether upon the matter of the scale of pensions; and we are certain that if we get the measure referred to a Committee, common sense and economy will exert an influence upon the provisions of the Bill, and that the Bill would be more satisfactory than it is at present, I do not say to everybody, but to many of us. I think I may ask the Home Secretary to give some definite reply, and the point I wish to press upon him is this: that if he had brought in a separate Bill for the Metropolis, which is governed by itself, and a separate Bill for the provinces, giving the latter an uniform rate with Scotland, the Bill would have been in a very much more defensible position than it has assumed. How does the right hon. Gentleman justify giving one scale to counties north of the Humber, and then, directly he crosses the Tweed, introducing another scale? I submit he cannot justify it. He is bound, before we go further, to explain why he does this. We wish so to modify the Bill that the provinces may be treated more equitably than is now proposed.

(1.22.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I can quite confirm what has been said with reference to the opinion of Scotch Members on this side of the House as to the desirability of proceeding with the Bill; but it is exactly because I desire this Scotch Bill to pass, and think it an exceedingly good Bill, that I support the Motion of my hon. Friend. I believe the scale in our Scotch Bill is exceedingly reasonable, but we do not consider that the scale in the English Bill is of a reasonable character. We desire that the scale in the English Bill shall be assimilated to the scale in the Scotch Bill, and we consider that to be a very reasonable proposal. The Chief Constable for Edinburgh in his evidence stated that the limited form of superannuation in Scotland told very injuriously against the Scotch Police, because men who resolved to make the Police Service a profession were attracted to England by the better terms offered. I maintain that if you create a new system under which the English Police get a higher scale of pensions than the Scotch Police, we shall find the present difficulties in Scotland intensified. For these reasons I support the Amendment of my right hon. Friend behind me.

*(1.24.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I wish to say a few words on this point. It is a little inconvenient to discuss and compare the English and the Scotch scale of pensions, but I will assume for the purpose of hon. Gentlemen opposite that the Scotch scale will ultimately be lower than the scale of the English Bill. The hon. Member says that will result in the attraction of Scotch Police to England. But, at the same time, I would point out that to propose cutting down the English scale to the level of the Scotch scale is going beyond the province of a Scotch Member. The maximum scale of the English Bill is no more than what the Metropolitan Police receive at this moment, and is actually less than many of the police receive in the North of England and the West Riding. And at the present moment I would point out that competition exists though there is no superannuation in Scotland. Yet, notwithstanding that competition, no difficulty is found in obtaining a sufficient number of men to fill the Scotch police forces and keep them to their proper complement. Does the hon. and learned Member really ask the House to cut down the English scale by giving the same superannuation as is proposed for Scotland? His argument has utterly failed. But inequality of superannuation is inevitable as between forces. In England several police forces, side by side in neighbouring counties, adopt different scales, within the maximum of the Bill, according to the varying conditions of those forces. You would really throw a hardship upon the Police Forces if you insisted upon uniformity of scale.

*(1.27.) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I think the reasons given by my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee for stopping the progress of the English Bill are of the most frivolous character. Scotland is not substantially affected by the Bill at present before the House. The existing practice with regard to pensions is different in the two countries; besides, the scale of living and remuneration generally is different in Scotland from what it is in England. The hon. and learned Gentleman complains that policemen are attracted from Scotland to England. But, Sir, it is not policemen alone who are drawn to England by the superior advantages and greater opportunities which this wealthier country offers. The Amendment of my hon. Friend does not meet the difficulty which he has raised, because, though he might equalise the pensions, there is no proposal under either of these Bills to equalise the scale of pay; and it is really the superior scale of pay, and not the superior scale of superannuation, which attracts the Scotch Police to England. You cannot have the best men unless you pay the best scale of wages. My hon. Friend proposes to re-commit the Bill to a Committee of Scotch Members, but I can hardly think that he is serious in making such a suggestion. In the first place, such a course would be a gross affront to the Committee on Law, who went most carefully through the Bill; and, secondly, to re-commit an English Bill to a Committee exclusively composed of Scotch Members would be a ridiculous inversion of the principle of Home Rule, to which I thought my hon. Friend adhered.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is out of order.

*MR. PICKERSGILL: Then I will only make a very strong protest against the idea that the Bill should be re-committed at all.

(1.31.) MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): I am afraid from what the Home Secretary has stated that under this Bill there is to be a distinction drawn between the scale of pensions obtaining in the various provincial forces in this country; and the right hon. Gentleman argued that, as such a difference was to obtain throughout England, there can be no objection to its obtaining in Scotland. The difference in the scale of pensions in different places in England may be very small, but the difference of scale between England and Scotland is very large. There has been an agitation among the Scotch Police for the purpose of assimilating their scale of pensions with that in England. That is a serious matter; and the agitation will be continued, especially as the scale is not hereafter to be fixed by the Local Authorities, but has been fixed, or will hereafter be fixed, by the Imperial Government. The Home Secretary has made a somewhat extraordinary proposition. He says, "I object to a cast iron system," and yet he is the first to propose such a system; he has proposed perfect equality of pensions throughout the provinces.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No.

Mr. ATHERLEY-JONES : Well, I certainly took that to be the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman. I understood there was to be no discretionary power vested in the municipalities; but if that is not so, then, of course, I am mistaken. I will not trespass further on the time of the House. I think that in the circumstances, the Amendment of my hon. Friend deserves more consideration than the cavalier treatment which it has received at the hands of the Government, and I hope it will be pressed to a Division.

(1.35.) Mr. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I have listened in vain to hear any justification for the position which the Scotch Members have taken up on this matter. If an English Member had moved such an Amendment with reference to a Scotch Bill, the Scotch Members would certainly have charged him with incurring a serious responsibility, and with paying them a very poor compliment. If such an Amendment to the Bill had been moved by an English Member, the Scotch Members might legitimately have approved and supported it, as we have supported them in the action they have thought best to take on Scotch questions; but it is scarcely for the Scotch Members to take the initiative, especially as they have pretty well secured their own way with regard to their own Police Bill. We are bound to deal in a generous and liberal spirit with our Police Forces; and, therefore, I shall support the Bill, because I conceive that the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member is not conceived in the interests of these most useful bodies of men. The system prevailing in England is entirely different to that which obtains in Scotland; and unless the Scotch Members are prepared to carry their principles still further and say that in all things a common basis shall exist between the two countries, their position is illogical.

(1.39.) Mr. JACOB BRIGHT (Manchester, S.W.): I am not prepared to support this Amendment simply because the pension scale in Scotland is lower than the English scale. If it can be shown that the pensions in England are unnecessarily high, and that there are grave reasons for reducing them, I shall be prepared to listen to such arguments, and to act accordingly; but to move to reduce pensions in England simply because the Scotch scale is lower is unreasonable, and I therefore hope that the Government will adhere to their Bill.

*(1.40.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I do not think the Metropolitan Members can be aware of the increased burden this Bill will throw upon the rates. According to the calculations of Mr. Finlaison, the Actuary to the National Debt Office, the present annual charge for superannuations for the Metropolitan Police alone, is £197,000; but if the Bill is carried, the charge will be according to Mr. Finlaison's calculations £565,000 a year, nearly three times the present amount. I very much regret that the Government should have resolved to press it forward at this late period of the Session when it cannot be fully discussed by the House. Though I am favourable to the general principle of the Bill, yet I would suggest to the Government that the better and wiser course to pursue is to postpone the Bill to next Session, in order that the County Councils may have an opportunity of considering it. I am confident that such a course would result in the improvement of the Bill. A sum of £850,000 will have to be raised out of the rates over the country outside the Metropolis in order to meet these additional police pensions, towards which pensions the Government are only giving £350,000. These figures are startling and alarming, and, therefore, the Government ought not to press the Bill forward at this late period of the Session. This enormous burden ought not to be imposed on the rate payers without the County Councils first having an opportunity of considering the provisions of the Bill.

*(1.43.) Mr. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I hope that, as the matter has been thoroughly discussed in the House and afterwards in the Standing Committee, the House will not be put to the trouble of dividing on the Amendment. It is not right that the House should now be delayed by a Second Reading Debate on the Bill. The question raised having been fully discussed ought not now to be revived. The hon. Member for Sunderland was on the Standing Committee, and if his views were not fully considered there it was not his misfortune, but his fault. He generally takes very good care to have questions adequately discussed on Committees of which he is a Member.

I make the same observations with reference to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy. I rise for the purpose of protesting against the obstructive policy and tactics which are being pursued apparently in order to prevent the House from getting to the business for which hon. Members have been called together to-day. I recognise the efforts which the Government have undoubtedly made to deal with the question. There is a strong feeling among Members generally that this police superannuation question should be dealt with and settled as soon and as satisfactorily as possible; and as I believe the Government are acting on these lines in the matter, I shall give them all the support I can to get the Bill passed.

(1.45.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I have already expressed an opinion that the Superannuation Bill is required for Scotland. If the Government will drop the English Bill we will give them facilities for passing the Scotch Bill. I do not wish to put any obstruction in the way of the latter, but I wish to point out that if you give the English policemen advantageous terms, you will interfere with the market supply of policemen for Scotland. I think the Home Secretary has placed the matter in a false light. He says that already many provincial forces have better terms than those proposed in the Bill. That may be so as regards the maximum, but it is the minimum proposals to which we object. I shall support the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

*(1.48.) MR. CHILDERS: I, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgeton, who acted with me, assumed that the hon. Member was opposed to the prompt discussion of the Scotch Superannuation Bill; but if the hon. Member is not, then that fact further supports the contention that the majority of the Scotch Members are in favour of the Bill following the English Bill.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will say what the question was which he put to Scotch Members?

(1.50.) The House divided:—Ayes 137; Noes 20.—(Div. List, No. 220.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered.

*(2.13.) MR. MATTHEWS: I have to submit a clause which a few words of explanation will make plain to the House. When the special constables were last called out, they could only act in the City if appointed for the City, or in the Metropolis if appointed for the Metropolis. This clause is to enable the special constables sworn in before the Metropolitan police magistrates to act in the City and in the Metropolitan Police District.

A Clause,—Provision as to special constables,—(Mr. Secretary Matthews,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

(2.14.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I cannot say that the explanation given by the right hon. Gentleman is satisfactory. It seems to me a very extraordinary thing that such a clause should be proposed in a Bill which has to do with pensions, and only with pensions. ["No, no!"] At all events, this clause ought to have been introduced, if at all, at the Committee stage. I should like to know what is the necessity for introducing this clause. What is the object in view? We have got on tolerably well for centuries without this power, which seems to me entirely unnecessary.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

*(2.16.) MR. MATTHEWS: The next clause can be explained in a few words. Under an Act of George IV., the Receiver for the Metropolitan Police District is a person through whose hands pass all moneys that go to the Metropolitan Police. The statute requires the giving of a bond. The system of bonds is altogether obsolete, and the Treasury do not require them even in cases where there is responsibility. The money is no longer paid as it was, and the bond has become absolutely useless.

A Clause,—Provision as to Receiver of Metropolitan Police District,—(Mr. Secretary Matthews,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

* (2.18.) MR. CHILDERS: May I ask the Home Secretary whether he has concluded his inquiry into the duties of the Receiver, some of which are altogether archaic, and quite unsuited to present financial arrangements. I quite agree that he has no monetary charge or responsibility.

*(2.20.) MR. MATTHEWS: I have been for some time considering these points, and I hope during the recess, and so far as I can without legislation, to introduce a number of improvements.

(2.20.) MR. STOREY: As I understand the matter, the Receiver will be in the same position in London and in the Provinces. So far, that is satisfactory. I note the fact that the right hon. Gentleman takes more time to explain an Amendment of his own than he does to reply to serious arguments.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause read a second time, and added to the Bill.

(2.21.) MR. STOREY: In moving my Amendment, I may have to touch upon matters upon which I expressed an opinion on the Second Reading of the Bill, the only opportunity I have had. My objection is altogether one of principle. I object to the whole system and method of pensions as applied to persons who are not the direct servants of the State at any rate. If it were necessary to enter into the larger question whether a system of pensions is good for the country in respect to its officials, I should be prepared to discuss that, but I have not at the moment any intention of discussing other than the precise point to which I take exception. I take the liberty of pointing out to the right hon. Gentleman that in this Bill he is taking a very serious new departure. I am not going at any length into objections I have urged before, but I tell the right hon. Gentleman frankly that, in my judgment, and, I think, in the judgment of any sober-minded man who considers this matter seriously, he is introducing, in a deliberate manner, a precedent of State Socialism in this country with respect to others than the direct employés of the State. It may be wise or not to adopt such a policy, but at any rate it is serious, and, speaking from my own point of view, it is an extraordinary fact that a Conservative Administration which calls itself the Guardian of the Constitution, should have taken this very serious step. The right hon. Gentleman proposes to put the whole Police Force of this country in a better position, as regards pensions, than even the soldiers in the National Army. He proposes in this first clause that the men who have completed 25 years' service shall have pensions by right; in the second place, that a man who has completed 15 years' service, and is incapacitated by infirmity of mind or body, upon medical certificate, shall be entitled to a pension; thirdly, that before the completion of 15 years' service on being incapacitated he shall receive a gratuity; and fourthly, that if a man becomes incapacitated in the performance of his duty within a month after he has entered the Service, through injury received in the execution of his duty, and not through his own default, then he is entitled to receive a pension for life. Now, it must be admitted these are very serious proposals to make. If they were proposals affecting a limited body of men, they would be serious, but they will affect an army of no less than 38,000 men; in other words, you propose to add to an enormous army of pensioners from the Public Service another enormous army, the majority of whom are in no sense the servants of the State, but are the servants of municipalities. The right hon. Gentleman does more. He not only for the first time commits the State to the pensioning by right of a large army of men other than servants of the State, but he absolutely gives to this favoured class better terms than the State gives to its own servants. Let me refer to the two great classes of pensioners from the Civil Service and the Army. The right hon. Gentleman will not deny that the rate he gives to the policemen under this Bill is considerably higher than the ordinary rate for Civil servants. That, of course, is a matter beyond argument; it is admitted in all considerations of the Bill, and in the voluminous Report of the Departmental Committee this point is particularly dealt with. The police are asked, "Do you know that Civil Servants have neither the same amount of pensions you ask, nor are they pensioned at the same time?" The police answer, through their officers, "Certainly they have not, but you must remember what our life is, our service is more serious, more burdensome, more dangerous, and, therefore, we are entitled to larger pensions." Well, I am not disputing facts, I am only bringing out this point, that the right hon. Gentleman, for what seem to him good reasons, no doubt, is distinctly giving to other than public servants larger pensions, on more favourable terms than the Civil Servants of the State get. I put it to the House—or this remnant of the House—that this is a new departure, fraught with infinite risk of expenditure to the country, and which, I think, cannot but result at no distant date in Socialistic proposals against which I should be a strong supporter of the right hon. Gentleman, for I do not believe he is a Socialist to the extent to which this principle of State pensions may be pushed. If we grant to policemen, who are not the servants of the State, larger pensions and better terms than are granted to the great body of Civil Servants, how does the case stand as regards soldiers? It will not be denied that, to put it mildly, the duty of a soldier is more hazardous than that of a policeman. It may not be at certain periods of his life, but I put it to the right hon. Gentleman who, by his manner, rather seems to dispute my proposition, would he say that, taking an ordinary soldier in any of the marching regiments, with his chance of having to engage in warlike operations and subject himself to all the risks and privations of a campaign—

SIR G. CAMPBELL: And climates.

MR. STOREY: And bad climates—will he deny that the risks and dangers to life and health are greater than those encountered by an ordinary rural policeman? But the right hon. Gentleman is going to pension an ordinary rural policeman in a country village on much better terms than the soldier whose duty it is to suffer and risk death for the State, in any quarter of the globe! How does he justify that? Now, first of all, you do not grant any pensions to your soldiers at all—no, not the ordinary soldier. I am sometimes inclined to think that when the House sees the sum total of £1,500,000 for military pensions, it does not realise what it means.

I daresay a good many good-natured kindly folks think that every soldier—that the ordinary Tommy Atkins—gets a pension. Nothing of the sort. Your captains, colonels, and majors get pensions; the ordinary soldier is not entitled to a pension. Now, I put the point very seriously: first of all, the soldier is not entitled to a pension; secondly, if he serves for 21 years he brings himself under the Pension List, and the pension you grant him is a mere bagatelle compared to this pension you propose to give to a policeman. What is the reason? Where is the justification for giving better terms to the policemen than to the soldier? Then I put another case, and to me it seems a very serious case. I am not unwilling that you should be generous towards the police, though I say that should be displayed in pay, rather than in pension, but I put this practical point to the Home Secretary: If a man joins the force, and within a month is injured in the execution of his duty, or within any limited period, it may be a month, it may be a day, he is then entitled to a pension for life. Now take the case of a soldier, who has promised to serve for seven years. He goes to war, and if he dies in consequence of wounds received from the enemy, I admit his family are entitled to a pension, but if he comes home, or goes to an invalid station, and dies in pain and anguish, after illness arising from the hard life of the campaign, his wife and children under the law that governs pensions are entitled to nothing but a simple gratuity which may be given or refused. That, I suppose, you think fair to the soldier? That is the point of my argument. ["No!"] But it is. That is what the State by law regards and decrees to be fit and proper treatment for the soldier. It is always an advantage to put a concrete case. I know a case of a man who served in that unhappy Zulu War, and in the fight at Isandula, where one of our regiments was cut up. This poor man was not killed in the action; he escaped and was sent to Port Elizabeth, where he died of exhaustion induced by the hardships he endured in the campaign. His wife was with him, and, at the expense of the State, she was sent home, and, not unnaturally, she expected that her case would receive some consideration at the hands of the authorities. But no help was given her because her husband was not killed in action, but died of exhaustion that followed, and under the regulations, which are thought sufficient, the widow was not entitled to State assistance. As a matter of fact, she got nothing. A good deal of sympathy was evoked for her, and ultimately this poor woman applied through a Member of Parliament to be sent back in a troopship to Port Elizabeth, where she thought she had an opportunity of getting a living. The circumstances were put before the Government that her husband had died of hardships endured in the war, and the request was made that she might be permitted to go out in a troopship, and the answer given by a right hon. Gentleman who sat on that Bench under a former Government, was that he was sorry that he had no money to do any such thing, and that moreover it was against the regulations. Well, that is the way we treat our soldiers, but the point of my argument is, if you consider this fair as applied to the case of a soldier, how is the case of the policeman? Here is a man who stays at home at ease, and you propose that if he meets with an accident in the carrying out of his public duty he shall be entitled to a pension for life. Now, I put it to the Home Secretary, what business has he to decree to a municipality that it shall carry out such a regulation as that? He does not provide the money; the municipality does that. One part of my objection is, that if we have to pay, as we shall have to pay, we do not want to have Home Office instructions as to what is fair and just in any such case. Why does he want a cast-iron system? Cannot he trust a municipality to deal with its own servants? Your proposed pensions to policemen are to be on a more magnificent scale than the best of their countrymen in the Civil Service. Of course, I do not mean to say that you are going to treat the police better than a certain pampered class of the community—it would be too much to expect that. If I were to enter into this controversial matter, I should provoke heat I desire to avoid, but I am within my right if I say that it would be instructive were I to show the methods the right hon. Gentleman, and such as he, pursue in dealing with a certain pampered useless class of officials. But I pass from that. I maintain that it is now proposed to treat policemen on more liberal terms than the Civil Service, and to give them better pensions than we give our soldiers. I was amazed to see the right hon. Gentleman's sign of dissent as I contrasted the life of a soldier and a policeman, and said the duties of the former are more dangerous. Now, if the right hon. Gentleman were dealing with the London policemen alone, I should not be disposed to indulge in any controversy with him. I can realise the bitter hardness of the life of a London policeman. I know what it means perambulating these huge and monstrous streets, spending nights and days in what is very serious duty. If the Home Secretary had said owing to the exceptional position of the Metropolitan Police, the character of the duties they have to discharge, the wear and tear of body and mind, he proposed exceptional pension arrangements, then, although I am very much opposed to the whole system of pensions, I confess I do not think I should have the heart to oppose him. But I complain that the Home Secretary will persist in allowing his experience of London to govern his settlement for the whole force of the country. Now, I speak to many Members who live in the country, and I ask them: What is the position of the rural policeman? He lives in a village; he has, perhaps, now and then a drunken man to look after; he is looked up to by the villagers as a little god; he is held in the greatest respect by all the decent, quiet people, and even the well-to-do people, if they do not feel an awe of him, treat him with respect. I know, in my electioneering experiences in Durham, in village after village I found the local policeman a sleek, rubicund, comfortable-looking sort of man, evidently not over-worked in body or mind, and better known in the locality than anyone else. Does anybody say that he leads a life of exceptional hardness? And this man, in the prime of a healthy, comfortable existence, the Home Secretary decrees shall be pensioned by the public! The proposal is so utterly unreasonable that I believe if the right hon. Gentleman had taken the time and trouble to ascertain the opinion, not of the big-wigs of localities, not of Magistrates, who are mad after pensions, but the opinion of representatives of rate-payers I think he never would have made such a proposal. If this Bill passes, this is the position we shall have in Sunderland within a brief period of time. We shall have some 100 or 120 ex-policemen of ages between 50 and 55 walking the streets of the town, each one in the possession by right of a pension of £50 or £60 a year. This may not appear a very serious matter to hon. Gentlemen around me, it is not a large sum, but think of the fact that in that town of Sunderland at the same time there will be 10,000 men, each earning no more upon an average than these policemen get for a pension, and each one contributing towards those pensions. Will not every intelligent man among the working community of Sunderland ask himself the question, "What is it that these men have done for the State more than we have done that we should pay them £1 a week or more for life? He has served the State by doing duty to his employers for wages paid, and we have served the State by doing our duty to our employers." And the demand will grow to be imperative upon the successor to the Home Secretary and this House that if we carry the system of pensions out of the Public Service and into private service then the system should extend beyond policemen to all the working-classes in the country. That is the inevitable and logical result of this proposal. If this were January or March instead of August, and the right hon. Gentleman were compelled to deal in argument with this question, I think there are a great many hon. Gentlemen nearer to him than I am now would demand some more satisfactory reasons from him than he has yet given. I admit that in August it is very difficult to induce hon. Gentlemen opposite to apply themselves to the consideration of the legitimate outcome of their own action, the creation of a system of pensions for the whole of the poorer classes of this country. How, in the day when the demand is made, can we conscientiously resist it, having conceded the principle here? So long as I live I must remember that it was this quiet self-contained Home Secretary to a Conservative Government who, with little opposition, induced the State to adopt this system, of State Socialism in the matter of pensions for the poorer classes. Now, I am pleading all this time for some separation between the Metropolis and other parts of the country. I confess I was very much struck in reading, as I have done very carefully, the notes of the evidence given before the Departmental Committee of 1889, with the following question and answer:—

"Since then," said one gentleman questioning a witness, "the (Government of which he was Home Secretary (that is the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby) brought in a Superannuation Bill?" "Yes," said the witness, "but the Metropolitan Police were very much disappointed with that Bill." (That is the Bill of 1872.) "It did not apply only to the Metropolitan Police, as the men fully expected it would do. It applied to every borough and county throughout the country, and the men, rightly or wrongly, believed that if the Bill had been brought in for the Metropolitan Police only it would have passed."

I agree that the Metropolitan Police have reason to complain that their claims were mixed up with those of the police all over the country. In my judgment the Home Secretary would have been wiser if he had introduced a Metropolitan Police Superannuation Bill, and if he had I do not think he would have been sitting there on the first Saturday in August listening to my voice, or any other voice, in opposition to his proposal. I say, giving up the point whether there should be superannuation or not, if he will have superannuation then he ought to separate London from the rest of the country. I will not labour this, because I have an Amendment to propose on the point, which I shall have to briefly present to the House; but there is one point I forgot to mention in dealing with the superannuation of policemen. I should like the Home Secretary to furnish me with an answer to a question which will be put to me by my constituents. I shall have to tell them we have pensioned the police. Now, I shall have to put in an appeal, representing a shipping community, for the sailors of the country. If you superannuate the police, and provide for their old age, as of right, why not do the same for sailors? The right hon. Gentleman seems to think that is a horrible proposal, yet I can convince his judgment that he ought to do it, by legitimate argument, and one with great force in it. Why pension the police? Because, he says, they are the servants of municipalities, and maintain order. That is the right hon. Gentleman's reason, he can give no other. Well, I plead for the sailors of the Mercantile Marine. It will not be denied that their lives are as hard, and their risks as great, as the lives of policemen. What does the right hon. Gentleman reply? "Oh, but they do not serve the State, nor do they serve municipalities." Sir, the point I enforce is that they serve the State much more directly than policemen do. Whence do you draw your men for your Royal Naval Force, when war breaks out, if not from the Mercantile Marine? If the Mercantile Marine should go down in numbers and efficiency, where is your reserve of men when you engage in warfare with another nation? On that ground it is hard to say what class has a better claim to pensions than the class I venture to say a word for, and shall have more to say for in the next Session of Parliament. Here is what a police witness said before the Departmental Committee, and it is well worth notice. The witness is asked why the police have a special claim for pensions, and he replies—

"I have seen a great deal of night work myself, and I say there is only one class of men at all to be compared with policemen, and that is sailors in the Merchant Service. I have seen sailors in many ports, and you will find that sailors at 50 are old men, and the reason is exposure at night to all weather, and want of rest at night."

That is evidence in support of a Bill I hope next year to introduce to provide for the superannuation of sailors of the United Kingdom. Their life is hard, and they are absolutely necessary for the defence of the country. As briefly as I could, I have put the reasons why we should not accept this clause, and I venture a further reason. I have read the evidence before the Departmental Committee. The questions were numerous and searching, and the answers give an enormous amount of information to those who wish to master the facts, but can the Home Secretary tell me why every one of the witnesses summoned was an officer high up in the Police Service? Look through the list, you find Head Constables, Inspectors, Sub-Inspectors, and Superintendents, but not a single witness from the rank and file. If we had the evidence of the rank and file, I think we should give a very different idea of what the wishes of the London police are. From what I can gather, what the ordinary policeman of London wants is not pension but increased pay. The witnesses called before the Committee were in the position of officers in the Force, old men whose lives were running out, and who, naturally, would think of pensions. Therefore, it comes to pass that the Committee, in attempting to get the opinion of the police of London, really succeeded in obtaining the opinion of the old men, and so the stress is laid on pensions at a certain age. But I believe, in fact I think I may say I know, that if the younger men had been summoned, they would have said, "To us pensions are a secondary matter; the main thing is a considerable increase in pay." Those who think this Bill will settle the matter are greatly mistaken. I must pay the right hon. Gentleman the compliment of saying he does not think it will be a settlement. He has honestly told us the inevitable result from an economical point of view; he has warned us. From the moment we settle this matter of pensions, an agitation will arise for increase of wages. It is not the time for me to argue if this will be a fair demand or not, but if the Metropolitan Police are dissatisfied with their present wages, and if they do ask for an increase and obtain it, every penny of that increase will have a direct bearing upon this Bill which we are passing, because increase of pay means a larger burden for pensions on the rate-payers. I, for my part, have been extremely thankful to the right hon. Gentleman. I belong to an old-fashioned economical school, and I have never once taken part in putting any pressure on any Government, or any Member of a Government, on behalf of Government servants, as against the public at large. Neither the late Government nor the present Government can charge me with that. I stand here as the guardian of the public purse as against private interests. I do not stand here as the champion of the police. I say our duty is not to involve the public in burdens unless we are righteously convinced that they are proper burdens, and when we are so convinced it is our duty to make those burdens as light as possible to the taxpayer. It is on that principle that I raise opposition to this Bill. I have only one thing to resent in the discussion this afternoon. My hon. Friend, who is now sitting above me, has talked about obstruction. Sir, there has been no obstruction, and there will be no obstruction, but if right hon. and hon. Gentlemen think that there will not be honest and fair discussion, with due regard to the gravity of every point of the Bill, they are very much mistaken. My hon. Friend was unjust to us, and if he does not rise in his place and publicly apologise, I shall not have the same opinion of him that I have entertained hitherto. May I ask him what are the facts as to this Bill?

*MR. SPEAKER (interrupting): The hon. Member is dealing with the whole principle of the Bill, and, in pursuing that course, is not in order. The question before the House is that the clause stand part of the Bill, and I must request the hon. Member to confine himself to that.

MR. STOREY: I am afraid I was going beyond the question immediately before the House, because it is extremely difficult to deal adequately with a whole clause like this, involving, as it does, the principle of the Bill, without being somewhat profuse. I have given reasons why we should omit the clause altogether, and if the House—as I am afraid will be the case—willingly, and with its eyes open, embarks in a scheme of State Socialism, I can only say I have made my protest; I can do no more. I shall then move my Amendment to exempt from the operation of the Bill those municipalities that wish to be exempted.

Amendment proposed, in pages 1 and 2, to leave out Clause 1.—(Mr. Storey.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'Subject to the provisions of this Act every constable in' stand part of the Clause."

(3.5.) MR. MATTHEWS: I hope the hon. Member will not think me wanting in courtesy if, in answering his speech, which has lasted three-quarters of an hour, I content myself with a very few remarks. The hon. Member on his part was wanting not only in courtesy, but in humanity, to the House, in inflicting on a Saturday morning—

MR. STOREY: Where was the humanity to me?

MR. MATTHEWS: I did not interrupt the hon. Member. I said he was guilty of even inhumanity, in inflicting on the House, on a Saturday morning, a speech which was a Second Reading speech on topics which have been discussed three or four times, and which have been re-introduced because the hon. Member's hostility to the Bill induces him to have recourse to every method he can adopt in order to stay its progress. I will content myself with saying that every proposition on which the hon. Member based his argument is totally inaccurate. He seems to assume there is an amount of ignorance on this subject of police superannuation which passes the bounds of credibility. The hon. Member talks about introducing, for the first time, a system of superannuation of an extravagant character, which he assimilates to State Socialism. Does the hon. Member not know that since the Police Force began there has been a system of police superannuation in force, under which, by the permission of Parliament, larger superannuation has been given to the police in many parts of England than this Bill proposes? In talking about State Socialism as he does the hon. Member is trifling with the House.

MR. STOREY: Allow me to explain.

MR. MATTHEWS: I must decline to give way. The hon. Member talks about State Socialism.

MR. STOREY: I did not speak in the sense the right hon. Gentleman imputes to me.

MR. MATTHEWS: I say that in using such language the hon. Member is trifling with the House.

MR. STOREY again rose.

MR. MATTHEWS: I must decline to give way. I did not interrupt the hon. Member, although he spoke for three-quarters of an hour. I say that the hon. Member has trifled with the patience and indulgence of the House.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): Withdraw.

MR. MATTHEWS: I must decline to discuss again matters which have already been debated twice in the House and once in the Standing Committee.

MR. STOREY: The right hon. Gentleman has misrepresented what I said. I said that for the first time the State was introducing a compulsory system of police superannuation in the Municipalities, and that is true.

(3.11.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: The hon. Member for Sunderland has put his case so forcibly that I will not go into it, even though there is a conspiracy of silence on the part of the Government, to which conspiracy expression has just been given by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary. The hon. Member for Sunderland has compared the case of the policeman to that of the soldier; that there seems to be a doubt whether the risk of the policeman is not greater than that of the soldier. Perhaps the risk of being killed in battle is as great to the policeman as to the soldier; but the fact is that soldiers, unlike policemen, have to go on foreign service and face tropical climates. [Cries of "Divide!"] The life of a private soldier in India is one of extreme hardship. [Renewed cries of "Divide!" and interruption.] Military Members will bear me out when I say that it is the rarest thing in the world for a soldier to get through his 21 years' service without being invalided for a time; and when he has done that he only gets 1s. a day, or one-third of the amount it is proposed to give the police. [Renewed cries of "Divide!"] I see the Home Secretary adopting the tactics of hon. Members behind him—

MR. MATTHEWS: Hear, hear! Divide, divide!

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I think we have reason to complain that the Home Secretary refused in Committee to do that which has been done by the Scotch Committee, and that is to define the word "constable." [Laughter.] The Home Secretary may laugh, but the word has a popular and technical meaning, and the evidence shows that a mere constable, as distinguished from an officer, rarely serves for 25 years. In many cases he gets promoted and ceases to walk the streets, and in many other cases he retires on a medical certificate. [Renewed cries of "Divide!"] Under the present system a man, under ordinary circumstances, cannot retire until he has reached the age of 60; but under this Bill he may retire at the age of 43. Though I know the case is hopeless, I feel bound to make this protest.

(3.14.) MR. CONYBEARE: I am not surprised at the impatience of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, seeing that this is Saturday afternoon; but, so far as I myself am concerned, no one can accuse me of having unduly trespassed upon the time of the House. This is the first occasion on which I have ventured to open my lips on the Bill in the House, and I had not an opportunity of speaking on it in the Standing Committee. Therefore, the taunt the Home Secretary addressed to the hon. Member for Sunderland will have no application in my case. I am expressing the sentiments of my constituents in opposing the policy of the Government in this matter. I have received from my constituents a direct mandate to oppose this measure. I do not think that the manner in which the Home Secretary met my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland reflects great credit upon the right hon. Gentleman. It was discourteous to the House, and we have in a matter of this moment a right to look for a little more courtesy from the occupants of the Treasury Bench. The Home Secretary has refused to answer the very weighty arguments which have been advanced in this matter, and it is a new departure when Ministers of the Crown, whose duty it is to listen to and meet arguments, simply sit in their places and cry out "Divide" when hon. Members are speaking. The right hon. Gentleman has the assurance to accuse the Member for Sunderland of trifling with the House because he spoke for three-quarters of an hour. Well, the right hon. Gentleman himself trifled with the House in misrepresenting the arguments of my hon. Friend and refusing to allow my hon. Friend to correct him. As to this clause I object to its principle on two grounds. I am not going to argue whether this is a departure to State socialism, for I am willing that we should have State socialism if it is to the interest of the community at large. But I think this clause ought to be hotly opposed by every Radical and Liberal Member, because it embodies the principle of the control of the police of the country by the State, which principle we fought against most vehemently during the passage of the Local Government Act in 1888. If there is one principle more than another dear to Radicals and Liberals it is that the Representatives of the people should have the control of their own police. What was it that gave so much importance to the action of Sir Charles Warren in Trafalgar Square? Why, the burden of our cry was that the elected Representatives of the people on the County Council should have control of the police. One strong argument advanced in favour of the Metropolitan Police being released from the control of the Home Office was that the City Police were entirely under the control and management of the elected Representatives of the City.

*MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I rise to a point of order. Is the hon. Member now addressing himself to the Motion before the House?

*MR. SPEAKER: No, I cannot say that the hon. Gentleman is addressing himself to the question before the House.

(3.22.) MR. CONYBEARE: I am supporting the Motion to omit Clause 1 on the ground that this clause establishes the principle of pensions to the police, and my reason for objecting to pensions being given to the police under this clause is that it involves the principle of control of the police by the State. I merely introduced the question of the City Police as an exemplification of my argument. Another reason why I object to the clause is that pensioned policemen will be able to compete on unfair terms in the labour market with other citizens in a similar position to themselves. I do not care whether the age is 46, or 50, or 55. I imagine that, unless a man can be shown to have sustained either mental or bodily injury in the course of his duties in the force, no one will venture to assert that a man of 55 is necessarily a decrepit old man, who should retire from the public service in receipt of a pension. If such a rule were applied to Members of this House, I should like to know how many of us would be regarded as capable of transacting the business of the State. Well, men with pensions will be able to take at merely nominal remuneration those posts which require trustworthiness and honesty, and so be able to undersell others. The fact that the system of pensions will necessarily establish control by the central Government over the police constables throughout the country may lead to very grave friction and discontent among the force. We will suppose that a great strike question has arisen in London or elsewhere. I do not say that it may not be the duty of private employers, or of the State itself to call on the authorities to provide the necessary Police Force in case of an emergency; but I do say that as the pensions to be given to the police under this clause would be granted to the Police Authorities of this country, they will very much depend on the satisfaction given to the Home Secretary and the Government by the way in which the police are managed and controlled; that is to say, that practically the Police Force will not be under the control of the Local Authorities, but will, to a large extent, be controlled from head quarters. I maintain that, in case of the police being called upon to take part in any such crisis as I have indicated, there would necessarily be considerable resentment on the part of the workpeople who were interfered with by the Police Force. There would be, on their part, a strong feeling of dissatisfaction and discontent, arising from the fact that the Police Force, controlled to a great extent by the Government, was being used adversely to their interests, and in the interests of their employers. It seems to me not unlikely that, if any such combination of circumstances should arise, there would be a strong feeling of dissatisfaction and resentment against the Force, and, consequently, that the moral power which should reside behind the Force would lose its effect, so that the authorities would eventually have to fall back upon that group of Military Forces which every Government can, on an emergency, call into requisition. Hitherto, we have been proud to rely on the assurance of the moral power which backs up the Executive Authority—a moral power created by the belief that they are acting in harmony with a feeling of the great body of the citizens. It is this which has controlled public opinion in times of great excitement, and I venture to say that if it were felt that there was nothing behind the bare use of physical force, and that the moral power which has hitherto supported the authorities was wanting, we should be in danger of very serious disturbances in this country. It has been argued that the police discharge more arduous and dangerous duties than are performed by any other body in the community. They have been compared with our soldiers and sailors. I am not going into the arguments that might be used on this point. But I must say, from my own knowledge of the conditions under which another class of our fellow-subjects have to labour—I allude to our miners in particular—the accidents and incidents of danger to which they are constantly exposed render their peculiar calling much more difficult and dangerous than that of the police. I need hardly appeal to the recollection of hon. Members in order to awaken their sympathies with a class of men who are subjected to the terrible calamities which constantly overtake the men beneath the surface of the earth. I believe I am right in saying there is not a day that passes without some grave accident, involving either loss of limb or loss of life to the poor fellows employed in our mines. Therefore, I say that, if you ask for pensions for the police on the ground that their calling is more dangerous than to our soldiers and sailors, you will have to face the question of extending the pension system to other classes who are, as I have shown, engaged in much more perilous occupations. But I will take another case—the case of the dock labourers and gas stokers employed throughout the country. What answer would you make to these men, who are employed a larger number of hours, and in much more arduous work, than the police, if they also claim a right to be pensioned? With regard to the gas stokers, I may mention the case of one of my constituents who is employed during 84 hours in every week, and who is bound to work fully six months in the year at night. If that man were working for the State his claim to a pension could not possibly be resisted if the claim urged on behalf of the police employed on night duty is to be accepted. Mention has been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, with whom I quite agree, of the light character of the duties performed by the rural police. The only duties of a dangerous or arduous character performed by these men is when they are told off by the Magistrates and landowners of the district to protect their game against the inroads of the poachers, and I unhesitatingly assert that at least 19 out of 20 of the injuries sustained by the rural police occur during the time they are acting as gamekeepers to the landowners. This is a consideration we are bound to keep in mind when asked to grant large pensions to the police, on the ground that their occupation is more dangerous than that of other people. Beyond this it has been clearly shown that this Bill has been drafted not in the interests of the rank and file of the Constabulary, but in the interests of the police officers. I have good grounds for saying that it is not the rank and file, but the officers, who are anxious for these pensions, and this introduces the larger question, whether it would not be a better policy, in the interests of the State, to give a fair rate of wages to those employed in the service of the State and to leave them the responsibility of making provision for their old age, thereby encouraging those habits of thrift and industry which hon. Members on both sides of the House are constantly endeavouring to enforce.

Mr. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield) rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

*(3.42.) Mr. SPEAKER: Although I do not feel called upon to put the Motion just made by the hon. Member, I feel bound to say that after the discussion which has taken place I look with grave apprehension to future Debates in this House if hon. Members are to exercise their right of addressing it at the extreme length which has characterised several speeches made on the present occasion. The same arguments have been repeated over and over again. I have hitherto refrained from giving effect to the Standing Order which I have the power to enforce, namely, that if a Member indulges in tedious repetition, either of his own arguments or those of other hon. Members, he should be silenced. I have preferred to leave it to the good sense and self-restraint of hon. Members to avoid needless repetition; and I trust that now, after what has been said in the interests of Debate, Second Reading speeches will not be delivered on every clause of this Bill.

At that rate real and pertinent discussion would become utterly impossible. If I now decline to put the Motion for the Closure, it is not that I think it to be made without reason, but because I do not think that time would be saved by the Motion being put at this particular point in the Debate.

MR. CONYBEARE: After what you, Sir, have stated I do not wish to continue my remarks, but I would remind the House that this is the first and only opportunity I have taken advantage of in order to say what I wished to put before the House on this important question. I should not have spoken now but for the fact that I have received a distinct mandate from my constituents to oppose this clause.

MR. STOREY: In asking for leave to withdraw my Amendment, I may say that, having listened to what you, Sir, have just said, I wish the House to understand that this is the only clause dealing with the main principle of the Bill to which my Amendment could be directed. Those who think with me have felt it their duty to raise this question on a clause which contains the substantial principle of the Bill. I now ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(3.44.) MR. STOREY: I now wish to bring before the House the precise question on which I shall ask a Division. The series of Amendments I have placed on the Paper would, if adopted, cause the clause to read as follows:—

"Subject to the provisions of this Act (a) every constable in the Metropolitan Police Force."

this being intended to cover not only the Metropolitan, but the police of all the boroughs and counties in the Kingdom,

(b) "and any Police Force without an adequate pension fund, and (c) Any Police Force with an adequate pension fund, the Local Authority controlling, which shall now or hereafter signify in writing its willingness to come under the provisions of this Act."

This, I think, will explain exactly what I propose. With regard to the boroughs and counties having an existing Police Force with an adequate pension fund, I claim that in that case, and in that case only, the Bill shall not apply unless the authorities who are in that happy condition shall signify their wish to come under its operation. I made a suggestion on the Second Reading of the Bill which has since been reinforced by the action of the Government in exempting one Police Authority, namely, that of the City of London from the operation of the Bill. As the Home Secretary told us yesterday, they have done this on the ground that the City of London Police Force has an adequate and sufficient pension of its own. If the Government make this exemption in the case of the City of London, I think I am not asking too much in claiming a similar exemption for the borough I represent. I ask that that and other boroughs as well as counties having adequate pension funds should be not absolutely exempted from the Bill, but should be exempted unless they signify their willingness to come under its operation. In the case of Sunderland, the County Council has petitioned against the Bill, and I think it is the only Petition of that kind that has been presented. [An hon. MEMBER: No!] At any rate, I was asked to present that Petition to this House. The Petition asked that the Bill should not pass, but that if it did pass, they, the County Council of Sunderland, and similar bodies with adequate pension funds, might be exempted from its operation unless they chose to come under it. Of course I know that in the present temper of the Home Secretary, it would be idle for me to speak, even had I the tongue of an angel, because the right hon. Gentleman would go into mock heroics, instead of using an argument for an answer. It may be very easy to browbeat the minority, but the minority may be right. I say that Sunderland wishes exemption from this Bill. We have never been in the unhappy position of having to supplement our Pension Fund by our rates. We have a fund amounting to £4,900, and with that the police are satisfied. It may be that many counties will desire to come under the operation of the Bill, because the County Police are not managed by the chosen Representatives of the people, but in the boroughs the Town Council and Watch Committee represent the ratepayers, and if they have already adequate pension funds, and wish to be kept outside this Bill, I do not see why the House should refuse their request. Although we are in a minority—nay, because we are in a minority—this concession ought to be made, because our request is founded on reason and common sense. In conclusion, I beg to move to omit the word “a” in order to insert the words “the Metropolitan.”

Another Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, to leave out the word “a,” and insert the words “(a.) the Metropolitan.”—(Mr. Storey.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘a’ stand part of the Bill.”

(3.55.) MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Gentleman proposes to exempt from all the operations of the Bill all those Local Authorities which have adequate pension funds. My answer to his demand is twofold. In the first place, I say that, as far as I am aware, not a single Police Authority in the country has an adequate Pension Fund. As long ago as 1887 all the County Police Pension Funds were exhausted and the Borough Police Pension Funds were rapidly approaching that condition. As far as I am enabled to ascertain at the present moment, the Borough Pension Funds have, for the most part, attained that unhappy position; and in answer to what the hon. Member for Sunderland has said with regard to his own borough, I would remind him that the balance in hand on account of the Police Pension Fund is not now £4,900, which was the amount last year, but is at the present £4,504, showing a decrease of nearly £400.

MR. STOREY: The right hon. Gentleman is misinformed. [Cries of Order!] The friends of the right hon. Gentleman will not hear me, and while the right hon. Gentleman exhibits so much temper I will not give him the information I was about to have afforded.

MR. MATTHEWS: This is not a matter of temper. But, nevertheless, I think it right to remind the House that a period has arrived at which the prolongation of the Debates in this House has reached an almost unendurable limit. I did not interrupt the hon. Member during the whole of the 40 or 45 minutes he was addressing the House, and I have not yet occupied the time of the House for five minutes. I think, therefore, I ought to be allowed a very brief period in order to explain my views upon this question. I have stated that the Return I have quoted shows that the Sunderland Police Pension Fund is approaching the verge of insolvency, but, even assuming that I am wrong in that statement, although I have no doubt that I am right, I ask the House to consider the extraordinary proposal the hon. Gentleman has made, namely, that the Police Authorities, having the management of the pension funds, can afford to pay the pensions. For the last 13 years, as shown by the Report of the Committee of this House, pensions for which the police have been waiting, have remained unpaid, and yet the hon. Gentleman asserts that the Police Authorities have sufficient money in hand to discharge these obligations, and consequently asks this House to exempt the Police Authorities from the operation of this Bill, leaving to those exempted Authorities the arbitrary discretion of paying or refusing the pensions to which the police have become entitled by a length of service. A more incongruous, illogical, and preposterous suggestion it has never been my lot to hear brought forward in this House.

(4.0.) The House divided:—Ayes 139; Noes 33.—(Div. List, No. 221.)

(4.6.) MR. ATHERLEY - JONES:

In the Amendment I have to move I hope I may obtain the support of Members opposite, and that the Home Secretary will at any rate treat it as an open question. Under the Bill policemen in the Metropolis are to receive a pension of two-thirds of their pay after serving for 25 years, whatever their age may be. The last Police Bill introduced was that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), and I take marked notice of the fact that the right hon. Gentleman is absent today. His knowledge, experience, and judgment would have been of infinite value to the House in this discussion. In previous Police Bills the provision was that a constable must reach the age of 50 or 55 years before he received a pension. A provision has been put in the Schedule of this Bill, that outside the Metropolis the age must be not less than 50. It is preposterous to say that a policeman who has served 25 years and left the force at the age of 45 should be entitled to receive a pension for the rest of his life. A man at 45 is perfectly well able to perform all his physical and intellectual duties. It is urged by the Home Secretary that the wear and tear and the hardship of the London policeman's life are greater than of the provincial policeman; but I have been unable to find from statistics that the one is more rapidly incapacitated than the other. But even if that were so, wherever a police officer is incapacitated through infirmity of mind and body, ample provision is made in the Bill to meet his case. What I propose is the limit of age should be 50 or 55. Experienced police officers tell me that the result of the Home Secretary's proposals will be to increase vastly the number of men remaining in the force for 25 years. Thus the future pension fund of London would be enormously augmented. At present it is under £200,000, but under the proposals of the Home Secretary it will soon reach £500,000. That is an enormous increase in the burden proposed to be placed on the ratepayers, and it is a burden which is not justified. In almost every case the men who leave the Force can take employment elsewhere, even if they have not a pension. I am not opposed to reasonable pensions, but in the interest of the ratepayers of the Metropolis I object to the imposition upon them of the burden of maintaining a body of men in absolute idleness, when they are perfectly competent to maintain themselves. I do hope that there will be found hon. Members on the other side of the House to join with me in pressing the Home Secretary to revert to the lines of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolver-hampton, and establish the same standard of age for earning pensions that you would have in the provinces of England and Scotland.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 10, to leave out from the word "and," to the word "shall," in line 12, and insert the words "is not less than fifty years,"—(Mr. Atherley-Jones,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

(4.17.) MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Gentleman's statement was correct so far as it went, but it was not complete. Mr. Hibbert brought in two Bills when the late Government were in office—in 1882 and 1883—and neither of these contained a limit of age. Those Bills were stoutly opposed by the Representatives of the ratepayers' interest, and it was in consequence of that hot opposition that the limit of age was first introduced. In Mr. Hibbert's first Bill the limit of age was 50 years, but in the second Bill it was fixed at 55 years. In the next Bill of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton there was a limit of age, but with power of exemption. The police all loudly protested against that. It was somewhat more severe, but was to conciliate conflicting interests. But through the whole of the controversy there was no suggestion as to contribution from public resources. In the present Bill I have endeavoured to steer a middle course. The Bill allows each Local Authority to fix a limit of age if it thinks fit.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES: Not in the Metropolis.

MR. MATTHEWS: The Secretary of State has the same authority in the Metropolis, and though I have stated that I have no intention of fixing a limit, it will be open for my successor to do so. ["No."] The Bill will enable the Secretary of State to empower the Local Authority to impose whatever limit of age they desire, both outside and inside the Metropolis. It ought also to be borne in mind that if no men are allowed to enter the force until they are 25 years of age, they will have reached the suggested age of 50 years before they are entitled to a pension, and such a course may have its advantages. I trust the hon. Member will not think it necessary to press the Amendment.

(4.20.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I look on this as a very important Amendment, as it goes to the very root of the question. I will not discuss the point as to what ought to be the limit of age. All I want to provide for is that there shall be some limit of age, and that you should impose on the Local Authority the responsibility of saying what the age shall be, be it high or low. The right hon. Gentleman has said that there will be no limit of age in the Metropolis if the Bill passes, and I say that the proposal is an entirely new one, which your House never had made before in connection with public rates. In connection with all the branches of the police, whether in the Metropolis or in the country—save in the City itself—the limit of age is 60 years. It is impossible for a man to retire before that age, unless he is broken down and obtains a medical certificate. What is the rule of the Civil Service? Why the age is 60 years. What is the rule of the great companies and railways? Why that no pension is attainable without a medical certificate below the age of 60. The pensions are not paid on the maximum salary received at the age of 60, but on the whole pay during the period of service. The Representatives of the ratepayers rebelled against the scheme propounded by Mr. Hibbert. They would not have it, and I maintain that if the Representatives of the ratepayers had time to consider the present Bill they would rise against it just as they did against that of Mr. Hibbert. If we are to go by precedent, we see that in the matured draft of the Bill of the late Government the limit of age was put at 55 years; and we cannot help seeing that without a limit of age a great many constables will be able to retire at the age of 43, a great many at the age of 44, and a great many at the age of 45, for large numbers of young men enlist into the force at the ages of 18, 19, and 20. It is proposed to allow the policemen of the Metropolitan district to retire into civil life, carrying with them these large pensions—three times the amount received by our soldiers. I hold that the result will be that your best men will retire into civil life, carrying these high pensions with them, and you will be left with the dregs. The retiring age for men in the Metropolitan Police Force should not be less than 50. I do not object to that age in London, but consider it very reasonable. The Committee on the Scotch Bill has struck out the provision my hon. and learned Friend proposes to strike out in this Bill. I am quite willing to make the limit of age elastic, in order to enable constables to retire at 50 and officers at 60. Under these circumstances, I shall be glad to support my hon. and learned Friend in his Amendment. There is only one other argument I wish to advance. I think that if you make no limit in the Metropolis you will have an agitation in the provinces that they should have no limit also. They will say we will bully the Government until we have got what has been given to the men in the Metropolis. I never will support an agitation on the part of the servants of the State. There has been agitation, and now we are reaping the fruits of our action in regard to it.

*(4.34.) SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): The principle of this Amendment seems to me to be whether it is necessary to add to the condition of 25 years. We have a limit of age, and the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Atherley-Jones) contends that an addition is necessary in the case not only of the provincial forces, but also of the Metropolitan Force. I think the cases the hon. and learned Gentleman cited of constables being able to leave the Force at 45 or 50 were very extreme. That is by no means the general rule. The general rule is, that even 20 years' service has exhausted the energy of a constable, and that he leaves the Force after such service. The practical result of the figures I propose to give is that it is not necessary to make any further addition to the condition as to the limit of age. In 1885, in the Metropolitan Force, out of 11,514 constables, only 1·2 remained after 20 years of age and up to 25. In 1888 the number was somewhat increased. Those remaining amounted to 1·3 of the whole Force, and in 1889, out of 14,315 constables, only 329 were remaining up to 25 years' service. [Sir G. CAMPBELL: What about the officers?] I am dealing with the whole Force, including officers. The last figures I have cited only give 2 per cent. as remaining up to 25 years. What is a fair inference to be derived from the figures? It is that, at any rate in London, the demands on the constables are such that they cannot generally fulfil even the condition of 25 years' service. If that be so, I ask, is it right to attempt to add an additional limit of age? Is it not our proper course to endeavour, by a system of superannuation, to retain as long as possible in the Force those men of experience and character who have remained for a very considerable period. As a Metropolitan Member, I shall strongly oppose this Amendment.

(4.38.) MR. E. ROBERTSON: The hon. and learned Gentleman has rather mistaken the question raised by the Amendment. The clause proposes to leave it to the Local Authority to prescribe what shall be the limit of age, and the question raised by the Amendment is whether or not there should be a uniform limit of age in all places. The Home Secretary told us earlier in the Debate that a Scotch Member was travelling out of his province if he presumed to express an opinion upon this English Bill. That seems a startling statement to come from a Unionist Minister, and I can only attribute it to the Home Rule principles with which the right hon. Gentleman began his political career. As a matter of fact, we Scotch Members have a direct interest in the provisions of this Bill. Whatever provisions may be agreed to in the English Bill, there will be Scotch Members and English Members also who will insist on the Scotch Police having as good terms as the English Police. We therefore have a direct interest in seeing that no extravagant conditions are imported into this Bill. As to whether the limit should be universal, I will again recall to the attention of the House the important evidence laid before the Scotch Committee on the question. Captain Munro, a police expert, laid it down as a governing principle that between one Police Authority and another there should be uniform treatment as to pension. As to the question of the limit of age, this same expert, the only one called before the Committee, gave it as his opinion that in all forces the limit of age should be 55 for constables and 60 for officers. Unless the Government can give us some stronger reasons than those already adduced for the rejection of this Amendment, I shall be compelled to support the Amendment.

*(4.43.) MR. PICKERSGILL: As the hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Atherley-Jones) has made several references to Metropolitan Members, and has mentioned me by name, I should like to say a very few words. I suppose I have no right to complain that I and my Colleagues have again and again been charged by the hon. and learned Gentleman with being actuated by the most sordid motives in the position we have taken up. I do expect, however, from a learned Member of the House that his statements shall be coherent and intelligible. I submit that the hon. and learned Gentleman's statements against us were neither coherent nor intelligible. He says we are neglecting the interests of the ratepayers. If we are neglecting the interests of the ratepayers we stand to lose very much more than we can ever hope to gain by conciliating a mere handful of policemen. In the great popular constituency like that which I have the honour to represent the police vote is absolutely inappreciable; and even if it were not, I am not hard up for a few scores of votes or even for a few hundreds. Again, the hon. and learned Gentleman is, I think, wrong as to his information. He says that upon the statistics of the past a policeman is not worn out sooner in the Metropolis than in the rest of the country. That is directly contrary to the information afforded by the Parliamentary Paper I hold in my hand. This Paper shows that the average period of service of men pensioned in the Metropolitan Police Force is 21 years. Taking the 10 boroughs which precede the Metropolis in the list, the average length of service performed by constables before they are pensioned is over 27 years. I have only to add that the position of my constituents, and I think of the Metropolitan ratepayers generally, is this: They know, as every Member of the House knows, that for years—for nearly 10 years past—certain promises, of which this now before the House is one, have been held out to the Police Force by both Political Parties, and they desire that the public faith, having been in this way pledged, should be kept; and, moreover, they are quite willing to bear the burden of additional cost, if any, in order to secure the incalculable advantages which spring from a contented Police Force.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The question has been debated at great length on this and other occasions, and, therefore, I trust the House will now come to a decision.

MR. STOREY: My hon. and learned Friend has just left the House. I do not think he wishes to divide on this point in view of the suggestion which has been made to him.

(4.47.) The House divided:—Ayes 114; Noes 47.—(Div. List, No. 222.)

(4.55.) MR. E. ROBERTSON: I wish to move an Amendment in line 15. It is to omit the word "receive" and insert "thereupon the Police Authority may if it thinks fit grant him." This point was carefully considered by the Committee on the Scotch Bill. The object of the Amendment is to leave it to the Police Authority in each case to say whether or not a constable shall have a pension.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 15, to leave out the word "receive," and insert the words "thereupon the Police Authority may if it thinks fit grant him."—(Mr. Edmund Robertson.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'receive' stand part of the Bill."

Mr. Pinkersgill

(4.56.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): This is a question whether the police shall have a right to a pension or not. If we accepted this Amendment, we should really surrender the principle of the Bill.

(4.58.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I think it is a wrong principle, and one that ought not to be adopted in regard to any branch of the Public Service. I shall, therefore, vote with my hon. and learned Friend. I admit I moved this Amendment in Grand Committee, and got no support for it. The Liberal Government accept, to a certain extent, this principle; but, then, two blacks do not make a white.

MR. STOREY: I think policemen ought not to be pensioned by order of the State when they are paid by the ratepayers. The ratepayers ought to have some option in regard to pensions, and, in order to give effect to that principle, I shall vote with my hon. and learned Friend.

*(4.59.) MR. CHILDERS: There seems to be an impression in the minds of the Committee that this Amendment was adopted in the Select Committee on the Scotch Bill. The question as affecting the ordinary pensions where no medical certificate was necessary was discussed at great length on the Scotch Bill, and the Motion was rejected by a majority of 14 to 4.

(5.0.) MR. CONYBEARE: I consider it is fundamentally wrong in principle to destroy local control and to make the Home Office the operative authority all over the country. I am glad the Amendment has been proposed, and however large the majority against us may be, I think we ought to support that Amendment to a Division. The right hon. Gentleman says it would practically destroy a policeman's right to a pension altogether, but I do not agree with him. You may adopt the principle that every constable shall have a right to a pension, and you may embody that in an Act of Parliament, but still you may leave the Local Authorities, the representatives of the ratepayers, to act up to that principle and to put it in force. I do not see that there is any conflict of principle in the position. But whether that be so or not, it is material to the view I take that we should make every effort in our power that the locality, through its representatives, should have the controlling power, and not the Home Office.

*(5.11.) Mr. W. H. SMITH : I appeal to the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy not to press the other Amendments standing in his name. The hon. Member must have gathered from the Divisions what the view of the House is, and I hope that the hon. Member will not put the House to the trouble of considering Amendments which he knows the House will not approve. The hon. Member has already expressed his views on every possible aspect of the Bill.

(5.12.) Sir G. CAMPBELL : I should be glad if I could accede to the wish of the right hon. Gentleman. I feel that it is rather hard upon the right hon. Gentleman that he should be kept sitting here, at an inconvenient time, because his Colleagues have made such a mess of the Session. I quite admit that I have expressed myself at length upon my objections to the Bill, and, therefore, I shall now be brief. Still there are some matters of principle to which I must allude, though I will not take the House through the Lobbies unless I have a prospect of reasonable support. I was not a Member of the Committee on the Scotch Bill, but I have great faith in the wisdom of my own countrymen, and I find they have made an Amendment in their Bill not on a local but a general question, which is this : According to the English and the Scotch Bill, any man who is incapacitated from injury received in the execution of his duty is entitled to retire on a pension for life. We none of us want to alter that, but Clause 3 is very different. Where a man is incapacitated not by the performance of his duty, but because it turns out that he is unsound in mind or body, and incapable of the work required from him, in consequence of that infirmity, the question is : After what period of service should he be pensioned ? The Scotch Committee decided for 20 years, and I think they are right. If you adopt 15 years the result will be that for five years the man will be trying imperfectly to learn his duties, for the next 10 years he will be doing his work badly, and the end of that term he will receive a pension for the remainder of his life. Well, I do not think that is desirable. It will always be in the power of the Police Authority to award a gratuity. I should like to give the right hon. Gentleman the opportunity of expressing his view why we should not here adopt 20 years for the term of service instead of 15.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 17, to leave out the word "fifteen," and insert the word "twenty."—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question, "That the word 'fifteen,' stand part of the Bill," put, and negatived.

(5.17.) Sir G. CAMPBELL : The next Amendment is a very necessary one, and I scarcely know how the Under Secretary can resist it—

(5.17.) Mr. CONYBEARE : I desire to propose an Amendment which arises before the Amendment of the hon. Member, that is, to add after the words "infirmity of mind or body," the words "arising from his duty." It appears to me desirable to limit the right to receive a pension in this way, because it is clear infirmity may arise from causes altogether outside his duties as a constable.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 19, after the word "body," to insert the words "arising from his duties."—(Mr. Conybeare.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(5.18.) Mr. STUART WORTLEY : If the hon. Member will look lower down in the Bill, he will find that cases of infirmity brought about by vicious habits are abundantly provided for by a discretion given to the Police Authority.

Question put, and negatived.

Sir G. CAMPBELL : I really think the Under Secretary will not resist this Amendment. What I now propose is to provide that where a constable has not been subjected to a deduction from his pay for a reasonable period the amount of his pension shall be in proportion to such exemption. I know it has been said that no such case will arise, because by law every constable is obliged to allow some deduction from his pay to form a fund. But then a difficulty arises from the refusal to insert the definition of a "constable." Proceeding further, we find that chief constables do not now contribute to the fund; no deduction is made from their pay. I say it is a monstrous job to give chief constables full pensions, while they, unlike other members of the Force, are not required to contribute by deductions from their pay. I cannot see why there should be this exemption. In every Bill brought before the House there has been some proviso of this kind. There was such in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler); in the Scotch Bill there is a complicated set of rules for the same purpose. If I am right, as I think I am, that chief constables do not have to submit to deductions, then I do hope that the Government will, in fairness, accept my Amendment. It is, indeed, an important matter of principle, and I do not think I could have put it more briefly.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 5, at the end of Clause 1, to add the words—

"Provided that, if a constable has not been subjected to the deduction from his pay herein-after provided, as a contribution to the pension fund, for at least two-thirds of his whole service, the pension awarded to him shall be diminished to such an extent as to the Police Authority may seem reasonable under the circumstances."—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

* (5.22.) MR. STUART WORTLEY: So far as chief constables are concerned the Police Authorities have power to attain the same object as is secured by the deductions from the pay of ordinary constables; they can fix the salary of the Chief Secretary pro rata as vacancies arise.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: But existing chief constables?

*MR. STUART WORTLEY: The hon. Gentleman will allow me to proceed.

Sir G. Campbell

The same object is secured by the fixing of the amount of the salary. My argument applies to the past as well as to the future. So far as ordinary constables are concerned the Amendment ought not to be entertained. To insert the Amendment would be to introduce that element of uncertainty and possible caprice which it is the object of the Bill to avoid.

(5.23.) MR. STOREY: I submit that this is not a reasonable answer to a reasonable Amendment. The case we put is this: Is a constable who has made contributions to the fund from his pay to receive no advantage in his pension over the man who has made no such contribution? Really, what the Under Secretary has said is no more than an argument against any system of pensions at all, for the Local Authority, on engaging a man, can arrange for a scale of pay that shall prevent the question of pension arising. My hon. Friend has put the case of men who are to receive pensions of hundreds of pounds a year, making no contributions, as ordinary constables are required to do. Really, we have had no reply to justify this.

* (5.24.) MR. CHILDERS: I would strongly urge the Government to accept the Amendment. The question has been discussed before and was considered in the Committee on the Scotch Bill as satisfactorily settled. As it is a matter of great importance, I hope the Government will consider whether some Amendment could not be introduced into the Bill which would remove the apparent injustice to the common constables.

* (5.25.) MR. W. H. SMITH: Such an appeal coming from the right hon. Gentleman certainly deserves the fullest consideration from the Government. The proper place, however, for the Amendment suggested would be in a later clause of the Bill. Though I can give no definite pledge, I will certainly undertake that the point shall be re-considered.

(5.26.) MR. CONYBEARE: I should like to know how it is the suggestion acquires such importance when repeated from the Front Bench? Before we divide, I would just mention as a reason why chief constables should be put on the same footing, at least, as ordinary constables, that they are usually men who are in receipt of pensions for service in the Army.

(5.27.) MR. J. ROWLANDS: I certainly feel that there is every reason for some such an Amendment, and that chief constables should not escape those deductions to which constables have to submit.

(5.27.) MR. E. ROBERTSON: I would suggest to my hon. Friend that he should accept the specific promise made and withdraw his Amendment now.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(5.28.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: The point I have now to raise is also an important one, it is whether any discretion is to be allowed to Police Authorities in the amount of pensions. The House has decided, I think wrongly, that a man shall have the right to claim a pension after a certain period of service, but the question arises, whether a man having completed his term shall receive the same pension, whether his conduct has been good, bad, or indifferent. The words I propose have good authority, they are taken from the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and they run as follows:—

"Provided also, that the Police Authority may grant to any constable a pension of less amount than he would have been entitled to receive if his defaults or demerits in relation to the public service appear to them to justify such diminution."

It being half past Five of the clock, Further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, stood adjourned.

Consideration, as amended, to be resumed upon Monday next.

SUPPLY—REPORT.

Resolution, [1st August] reported.

REVENUE DEPARTMENTS.

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,583,845 (including a Supplementary sum of £50,000), be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the Salaries and Working Expenses of the Post Office Telegraph Service."

MR. J. M. MACLEAN (Oldham): I wish to call attention to what I may characterise as an extraordinary statement made last night by the Postmaster General in the Debate relating to the question of the telegraph clerks at Cardiff. I was not present during the Debate. I am sorry to hear that the Postmaster General has left town for Carlsbad. I was surprised to read the following in the report of the right hon. Gentleman's speech in the Times:—

"The editor of an infamous print, the Western Mail, seemed to have done his best to induce the servants of the Telegraph Office to disclose information for publication."

The right hon. Gentleman was smarting under attacks made upon him in the Western Mail for his conduct in removing from Cardiff certain telegraph clerks who had written to the local Press, and he appears to have lent a ready ear to stories told to him about the way in which the Western Mail attempted to obtain official information from clerks in the Telegraph Office. Now I personally refrained from taking any part in the Debate, because it might be supposed I had an interest in the matter, as I am one of the proprietors of this newspaper, and I therefore left it in the hands of my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff. I must say, however, it seems a most unwarrantable proceeding on the part of a Minister of the Crown to stand up in his place in Parliament and bring a shameful charge of that kind against a newspaper of large circulation and high standing, which has probably done as much service for the Conservative cause in the country, and for the public interest, as even the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General has done in the course of his long public life. I believe the only conceivable foundation for a charge of that kind is, that a telegram relating to the movements of the Postmaster General himself found its way into the columns of the Western Mail. The right hon. Gentleman was going down to Cardiff, and sent a telegram to say he could not come at the time he intended, but would a little later. That was a matter which interested the telegraph clerks more than ordinary telegrams would, and they appear to have talked about it to one another, and the news got round in the office, and one of the Post Office clerks—not one of the telegraph clerks—appears to have conveyed the information in a gossiping way to one of the reporters of the newspaper. Whether a thing of that kind justifies the Postmaster General in coming down and saying that a newspaper which publishes a telegram of that sort is an infamous print and tries to corrupt public servants I will leave it to the House to say. It seems to me to be an exceedingly unfair and improper thing for any Minister of the Crown to take advantage of his position as a Member of Parliament to bring such charges against men who are quite as honourable as himself. If the right hon. Gentleman had been present I should probably have used much stronger language; as it is, I will content myself with saying that the Western Mail is no more an infamous print than the right hon. Gentleman is an infamous Minister. If this is the way in which he deals with outside and unofficial critics, then I can only hope the right hon. Gentleman will come back from Carlsbad in better health and better temper, or I shall be very sorry for the unfortunate servants in the Post Office and Telegraph Service, who are at the right hon. Gentleman's mercy.

Resolution agreed to.

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILL
[LORDS].—(No. 251.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): When the Committee had this Bill under consideration they came to the conclusion unanimously that certain formal parts of various statutes, such as long preambles, might well be omitted in the revised edition, and the draughtsmen were instructed to prepare another schedule of preambles which might be dealt with in the same way. This Bill is the result of their work, and if it is passed we shall be able at once to issue three volumes of the revised edition. I trust, therefore, that the House will allow it to proceed.

*MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I should like to confirm that statement. This Bill merely carries out the wishes of the Committee, already approved by the House, and it is desirable to carry out this reform in the interests of the general body of the people, who have long been promised a cheap and convenient edition of the Statutes.

Mr. J. M. Maclean

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I really must object to Bills like this being passed in this way. If it is so important let the Government make it the first Order of the Day on Monday. I must continue to oppose measures being taken at such an hour as this.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On the Motion for Adjournment:—

MR. BRYCE: What will be the business for Monday?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeda, N.): Substantially the first Order on Monday will be the Police Bill, and it is proposed to go on with these Bills, and as soon as they have passed this House to take Supply.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Both Police Bills?

MR. JACKSON: Yes.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Is there to be a Supplementary Estimate?

MR. JACKSON: Yes; I have laid one on the Table to-day.

MR. STOREY: With regard to the Savings Banks Bill, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury singled me out yesterday as the only opponent of this Bill. If he looks on the Paper he will find 33 notices of opposition.

MR. JACKSON: I am quite aware of that, and I think it reflects great credit on the hon. Member's industry.

MR. CONYBEARE: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to imply by that that the opposition is not bonâ fide. If so, I can assure him that my opposition is?

DR. TANNER: And I also may say that in consequence of communications I have received from Ireland I must oppose the Bill.

MR. JACKSON: I may remind the hon. Member that we have met the case of Ireland by agreeing to exempt that country from the operation of the Bill.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock until Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 4th August, 1890.

COMMISSION.

The following Bills received the Royal Assent:—

Poor Law (Ireland) Rating.

Pauper Lunatic Asylums (Ireland) (Officers' Superannuation).

Boiler Explosions Act, 1882, Amendment.

Infectious Disease (Prevention).

Anglo-German Agreement.

Foreign Jurisdiction (Consolidation).

Statute Law Revision.

Removal Terms (Scotland) Act (1886) Amendment.

Birstall Wesleyan Chapel Trust Scheme Confirmation.

Shrewsbury and Holyhead Road (Anglesey and Carnarvon).

And a number of Private Bills.

METROPOLIS MANAGEMENT AND BUILDING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.
(No. 168.)

Report from the Select Committee, That the Committee adjourned on Friday last over this day; read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

DUBLIN CORPORATION BILL.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: My Lords, the Motion that stands in my name requires a few words of explanation. The Motion is that the Bill relating to the Dublin Corporation be re-committed so far as relates to Part IV. The facts of the case are these: When the Bill came up from the House of Commons these clauses relating to the collection of rates were in such a condition that the Committee to which the Bill was referred did not consider, under the circumstances, they were able to pass the clauses. Perhaps I had better read the Chairman of the Committee's statement on the subject. He states—

"I have to remark in the first instance, that the Bill, as it left the other House, did not attempt to deal with the great difficulty in the case, that of the altered position of the Collector General and his staff, his duties being the same, or nearly the same under the Bill, with only one-third of the sum available for the payment of himself and his staff."

Then he recommends that the rating clauses of the Bill ought to be struck out, and that the preamble be amended accordingly. Since that decision was arrived at clauses have been prepared which have been agreed to by certain parties to the Bill. It was thought extremely desirable by them that the matter should be again brought before the same Committee, when, of course, any opponents of the new clauses, whoever they might be, would have an opportunity of being heard. It was a point of some difficulty, and it was thought by myself far better that the matter should be settled in a satisfactory manner here, and sent down in a satisfactory form to the Commons. That is all I have to say now about the matter. It is not, of course, for me to express any opinion, or to make any statements as to the merits of the case, in regard to which I am afraid I am not competent to speak.

Moved—

"That the Bill be re-committed so far as relates to Part IV. (Rates), and the corresponding recitals in the preamble."—(The Chairman of Committees.)

*THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD (who spoke by leave of the House sitting): My Lords, I must really make the strongest protest I am able against the Motion of the noble Earl. I do not think the Motion comes exactly from himself. I think it is a change of front on the part of Her Majesty's Government, and a very extraordinary change of front it is. I will put before your Lordships very shortly what happened with regard to his Bill. Originally, when the Bill came into another place, it proposed to transfer the appointment of the Collector General to the Corporation. Well, that was opposed by Her Majesty's Government, and amended, and it was then arranged that the Corporation should collect its own rates, and that the other rates should still be collected by the Collector General. The Bill was then placed before a Committee of your Lordships' House. It was again opposed by Her Majesty's Government, these clauses were opposed by the Government in the person of Sir Richard Wyatt acting for the Government, it was opposed by the Chambers of Commerce in Dublin, who represent the largest ratepayers in that town. It was also opposed by the Port and Docks Board. Now, let me point out what happened then. All these different bodies have been heard by counsel upstairs, at great expense to them; and now, by the re-committal of this Bill, they must go through all that expense again. It is a most unsatisfactory arrangement; and I am sure your Lordships will agree with me that if the Government opposed this Bill upstairs they should not have changed front now, and come forward with a large sheaf of other clauses which the Government made no mention of before that Committee. I may mention that the clauses in Part IV. of this Bill were unanimously rejected by the Committee upstairs. These new clauses which the noble Chairman has suggested will improve the Bill are perfectly unworkable. They are most complicated; and to prove to your Lordships that even the framers of these clauses do not think much of them, they have inserted a proviso at the end that if either of the parties object to them they are at the end of six months to become a dead letter and to no longer have effect. I think on the part of the framers themselves that is not saying very much in favour of these clauses. I say these clauses simply do not carry out the original decision of the House of Commons. That decision was that the Corporation should collect its own rates. This does not even arrange for that; but it arranges that the Corporation is to interfere with the collection of all rates. I must protest very strongly against this change of front. The expense of this re-committal will to everybody be very great. The opponents received no notice, and at the last moment these clauses are brought forward, clauses which are very crude, and, as I venture to think, though I cannot claim great skill as a draughtsman, extremely badly drawn. From my own knowledge of the country also I believe them to be absolutely unworkable. They arrange that the Corporation shall have the appointment of two-thirds of the staff by which they provide really for the collection of the whole of the rates in Dublin. I hope sincerely that if your Lordships agree to refer this Bill to the Committee again the Committee will not follow the example of Her Majesty's Government, but will adhere to their former decision.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN: I beg to support every word which has been said by the noble Lord who has just sat down, and to protest most strongly against the action taken in re-committing this Bill. The clauses relating to rating have been unanimously rejected by the Committee upstairs. At the same time, other similar clauses have been inserted at the action of certain persons, and I shall be very much obliged if the noble Lord will inform the House why the wishes of those certain persons who have met these clauses with approbation have been consulted in the matter, and why this Bill is to be laid before the Committee upstairs again without any notice. It has caused, I am bound to say, great consternation among a large number of Her Majesty's citizens in Dublin, who had no notice that this action was to be taken, and who thought that when the Bill came down from the other House all further legislation on that head was at an end. I must say that I think the various opponents of this Bill have great cause of complaint, for not only have they been taken completely by surprise, but they will be put to great expense in having to employ counsel at great expense to re-argue the case.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: I think I ought to explain, in answer to what has fallen from the noble Duke, that the opponents of the Bill have had ample warning or notice in this matter. The Motion which I have made has been on the Paper for a week, and ample opportunity has therefore been given to any persons desirous of opposing the Bill, and discussing the matter before the Committee.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Earl CADOGAN): I rise not at all for the purpose of entering into the matter which have been referred to your noble Lords, or with any desire to prolong this discussion, but to point out that the question before the House is whether this Bill committed or not. I am bound to say that in my opinion the noble Lord, the Chairman of Committees, has shown good ground for such re-committal, and I hope your Lordships will agree to it.

On Question agreed to.

SWAZILAND.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I rise to put a question to the noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The Session is more or less approaching an end, and it would be, I think, very desirable if he could inform the House what is the state of the negotiations with regard to Swaziland, whether any arrangement has been come to with the South African Republic, and whether, before we adjourn, Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to place before the House any Papers on the matter?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KINTHURST): My Lords, I am glad the noble Earl has been good enough to put this question to me, because the matter is one which is of great importance and which has naturally excited much interest in this country as well as in South Africa. I am happy, therefore, to be able to state that we learned yesterday that the result of the negotiations, conducted in a most friendly spirit between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the South African Republic, has been the making of a Convention which secures the independence of Swaziland, and a joint Government over the white settlers for a term of years, and provides other terms, to which, with your Lordships' permission, I will shortly refer. This Convention has been signed by the President, and is to be submitted this day to the Volksraad for ratification. Papers will be presented to Parliament on the subject as soon as possible, but, looking at the importance of the subject, I trust your Lordships will allow me to make a short statement in explanation of the course of events which led up to these negotiations, and also of the action of Her Majesty's Government. Swaziland has an area of the Chiefdom of 8,000 square miles, and is situated on the borders of three sides by the South African Republic. It has a native population of about 63,000, about 9,000 of this number being fighting men. In the Report of Sir Francis de Winton, to which I shall have occasion later on to refer, he well describes the Swazis as "a happy, contented, work-hating, wild people." As regards the number of white residents it is very difficult to make any accurate calculations; but referring to Sir Francis de Winton's Report, I may observe that he says that—

"As regards the White residents, it is difficult to arrive at their correct numbers, so many persons being non-resident, though possessed of interests in Swaziland, and a proper register of those entitled to vote for the White Committee never having been kept. The mineral holders, miners, canteen and store keepers, missionaries, and a few permanent farmers are the only residents in the country. These consist chiefly of subjects of Great Britain. The non-residents consist of grazing holders and concessionaires. These are chiefly subjects of the Transvaal, or persons who have interests in the South African Republic. Roughly speaking, the subjects and sympathisers of the South African Republic represent 3 to 1 as to other nationalities, but they do not represent much capital."

As regards the trade of the country, it may be shortly stated that the main trade is through Delagoa Bay and Natal. The trade between Natal and Swaziland is about £70,000 a year, and it may be said that the trade and commerce of Swaziland generally have been chiefly created by the wants of the white residents, and are almost entirely in the hands of Englishmen, with the exception of one or two Germans. Little is produced in the country out of which revenue can be collected. The present revenue of the country mainly consists of rents, obligations and transfer fees due under concessions; licences, taxes; and Customs dues. The former are paid to the King or Representative of the Swazi nation, and are computed to amount to about £20,000 a year, while the other portion of the revenue, that is, the portion derived from licences, taxes, and Customs dues, may be stated at about £8,000 a year. I need not weary your Lordships by going into the early history of Swaziland, a full account of which is contained in Sir Francis de Winton's Report; but I may mention that the independence of the Swazis and the continuance of that independence were fully recognised by Article 12 of the Convention of 1884, known as the Convention of London, and made between in fact, we did send up, Colonel Martin with police to act with the Transvaal officers. On September 26 of last year Sir Francis de Winton was appointed. I will not trouble your Lordships with the instructions which were issued to Sir Francis de Winton. They will appear with the Report which will be presented to Parliament. I will only read one paragraph of the instructions given to him, as showing the line we desired to take in reference to this matter.

"In your discussions with the Commissiener of the South African Republic and in any recommendation you may make, you are at liberty to take into consideration the relations of the affairs of Swaziland to the interests of South Africa generally; bearing in mind that Her Majesty's Government desire to arrive at a satisfactory and enduring understanding with the South African Republic in regard to all the tribes and countries bordering thereon, and that it is an essential feature of our policy that there shall be no undue restrictions on the development and advancement of British trade and enterprise in any part of South Africa."

But pending those proceedings and the settlement of the question it was necessary to appoint a temporary Commission to keep peace and order in Swaziland, in place of the White Committee, to which I have before referred, and Colonel Martin was appointed the British Commissiener. I desire now publicly to express our sense of the good service rendered by Colonel Martin, for it is largely owing to his tact and judgment that peace and order have been hitherto preserved under very trying circumstances in Swaziland. Turning again to the Report of Sir Francis de Winton, it is manifest from what I have said of the legal position of the Governments of the two countries with regard to Swaziland that there were three alternative courses which might be taken consistently with the preservation of the independence of the Swazis — either the government of the whites might be handed over to the Transvaal Government, or we might take it in hand ourselves, or there might be a Joint Government. Sir Francis de Winton's recommendations were opposed to a Joint Government. He thought that complications would probably arise from that form of government. He pointed out in his Report the conditions under which alone Her Majesty's Government could administer the government of the whites; that it would cost about £22,000 a year, and that we should not have any full command of the Revenues; and there were other reasons which he urged for consideration if that course was to be adopted. He also laid down nine conditions which would have more or less to be observed and enforced if the government of the white settlers was to be handed over to the South African Republic. On the whole, looking to his Report and remembering the conversations which I have had with him, I think I am not doing him an injustice in saying that he was in favour of our allowing the South African Republic to take over the administration of the government of the white settlers. But, after very full and careful consideration, and looking to the strong feeling in this country, and also to what we believed to be the strong feeling of the Swazis, Her Majesty's Government decided in favour of a Joint Government over the white settlers. I need not now trouble your Lordships with the details of the various points which have been discussed before the terms of the Convention were settled; but merely say that, subject to the main principles of preserving the independence of the Swazis and securing the Joint Government over the white settlers, we have been most anxious to meet the wishes of the South African Republic. The exact terms of the Convention, as finally settled and as signed yesterday, and which the President is going to lay before the Volksraad to-day, have not yet arrived, but we know sufficient of the substance of them, from the draft agreements and correspondence which has passed, and I am able to point out the main features of the Convention to your Lordships:—1. The independence of the Swazis, as recognised by the Convention of 1884, is reaffirmed and secured; the control and management by the Swazi Government of all affairs in which natives are concerned remain unaffected. 2. It is provided that there shall be a joint administration over the white settlers, under a proclamation to be issued by the Swazi Regent and Council. 3. A Court of Justice will be established to administer Roman Dutch law; to decide all cases, criminal or civil, between white settlers; and to inquire into the validity of disputed concessions. 4. All lawfully acquired rights are to be recognised by the Joint Government Committee, and by all Judicial Tribunals. 5. The Government of the South African Republic undertakes not to interfere to the north or north-west of the Republic, and to support by its influence the establishment of order and government by the British South Africa Company within the jurisdiction and under the powers granted to that company by their charter. 6. Her Majesty's Government recognise the right granted to the South African Republic by concession from the Swazi King to construct a railway through Swaziland towards the sea. They also approve of the South African Republic making Treaties to secure a right to continue that railway to the sea at, or near, Kosi Bay, and to obtain a concession of an area of ten miles in radius from a point at, or near, that Bay. 7. Provision is made to prevent the sovereignty, control, or management of Kosi Bay, or of the area above mentioned, falling into the hands of a foreign Power. 8. Provision is also made for the entering of the South African Republic into the existing Customs Union Convention with the Cape, the Orange Free State, and Bechuanaland, upon terms to be agreed upon. 9. Failing such agreement within six months, the arrangement as to Kosi Bay is to lapse, but the Joint Government of Swaziland will continue for three years certain, and will not be terminated after the expiration of the three years unless six months' previous notice be given by either Party. If the South African Republic enters into the Customs Union, no limit of time is named for the ending of the Convention. I fear that I have troubled your Lordships at some length, but some such short sketch of the position of affairs was necessary to enable your Lordships to appreciate the effect of the Agreement that has been made with the South African Republic, and I trust that when that Agreement is looked at, and when the position of the two countries with respect to Swaziland is understood, the country will approve of it, and will regard it as a satisfactory arrangement. The independence of Swaziland is secured, a Joint Government is provided for the white settlers, and we have been able to satisfy the natural, and very legitimate, desire of the South African Republic to have some port on the sea coast, while at the same time provision has been made to prevent that harbour, or port, from falling into the hands of a foreign Power. Although all the terms of the Convention may not approve themselves to everybody, yet I feel confident that the Convention, on the whole, will be approved in this country as a satisfactory settlement of questions which were in a very unsettled condition, and which would, undoubtedly, if left unsettled, have led to grave complications and very serious trouble. I desire, in conclusion, to recognise the friendly attitude of the South African Republic throughout this matter, and the good services rendered by Mr. Hofmeyr, who, at great personal inconvenience, went up himself to advise the President as regards the Convention. Nor can I conclude without bearing testimony to the great services, ability, and judgment shown by Sir Francis de Winton and Sir Henry Loch. It is largely owing to the tact and judgment of Sir Henry Loch that this troublesome question has been, as I trust, settled in a friendly spirit, and that our good relations with the South African Republic have been maintained unimpaired.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I am sure every one must have listened with the greatest interest to the statement of the noble Lord opposite. The matter is so complicated and important that I think it would be unwise to enter into any discussion, or to express any opinion on it now, and until we see the Papers. I can only say that I earnestly trust that the hope which the noble Lord has expressed, that this will be a satisfactory settlement of very difficult questions, may be fulfilled. I only rise for the purpose of asking the noble Lord to say, if he can, within what territory Kosi Bay is situated, and with whom the negotiations for the construction of the railway to Kosi Bay are to be conducted. I should also like to ask whether there are any provisions in the Convention in regard to the transit of goods over that line, and as to the duties to be levied at the port.

*LORD KNUTSFORD: I have been obliged necessarily to cut my statement rather short. The territory at Kosi Bay belongs to the Queen Zambili, and is in Amatongaland. The South African Republic could not, according to the terms of the Convention of 1884, enter into any Treaty on the South-east of the Transvaal, but Her Majesty's Government will now support the Transvaal Government in making Treaties with the Chiefs and with Queen Zambili for constructing and maintaining the railway and the harbour at Kosi Bay. Attention will be paid to securing free rights over the railway which is to be constructed from the Eastern border of the Transvaal, through Swaziland, and on through the Queen Zambili's territory to Kosi Bay. I should not like to give an absolute answer on the other point until we have the Convention before us, but I have every reason to believe that the subject was discussed.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I would ask one other question if the noble Lord will pardon me, and that is whether the position of Amatongaland will be in any way altered, except as regards the particular strip of land required for the railway?

*LORD KNUTSFORD: No, except that a certain portion of land on each side of the railway will be reserved to the South African Republic, and an area of land at or near Kosi Bay.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE BILL—(No. 231.)

Returned from the Commons with the Amendments agreed to.

ALDERSHOT ROADS BILL—(No. 219.)

House in Committee (according to Order).

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (EARL BROWNLOW): I have no Amendment in the Bill itself, but I propose to add a few words at the end of it in fulfilment of a promise given in the other House by the First Lord of the Treasury. It will come after Clause 8 at the end.

Moved to insert—

"The Secretary of State for War shall, one month before selling any part of the lands shown on the plan referred to in this Act, give notice of his intention to the vestry of the parish in which such lands are situated, and to the county council of Surrey, and shall consider any objections which they may make to such intended sale."

Amendment agreed to: the Report thereof to be received to-morrow, and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 247.)

BANKRUPTCY BILL—(No. 237.)

House in Committee (on re-commitment) (according to order.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I had proposed to move some Amendments, but I believe my noble and learned Friend will try, if I state what they are, to meet them in the further stages of the Bill. One has reference to the absolute bar upon the discretion of the Court in granting discharges in the event of a person being in the opinion of the Court guilty of any of the misdemeanours mentioned in the Act. I object to the form in which that absolute bar is placed. The second point has reference to the question which was raised by my noble and learned Friend opposite with reference to the obligation to disclaim onerous leases and so forth. As both of those Amendments will, I understand, be made by my noble and learned Friend at a further stage of the Bill I do not propose to move them now.

Bill reported without further Amendment, and to be read 3^a on Thursday next.

PHARMACY ACT (IRELAND) (1875) AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 172.)

Amendments reported (according to order); and Bill to be read 3^a to-morrow.

CENSUS (ENGLAND AND WALES) BILL—(No. 226.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order.)

Clause 5.

*THE PAYMASTER GENERAL (The Earl of JERSEY): I have one Amendment in this clause. I beg to move that the words in page 2, line 14, after the word "and" be inserted, "In the case of a dwelling-house in Wales or the County of Monmouth." This is to make it perfectly clear that the persons referred to as speaking Welsh are only those living in Wales and Monmouthshire.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 14.

*THE EARL OF POWIS: My Lords, we have been told that this Bill goes exactly on the lines of the Bill of 1880, but in this clause there is an important difference. In the Census Bill of 1880 the phrase used is "constable or other police officer for every parish," which, of course, restricts the use of rural constables to the local constables, and does not make the County Constabulary liable to be called in in addition to their present duties, which are extensive enough, to assist as enumerators. Now, I think it is very desirable that this phrase should be maintained, because the County Constabulary are much fewer in point of numbers than they are in Ireland, for instance, where they do this and every other sort of work; and it will be especially burdensome in the smaller Welsh counties where the number of county constables is very small in comparison with the area. It would be very undesirable that they should be taken away to act as enumerators, which would, of course, employ them, not only during the two days when the Returns are given out and taken back, but would give them a good deal of other employment. This makes but a very small apparent change, but its consequences would be considerable. In accordance, therefore, with the Act of 1880, the word "for" is used, and in page 14, line 24, I move, therefore, that the word "in" be struck out, and the word "for" substituted. We shall, probably, be told that this is a power which is only intended to be used in special circumstances, but the convenience of using drilled men for this work would be so great to the Department that, no doubt, the cases of pressure and necessity will be found to be very numerous, and it will aid greatly in establishing a practice which is not now the law of employing the constabulary for the purpose of doing census work.

Moved, in line 24, to leave out the word ("in") and insert the word ("for.") —(The Earl of Powis.)

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: There is no intention on the part of the Local Government Board to employ the County Constabulary as regular enumerators, but those words were put in in order to provide for emergencies or pressure, and to meet difficulties in certain cases in which the overseers or relieving officers could not be got to act as enumerators. I wish to assure the noble Lord that the Local Government Board intend to employ the latter in the first instance, and it would only be in very exceptional cases that they would be called upon to employ the parish constables. I believe there are some parishes in which parish constables are not now chosen. I hope the noble Lord will not press his Amendment.

Amendment put, and negatived.

Report of the Amendment to be received to-morrow.

PROCEDURE IN LUNACY.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD HERSCHELL, in rising to ask the Lord Chancellor "whether his attention has been called to the letter of Dr. Percy Smith in the British Medical Journal of 19th July, exemplifying the difficulty now frequently experienced in finding Magistrates to undertake the required duties of certifying lunatics, and the hardship thus inflicted on lunatics and their relatives; and whether he will consider what measures can be taken to lessen as far as possible the inconveniences thus arising," said: My Lords, I have to call the attention of my noble and learned Friend to a somewhat important matter connected with the working of the Lunacy Act. Complaints are made that there is a difficulty experienced in finding a Justice of the Peace, whose act is necessary for the purpose of completing the requirements of the Act in reference to the detention of lunatics. My attention has been called to a particular case where, a lunatic having been admitted into Bethlehem Hospital under an urgency order, it became necessary, in order to comply with the requirements of the Act, and to justify the continued detention of the lunatic, to obtain the necessary documents from a Justice of the Peace. The relations of the lunatic endeavoured to comply with the Act. There were four Justices, I believe, in the district, who were qualified in the manner provided by the Act to act in lunacy matters. Three of them were absent; and the fourth declined to act, and, I believe, suggested a visit to the stipendiary. A visit was made to the stipendiary, and in this particular instance correctly enough he stated he was unable to do what was required of him in the absence of the petitioner. But in many cases I am informed the stipendiaries decline to exercise this jurisdiction under the provisions of the Act, which enables them to do so, if, as I understand, it is inconsistent with their ordinary duties. The result is that in cases of unquestioned lunacy the unfortunate relations of the lunatics are driven from one place to another endeavouring to find a Justice of the Peace who can perform the functions required of a Justice under the Act, and a very considerable amount of trouble, annoyance, inconvenience, and difficulty is entailed, which I am quite sure my noble and learned Friend will feel it is desirable to avoid as far as possible in the case of persons who are often sufficiently distressed at being compelled to part with those who are dear to them. I, therefore, desire to ask my noble and learned Friend whether he will inquire into the matter, in order to see what steps can be taken by which those inconveniences can be mitigated as far as possible.

"THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I have had information from various quarters that some difficulty has been experienced in obtaining judicial authority for reception orders in cases of lunacy. The Act, which made a very considerable change in the law, has only been in operation for three months, and some difficulty was reasonably to be expected at first. So far as it has arisen from insufficiency in the number of justices appointed. I have no doubt that at the meetings of justices at Michaelmas the appointments for next year will be made in the light of the experience which has been obtained. The allegation that Stipendiary Magistrates have manifested a disinclination to carry out the duties entrusted to them by the Statute is a serious one, which must necessarily engage the attention of the Home Office. It would be the Home Office which would, in the first instance, make inquiry in that direction, but I think there must be some misunderstanding in the matter. The terms of the Act of Parliament are quite clear. I do not understand my noble and learned Friend to suggest any alteration of the law. The principle of having a Judicial Authority met with such general assent in both Houses of Parliament, and the details were so carefully considered, that it would be unjustifiable to raise any of the questions over again for some time to come. I think your Lordships may rely upon those who have the working out of the Act cast upon them to get over such difficulties as present themselves in the practical and cordial spirit to which we are accustomed in this country. I have no doubt that at the approaching Michaelmas Sessions the Magistrates will take care, as far as in them lies, that if any inconveniences are found, the deficiency will be supplied. My noble and learned Friend has called my attention to the letter which has given occasion for his observations. I cannot part with that letter without saying that the spirit in which it is written is not one which gives it much credit with me. My noble Friend, as well as myself, may perhaps be aimed at, as he and my noble and learned Friend Lord Selborne both had to do with the measure until I took charge of it, and finally passed it through the House. I can only say, as far as I am concerned, the suggestions made by Medical Authorities received the most careful attention. I received a deputation, including Sir Andrew Clark and other eminent persons, particularly in that line of medical study, and their suggestions were not only listened to but many of them adopted at my instance. After the Bill had passed in this House, the Home Secretary also received more than one deputation on the subject. I cannot say, therefore, that this letter comes credited with a spirit of great candour on the part of the writer. But the subject certainly requires attention, and if the facts should turn out as they are represented, undoubtedly they are facts which ought to be dealt with, and I can only say they shall receive any attention I can give to them.

TRAMWAYS ORDER IN COUNCIL (IRELAND) (SOUTH CLARE RAILWAYS);
BILL—(No. 251.)

To be read 2^a on Monday next.—(The Lord Privy Seal [E. Cadogan]).

House adjourned at a quarter past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock,

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 4th August, 1890.

ROYAL ASSENT.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners;—

The House went;—and being returned;—

Mr. SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to the Bills mentioned on page 1709.

QUESTIONS.

THE CALEDONIAN CANAL.

Mr. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Invernesshire): I beg to ask the Lord
Lord Halsbury

Advocate if he will state by what authority and at whose instigation a locked gate has been recently placed on Government property across the much-frequented east bank of the Caledonian Canal at Fort Augustus, near to Loch Ness, although the canal banks have been accessible to, and used by, the public ever since its opening 70 years ago; and whether he will order its immediate removal?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): The gate in question is situated on private, not on Government property, and presumably has been placed there by the proprietor. The Canal Commissioners have a right of free access to the banks and are at present negotiating with the proprietor to secure that this right is fully given effect to, but I have no power to order a removal of the gate.

MADAGASCAR.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that great anxiety is caused to those interested in missions in Madagascar by the report that this country may give France a free hand in Madagascar in return for assenting to our Protectorate in Zanzibar; whether he is aware that a large part of Madagascar has been civilised and Christianised by British Protestant missionaries; whether great anxiety was caused to those missionaries by the pretensions of France some years ago, and whether a peaceful settlement was then come to, under which Madagascar is making rapid progress; and whether Her Majesty's Government will refrain from doing anything which may give France a pretext to encroach on the liberty of the Malagasy people or disturb the full rights now enjoyed by the British missionaries and their adherents?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Belfast, W.): May I ask whether, considering the very harsh treatment of the Rev. Mr. Shaw, the Government will take care that the missionaries are properly protected?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): I think my answer will cover both questions. Her Majesty's Government are well aware of the work and claims of British missionaries in Madagascar, and will not fail to consider them in all circumstances.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): Will the Government, in any negotiations, regard the claims of the Malagasies?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: That question does not arise out of my answer.

BLACKBURN SCHOOL BOARD.

MR. CODDINGTON (Blackburn): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department why he refuses to sanction the rules and regulations submitted by the Blackburn School Board, for the management of the Mayson Street Day Industrial School, provided by that Board, and which has now been ready for occupation for nearly three months, and the teachers and other officers for which have been appointed for the same time, and more especially as such rules and regulations are based on those prepared for the Day Industrial Schools of Nottingham, Gateshead, Wolverhampton, Newcastle, Leeds, Liverpool, Sunderland, Great Yarmouth, and Oxford, which have been sanctioned by previous Home Secretaries?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The Order in Council of March, 1887, which regulates Day Industrial Schools, expressly provides that religious instruction at those schools shall be given to the children by ministers of the religious persuasion, to which they belong with no restriction on the denominational character of that instruction. The rules proposed by the Blackburn School Board do not at all give effect to this provision, nor do they correspond with the rules of the other schools mentioned. They prohibit the teaching of any distinctive religious catechism, or formulary, and for Roman Catholic children provide for religious instruction only by an assistant mistress, and if they are numerous enough to form a class. I have, therefore, declined to sanction these rules, and have advised the adoption of the same rule as that which obtains at the Salford and Manchester Schools. The Inspector of Industrial Schools has strongly urged the adoption in future of such rules as will accord with the intention of the Order in Council, and will, at the same time, remove the causes of that discontent which has arisen, and will necessarily arise in schools where, owing to the imperfect provision being made in the rules, particular denominations have reason to believe that insufficient opportunity is allowed for the religious instruction of the children, belonging to them.

EAST AFRICA—THE INDIAN ABKARI (EXCISE) SYSTEM.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that it is reported that the British East African Company purposes introducing the Indian Abkari (Excise) system in Eastern Africa; and whether, in view of the condemnation of that system in India by this House last Session, the Government will interfere to prevent such a course being adopted?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: We are not aware of the report referred to by the hon. Member, but the policy of Her Majesty's Government, in conjunction with that of other Powers, is to check and restrain the importation of ardent spirits among the natives of Africa.

THE BURMESE DACOIT BOH YAN MYUN.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cookermouth): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he can now give the House any information as to the capture and trial of the Burmese Dacoit Boh Yan Myun?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (SIR J. GOSSET, Chatham): With the permission of the House, I will read a telegram which has been received by my noble Friend from the Viceroy, dated August 1st.

"Your, 29th. Regarding Yan Myun Dacoit. Following received from Chief Commissioner of Burma: 'When proclamation recently issued in Myingyan district, offering free pardon to lesser dacoits, Yan Myun specially excepted by name, and reward 5,000 rupees offered for his apprehension. On the 28th of May last Macdonald, sub-divisional officer, heard Yan Myun meditated surrender, and sent out a pongyi to communicate with him. Macdonald says no promise was made, but we';—

I presume he means "he"— 'told him if he came in Authorities would probably show him mercy and spare his life. Macdonald also told Pongyi if Yan Myun surrendered he would plead for his life. Yan Myun surrendered two days later, having received no further promise. He has been tried by Deputy Commissioner of District, and sentenced to death, and he appealed to Judicial Commissioner. Appeal not yet decided, and sentence not carried out. Yan Myun first alleged he surrendered on the understanding that Macdonald would do his utmost to get his life spared; subsequently that he received a promise that his life would be spared, but would have surrendered anyhow, owing to constant terror of being murdered. If Judicial Commissioner confirms sentence, it will not be executed until Chief Commissioner has considered case. Sir Charles Crosthwaite (who is Chief Commissioner of Burma) states that we can rely upon him to prevent even apparent breach of faith."

ASSAM TEA PLANTATIONS.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the difference in the mortality between coolies employed on the tea plantations of Assam, under the Act of 1882, and those not under the Act, and to the fact that the average mortality of the coolies under the Act is double that of those not under it; whether he is aware that the non-Act labourers are free agents, who take service on healthy plantations, while Act labourers are imported from a distance under long contracts, and are often placed on unhealthy plantations, and that Act labourers are often engaged by contractors for unhealthy places, in entire ignorance of the conditions of plantation life; whether he has observed that the death rate on some of those unhealthy plantations ranges from 200 to 270 per 1,000, or eight times the average mortality of Assam; that on two plantations in 1884 more than half the coolies died; that many of the coolies desert and perish in the jungle; and that many others come back from the tea gardens crippled for life, and have to depend on charity; and whether the Government of India, in the investigation they are now making into the subject, will consider the desirability of ceasing to enforce labour contracts entered into for a term of years?

*SIR J. GORST: The answer to the first question is, Yes. The attention of the Secretary of State has been frequently called to this matter by questions in Parliament, and it has been pointed out that such questions are suggested by those who desire to substitute a system of free immigration for the safeguards of the Act of 1882. The answer to the second question is also in the affirmative. The Government of India consider that the higher mortality among the labourers under the Act is to a great extent accounted for by the fact that these are chiefly new comers, while the non-Act labourers are generally old hands who are seasoned and acclimated. As to the second paragraph of the question, it is one which, as I have before pointed out to the House, is based on isolated facts picked out of the official Reports of many years past. It gives a most erroneous impression of the actual state of the tea gardens. The answer to the fourth question is, Yes. This is one of the points which is engaging the attention of the Government.

THE WORLD'S PRODUCTION OF GOLD AND SILVER.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the increasing interest in the subject and its importance, he can arrange for an annual Return of the World's production of gold and silver (based on the most approximate sources of information available to the Government), and the extent of their use in commerce, the arts, and coinage respectively, as is done by the Director of the United States Mint?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Such an annual Return as the hon. Member suggests would, if it were trustworthy, be no doubt extremely instructive. But there are many difficulties in the way, and any Return we could give would practically be based upon the same information which is already used by the Director of the United States Mint. I will, however, make further inquiries on the subject.

BROMPTON CEMETERY.

MR. KIMBER: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many coffins of deceased persons remain above ground in Brompton Cemetery, and is their number allowed to be increased every year; Is he aware that such coffins are sometimes found to have become so deteriorated by age as to allow the escape of noxious gases from their contents ; and whether, in the interests of the public health of the Metropolis, he will consider the expediency of prohibiting any further interments in open catacombs, or of entirely closing the cemetery as a place of burial, or for any other purpose than an open space ?

MR. MATTHEWS : I am informed by the Inspector that there are 587 leaden coffins deposited above ground, and about 10 fresh ones are placed in the catacombs every year. It is the fact that the lead of some of these coffins occasionally gives way ; but as the catacombs are daily visited, anything amiss is immediately discovered and dealt with. With regard to the cemetery generally, the Inspector is satisfied that the regulations now in force will prevent it from becoming dangerous to the public health ; but with regard to coffins deposited in the catacombs, I am now in consultation with the Office of Works with a view of adopting more stringent regulations, which will remove all reasonable cause of apprehension.

LANARKSHIRE MINERS.

MR. DONALD CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.) : I had intended to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the complaints of the Lanarkshire miners, that they have no place to prepare their cartridges, cartridges being the only form in which they are permitted by the Coal Mines Regulation Act to take gunpowder into the mines ; and whether, since the preparation of the cartridges in their own houses is attended with great danger, even when compressed gunpowder is used, which is expensive, and not always made up in suitable quantities, he will consider the expediency of legislation to amend the general rules of the Act, and make it compulsory on colliery owners to provide magazines in which the miners can make their cartridges ? At the request of the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to postpone the question until Thursday.

BRITISH HONDURAS.

MR. LENG (Dundee) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the attention of the Colonial Office has been called to the letters by Mr. James Arthur, a merchant of Belize, appearing in the Times of Monday, 21st July, and the South American Journal of 26th July, complaining of the manner in which the colony of British Honduras has been administered by Sir Roper Tuckfield Goldsworthy since his appointment to the Governorship in 1884, and more particularly with reference to a series of arbitrations in which the colony, without being adequately represented, has been mulcted in considerable sums for alleged breach of contract entered into between the Government of the colony and a Mr. C. T. Hunter, a friend of the Governor ; whether a serious constitutional crisis has arisen in consequence of the resignation of all the unofficial members of the Legislative Council, such resignation having been caused by the proceedings of the Governor ; whether the Secretary of State for the Colonies will cause inquiries to be instituted into the correctness of these statements, either by sending out to the colony a Commissioner at the cost of the taxpayers or otherwise ; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the whole of the correspondence which has passed between the Colonial Office and the Governor of the colony relating to the Hunter Contract case, both before and after the last arbitration held in London ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth) : The Secretary of State has seen the letters of Mr. Arthur. The arbitrations referred to were held by his instructions, and the colony was, in his opinion, adequately and ably represented at them. The unofficial members of the Council tendered the resignation of their seats in consequence of the vote for the amount awarded in the final arbitration being passed by the official majority in accordance with the direction of the Secretary of State, and in so doing they stated that their action was not intended to express any reflection upon the Governor. The Secretary of State has ample material for judging as to the correctness of Mr. Arthur's statements, and sees no need for sending out a Commissioner. He does not think that any good object would be obtained by laying the Papers on the Table of the House, but he will be glad to let the hon. Member see them, if he desires.

SUPERANNUATION OF MINE INSPECTORS.

SIR JOSEPH BAILEY (Hereford): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, by a Treasury Minute, dated 14th June, 1859, the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury, in pursuance of Section 4 of "The Superannuation Act, 1859," declared that a period of seven years should be added to the service of Inspectors of Mines for the purpose of computing their superannuation allowance; whether, on the 8th April, 1873, Mr. Thomas Cadman was appointed an Inspector of Mines; whether Mr. Cadman retired in consequence of ill-health in January, 1887, after 14 years' service; whether Mr. Cadman's superannuation allowance was calculated on 17-60ths of his pay instead of 21-60ths, to which he was entitled, on the ground that for four years he had been Assistant Inspector, whereas in fact he had been from the first appointed Inspector, though employed to do assistant's work; whether the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in a letter addressed to the Secretary to the Treasury, dated 11th October, 1887, stated that up to that date it had been the belief of the Secretary of State and the Civil Service Commissioners that persons thus employed were entitled to the status of Inspectors, no intimation to the contrary having been received from the Treasury; and whether, under these circumstances, the Treasury will re-consider the matter, and award to Mr. Cadman, and others in a similar position, the full superannuation allowance to which Inspectors of Mines are entitled.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The Estimates show that there are two classes of Inspectors of Mines—Inspectors and Assistant Inspectors. The number of each class is limited, and cannot be altered without the assent of the Treasury. It was, as stated in the question, to perform the duties of the latter class, that Mr. Cadman was appointed in 1873. The number of Inspectors was at that time fixed at 12, and there was no vacancy among them. Mr. Cadman continued to perform the duties and to receive the salary of an Assistant Inspector until his appointment, in 1876, to be an Inspector, when he became entitled to the higher salary and special rate of pension attached to that class. Assistant Inspectors act in subordination to the Inspectors, and can only become Inspectors by promotion on the occurrence of a vacancy. The salaries are lower, and they do not fulfil the essential condition for a special rate of pension which is required by the 41st section of the Superannuation Act, inasmuch as they may be appointed at an age (23), not exceeding that at which public service ordinarily begins. Until Mr. Cadman's retirement, no inquiry was addressed to the Treasury, either from the Home Office or the Civil Service Commissioners, as to the right of Assistant Inspectors to special terms of pension; but the fact that Mr. Cadman was appointed after obtaining a certificate of qualification from the latter Department was notice to them and to him, under the terms of the section referred to, that he was not entitled to the special terms of pension granted by that section, which provides that persons appointed to offices placed under it may obtain pensions without having obtained Civil Service certificates.

COLONEL BRIDGELL (Lancashire S.W., Irec): Was Mr. Cadman gazetted into the Service as an Inspector or an Assistant Inspector, and are there any duties an Inspector can perform which an Assistant Inspector cannot?

MR. JACKSON: I have pointed out that the number of Inspectors cannot be increased without the sanction of the Treasury. As there was no vacancy, Mr. Cadman could not be appointed. He entered the Service by open competition, and must, therefore, have had notice that he was not entitled to be pensioned on special terms.

SWAZILAND.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that a Convention has been signed with the Transvaal Government, and whether that Convention excludes Her Majesty's Government from the paramount position in Swaziland conceded to them under the Convention of 1884; and whether Her Majesty's Government have acquiesced in the demand of the Transvaal State for extension of their site to the sea?

BARON H. DE WORMS: A Convention has been signed by President Kruger, and will be presented this day to the Volksraad. Papers are in course of preparation, and will be presented as soon as possible, including, of course, Sir Francis de Winton's Report. In the meantime it may be convenient to state the substance of the Convention, the final terms of which we have not yet received. (1) The independence of the Swazis as recognised by the Convention of 1884 is re-affirmed and maintained, and the control and management by the Swazi Government, of all affairs in which natives only are concerned, remains unaffected. (2) It is provided that there shall be a joint Administration over the white settlers, under a Proclamation to be issued by the Swazi Regent and Council. (3) A Court of Justice will be established to administer Roman Dutch Law, and to decide all cases, criminal and civil, between white settlers, and to inquire into the validity of disputed concessions. (4) All lawfully acquired rights to be recognised by the Joint Government Committee and by all Judicial Tribunals. (5) The Government of the South African Republic undertakes not to interfere to the North or North-West of the Republic, and to support by its influence the establishment of order and government by the British South Africa Company within the jurisdiction and under the powers granted them by Charter. (6) Her Majesty's Government recognises the right granted to the South Africa Republic by concession from the King of Swaziland, to construct a railway through Swaziland towards the sea. They also approve of the South Africa Republic making Treaties to secure a right to continue that railway to the sea at a point at or near Kosi Bay, and to obtain a concession of an area of 10 miles in radius at or near Kosi Bay. (7) Special provision is made to prevent the sovereignty, control, or management of Kosi Bay, or the area above mentioned, falling into the hands of a foreign Power. (8) Provision is also made for the entering of the South Africa Republic into the existing Customs Union Convention with the Cape, Orange Free State, and Bechuanaland, on terms to be agreed upon. (9) Failing such Agreement within six months, the arrangement as to Kosi Bay is to lapse; but the Joint Government of Swaziland is to continue for three years certain, and will not be terminated after the expiration of three years, unless six months' previous notice be given by either party. If the South Africa Republic enters the Customs Union, no limit of time is named for the termination of the Convention.

DR. CLARK (Caithness: Will the Papers be in the hands of hon. Members before the discussion comes on?

BARON H. DE WORMS: It may hardly be possible to produce them by that time.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Considering the importance of the matter, it is most desirable that at least a Paper containing a summary of the terms should be printed before the discussion comes on.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Papers similar in character will be laid on the Table.

ARMENIA.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs when he proposes to issue Mr. Clifford Lloyd's Report on the late outrages in Armenia, especially in Erzeroum?

MR. J. FERGUSSON: Reports on the Asiatic provinces of Turkey cannot be ready for presentation this Session.

ENGRAVER TO THE BOARD OF INLAND REVENUE.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the vacancy to the post of Engraver to the Board of Inland Revenue has yet been filled up; and, if so, when, and in whose favour?

MR. JACKSON: The late Deputy Engraver to the Board of Inland Revenue, Mr. W. De La Rue, was appointed last year to the post of honorary Engraver to the Board.

"EMPEROR OF GERMANY."

MR. BRUNNER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs for what reason the German Emperor was styled the "Emperor of Germany" in Her Majesty's Speech at the opening of the Session; and particularly whether he was then so described at the request of the German Foreign Office?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: There was no request from the German Foreign Office for the description mentioned. It has been already stated that hereafter the style "German Emperor" will be officially employed in this country.

ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT AND THE CAPE.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the fact that the Cape Colony House of Assembly has, on the Motion of the Hon. Cecil Rhodes, unanimously passed a Resolution regretting that the Cape Government was not consulted with regard to the Anglo-German Agreement, as far as it concerned the territory south of the Zambesi; and whether he is now in a position to state what was the nature of the communications that are alleged to have taken place between the Home Government and the Government at the Cape, with reference to the matters dealt with in the Anglo-German Agreement, before that Agreement was made?

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that the House of Assembly of the Cape Colony has unanimously passed the Motion submitted by the Hon. Cecil Rhodes, expressing regret that the Cape Colony was not consulted with regard to the Anglo-German Agreement, as far as it concerned the territory south of the Zambesi River, and, further, that a Motion by Sir Thomas Uppington, to the effect that the colony would deeply resent any interference with the direct control of the Cape Parliament over the Walfisch Bay territory, was also unanimously passed; whether Her Majesty's Government have been made acquainted with the grounds on which the two Motions have been based, by any communications or protests from the Cape Government made prior to the signing of the Anglo-German Agreement, or up to the present time; whether he will state the nature of such communications or protests, if any, to the House; and whether he will now state to the House what provisions of the Anglo-German Agreement were laid before the Cape Government, and what provisions were withheld from the Cape Government, in the communications which he has stated took place between Her Majesty's Government and the Cape Colony Ministers before the signing of the Agreement.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I will ask to reply at the same time to the question in the name of the hon. Member for East Northampton (Mr. Channing). As regards the first paragraph of both questions we have no official knowledge. As to the second and third paragraphs, we have received no such communications or protests. As to the fourth paragraph the negotiations were conducted in London and Berlin; the High Commissioner's opinion was taken, as is stated in the Despatches published with the Agreements, on the questions of territory contiguous to the British Protectorate of Bechuanaland. The Cape Government was not a party to the negotiations, its territories were not affected by the Agreement, and the general provisions were not laid before it previously to the conclusion of the Agreement. It is not usual to consult a colony with respect to Treaty negotiations unless it is affected by them.

*MR. SUMMERS: Can the right hon. Gentleman now state what was the nature of the communications which were alleged by the First Lord of the Treasury about a month ago to have taken place between the Home Government and the Government of the Cape Colony?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Certain communications have passed with the High Commissioner; but, as was stated by the First Lord of the Treasury, they were not of a nature to be communicated to the House.

DR. CLARK: In the White Paper Report there is a reference to a transfer of territory in the Walfisch Bay. What is the territory referred to?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: There is no question of the transfer of any territory in the Walfisch Bay district. The fact is that the territory there has never been defined. I stated quite distinctly that the Cape Colony had not been directly consulted.

DR. CLARK: Are we to understand that, when determining the question of Walfisch Bay, the negotiations will be between Germany and the Cape Colony?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I must ask for notice of the question.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that the delimitation of the German sphere into Damaraland does not vitally affect the question?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I must also ask for notice of that question.

*MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what was the nature of the communications which he asserts took place with the Cape Colony?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Member must be under a misapprehension. I said that communications had passed between the Home Government and the High Commissioner, the High Commissioner being Governor of the Cape; but I think the hon. Gentleman will find that I did not state—at all events I did not intend to state—that communications had passed between the Home Government and the Cape Government.

*MR. SUMMERS: My question had reference to two points—the communications which have passed between the Home Government and the High Commissioner, and the communications which have passed between the Home Government and the Cape Government. The right hon. Gentleman distinctly told me that communications had passed not only with the High Commissioner, but also with the Cape Government, and that they were of a confidential character, the effect of which it was not desirable to state because the negotiations were proceeding. Those negotiations have now concluded, and I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman can now state what the nature of those communications was?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No, Sir, I cannot.

MURDER OF A BRITISH SENTRY AT GIBRALTAR.

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the statements in the Daily Graphic, of 29th July, have been called to his attention relating to the recent murder of a British soldier by a Spanish Carabiniere, on the neutral ground betwixt Gibraltar and Spanish territory:—

"The facts appear to have been as follows:—On the night in question some smugglers (Spaniards) were observed attempting to run a cargo on the neutral ground. The English sentry, having orders to prevent such action, gave the alarm, and a small patrol attempted to seize the offenders, who at once ran back into the English lines. The Spanish Carabiniere were quickly on the spot, and one of these, a mounted man, galloping up to the English soldiers, turned deliberately in his saddle, and, firing at one of our men, shot him dead. As the act took place on neutral ground, a short distance beyond our lines, and as the perpetrator at once made off, no action could be taken by the authorities, or by the coroner who presided at the inquiry."

If these statements are correct; and whether, in such a case, he is in a position to inform the House if any communications have passed between the British and Spanish Governments upon the subject?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The account, as given in the question, appears to be inaccurate in several particulars; but the matter is under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, who are in communication with the Spanish Government on the subject.

NEWFOUNDLAND.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if Her Majesty's Government have yet received any information regarding what is going on in Newfoundland; whether the measures taken by Captain Baldwin Walker, R.N., under the instructions of Her Majesty's Government, to enforce the modus vivendi by closing Mr. Baird's lobster factory and otherwise, are still being carried out; and whether, under pressure of legal process in the Newfoundland Courts, they have been suspended?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government are informed from time to time by the Governor of Newfoundland of what is going on in that colony. The Reports received from him show that most of the rumours which have been published in the newspapers are gross exaggerations, and that the difficulties which have occurred in connection with the fishery this season have not been of a serious nature. The measures taken by Sir Baldwin Walker to enforce the modus vivendi will, where necessary, continue to be carried out; as a matter of fact, only two factories have been closed out of all those in operation on the coast. The instructions under which that officer has acted have not been suspended.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Has the embargo regarding Mr. Baird's factory been removed, and has this been done on pressure of legal process in the Newfoundland Courts?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I will make inquiry.

IRELAND—SHADOWING.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the law as laid down in 38 and 39 Vic., c. 86, which enacts that every person commits a misdemeanour who, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from any act which he has a legal right to do, persistently follows such person from place to place, or persistently watches or besets the house, or other place, where such other person resides, or works, or carries on business; and whether he can say if the Criminal Law and Procedure Act repeals, or the constabulary regulations over-ride, these sections of the Act quoted; and, if not, under what authority or Statute constables act who are engaged in shadowing duty in Ireland, when they shadow farmers, cattle dealers, and others, engaged in business at different fairs and markets in Ireland.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I am aware of the enactment referred to in the question, which has no application whatever to the action of the police. It refers to costs in relation to trade disputes done wrongfully and without legal authority, and for the purpose of intimidation.

MR. SEXTON: Do the instructions to the police warn them not to obstruct persons who are engaged in the transaction of business?

MR. MADDEN: I am not aware of the precise instructions, but if the hon. Member will put a question upon the Paper I will inquire.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that a gentleman, named William Lee, was closely shadowed in Youghal by two policemen last Tuesday evening; whether this action was taken on instructions given by authority; and whether it was done in consequence of Mr. Lee being a local organiser of the labour movement?

MR. MADDEN: As the hon. Member did not specify any district when he originally placed this question on the Paper the Constabulary Authorities were unable to make the necessary inquiries. They are, however, now proceeding.

HAULBOWLINE DOCKS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty how many labourers and artisans are now employed at Haulbowline Docks; what buildings have been completed during the past and present financial years; what total amount has been spent on the works up to the present time; and whether there is any immediate prospect of their completion?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): About 50 men are employed daily, on the average. No new buildings were erected during the past financial year, but various works were carried out at a cost of £6,800, and it is proposed to spend on similar works about £6,200 during the present financial year. The total cost of the extension works, which were completed in 1888, exclusive of the annual minor works and repairs, was about £567,000. The extension works have been practically completed, but it may be necessary to make some small addition hereafter.

DR. TANNER: How soon will the docks be able to receive a ship?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I am not certain, but I think that a ship could be docked there at the present moment.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Money was obtained for the erection of certain machinery last year or the year before. Has the machinery been erected, and, if so, what is being done with it; if any work has been done, what is its character?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is a question which requires notice.

CONSTABULARY FORCE FUND.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland what is the present condition of the Constabulary Force Fund, particularly as to the gross assets, the annual receipts, and the annual expenditure; by whom the account is kept, by whom it is audited, and whether any periodical statements are published or furnished to the contributors; what is the intention of the Irish Government in regard to the fund; and whether they are disposed to wind it up at the desire of the contributors.

MR. MADDEN: The condition of the Constabulary Force Fund has been for some time engaging the careful attention of the Irish Government in communication with the Treasury. The question is now in an advanced stage, and we hope to be in a position at an early day to make a statement on the subject which will be satisfactory to all parties concerned.

MR. SEXTON: I will repeat the question on Monday.

PRIMARY TRAINING COLLEGES.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether, in equalising the position of the Irish Primary Training Colleges, account will be taken, in the case of the non-official colleges, of the special annual charges arising against their credit funds, owing to the disadvantage arising from inequality of treatment up to the present time?

MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone the question until to-morrow.

DRAINAGE OF DERRY PRISON.

DR. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he can state what alterations have been made in the drainage of Derry Prison since Major Beamish issued his Report with regard to the sanitary condition of the prison; and how often the dusthole of the prison is now cleared out?

MR. MADDEN: The General Prisons Board report that since the Report referred to one of the drains in the female prison has been altered, and now discharges into the Bennet Street sewer, and a ventilating pipe has been erected at the head of the Bennet Street sewer. The dusthole referred to is, by order of the Board, cleared out once a month."

LAND COMMISSION—DERRY AND DONEGAL.

MR. DALTON (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he can explain how it happened that at the sittings of the Chief Land Commissioners in Derry on the 18th of June, in the case of General Tredennick, landlord, James O'Donnell, tenant, the Court made an order to have the tenant's case re-heard at the next sitting of the Chief Commissioners in Donegal, though the case was adjudicated upon three years ago by the Sub-Commissioners and the landlord did not give notice of appeal within the time required by law?

MR. MADDEN: The Land Commissioners report that the facts are as stated in the question. They have adopted the course referred to in order to enable a mistake in the area and denomination of the holding, set forth in the Order made by the Sub-Commission, to be rectified. This mistake was ascertained for the first time at the sitting of the Land Commission in Derry in last June, in the hearing of a case between the tenant's father and the same landlord by the admission of the tenant who was a witness in the case.

MERCHANDISE MARKS ACT—IRISH LARD.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to "The Merchandise Marks Act, 1887," whether his attention has been called to the reports of the proceedings at a meeting of the Provisions Curers' Association of Ulster, held at Belfast on the 25th July, when it was resolved that—

"Special legislation is needed to protect the Irish lard trade, which has been practically undermined by the system of shipping 'American lard refined in Belfast,' branded as 'Pure bladdered lard, Belfast,'" and also that, for the efficient working of the above Act as a protection to the public—

"It is essential to appoint a Public Prosecutor and Inspectors to carry out its provisions:"

and whether, considering the very influential and representative character of the meeting referred to, and the importance to the public in being supplied with lard in its pure state when they ask for it under that name, he will consider what steps can be taken in the direction pointed out by the resolutions adopted at said meeting?

Mr. MADDEN: I have been informed that no such resolution has been received as that mentioned in the first paragraph of the question. I will, however, make inquiries into the matter.

Mr. DAVID M'GAW.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND (Fermanagh, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether Mr. David M'Gaw, of Enniskillen, has been paid the £200 offered to him in settlement of his claim in May last?

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigton): No payment has been made to Mr. McGaw. When his application was laid before the Lords of the Treasury, their Lordships felt themselves unable to renew the offer of 1884, having regard to the rent received in the interval by Mr. McGaw in excess of the value of his premises, and to the costs thrown upon the Department by his rejection of that offer. As an act of grace, however, and still denying any legal liability, they have authorised a payment to him of £100 on certain conditions, and the matter is under his consideration.

CLERK OF THE BANDON UNION.

Mr. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether it has been brought to the notice of the Local Government Board that the clerk of the Bandon Poor Law Union was absent from his office 12 days in December, 10 in January, 8 in February, 10 in April, and 10 in May; and, if brought under their notice, has the Board demanded any explanation from the clerk of this neglect of duty; and, if so, what explanation has been tendered?

Mr. MADDEN: It appears from a letter received from the clerk of the Bandon Union that he was absent from his office on the days mentioned in the question owing to ill-health; but he states that he is now recovered, and hopes to be able to attend at his office regularly in future.

FERMOY PETTY SESSIONS.

Mr. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that at the last Fermoy Petty Sessions, Mr. Redmond Donegan was charged with and found guilty of assaulting Mr. J. D. Bremner, T.C., and was fined by the Magistrate 2s. 6d. and costs; that at the same Sessions Mr. James Maye, charged with a technical assault on a policeman (which occurred so far back as September, 1889), was sentenced to seven days' imprisonment at hard labour; and if he can explain why the latter case was tried before a Court constituted under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, consisting of two Resident Magistrates, whilst the former was tried before a Bench of ordinary Magistrates, under the ordinary law?

Mr. MADDEN: I am informed that the difference in the modes of procedure and in the punishments inflicted was due to the difference in the nature of the assaults. The assault on Mr. Bremner is reported to have been a very trifling one, committed by an old man on a comparatively young man in the course of an angry discussion. The other assault was not a technical one as suggested in the question, but an actual and deliberate one, committed in open Court, where Maye was at the time on trial, and where the constable was on duty.

Mr. J. O'CONNOR: May I ask whether the difference in the procedure in the two cases was due to the fact that Maye was a Nationalist?

Mr. MADDEN: I say distinctly—no, Sir.

THE EAST LANCASHIRE REGIMENT.

Mr. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the report in the Newry Reporter of 26th June, 1890, of an action for trespass against Captain Irwin, of the East Lancashire Regiment, brought before the County Court Judge of Down at the last sitting of the County Court at Newry, from which it appears that, on the 15th July, 1889, Captain Irwin and about 60 men of his regiment were going through a "night attack," in the course of which a number of his men trespassed on the lands of Mr. James Goodman, of Cloghmore, and did damage to his crops; whether he has observed that it appeared in evidence that, when Mr. Goodman protested against the trespass on his crops, one of the soldiers pointed a revolver at him and threatened to shoot him; whether Mr. Goodman offered to leave to arbitration the amount of loss sustained by him; whether Colonel Griffiths, on 14th August last, in answer to a letter of Mr. T. J. Marron, solicitor for Mr. Goodman, referred Mr. Marron to Captain Irwin as—

"The officer who was in sole command, and who was solely responsible for any occurrence connected with his party on that night"; whether at the trial advantage was taken of the fact that the trespassers were under the immediate command of the colour sergeant, and that the proper defendant was not before the Court; and whether the Judge is correctly reported to have said—

"He believed damage had been done by the military, but he could not hold Captain Irwin liable," and he dismissed the case; and whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the matter, and see that fair compensation be given to Mr. Goodman for the damage done to his property by the soldiers on that occasion?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): It appears that in July, 1889, a patrol, consisting of a corporal and two privates of the East Lancashire Regiment, trespassed on Mr. Goodman's ground. No revolver was in possession of the party, and they had no blank or ball cartridge with them. One of the men was said to have pointed his rifle at Mr. Goodman. Captain Irwin, who was asked to settle the matter, offered to cover the alleged damage, which was refused, and Captain Irwin was unable to get any answer regarding it. A summons was taken out against Captain Irwin, but was dismissed owing to the non-appearance of the complainant. The case was brought forward again at the Quarter Sessions, and it appeared from the evidence he had before him the amount of compensation offered—namely, £1—was ample.

MR. SEXTON inquired if the right hon. Gentleman had received the Report, from which it appeared that the County Court Judge thought the damage had been committed, and expressed no opinion as to the £5 claimed being excessive damage, and if the right hon. Gentleman himself would pay the £5, as the case was dismissed, because Captain Irwin was not the proper officer?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am informed the case did not come on because the complainant did not appear. Under these circumstances, it is not likely I am going to pay the £5.

MR. SEXTON: I have the Report to which I have referred in my possession.

MR. E. STANHOPE: If the hon. Gentleman will let me see the Report I will consider whether there is anything further in it.

MR. F. C. GARVEY.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that Francis C. Garvey, of Murrisk Abbey, Mayo, Ireland, who was appointed clerk of Petty Sessions for Louisburgh district by the Justices of said district, and also recently appointed Commissioner for taking affidavits by the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland, was dismissed his ship and the Service, he being then an officer in the Royal Navy, on a charge of larceny, and was sentenced to a term of imprisonment; and whether, in the face of the above-mentioned finding, he will be continued in the position of trust and emolument to which he has been appointed?

MR. MADDEN: The Registrar of Petty Sessions Clerks reports that the Petty Session clerk mentioned admits the truth of the allegations, but pleads that the occurrences took place when he was but 16 years of age. Had the matter been brought under the notice of the Lord Lieutenant at the time, I have no doubt that he would have given it careful attention in deciding whether the appointment should be made. But as the Registrar reports that the conduct of the clerk since his appointment seven years ago has been good, and that the inspection and inquiries which have from time to time been made show him to be perfectly trustworthy, His Excellency, having regard to all the circumstances, would not feel justified in dismissing him from the position.

DR. TANNER: Am I to understand that a person who has been dismissed from Her Majesty's Service for theft is regarded by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland as a fit or proper person to hold this appointment. Is he not retained simply because he is a Protestant and an Orangeman?

MR. MADDEN: After a service of seven years Mr. Garvey has proved to the heads of the Department that he is perfectly trustworthy, and it would not be right to go back upon matters which occurred so long before.

THE DRILL GROUND AT NEW-TOWNARDS.

MR. MC CARTAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, with reference to the ground for the encampment of the 3rd Battalion of the Royal Irish Rifles at Newtownards, whether he is aware of the general dissatisfaction among the officers and men of the regiment on account of the unsuitableness and inconvenience of the present place of encampment; whether he is aware that the drill ground is small and bad, and the distance from the shooting range is so far that it takes three days to put a company through, each company firing 10 rounds a day; whether his attention has been called to the correspondence on the subject published in the Newtownards Chronicle of 28th June last and of the 5th instant; and whether, considering the statements therein and the complaints made by officers and men, he will make inquiry with the view to let them have the use of the huts at the shooting range when next up for drill, or if he will consider the desirability of securing a place of encampment convenient to the present shooting range?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The ground consists of 27 acres, and is in every way suitable for the purpose.

DISTRICT INSPECTOR BALL.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he has now read the depositions in the case of "District Inspector Ball v. David Kent;" if he has seen the depositions of Edward Kent, who swears that he had about a score of lambs to sell at the fair, and that his brother, the defendant, came up followed by a constable, and that he told his brother that the lambs would not be taken from him if the constable remained alongside; and if, in view of this sworn statement of deponent, the Constabulary Authorities are entitled by law to order policemen to shadow cattledealers or farmers engaged in buying or selling transactions at fairs or markets in Ireland?

MR. MADDEN: I have seen the depositions in the case referred to. Having regard to the charge on which the adjudication took place, it was not necessary to go into evidence as to the maintenance of the boycotting, which the police were endeavouring to put down; but I may state that no such orders were given as is assumed in the concluding paragraph of the question.

DUBLIN POST OFFICE.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he is now in a position to state when the vacancies for first class sorters and overseers in the Dublin Post Office will be filled; and whether the increase of pay will date from the time the vacancies occurred?

SIR H. MAXWELL: The authorities at Dublin have not yet been able to report favourably upon the qualifications of the members of the classes next below those upon which the vacancies exist. The vacancies cannot be filled until such Report has been received. As regards the latter part of the hon. Member's question, the Postmaster General cannot promise that the promotions, when promotions come to be made, will take effect from the date of the vacancies. It will, I understand, be a question with him whether the earliest period from which the higher pay should take effect should not be the date on which the recipients proved themselves qualified for the duties to which the pay attaches.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

DR. FITZGERALD: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether any representations have been made to the Police Authorities or to the Board of Works to take over, as quarters for married members of the Royal Irish Constabulary, the house in Carrickmacross from which Mr. Thomas Phelan, J.P., was evicted; and, if so, whether there is any intention on the part of the Government of taking the house from Mr. Shirley?

MR. MADDEN: No such representations have been made.

THE TRAINING SHIP GRAMPIAN.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if his attention has been called to the following advertisement which appeared in the Belfast Evening Telegraph—

"Training Ship Grampian.—Wanted, a ship's cook: must be a Protestant. Application, with copies of testimonials, to be sent to the Captain Superintendent on board."

and whether the Admiralty approve of this exclusion of all but Protestants from the situation of a cook in a training ship?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The Grampian was lent by the Admiralty in 1871 to a committee of gentlemen representing the City of Belfast, for use as a training ship for the Mercantile Marine. The management of the institution rests entirely with the committee, and the Admiralty have no power to interfere in the selection of any of the seamen or domestics employed in the training ship.

INCREASE OF SENTENCE ON APPEAL.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Recorder of Cork, in the appeal of Patrick Staunton, convicted of boycotting by the Resident Magistrates and sentenced to three months' imprisonment with hard labour, told the defendant, in reply to some observations, "I have the power of giving you a little more;" "if you say much more I will give you three months more;" and finally adjudicated in the following terms: "I confirm the sentence; I give him another month—four months;" whether the increase of a sentence on appeal, because of observations made by the defendant, is in accordance with law; and whether the Executive will enforce the additional month's imprisonment?

MR. MADDEN: I am not aware whether the Recorder of Cork made the observations attributed to him; but it appears from the entry in the Order Book that he confirmed the sentence, but varying it by increasing it from three months' hard labour to four months' hard labour. It is not within the province of the Executive Government to review or to discuss sentences pronounced by County Court Judges in appeals which may come before them. As regards the concluding paragraph, the Prisons Board will, of course, act in accordance with the warrant of committal issued in pursuance of the order of the Judge.

MR. SEXTON: Has the right hon. and learned Gentleman read the report of the trial? Had the Recorder any legal power to increase the original sentences on appeal, not on account of further evidence, but in consequence of some language used by the defendant in Court? Has not the Executive power to release the prisoner when it chooses?

MR. MADDEN: The Prisons Board have no power to do anything of the kind under the committal warrant. I have no right to review or discuss the Judgment of the Judge who made the order. There is no doubt as a general principle of law, and without discussing the facts of the case, that a County Court Judge, on appeal from a sentence—which amounts to a re-hearing of the case—has the right to impose the sentence which he considers should have been imposed by the Court below in the first instance.

MR. SEXTON: Had the Judge a legal right to pronounce an increase of sentence in a case where nothing relevant to the original charge was adduced, but simply because the defendant used language which the Judge considered to be disrespectful, and could the Judge impose a sentence for contempt?

MR. MADDEN: This is asking me not to answer a general question, but to review and discuss the legality of the decision of the Judge in the case. I must decline to express an opinion upon, or discuss in any way, the decision of the Judge.

DR. TANNER: Was it not the fact that Mr. Hamilton had pronounced sentence upon the prisoner; that he subsequently cautioned him, and then increased the sentence by one month; and was not the second sentence deliberately given for contempt of Court?

MR. MADDEN: It is not for me to say one way or the other.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: May I ask whether, in order to put an end to these scandals, the right hon. Gentleman will consider the propriety of such cases as this being tried by a Judge who is not himself a landlord.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. SEXTON: What is the remedy of the prisoner at the end of the original term of three months' imprisonment?

MR. MADDEN: The legal remedy for any person who is in illegal custody is habeas corpus.

THE SENTENCE ON MR. TULLY.

DR. FITZGERALD: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, with reference to the treatment of Mr. Jasper Tully, editor of the Roscommon Herald, now a prisoner in Tullamore Gaol, if he can state what was the sentence imposed upon Mr. Jasper Tully; is he aware that he is engaged in the labour of sack-making, and that his hands are full of sores; that he has lost two stone in weight during the two months he has been in prison; and that he is now suffering from an attack of diarrhoea; and, if so, why is he not placed under hospital treatment; and if the sentence did not include hard labour, why is the work of sack-making imposed upon the prisoner?

MR. MADDEN: The General Prisons Board report that Mr. Jasper Tully is in custody under sentences of 14 days and three calendar months' imprisonment, concurrently, without hard labour. During four days after committal to Tullamore Prison this prisoner made sacks, although informed that he could by Statute be exempted from labour by paying for his food. Since that time he has been taking advantage of the exemption; but he asked to be permitted to have a few sacks to pass his time, and the Governor gave them on the clear understanding that it was his own desire. His hands have not suffered in any way as alleged. He lost 8lb., not 28lb. in weight subsequently to committal, but has since regained 11lb. He is not suffering from diarrhoea. He had a slight attack for four days, but it was of such a nature as not to render hospital treatment necessary. The Board are required by Statute to provide employment for prisoners, though not sentenced to hard labour. Sack-making untasked is one of the forms of employment so provided.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask whether, according to a statement publicly made, this treatment is in accordance with the sentence? From the instant Mr. Tully entered gaol he has been subjected to the most insulting and degrading treatment; not content with classing him with the ordinary criminals and setting him to pick oakum, he has been put to sack-making in the prison, in which work his hands and fingers have been torn and lacerated in the most cruel manner; his dietary has been changed, and the class of food kept down in his case, though he has repeatedly asked for a change; he further complains of the constant annoyance and supervision to which he is subjected; that his clothes are taken away from him and rummaged by the warders; and that he is left standing naked on a stone-flagged cell.

MR. MADDEN: Certain of those statements are not met by the information in my possession; but, so far as the statements contained in the question relating to oakum-picking and sack-making are concerned, they are absolutely unfounded. When Mr. Tully was given sacks to make, he was told that he might, under Statute, exempt himself from doing so. Mr. Tully elected to exempt himself by making a payment for food; but subsequently sacks were given to him at his own request, and in order to find him employment.

MR. SEXTON: I will take the earliest possible opportunity of bringing this case under the notice of the House.

MR. MADDEN: I can only answer the question according to the information which has been placed before me; but if the hon. Member will put a question on the Paper as to the other points, I will try to find out.

MR. SEXTON: I will do so tomorrow.

DR. FITZGERALD: I am compelled to say that not a single particle of the reply of the right hon. and learned Gentleman is true. [Cries of "Order!"] Sack making is hard labour in Tullamore Prison. If the right hon. Gentleman does not know that that is so, I can tell him from my own experience that it is. Why, then, was a person who was not sentenced to hard labour put to sack-making?

[No answer was returned.]

LABOURERS' COTTAGES AT CLOGHERHEAD.

MR. NOLAN (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the insanitary condition of a large number of labourers' cottages at Clogherhead, County Louth, and to the difficulty of dealing with them, owing to the absence of other houses of any kind available for the labourers in the neighbourhood; and whether, under the circumstances, he will instruct the Local Government Board to confer with the Local Sanitary Authority, with a view to providing suitable accommodation for these people before they are driven from their present dwellings?

MR. MADDEN: The insanitary condition of the village referred to has, I am informed, been for some months engaging the attention of the Drogheda Board of Guardians. They have already taken steps to deal with the matter, and state that it shall continue to have their attention until the village is improved.

FREE TRADE AT ZANZIBAR.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is provided in Article VII. of the Commercial Treaty of 1886, that

"A duty not exceeding five per cent. shall be paid at that port in the dominions of the Sultan of Zanzibar where the goods are first landed, and on payment thereof such goods shall thereafter be exempt within the Zanzibar dominions from all other Customs Duties or Taxes levied by or on behalf of the Government of His Highness the Sultan";

and whether, in the event of the mainland portion of the Sultanate of Zanzibar being ceded to Germany, goods which have paid the 5 per cent. duty on entering the island, would be liable to pay another 5 per cent. duty on entering the mainland?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It may be assumed that if the mainland and Zanzibar are separated, goods coming from the latter would certainly be treated like goods coming from any other foreign country. The best security against undue burdens upon trade is that they would tend to divert it to another sphere.

MR. SUMMERS: Do I understand the Under Secretary to say that, under the Anglo-German Treaty, there will be an end of Free Trade between the Island of Zanzibar and the mainland?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have answered that question repeatedly. If the mainland of Zanzibar or part of it falls into the hands of the German Government it will be subject either to the conditions of the Commercial Treaty with Zanzibar or to those of the Berlin and Brussels Act.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Are goods from Zanzibar free to enter that portion of the mainland where the Sultan's flag flies without paying additional duty?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Certainly.

MR. BRYCE: May I ask whether the effect of the Anglo-German Agreement will not practically be to abrogate the Zanzibar Treaty of Commerce?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I understand the German Government desire to be held by the terms of the Zanzibar Treaty of Commerce.

THE CASE OF MESSRS. HEATH AND SMITH.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will lay upon the Table a Copy of the General Order of Customs, No. 67, 1890, and the correspondence between the Treasury and the Commissioners of Customs relating to the case of Messrs. Heath and Smith, two officers of Customs, recently punished for communicating with the private secretary of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject of promotion in the Department?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I will lay Papers on the Table; but I may point out at once that the officers were, of course, not punished for communicating with my private secretary. What their offence was will appear from the Papers.

MR. BRADLAUGH: When will the Papers be presented?

*MR. GOSCHEN: In a few days.

THE DEATH OF CHRISTOPHER O'CONNOR.

MR. DALTON (for Mr. WILLIAM CORBET, Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has the inquiry promised into the death of Christopher O'Connor, a patient in the Richmond District Lunatic Asylum, been held; and, if so, what is the result; has the verdict of the Coroner's Jury, who found that death was caused by violence, been upheld; has anyone been punished in connection with the case; and, if not, what steps will be taken to bring the guilt home to whoever inflicted the injuries; and what compensation will be given to the widow and orphans?

MR. MADDEN: My answer to the first two paragraphs is in the affirmative. The services of an attendant accused of having inflicted the injuries have been dispensed with by the Board of Governors, and the Papers in the entire case have been submitted by the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums for the consideration of the Executive Government.

CASE OF TRESPASS AT DUNFANAGHY.

MR. DALTON: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if his attention has been called to the proceedings at Dunfanaghy Petty Sessions on the 28th of June, in the case of Mr. Crawford against Derryheriff peasants for trespass, and wherein the Magistrates made an order that the tenants should pay £2 2s. solicitor's fees: and whether, seeing that it was afterwards proved that the Magistrates had no jurisdiction, they were within their right in making this order?

MR. MADDEN: I am informed that when the cases referred to came before the Court on 28th June they were adjourned on the application of the defendants on the usual terms of their paying the cost of the day. The cases were not gone into at all on that day. On 12th July they again came before the Court. One of the defendants was fined and the remaining cases adjourned, pending the result of a case stated. It does not appear from any information before me that the Magistrates had no jurisdiction.

GAOL MORTALITY IN BENGAL.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that, while the average town mortality in Bengal in 1889 was 25·03 per 1,000, the gaol death rate in the same Presidency was 45·8 per 1,000, and in other parts of India much higher, attaining in some instances to 120 per 1,000; whether the regulations under which Indian gaols are conducted were framed by gaol officials; and whether the Secretary of State will direct the attention of the Government of India to this excessive mortality, with a view to the adoption of means to secure its reduction to at least the average mortality of the district in which each gaol is situated?

*MR. J. GORST: The official Returns for 1889 have not yet been received. In 1888 the death-rate in gaols was 44·7 for Bengal, and 33·1 for the whole of India, which was a satisfactory reduction from 35·6, the death-rate of the preceding year. The regulations are framed by the Government of India. The attention of the Secretary of State and Government of India has for some time past been directed to the mortality in gaols; and the Government of India is now engaged, in concert with the Local Governments, in considering suggestions for endeavouring to diminish the amount.

EX-CONSTABLE BRENNAN.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask whether ex-Constable Peter Brennan, late of the Royal Irish Constabulary, who was convicted by a Coroner's Jury of wilful murder, has been allowed or encouraged to retire from the police, and granted a pension of £72 per annum; and whether Brennan, having failed in business as a publican in Kinsale, has been recently employed as a bailiff by the Sheriff for the County of Cork?

MR. MADDEN: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that the ex-sergeant named was included with other members of the Force in a verdict of wilful murder, found by a Coroner's Jury, but that that verdict was subsequently quashed as an improper one by the Superior Court. He retired in ordinary course, after 30 years' service, with the pension mentioned. It is the case that he subsequently failed in business. This failure was, I am informed, owing to the system of boycotting instituted against him. He is now employed as stated in the question.

DR. TANNER: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman try and impress upon the Executive Government in Ireland the desirability of ceasing to employ murderers and thieves for the purpose of administering the law?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

THE PELICAN CLUB.

MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyne): I beg to ask the Home Secretary whether he can now state what was the character of the "boxing matches" at the Pelican Club; and whether he has obtained any reports from the police about it, or from any other quarter than "a member of the Committee of the Pelican Club?"

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Commissioner of Police that he has no information to the effect that fights of an illegal character are carried on at the Pelican Club, nor has he reason to believe that such is the case. If the hon. Member is in possession of evidence to the contrary effect, and will submit it to me, I will take what steps are necessary to provide against any infraction of the law.

SCOTCH ECCLESIASTICS AND PRECEDENCE.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether any princely rank had been accorded to the Moderator of the Free Church of Scotland, such as had been accorded to Cardinal Manning, as head ecclesiastic in England of another unestablished Church?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I am not aware of any question having arisen on this point.

DECORATION OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether the existing contracts for decorating and painting the House of Commons and public offices will shortly terminate; and whether in the new contracts he will stipulate with the contractors that they shall pay a standard rate of wages to the workmen in the particular trades?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The general contract in which the decorating and painting of the House of Commons is included will terminate next year. A Departmental Committee is now sitting to inquire into the question of the terms upon which new contracts for such services shall be made.

WOOLWICH ARSENAL—CASE OF MR. B. DUNN.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether Mr. Bernard Dunn was the first person who called the attention of the Government to the fact that bad articles and materials were being passed into Woolwich Arsenal; whether Colonel Barrington reported that Mr. Dunn was misinformed; since then the Judge Advocate General has reported that Mr. Dunn's allegations were well founded, and that it was unfortunate that the higher officials did not take more notice of them when they were first made; whether Mr. Dunn frequently complained that he was being unjustly treated by the officials; and has any inquiry been made into his charges against the officials; if so, by whom, and when; if not, considering the services Mr. Dunn has rendered, whether he will cause an impartial inquiry to be made into the charges made by Mr. Dunn against the officials in the Department in which he was employed, and from which he has been discharged?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: As I have already stated in this House, Mr. Moody was the principal complainant as to the bad material passed into the Arsenal; but he was supported by Mr. Dunn. The second and third paragraphs of the hon. Member's question appear to be a correct statement of facts. Mr. Dunn's complaints have been most fully inquired into, as I have more than once informed the House. Mr. Dunn has now been discharged for insubordinate conduct, and I cannot undertake to make further inquiries into his case.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: May I ask whether it has not been well understood at Woolwich that Dunn is a marked man?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am quite sure that is not the case.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I put it to the Secretary of State whether of his own knowledge, months ago, a Member of the Government did not intimate his own opinion that Dunn ought to be "sacked"?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am not aware who the Member of the Government alluded to is.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): Since the Secretary of State has punished Dunn so severely, will he also inquire into the case of those men against whom Dunn brought and proved the charge that they had introduced bad material into Her Majesty's Services.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I have made such inquiry, as I have told the House several times already.

MR. HANBURY: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman what he has done?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I troubled the House with a speech of nearly an hour's length on this subject last Session, and explained what I had done.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I wish to know whether Dunn has not made an allegation, supported by evidence, to the Secretary of State for War since the inquiry presided over by the Judge Advocate, as to whether he wishes for further inquiry?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: It is true Dunn did supply me with additional evidence. Upon this I had caused to be made a most careful and independent inquiry, which proved beyond any doubt that the complaint was entirely unfounded.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS AT COURT.

MR. TATTON EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is true that Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to place officers of the Volunteer Force in the same position with regard to presentations at Court as officers of the Auxiliary Forces?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I have very great pleasure in informing my hon. Friend that Her Majesty has been graciously pleased to place Volunteer officers in an exactly similar position to officers of the rest of the Army as regards presentation at Court.

OUTRAGES IN ARMENIA.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the statement in the Daily News of 2nd August, by telegram from Erivan, that a fortnight ago Kurds attempted to carry off a newly-married Armenian woman from the village of Vartenis, near Moosh, and a struggle ensued, in which two Armenians and six Kurds were killed; whether he will make inquiries as to the facts of the case, and generally impress on the Porte the necessity of protecting its Christian Armenian subjects from the attacks of wild Kurds; and of the further statement that, in the district of Alashgerd, the condition of the Armenian peasants is miserable beyond description, as the petty Turkish officials urge the Kurds to attack the villagers and harry them?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have received reports that the country is in a disturbed state, but have no knowledge of the particular outrages referred to. The district of Alashgird is one in which the inhabitants are specially liable to insecurity. It is a frontier district, bounded on the north by the Russian Frontier, which the Kurds are continually crossing and re-crossing. Many of the Kurds are said to be now Russian subjects.

MR. SCHWANN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a telegram received to-day states that Martini-Henry rifles have been distributed amongst the Kurds at several places in America?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I cannot undertake to receive telegrams in newspapers when they arrive as well-founded. No doubt, if they are well-founded, we shall hear of it in due course.

MR. SCHWANN: I would ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to a statement in the Daily News of 2nd August (from Reuter's Agency, Constantinople, dated 31st July), that the mixed council, i.e., civil and religious councils combined, held on Tuesday last, at the Armenian Patriarchate in Constantinople, to discuss the late message or Takrir, from the Secretary to the Sultan, Sureya Pasha to Monsignor Achikian, declared that the recent demonstration was not directed against the Patriarch personally, but was the outcome of the feeling of despair prevailing amongst the Armenian population, and of the failure of the Porte to reply to any of the numerous memorials addressed to it by the Patriarch, respecting the deplorable state of the Armenian population; and whether, in view of there being approximately some 250,000 Armenians in Constantinople, many of them refugees from Armenia, he will make representations to the Porte of the very serious risk it runs by postponing remedial measures of a conciliatory character in Armenia?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: We have not received as yet any official information as to this meeting. The Porte is well aware that Her Majesty's Government are in favour of a conciliatory policy towards the Armenians; but without further particulars, I am unable to say whether this would be a favourable opportunity for pressing our views.

MR. BRYCE: I wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the recent grave disturbances among the Armenian subjects of the Sultan at Constantinople, as well as in Erzeroum, and at Moush, arising from the outrages of the Kurds, the oppression of the officials, and the impossibility of obtaining justice upon Mussulman offenders; and whether, having regard to the risk that an insurrection or occupation by some other Power may be provoked by further attempts at repression and denials of justice, Her Majesty's Government are advising, or will advise, the Sultan to adopt a more conciliatory policy, and will inform him that they regard the Anglo-Turkish Convention of 1878 as having lapsed, owing to the neglect of Turkey to introduce the reforms undertaken by that Instrument?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: (1) Her Majesty's Representatives lose no opportunity of bringing well-authenticated cases of hardship and ill-treatment to the notice of the Turkish Authorities. (2) It would not be expedient for me to make any statement in regard to communications which Her Majesty's Government may think it their duty to make to the Porte on the subject.

*MR. BRYCE: I would ask whether, seeing the extreme urgency of the matter, the Government will make any representations? These disturbances at Erzeroum and Constantinople have been of a most serious character, and portend danger.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have already stated what has been done. Her Majesty's Government will make representations if they think they will be attended with good effect. I am not prepared to say whether the Government is making any special representations on this subject at this moment. I wish to remind the House that we are not yet fully informed as to the facts.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I do not desire to press the right hon. Gentleman unduly, but I wish to remind him that in this particular case, if our remonstrances are not attended to, we can give full notice to the Porte that we have power under our Treaty with the Porte and the guarantee given against the intervention of a Foreign Power, to take certain steps in case of the misgovernment of the country being continued.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that the events referred to are of a character that undoubtedly requires great consideration, and I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will see that a premature answer would be most inconvenient.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: The right hon. Gentleman informed me that the Report of Mr. Clifford Lloyd would not be laid on the Table before the end of the Session. I would ask him whether, whatever the length of the Session, we are not to be made acquainted at least with the substance of that Report?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I should be happy to give the best information in our possession; but since I last made a statement on this subject, the Government have received no further information.

FREE TRADE ON THE AFRICAN COAST.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, with reference to Article 1. of the General Act of the Conference of Berlin (1885) by which the Conference Powers agree to use their good offices with the Governments established on the African shore of the Indian Ocean for the purpose of obtaining their approval to the establishment of complete Free Trade within their respective territories, and in any case of securing the most favourable conditions to the transit (traffic) of all nations, the Conference Powers have used or intend to use their good offices in the direction indicated?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government have endeavoured to obtain as far as possible the relief of trade on the African coast from burdens and hindrances; they have not felt it to be their special duty to press upon the Sultan of Zanzibar the abolition of all Import Duties, as their Commercial Treaty afforded sufficient protection. The Powers who were parties to the Berlin Act have now agreed upon certain modifications.

THE CASE OF MR. PERCY MAGAN, J.P.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland whether he can state what decision has been come to by the Irish Law Officers regarding the communication received by the Land Commissioners from Mr. Percy Magan, J.P., on the 22nd July, purporting to be an explanation of the charges of fraud brought against him; and whether the Government is still determined to take no steps to have Mr. Magan suspended from the Commission of the Peace pending proceedings for the recovery of the money alleged to have been obtained by false representations under the Arrears Act?

MR. MADDEN: I have this day received the Papers in this case, which I shall deal with in due course.

EVICTIONS ON BLASKET ISLANDS.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether, having regard to the 125th section of "The Civil Bill (Ireland) Act, 1851," which protects from seizure under Civil Bill Decree "the tools and implements of the trade or business of any debtor" he has made inquiry as to the seizure of the boats of the fishermen of Blasket Islands by the Sheriff, who was brought there on board H.M. Man-of-War the Britomart?

MR. MADDEN: I have made inquiries on the subject of the question of the right hon. Member, and I am informed that the seizure in question was not made under Civil Bill Decree. The section referred to does not, therefore, apply.

MR. SEXTON: Is it not the case that private persons were carried in this vessel on the occasion in question, and that it was used for seizing and carrying away the property of private persons?

MR. MADDEN: A distress was levied: and if its legality is questioned, the matter can be tested in the usual way.

PRECEDENCE.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury which of Her Majesty's Ministers advises Her Majesty in matters of Precedence?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is not the duty of any Minister to advise Her Majesty in matters of Precedence, except when such matters may be connected with the particular Department of which he is the head.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I wish to ask, as to a question of Precedence which has arisen with regard to the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Working Classes, to what Department should a question be addressed?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think that a question should be addressed to the Minister who was in office at the time, and upon whose advice the Commission was issued.

COPIES OF PRIVATE BILLS.

MR. WEBSTER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether arrangements can be made by which Members of this House may be in future supplied with Copies of Private Bills introduced by the London County Council prior to the Second Reading, especially such Bills as contain provisions of a public or general character? I would point out that the present mode by which the County Council have Bills delivered to Members of this House often leads to very long discussions on the Third Reading.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If the hon. Member will turn to Standing Orders 203 and 213, he will find that provision is made that Copies of Private Bills are obtainable by Members at the Vote Office.

MR. WEBSTER: I applied for a London County Council Bill at the Vote Office just before it came on, and I could not obtain one.

COMPANIES (WINDING-UP) BILL.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, with regard to the Companies (Winding-up) Bill, which has been very considerably altered by the House of Lords, and in which important provisions which had been struck out in this House have been restored, he will arrange that the Lords Amendments shall not be considered until this House has had fair notice on the Paper, and an opportunity of discussing them before midnight; and as regards other Bills which are coming down from the Lords with Amendments, what notice he will give before such Amendments are considered?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am informed that there has only been one alteration of importance made in the Companies (Winding-up) Bill, and that this was due not to the initiative of the Government, but to the unanimous feeling of noble and learned Lords in another place.

MR. KIMBER: Will the right hon. Gentleman say what notice will be given?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Notice in the Votes.

MR. KIMBER: But how much notice? A Bill comes down to this House, and is on the Paper on the day on which the consideration is taken.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I sought to draw attention to this matter the other day. An extremely difficult position might be brought about through taking the consideration of the Lords Amendment without any notice whatever.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is not at all desirable that Lords Amendments should be taken without notice unless they are merely formal or verbal Amendments. Where there is any matter of substance, I will undertake that notice be placed on the Paper.

MR. KIMBER: The Bill referred to in my question is one in which the most important and radical alterations have been made. I wish to know from the right hon. Gentleman how much notice will be given before the Bill is taken.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is the rule that alterations of that character should be printed and circulated with the Votes. The Bill cannot be taken until that Paper has been circulated. I apprehend that that must be held to be sufficient notice.

CASE OF H. LOUGHRAN.

MR. HENRY CAMPBELL (Fermanagh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the case of a man named Henry Loughran, Wattle Bridge, Belurbet, who was employed as a collector and lock keeper on the Ulster Canal from March 1873 to April 1889, and was entrusted by the Board of Works with the payment of the fortnightly wages to the labourers on the canal from Lough Erne to Charlemont, a distance of 46 miles, but received no remuneration for the latter service from March 1873 to 1880, when the Treasury granted him an allowance of 7s. 6d. for each fortnightly payment up to the date of his discharge in 1880; and, if so, whether he will endeavour to induce the Treasury to pay Loughran a like sum for his services in connection with the fortnightly payments of the labourers' wages during the years from March 1873 to the end of 1880?

MR. JACKSON: I understand that the facts are correctly stated by the hon. Member. I will make inquiries on the subject, and will communicate my decision to the hon. Member.

COUNTY COUNCIL FUNDS.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: In the interests of the public, who are much mystified on the subject, I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer at how much he estimates the sum placed at the disposal of the County Councils for technical (including agricultural and commercial) education in England by the Resolution of the House of Commons on Friday, and at how much he estimates the sum applicable to Wales for intermediate education by Resolution of the same date?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The question of the hon. Member conveys a wrong impression. The money is not placed at the disposal of the County Councils for the purpose stated, but for all such purposes as the Councils were empowered to apply it, and amongst them is technical education. The amount for England and Wales is £743,000. The sum for England, exclusive of Monmouthshire, is £709,000, and £34,000 for Wales and Monmouthshire.

THE IRISH POTATO CROP.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland a question of which I have given him private notice, and which nearly concerns my own constituency. Has his attention been called to the following paragraph in to-day's Daily News:—

"At the Killala Board of Guardians yesterday great apprehension was expressed at the probability of a famine along the West Coast through the failure of the potato crop. A Guardian stated that he had been through three divisions of the Union and the crop was fast decaying, and the people were in a dreadful state of anxiety as to the future. Eight or 10 days ago the crop looked fairly well, but it was wasted and burnt up with the blight. A resolution calling the attention of the Local Government Board to the matter, and through them the attention of the Government, was adopted."

I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is in a position to say that there is any basis of truth for the paragraph, or can he give us any information in addition to the statement made the other day in the House by the Chief Secretary as to the truth or otherwise of the alleged failure of the potato crop in North Mayo and other parts of Ireland?

MR. MADDEN: The importance of the subject to the hon. Member's constituents quite justifies him in putting the question to me. The subject is now receiving the anxious and constant attention of the Government in reference to various parts of Ireland. I only received the hon. Member's notice as I came down to the House, and I am unable to make any statement as to any special part of the country.

MR. SEXTON: A promise was made, I think, more than a year ago that Reports which have already been made by the Inspectors of the Board should be laid on the Table, and I hope they will be so laid.

MR. MADDEN: I will make inquiries on the subject.

BISHOPS IN CYPRUS.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies with reference to the Proclamation read by the Queen's High Commissioner, and afterwards promulgated in Turkish and Greek throughout the island, on the occasion of the assumption of the Government of the Island of Cyprus in the name of Her Majesty, confirming the Cypriotes, both Moslems and Christians, in all the rights and privileges they then enjoyed; whether one of those privileges was that the name of an Orthodox Bishop was submitted, after the election and consecration of the Prelate, to His Imperial Majesty the Sultan for approval and confirmation; and whether, as the formal recognition of a Bishop is a question quite apart from the levying of episcopal dues and does not depend upon any Council, legislative or otherwise, the Secretary of

Mr. Crilly

State will re-consider his recent decision, and recommend the Queen to confirm, by Warrant under the Royal Sign Manual, the election of the Bishops of Kition, Kyrenia, and Paphos, in accordance with the prayer of the Petition presented by the Archbishop of Cyprus?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The Proclamation in question does not altogether accord with the description of it contained in the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question, although, of course, there is no intention of interfering with the religious privileges of the inhabitants. Her Majesty's Government are, however, advised that the necessity of obtaining the Sultan's confirmation of a Bishop's election was not a privilege of the inhabitants, but a restriction on a privilege. The freedom of Christian communities to elect their Bishops is now absolute and unqualified. The Bishops are, of course, fully recognised by the Local Authorities for all legal and social purposes as soon as elected.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury when he proposes to take the Foreign Office Vote?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I regret to say that we made very slow progress with the Police Bill on Saturday. We are anxious to bring on the Foreign Office Vote as soon as possible, but we cannot do so until the Bills now before the House are completed. It rests with hon. Members opposite themselves to forward the business of the House, and I would most earnestly appeal to those who ask for consideration to show some of that consideration which they owe to their colleagues in this House, so as to enable us to make such progress with business as is reasonable. We might well have expected that greater progress would be made on Saturday. In the circumstances, I cannot say when the Foreign Office Vote will be taken.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): After what business will the Vote be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: After the Bills now before the House have been completed. There is only one Vote for the Foreign Office. I wish to give notice that to-morrow I shall move the suspension of the 12 o'clock Rule, as far as Government business is concerned, for the remainder of the Session.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's Co., Ossory): Can the right hon. Gentleman inform the House when the Irish Census Bill will be taken?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The English and Scotch Bills stand before that measure, and the Irish Bill will be taken directly after them.

(5.5.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to inform the House what he is going to do with the Savings Banks Bill? The right hon. Gentleman will remember that about a week ago he stated that the Bill would not be proceeded with if it were opposed, and now there were 39 notices of opposition against the measure.

*MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): The Savings Banks Bill is brought forward in the interests of 1,500,000 persons, and I should like to ask whether it is not a fact that a few Members opposite are alone responsible for the opposition to it.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I have to ask whether the Government intend to proceed with the Local Registration of Title (Ireland) Bill and the Registration of Assurances (Ireland) Bill?

MR. MADDEN: These Bills contain details which certainly require discussion. I do not intend to proceed with them this Session, but they will be re-introduced next Session. The Orders will be read and discharged.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): May I ask when the Scotch Estimates will be submitted?

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): Is it the intention of the Government to take the Second Reading of the Factors (Scotland) (No. 2) Bill before the Foreign Office Vote?

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): May I ask whether the Savings Banks Bill had not been the subject of most careful consideration in a Committee upstairs?

*(5.7.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I believe that the hon. Member for Bethnal Green has correctly represented the origin of the Savings Banks Bill. It is no doubt the result of a very careful inquiry before the Committee, and the desire of the Committee that the Bill should pass is not confined to any section or Party in this House, but is, I believe, as widespread on the other side of the House as on this. We desire to provide satisfactory security for the savings of the working classes of this country. The present arrangements do not afford adequate security, and the Government hope to provide such security by the adoption of this measure. If the Bill should be defeated this Session by any dilatory opposition, the whole responsibility for any evils that may occur in connection with savings banks next year must rest on hon. Members who oppose the measure. I cannot say this evening whether it will be proceeded with or not in case of a continuance of the kind of opposition which it has met. To the hon. Member for Lanarkshire I may point out that I have already said that the Scotch Estimates will follow the Foreign Office Vote. The Factors Bill was, I thought, an uncontested measure, but it appears that the hon. Member for Aberdeen wishes to oppose it.

MR. HUNTER: What I object to is the introduction in the dying days of the Session of Bills seriously altering and affecting Scotch law when there is no time for their consideration.

*(5.10.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The Bill has appeared upon the Paper for many weeks, and it has been considered by the House of Lords with great care. It is a legal measure of great advantage to the public.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION LAW AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 89.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to—Shrewsbury and Holyhead Road (Anglesey and Carnarvon) Bill, without any amendment; Allotments Act (1887) Amendment Bill, with Amendments.

That they have passed a Bill, intituled "An Act to make better provision for the Elementary Education of Blind and Deaf Children in England and Wales." [Elementary Education (Blind and Deaf) Bill [Lords].]

STATUTE LAW REVISION (No. 2) BILL
[LORDS].—(No. 405.)

Read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PUBLIC HEALTH ACTS AMENDMENT
BILL.—(No. 290.)

Bill as amended, considered.

*(5.12.) MR. J. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I wish to move the Amendment which I have placed upon the paper. There are many things that are likely to cause nuisances injurious to health, although I cannot but regard as what may properly be termed "grandmotherly legislation" the provision which says, "If any person allows or permits any water to enter into any drain, and communicate with any pure water of the temperature of 103° Fahrenheit, which alone or in combination with sewage is likely to cause injury to health, that person shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding £10." I now beg to move my Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 16, page 7, lines 17 and 18, to leave out "is likely to cause a nuisance or to be" and insert "causes a nuisance or is injurious."—(Mr. Kelly.)

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE): I would suggest that the object of the hon. Member would be better met by inserting the words, "causes a nuisance which is dangerous or injurious."

DR. CLARK (Cuthness): We ought to have a definition of the word dangerous. We can understand what is meant by injurious to health, but the word dangerous has a wider scope.

*MR. RITCHIE: The word dangerous is only used here as an alternative to injurious, namely dangerous or injurious.

*MR. KELLY: I am willing to accept the right hon. Gentleman's proposal.

Amendment as amended put and agreed to.

Consequential Amendments agreed to.

*(5.15.) MR. KELLY: When this Bill was in Committee, I moved to strike out the whole of Clause 42, but the House was unwilling to accede to my Amendment. I now move after the word "works," to insert "but in every case including sewerage and metalling." The Bill proposes a rather singular and most drastic change in our law. When the law on the subject was considered before, it was made much more stringent. I desire to call the attention of the House to Section 70 of the Act of 1848, which says streets are not to be repaired out of the rates before being

"Sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled, to the satisfaction of a Local Board of Health."

In 1875 the conditions under which private roads were to be declared repairable by the ratepayers were made even more stringent, and it was stipulated that no local authority should have power to take over a private road to be repaired by the inhabitants, unless it were channelled, sewered, paved, metalled, flagged, made good, and lighted. Instead, therefore, of cutting down the obligations cast on the owner of a private road which it was desired to make repairable by the inhabitants at large, they were absolutely enlarged. Now it seems to me a somewhat startling proposition that the enormous burden of metalling, sewerage, kerbing, and lighting the road should be cast upon the ratepayers. If the right hon. Gentleman will pardon me, he will find that I am justified in putting the interpretation which I do on the words "any of the works mentioned." The right hon. Gentleman will at once admit that "any" means any one of these works. One of these works is levelling. Therefore, if a man levels the road, and has sufficient interest with the local board or local authority, he may be relieved from the cost of sewerage and metalling, and the whole of the charge will be thrown upon the unhappy ratepayer. I would like to know why this startling change is to be made. I may say that before I put down this Amendment the President of the Board of Trade stated, in answer to a letter which I then addressed him on the subject, that there was a very good reason, from his point of view, for this drastic alteration of the law. It must be apparent that wherever the speculative builder has sufficient influence to induce the members of the Local Board to take over the road, he will be able to cast upon the ratepayers of the district an enormous and perfectly new burden. On this point I should like to quote a few words from a very great Judge—the late Sir George Jessel. In the Judgment of “the Attorney General v. Bidder,” he said:—

“In the first place it is plain that the public are to be considered. The expense of future repairs would be much greater when the road was not properly formed than when it was properly formed. That is one thing, and the next thing to be considered is that you are not to sacrifice the interests of the public to the interests of the speculative builder, or the owner of building land. It was not intended that the public were to make roads or building land for the benefit of the building owner. He was to pay proper expenses and to make a proper road, and then if it was a beneficial road or street to the public the Urban Authority would take to it. Therefore the Legislature says: when a great many things have been done, and not till then you may dedicate to the use of the public. But all those things are to be done.”

I know that it will be said that there are cases on which the operation of this section of the Act of 1875 has been found to be very troublesome and irksome, and, indeed, injurious. It will be further objected that this Bill is only permissive in its character. That is just the class of legislation to which I most object. If the thing is right, let the Legislature say it shall be done, and then it will be properly considered; but if it comes down in the form of a permissive enactment from a Committee up-stairs, and the hon. Members have never had any opportunity of considering or sanctioning it, I say it is a dangerous thing to do, and it is inviting the Local Authority to do that which we dare not tell them to do. Permissive legislation is to my mind prima facie absolutely wrong. If the speculative builder is to have these advantages, let the House say so boldly, and let them say that the unhappy ratepayers are to pay these large sums to the speculative builders. Do not let it be permissive, because that simply means that where the speculative builder has sufficient influence he will get the benefit of it, and where he has not it will never be used. One difficulty which will be urged is that the Local Authorities have taken over roads which they ought not to have taken over. I believe that is perfectly true. I will tell you what these Local Authorities will do the moment this Act is passed. They will issue a new notice at the end of the month to secure themselves against any illegalities they have committed. I do not want the Local Authorities to commit any illegalities. Let the Local Authorities obey the law; if they do not, let them take the consequences. I would like the Committee to consider the class of road which will be taken over. It will be the road fringed by villas with very long frontages and in respect of which exceedingly small rates are really levied. Hon. Members know something about rating inside the Metropolis, and they know that there the shops and small houses are very highly rated, whereas the villas which fringe the road and have large frontages get off uncommonly cheaply. I would invite the House to say that this class of persons shall not be relieved at the expense of the ratepayers of the covenants which they have chosen to enter into voluntarily when signing their leases. What the House has to guard against is jobbery and corruption on the Local Boards. I believe there are cases—at least I am told there are cases—in which it would be in the interests of the public that such roads should be taken over. Let it be so. But let it be done only under the sanction of the Local Government Board. Let the ratepayers be protected. Everybody knows as much as I do about the influences at work upon these petty Local Boards, and that the whole cost of these roads taken over will be cast upon the ratepayers, must, I think, hesitate before making such a momentous change of the law as is proposed by Clause 42 of this Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 17, line 40, after the word “works,” to insert the words “but in every case including sewerage and metalling.”—(Mr. John Kelly.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

*(5.35.) MR. RITCHIE: From the observations of the hon. Gentleman, one would imagine that our Town Councils and Local Boards were filled with men whose sole object, though representing the ratepayers, was to protect the interests of the speculative builders. The history of this clause is very simple. Prior to the judgment to which the hon. Member has referred, Local Boards had never believed that it was necessary, under the provisions of the existing law, that all the various matters to which he refers, such as lighting, paving, channelling, curbing, metalling, flagging, and sewerage, must be done before they took over the road. It is quite obvious that a compliance with all these requirements was entirely unnecessary in the case of many of the roads which they took over. The decision to which the hon. Member referred caused enormous inconvenience to Town Councils and Local Authorities. It is not a new matter for Parliament to deal with this particular question. There is a provision in a Bill which passed this House in 1886 entirely analogous to the proposal now made in this Bill.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): What was the name of the Bill?

*MR. RITCHIE: It was the Public Health Acts (Improvements Expenses) Bill of 1886, and the clause to which I refer provided that the Town Council or Local Authority should have the liberty of saying whether these provisions should be carried out before a road is taken over. That is a principle to which I think hardly any one can object. Our opinion is, and the opinion of the Local Government Board is, that Parliament may properly be asked to give this authority to the local governing bodies without the smallest danger of those evils which the hon. Gentleman thinks may arise. The hon. Gentleman admitted that there are cases in which it would be absurd to call upon anybody to do all these various matters provided in the original Act.

*MR. KELLY: I never said that. On the contrary, I said that whatever might be the case, they ought to do the metalling and sewerage.

*MR. RITCHIE: Well, the hon. Member, at any rate, admits that there are cases in which the provisions of the existing law might cause considerable inconvenience, and he says in that case "let there be an appeal to the Local Government Board, whose judgment shall be final in the matter." But the Local Government Board has already sufficient burdens on its shoulders, and it could not send an inspector to various localities throughout the country to inquire into the circumstances of a particular road to be taken over. We must respectfully decline such a duty, which would probably have to be exercised in a vast number of instances in all parts of the country. We ask that Parliament should give to the Local Authorities, when a road is to be taken over, the power of saying what shall be done in the interests of the rate-payers. I think in asking the House to assent to that principle we are asking it to support that which is in accordance with the modern principles of legislation, namely, to confer more and more power, and more and more discretion on the freely-elected representatives of the rate-payers.

(5.40.) DR. CLARK: I am sorry the hon. Member for North Camberwell did not strike out the words "or any." I certainly think it is a very small thing to ask that the metalling and sewerage shall be done. Under Clause 122 of the Public Health Act, the Authorities can only take a road over when that has been done. You are now trying to get rid of the law by which landlords are properly made to sewer a road before it is taken over to be maintained at the public expense. The proposal now before us is simply a mode of relieving a certain number of landlords and builders from putting the streets they wish to be taken over into proper order. Some Local Authorities, whose proceedings are reported, will be very careful about what is done. But we know very well that there are Local Boards which are controlled by the jerry builders, contractors, and their friends. Generally, the rate-payers know nothing at all about it. In the suburbs of London, as the hon. Member for North Camberwell pointed out, it is very often the case. Why should you make this change in the law? Why should the public be compelled to metal, sewer, and light, and put the road into a condition that it may be maintained? I know the clause is permissive, but I think the same law ought to be applied all over. If the power were made compulsory, the Local Authority would see that all this work was done before taking the road over, but if it is made optional they will not do so. I do not see why you should repeal or modify this very valuable Clause of the Public Health Act, and which prevents badly-drained streets being made at all. As it is now, they will probably make badly-drained streets that will not bear the traffic when these streets will be taken over. This is simply an effort to slip into this Bill a permission repealing a very valuable Clause of the Public Health Act.

*(5.45.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I very much regret the tone of the President of the Local Government Board towards this Amendment. If the hon. Member will strike out the words "if any," I will support him.

*MR. KELLY: That would only be a re-enactment of Clause 152 of the Public Health Act.

*CAPTAIN VERNEY: I understand it to be so. I do not wish to see any alteration of the law myself. What do we very often see? Some market garden laid out for building purposes, with curb-stones to define the road, the middle of which is a perfect swamp. The houses are erected on either side, and the last thing done is the draining and metalling. What will be done in many instances? An attempt will be made to get the work of metalling and draining thrown upon the ratepayers. I think the speculative builders might at least be called upon to do the metalling and sewerage, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to accepting what is a reasonable Amendment, and one which can be productive of no harm.

(5.47.) MR. STOREY: I want to point out that the Public Health Act, as it exists at present, has worked admirably. The Local Authorities cannot take on highways and streets unless they have been properly paved, channelled, and metalled. But it is now proposed to give an option to the Local Authority to take over a road as to which all these things have not been done. Our rule in Sunderland has been the very opposite. We obtained a Private Act at a cost of £3,500 in order to secure control of the matter, and we require the centre of the road to be paved and drained before the buildings are erected. We require that the private owners of the land who make the profit shall put the street into a proper condition first of all. But under the clause now proposed, the Local Authority would have power to take over a street which had been simply levelled, and the ratepayers would have to pay the whole cost of sewerage and paving out of the public funds. The hon. Member has used the word metalling. I know that is the common expression in London, where the macadam roads are most used, but in the North we find it more economical to pave our streets with some description or other of stone. And if this Amendment is to apply usefully throughout the country, I would suggest that he ought to use the words "including sewerage, metalling and paving." I submit that the Amendment is a reasonable one, and where the Local Authority take over a road, the sewerage, metalling, and paving should at least be made a sine qua non. The Local Authority might well be at liberty, so far as the flagging and lighting are concerned, but sewerage, metalling, and paving involve considerations of health. I support the Amendment because I know that there are districts in England which are controlled by certain classes of persons who would use this change in the law to the public mischief.

*MR. KELLY: I am willing to accept the words "or paving."

*MR. SPEAKER: That can only be by leave of the House.

(5.50.) The House divided:—Ayes, 54; Noes, 129. Division List (No. 224.)

Question, "That the Bill be now read a third time,"—(Mr. Ritchie,)—put and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

POLICE BILL—(No. 392.)

As amended, further considered.

(5.58.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I propose to begin by saying one word as to something which affects this and other Amendments. I will not detain the House longer than is necessary. I have always looked upon the threats of the First Lord of the Treasury in this way. These threats apply equally to the other side who must suffer.

*MR. SPEAKER: That has nothing to do with the Amendment before the House. The hon. Gentleman will be good enough to address himself to the particular question.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I will be as brief as possible with regard to this particular Amendment. It seems to me reasonable that the Local Authority should have discretion to lower the pension by reason of demerits on the part of the officer in his service to the public as is the practice under the Civil Service Superannuation Act. But here you are going to give policemen a freehold such as is enjoyed by no other body of public servants except the clergy of the Established Church, and I hope they will not enjoy it long. I know the answer of the Government will be that there is no necessity for discretion. We insist that they shall not be deprived of these privileges. This is a reasonable Amendment which the Government may well accept. It touches the broad principle of the Bill that there shall be no discretion whatever in the Local Authorities in this matter, and it will make clear the position of the Government on that point. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 5, at the end of Clause 1, to insert the words—

"Provided also, that the police authority may grant to any constable a pension of less amount than he would have been entitled to receive if his defaults or demerits in relation to the public service appear to them to justify such diminution."—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(6.4.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The hon. Member has anticipated the line of argument to be taken by the Government on his Amendment. It is totally inconsistent with the principle of the Bill. It is not the case that the Local Authority has no discretion. The hon. Member forgets that the pension is only to be given for so many years approved service. If there has been misconduct on the part of any constable it is open to the Police Authority to deduct the period during which the service has not been "approved." If a man after all deductions are made still has fifteen years approved service to his credit it would be monstrous to give the Police Authority further power of depriving him of his pension.

(6.5.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I do not think that that is quite the point at the present moment. The Local Authorities have got complete freedom to grant pensions, larger or smaller, according to the conduct and character of the man. All we ask is that under this Bill they shall not have less power. We do not contest in this Amendment the principle that a man shall have a pension: we have contested that already, and so far have been defeated; but, given the right that the man shall have a pension, there remains this consideration: Shall the authority which employs and pays him have the right, at the end of 15 or 25 years, to consider whether he has been a useful and efficient servant, or whether he has been a sloucher and a loafer, and calculate his pension accordingly? If this power be not granted to the Local Authority we shall lose one of the most valuable powers we now possess for securing an efficient and active Police force. Take the case of a municipality with a Police Force of 600 men. Every man at present knows that if he proves himself by extra activity and good sense and acuteness a really valuable public servant the fact will be considered in fixing his pension; on the other hand, if he be one of those easy-going persons, who slouches through his work, never effects a capture, and never distinguishes himself by discovering the commission of offences, he does not come off so well. But if this Bill is passed as it now stands both these men will be placed on the same footing. Is it fair? I want to give the municipality power to distinguish between the two. I would suggest that the Local Authority should have the power of awarding a greater or lesser pension, according to its judgment of the service the constable has done.

Sir G. Campbell

MR. SPEAKER:* Order, order! The hon. Member is not speaking on the Amendment. He is referring to one which stands in his own name.

MR. STOREY: The principle of the two Amendments is the same. I have no disposition to discuss the matter twice, and I thought I might as well deal with the point on this Amendment. My hon. Friend proposes that the Authority shall be able to grant to a constable a pension of less amount than under the Bill as it stands he will be entitled to receive. He puts no limit to the amount, whereas I would suggest there should be two pension scales; and it should be in the option of the Local Authority to place the man on the higher, or on the lower, scale, according to the services he has rendered. The Authorities practically possess that power at present, and it works advantageously. But the right hon. Gentleman proposes absolutely to take it away from them, and I want to know why he does so. Surely we, who pay the money, ought to have some voice as to the amount of the pension to be granted. I submit that the Amendment is a valuable one, and I hope that my hon. Friend will press it.

(6.13.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): If the meaning attached by the Home Secretary to the word "approved" is accurate, then the Amendment of my hon. Friend is not necessary. The point is a very important one. In the case of the Civil Service it is competent for the Treasury to reduce a man's pension if he has misconducted himself.

*(6.14.) MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I appeal to my hon. Friend not to press his Amendment. The words are not necessary, and I am sure that if Clause 4 requires strengthening in order to make this point clear the Home Secretary would assent to the alteration. I agree with my hon. Friend it is absolutely necessary the Local Authority should have this power.

(6.15.) MR. STOREY: If we were quite sure as to the meaning of the term "approved service," and it covered what I want, I would not press the Amendment. But if my right hon. Friend examines Clause 4 he will hardly hold to the view he has expressed.

(6.16.) MR. MATTHEWS: I cannot undertake to alter Clause 4 so as to meet the views of the hon. Member for Sunderland. That Clause enables the Local Authority to make deductions from the actual service of a man for misconduct or negligence. But it does not give the Local Authority the option of giving either a large or a small pension—a power which they have greatly abused in the past.

*(6.17.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I think the words "approved service" do cover the point raised by the hon. Member for Sunderland. Approved service is diligent and faithful service. Surely it is only fair the constable shall have notice from time to time if his service is not diligent, and will not be allowed to count for pension. It would be hardly right at the end of a man's service to tell him suddenly he has not earned a pension. I think the power given in the Bill will keep the chief constables up to the mark in maintaining the efficiency of the force.

Question put, and negatived.

(6.18.) MR. STOREY: I now beg to move in Clause 3, page 2, line 31, to add at the end, "Provided that the Police Authority may, in the pension scale contemplated by this Bill for ordinary pensions and within the limits of such scale, provide for a greater or lesser pension according to its judgment of the services and the conduct of each constable."

*MR. SPEAKER: Will the hon. Gentleman explain how that differs from the preceding Amendment?

MR. STOREY: Yes, Sir. In this particular, that it provides the Local Authority may make two pension scales, and within the limits of these scales grant a higher or a lower pension according to their judgment of the services rendered. I must take leave to repel with indignation the statement of the Home Secretary that the Municipalities have in the past in any way abused the power of pensioning the police. Can he name any one Municipality the police of which as a body have complained of such abuse, or that they have been unfairly treated owing to the power possessed by the Local Authority of differentiating between one man and another? I have had a good deal more experience than the right hon. Gentleman of the action of Local Authorities, and I venture to tell him that there has been no such complaint. We ask for a continuation of this right to differentiate between a man who has done valuable service and one who has done poor service.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! This is precisely the same question; there is no difference whatever. The hon. Member is arguing the same question again.

MR. STOREY: Of course, Sir, if you—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! It is precisely the same question.

MR. STOREY: Then I will simply move my Amendment, and take the sense of the House on it.

*MR. SPEAKER: I cannot put it.

(6.21.) MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): I beg to move the Amendment in my name. It is more a matter of form than of principle.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 36, to leave out the words "and send a copy to the Secretary of State."—(Mr. Atherley-Jones.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

(6.22.) MR. MATTHEWS: The Local Authority is required to draw up a scale within a certain date, and if they fail to do so there is an alternative power in the Secretary of State to make a scale. How is the Secretary of State to know whether the Local Authority have framed a scale or not unless they send a copy of it to him?

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(6.23.) MR. ATHERLEY-JONES: I hope the Home Secretary will be able to accept the other Amendment in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 5, to leave out from the word "force" to the word "operation," inclusive, in line 7.—(Mr. Atherley-Jones.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

* (6.24.) MR. MATTHEWS: I think the hon. Member must see it is impossible to omit these words. It is provided that if the Police Authority are not satisfied with the scale they shall have power to revise it from time to time; but clearly it would be unfair to make the revised scale applicable to men in the Force when the original scale was framed. It must only apply to men entering the Force after the revision.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES: I will not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(6.25.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to move in Clause 4, page 3, line 13, after the word "misconduct" to insert "inefficiency." The object of the Amendment is to enable a deduction from a constable's pension to be made on account of inefficiency as well as sickness or misconduct. At present deductions can only be made for some specific offence; we desire the same power for general inefficiency. Surely the Home Secretary will not object to that.

Mr. Atherley-Jones

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 13, after the word "misconduct," to insert the word "inefficiency,"—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'inefficiency' be there inserted."

* (6.26.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Government have no objection to the introduction of the word, except that they hold it to be the duty of the Police Authority to discharge a man for inefficiency. We ought to be able to rely on the efficiency of the police of the country.

SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): Would not that be covered by the words in Clause 10, "any other reasonable cause"?

* MR. MATTHEWS: I think Clause 10 will require alteration.

(6.27.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I think the clause goes too far already. It is very unfair that a man's pension should be lessened on account of sickness. A great many constables contract sickness in the discharge of their duty. I think the words "misconduct" and "neglect of duty" are quite sufficient. If you introduce the word "inefficiency," a sergeant or inspector, without finding any particular fault with his subordinate, could affect his pension prospects by simply saying he is a stupid and inefficient man. You make the constable pay the bulk of the fund from which the pension is taken, and of course the pension is taken into account when fixing his wages. If you introduce this word you will be depriving him by unfair means of money he has really earned.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

* (6.32.) MR. MATTHEWS: The next Amendment is merely a question of drafting. At the instance of my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (MR. LAWRENCE), certain words were inserted in Clause 14. The draftsman has pointed out that they are in the wrong place. The hon. Member will accept it from me that the alterations I propose carry out the understanding come to in the Committee.

Amendment proposed, Clause 4, page 3, line 37, leave out "Great Britain" and insert "any part of the United Kingdom."

(Mr. Matthews.)

Question proposed, "That 'Great Britain' stand part of the Question."

(6.33.) MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I have to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the introduction of this clause.

*(6.34.) MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I am quite willing to accept the Amendment. There seems to be a little feeling abroad as to the effect of this Act upon Irish constables who come over here to serve. I have put an Amendment on the Paper providing that such constables should receive pensions from the Irish Government, which I regret the Government does not see its way to accept, but, as I have said, I am ready to agree to the right hon. Gentleman's proposal.

(6.35.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I do not know whether it is proposed to adopt a similar Amendment on the Scotch Bill. I should be obliged to oppose such an Amendment. The scale of pensions in Ireland is very much higher than the scale sanctioned by the Committee upstairs. At the same time, I am quite certain that the last thing a Scotchman would be willing to do would be to introduce as a policeman in Scotland any person who had been brought up under the malign influence of the Castle in Dublin.

Question, put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Clause 6

*(6.37.) CAPTAIN VERNEY: This clause is erroneously described in the margin as one to give power to reduce pensions where the infirmity of a constable is partially due to misconduct. The provision is to enable pensions to be reduced where the infirmity is wholly due to misconduct. Such cases do arise. As the clause now stands, the Police Authorities will have no power to give a man less than four-fifths of his pension. I think the ratepayers will think it hard if they have to give a four-fifths pension to a man whose retirement is entirely due to his own misconduct. I propose to give the Police Authority power to act as they think fit. I think they should have power to prevent a man having any pension at all.

They will then have power to say, "We know perfectly well you are injuring your constitution by your habits, and unless you improve we shall not give you a pension." There is a provision for a certificate by a medical man and therefore it cannot be hard on the man. It must be remembered that when a man is bringing on himself infirmity of body by his own misconduct he is injuring others besides himself. I do not think such misconduct ought to be treated lightly in the case of a policeman, who ought at all events to set a decently fair example in the locality in which he is placed. I therefore propose the Amendment of which I have given notice.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 29, after the word "reduce," to insert the words "or forfeit."—(Captain Verney.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(6.39.) MR. MATTHEWS: This is one of the matters we discussed very fully in the Committee, and I regret that it should have to be discussed again. No doubt it is a point which is open to consideration on both sides. This is necessarily a difficult matter to determine. Prima facie if the constable's habits had been such as to impair his constitution the Police Authorities ought to have found it out long before the pension was due and ought to have dismissed him. There may be a case in which where a constable who never drinks to excess, still goes on drinking from day to day. The former Bill on the subject only allowed the Police Authority to reduce his pension by one-tenth. I propose that it shall be reduced by one-fifth. Now comes the purist in the shape of the hon. and gallant Member opposite, who wants to give the Police Authority power to refuse a pension altogether. It is really a matter for the House to decide. If, however, you give power to the Police Authority to refuse a pension altogether, you should give an appeal, which at present is not given.

*(6.41.) MR. CHILDERS: For my part I should very much regret to have a system of appeals, except as to questions of law. If you start the system of appeals you will have appeals from the whole of the police. I would prefer to see Clause 10 made very stringent. Men falling into these practices ought to be dismissed. If the power to dismiss is made perfectly clear I should invite my hon. Friend not to persist in his Amendment.

MR. MATTHEWS: I intend to make it perfectly clear that the power to dismiss will be absolutely at the discretion of the Police Authority.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(6.44.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to move to leave out after "pension" to the end of the clause. I wish to take away the words which limit the reduction to one-fifth. In the Standing Committee the argument was all on one side. Member after Member appealed to the Home Secretary to accept this Amendment, and I did not think the right hon. Gentleman would divide upon it. The right hon. Gentleman, however, held out, without saying much in the way of argument, and, to the surprise of the Committee, he had a considerable majority when it came to the vote.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 29, to leave out all the words after the word "pension," to the end of the clause.—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of Bill."

*(6.46.) SIR W. BARTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I certainly agree very much with what the hon. Gentleman has said, and I think it would be infinitely better to leave the discretion to those who have to deal with the cases. In my opinion, the Home Secretary would never regret having placed this power in the hands of the Police Authority. Under the clause, as it stands, all cases of irregularity, whether grave or trivial, will have to be dealt with alike.

(6.47.) MR. MATTHEWS: I do not know whether it would shorten the discussion if I put in "one-half" instead of "one-fifth."

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I accept that.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I now beg to move to omit "one-fifth" and substitute "one-half."

Mr. Childers

Amendment proposed, Clause 6, page 5, line 30, to omit "one-fifth" and insert "one-half."

Question, "That 'one-fifth' stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That 'one-half' be there inserted."

*(6.49.) MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I cannot agree with the hon. Baronet behind me (Sir W. Barttelot). A man should be dismissed for an offence of a sufficiently grave character, but I do not think his punishment should be held over until he has completed his 25 years' service. I earnestly hope the right hon. Gentleman will adhere to the Bill as it stands, and will not consent to its alteration.

*MR. CHILDERS: The clause applies to a very limited class of men only. If this were not so the remarks of the hon. Gentleman would no doubt have great force.

(6.50.) DR. CLARK: After a man has served for, say, fifteen years, it would be very hard to refuse to pay him any pension. If he has served three-fifths of his time he ought to have three-fifths of his pension.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: My hon. Friend does not seem to appreciate that the clause will only apply to men who have misconducted themselves. I think the concession made by the Government is well grounded on public expediency.

*(6.52.) CAPTAIN VERNEY: I know a case of a Chief Constable, who, in the opinion of all who are acquainted with him, is bringing on ill-health by his vicious habits. I think if a constable who behaves in this way gets even half of his pension he is exceedingly well treated.

MR. STOREY: I would point out that medical evidence has to be obtained of the fact that the constable has contributed to the infirmity by his own default or his vicious habits. Now, according to experience the larger amount that is deducted, the least likely is the doctor to give a certificate to that effect. I would suggest that three-fifths should be given at any rate.

(6.53.) Question put.

House cleared for a Division.

(6.56.) Question again put, and agreed to.

DR. CLARK: Would I be in order in moving three-fifths?

*MR. SPEAKER: That would not be in order, because we have passed the word "one."

*(6.58.) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I propose to omit Clause 8 altogether. It provides that certain conduct on the part of a pensioner shall result in the forfeiture of his pension at the discretion of the Police Authority. I do not suppose the clause would have a very wide operation, because I cannot think that a man who had spent 25 years in an honourable occupation would be likely to commit any of the acts mentioned in the clause. The acts divide themselves into two classes. The first class consists of crimes, and the second of acts which are not crimes, but which one may call contra bonos mores. As to the first class the Court which convicts ought to punish once for all. To attach discretion for further punishment to the Police Authority would introduce a very disturbing element into the administration of justice in Criminal Courts. Further, it seems to me that by this clause we are reverting, capriciously and, therefore, the more mischievously, to the old practice of the criminal law under which a conviction for felony involved a forfeiture of the convicted man's property. The second class of offences are of an extremely vague character, and will give a power to the Police Authority which may be used in a tyrannical manner. One of the acts is knowingly associating with thieves, or reputed thieves; another is refusing to give information or assistance to the police; and another is being "guilty of any conduct which is, in the opinion of the police authority, disgraceful." I proposed this Amendment in the Standing Committee, and I quite admit I did not receive much support there. The only substantial argument, however—if I can call it substantial—advanced against me was that these forfeitures had been introduced into previous Bills dealing with the same subject. But by this Bill we are introducing a new principle which I think meets that argument altogether. In previous Bills it was provided that pensions should be given at the discretion of the Local Authority, and I quite admit that where the Local Authority has a discretion to grant pensions, it is not unreasonable to allow it a discretion to withdraw them. By this Bill we are giving an absolute right to a constable to have a pension, and it seems to me futile and nugatory, after providing that the constable shall have a right to a pension, to say the Local Authority shall be at liberty to withdraw it.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 5, to leave out Clause 8.—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

Question proposed,

"That the words 'A pension or allowance under this Act is granted only upon condition that it becomes forfeited, and may be withdrawn by the Police Authority, in any of the following cases' stand part of the Bill."

(7.4.) MR. F. ROBERTSON (Dundee): My hon. Friend (Mr. Pickersgill) and some of his supporters the other day commented with some severity upon the length of time occupied on Saturday on a much more important question, involving the whole kernel of the Bill, by some of us who did not address the House as long as he has just done. I wish to support the Amendment. In Committee on the Scotch Bill the same point arose. Although I do not like either of these Police Bills, I wish to treat the police fairly, and I do not wish to impose on them conditions which in themselves appear to be degrading and insulting. If they are to have pensions, let them have them on terms which imply that they are decent and respectable citizens. The proposal as it stands amounts to nothing more or less than that the police pensioners are to be subject to police supervision.

(7.6.) MR. MATTHEWS: This question was also thoroughly thrashed out in Committee. The clause has been in every Bill on the subject. Moreover, the conditions imposed have been in the regulations of the Police Force since the beginning, and it has never been alleged that they work any hardship to the men. Lastly, it would surely be a shock to the public conscience that a man committing an offence involving moral turpitude should be allowed to draw a large pension from the public funds.

*MR. CHILDERS: I am generally of the same opinion as the right hon. Gentleman, but I think the word "disgraceful" is too vague, and would suggest that it would be better to adopt the words of the Scotch Bill, giving power to the Police Authority to withdraw pension from any grantee who enters into or continues to carry on any business, occupation, or employment which, in the opinion of the police authority, is illegal.

(7.9.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I do not think that because a bad clause has been inserted in a number of other Bills we should therefore put a bad clause in this. Sub-section D would, I believe, give power to anyone who had a grudge against a constable to make it doubtful whether the constable would ever obtain a pension or not. The word "disgraceful" is so vague that I think the draftsman himself would like to reconsider it. I think there is also a great deal of force in the argument put forward by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bethnal Green, that a man when he is punished for a crime should be punished out and out, and should not have a lot of these forfeitures hanging over his head.

(7.11.) SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I trust the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary will, in justice to the Police Force, see his way to effect such a qualification in the clause as that indicated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh.

(7.11.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: We must be careful what we do in this matter. If we look at Sub-section A, we shall see that we are going to a dangerous length. If an ex-policeman is committed to prison for three months with hard labour, or for 12 months with or without hard labour, he is to lose his pension. If, therefore, he should be tried for the offence of pocket-picking, and should only be sent to gaol for two months with hard labour, it will have no effect on his pension. Can it then be said that you must go lower down and forfeit the pension for "disgraceful conduct?" No doubt these words are wide and will bring a great many things into the net; but on the other hand, I think if it is advisable to omit the words in question from Sub-section D, these words in Sub-section A should be amended. There may be many offences for which an ex-police constable may be convicted, and where the sentence is not so heavy as three months hard labour or 12 months imprisonment of any kind.

(7.13.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I may say that the Government will be willing to adopt the wording of the Scotch Bill on this point, so that the two Bills may run together. By this arrangement it will be competent to withhold a pension by reason of a man carrying on a business occupation or employment which is illegal, or of disclosing information which he has become possessed of through his connection with a Police Force.

DR. CLARK: What is an illegal occupation? Is there such a thing?

(7.14.) MR. HUNTER: My opposition is directed against the whole of the Clause. There are two points of view from which all these matters may be examined, and the first is the financial point of view. The first question is what is the Clause going to be worth to the ratepayer or the pension fund? Well, the answer to that is that this is a provision which, from a pecuniary point of view, is of no value to the fund whatever, as the cases in which ex-policemen will be guilty of these serious offences will be extremely rare. From a policeman's point of view I quite understand why the policemen do not strenuously attack the Clause. If they did it might be said, "Oh, they want to be at liberty to commit these offences and still retain their pensions." Every policeman would see the Clause did not affect him; but I object to it on the score of principle. We give an absolute right to a pension, and, under the circumstances, I contend that the pension is as much the property of the policeman as if he had inherited the money from his great-grandfather. There are two modes by which we pay policemen under the Bill, one by a system of gratuities, and the other by a system of pensions. It cannot be contended that, having given a gratuity, you could revoke it; and what difference, I ask, does it make if, instead of paying a sum down, you reward him by an annual pension? None at all; and I therefore protest against the singling out of this one class of property for forfeiture. If the principle of requiring the forfeiture of property every time a disgraceful act is done is insisted upon in the case of every body, I could understand its application to a policeman. The English law used to recognise the principle in cases of felony, but its absurdity has been recognised and its total irrelevancy to punishment for crime has caused it to be abolished. This clause is one which shakes the security of pensions. It would operate with the greatest hardship and injustice in certain cases, such as where an innocent man is convicted, and cases of that kind are by no means unknown. I shall vote against the Clause.

*(7.19.) MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I hope the House will not consent to this Clause being left out. It is a great advantage to the pensioners themselves that it is known that their pensions will be forfeited for certain things, as it enables them better to obtain the light employment of which they are capable.

*(7.20.) CAPTAIN VERNEY: I hope the Committee will adhere to this Clause, as the same rule obtains in the Army and Navy. It is to the advantage of the pensioners, as it enables them to get other employment. I am glad to hear what has been said in the course of the discussion as to the vagueness of disgraceful conduct, for the reason that during my election contest in North Bucks, my opponent expressed a hope that the Constituency would not disgrace itself by returning me.

(7.22.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I do not know how far the words "refusing to give assistance in case of any disturbance of the public peace" will extend. There may be many cases where the offence may not be of such a grave character that it ought to involve the forfeiture of a pension. The matter is to rest with the discretion of the Police, and we know they sometimes take a very wide view of what is a disturbance of the public peace. If it were for a Judge to decide I should be content. That is not the case, however, and I think these words should be altered. Many so-called disturbances take place at elections, and an ex-policeman might not wish to identify himself with either side.

Question put, and agreed to.

*(7.24.) CAPTAIN VERNEY: I beg to move to insert the word "indictable" before "offence." This word was inserted at first in the Bill, but was struck out in the belief that it was not necessary. I think it would be better and fairer if it were put in. A man may be indicted for picking pockets, and may not get as much as three months imprisonment with hard labour, but still may be unfit to receive a pension. If it is known that a man can easily lose his pension it will make him careful; besides which, it will make it easier for him to obtain employment.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 8, after the word "any," to insert the word "indictable."—(Captain Verney.)—

Question proposed, "That the word 'indictable' be there inserted."

(7.26.) MR. MATTHEWS: I cannot accept the Amendment. The object of this Sub-section A is to try by general words to include those Acts which involve moral turpitude. If you put in these words you might include offences, which would not come within that category. In the case of pocket picking I do not think it likely that so light a punishment as two months hard labour would be indicted for such an offence; for remember, the offender is an ex-policeman.

(7.27.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I accept the view of the Home Secretary that only offences which imply moral turpitude should be included, but if we accepted the Amendment we could graduate the punishment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(7.28.) DR. CLARK: I move to leave out Sub-section C, which provides that a man shall lose his pension if he refuses to assist the police in the detection of crime, the apprehension of criminals, or for the suppression of any disturbance of the public peace. The words "any disturbance of the public peace" will include occurrences such as Salvation Army processions or matters of that kind, for which the hon. Member for Lanarkshire was sent to prison. This, certainly, ought not to depend upon the vote of one man: there ought at least to be a majority of two-thirds or three-fourths.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 15, to leave out Sub-section C of Clause 8.—(Dr. Clark.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section C. of Clause 8 stand part of the Bill."

(7.31.) MR. STOREY: I support my hon. Friend in this Amendment, but not quite for the reason he has given. I admit that as to Sub-sections A and B, it is perfectly right that the pensions should be subject to withdrawal if the Local Authority thinks fit, but I submit that whatever a man does under Sub-section C, is not sufficient reason for withdrawing the pension he has earned. If he refuses to give to the Police the information in his power for the detection of crime, and apprehension of criminals, and the suppression of any disturbance to the public peace, he is to lose his pension. Suppose he does that, why should he be subject to a special punishment over and above any other man who commits the same offence? If he can be punished for what must be in most cases a very venial offence, why should you subject him to the possibility of losing his pension? If a man has served 25 years honestly, and you have decreed that he shall have a pension, surely if ten years later he does something the Police Authority object to, you should not provide that he should lose his pension.

(7.34.) MR. MATTHEWS: We must bear in mind that the pension is granted to a man who has been allowed to leave the Police Force on the ground that he either had a medical certificate that he was incapacitated for doing his duty, or had served for 25 years. Surely under such circumstances, it is only right that he should not forget that he is a pensioned policeman, and therefore is bound to give all the assistance he can in the detection of crime and so forth. If a man refuses to give such assistance, it is by no means unfair or unreasonable there should be some penalty.

*(7.36.) CAPTAIN VERNEY: I shall certainly support the proposal to omit this sub-section. The law gives ample power to the Government to cause every citizen to assist the police: why should a policeman be subject to any additional penalty, the additional penalty of losing his pension. I think the right hon. Gentleman might see his way to withdraw this section.

(7.37.) The House divided:—Ayes 132; Noes 39.—(Div. List, No. 225.)

(7.45.) Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 19, to leave out Sub-section (d.) of Clause 8, in order to insert the words—

"(d) If the grantee enters into or continues to carry on any business, occupation, or employment which is illegal, or in which he has made use of the fact of his former employment in the police in a manner which the Police Authority consider to be discreditable and improper."—(Mr. Secretary Matthews.)

Mr. Storey

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

(7.46.) MR. E. ROBERTSON: I rise for the purpose of supporting this Amendment. [Cries of "Agreed."] There is one remark I want to make, and I think I am within my right in making it. This Amendment entirely vindicates my suggestion on Saturday that the English and Scotch Bills should have been referred to the same Committee. In this debate constant references to the Scotch Bill are made under the most inconvenient circumstances. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) below me has been sitting with both Bills in his hands the whole evening, and has done the House the great service of continually referring to the provisions of the Scotch Bill. I think we have just ground for complaint against my right hon. Friend for having on Saturday prevented us by his influence taking a course whereby references to the Scotch Bills would have been made in a way convenient to the House.

*MR. CHILDERS: My hon. Friend has been good enough to compliment me on my influence. But he has also said, in opposition to my view, the two Bills should have been referred to the same Committee. My sole objection to that course was and is that if it had been adopted the chances are the two Bills would have been so delayed as not to pass this Session.

DR. CLARK: I have no objection to the sub-section being omitted, but I think we ought to know what is meant by "carrying on any illegal occupation." By adopting this Amendment we should change the clause completely. Perhaps our meeting in the House of Commons might be regarded as an illegal occupation, and right hon. Gentlemen engaged in it, and who have large State pensions, might lose their pensions.

MR. MATTHEWS: The words "illegal occupation" apply to some breach of the criminal law.

Question put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(7.52.) MR. STOREY: I would have no objection to the words down to the word

"illegal," but I cannot see the justice of the words "in a manner the Police Authority may consider to be discreditable and improper." I am very distrustful of what the Police Authority may consider to be discreditable and improper. I do not allude to Police Authorities in boroughs, but I am not so sure about Police Authorities in counties, because the counties are not controlled as to the police by representative bodies. But my greatest objection would be to trusting to the Police Authority in the Metropolis, which is the Secretary of State for the Home Department for the time being. I would not trust the right hon. Gentleman, for instance, to carry out this clause. In country districts there are many employments and occupations which an ex-policeman might engage in, and which the magistrates might choose to consider to be discreditable and improper. For instance, if an ex-policeman happened to be implicated in some game case, I can understand that in many rural districts the law might be strained with great severity against the man by the authority, which is in no sense representative. I shall take a division. I agree to the words: down to "illegal," but beg to move to omit the words from that word to the word "improper."

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out all the words after the word "illegal," to the end of the proposed Amendment.—(Mr. Storey).

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I think it necessary to press the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey). I do not see that this generalisation is better than the generalisation we had in the old clause. There is nothing to show how the power will be used. You are giving pensions, and I take it you are doing so because the men have earned them. I do not think you ought to give the Police Authority power to exercise just as they like. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to leave out all words after "illegal."

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Reference has been made to the Scotch Committee from which this clause proceeds. Let me say the Scotch Committee, although unanimous in substituting these words, were by no means unanimous in accepting the words which are now objected to.

(8.0) The House divided:—Ayes 100; Noes 50.—(Div. List, No. 226.)

Words inserted.

Other Amendments made. (8.15.)

(8.40.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

(8.43.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: The object of the next Amendment which stands in my name is to maintain the present right of a Police Authority to dismiss their own servants at their own discretion. This was discussed in the Committee on the Scotch Police Bill and only defeated by the casting vote of the Chairman. I believe the Government will admit that the clause requires amendment, and I hope they will assent to my first motion, which is to strike out all the operative part of the clause.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 10, page 8, line 3, to leave out all the words after the word "shall."—(Sir G. Campbell.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

(8.46.) MR. MATTHEWS: I agree that Clause 10 requires amendment, and that the Police Authorities ought to have an absolute right to dismiss any constable, who, it must be clearly understood, will, in the future, have no vested interest in his position. In the event of a constable who has earned a pension being guilty of gross misconduct, he should be liable to be dismissed without a pension, but in that case he ought to have a right of appeal, and that appeal I propose to give him, to the Court of Quarter Sessions. I propose to insert in the clause the following words (and here I may say I do not object to the hon. Member's words, they are probably quite as good as my own):—

"Nothing in this Act shall prevent any constable being dismissed or reduced to any lower rank or lower rate of pay or from having his claim to pension refused on account of misconduct or of negligence in the discharge of his duty, or on account of any of the grounds on which his pension, if granted, would be liable to be forfeited or withdrawn."

If the House prefers the hon. Member's words, I am quite prepared to give way. I wish to preserve unimpaired the absolute power of the Police Authorities to dismiss or to reduce any constable without cause shown, but to secure for any dismissed constable who has earned a pension a right of appeal, and in that case good cause for his dismissal must be shown. I look at it in this view. The right of dismissal and of getting rid of a constable must remain absolute, but where a man has already earned his pension he is to have a right of appeal against dismissal.

(8.52.) MR. HUNTER: I am glad the right hon. Gentleman has taken this view. When the Committee discussed this point I felt that the language of the clause was somewhat incautious, and that it gave a vested interest in his office to every constable, I thought that that could not be the intention of the Government, and accordingly I moved an Amendment, similar to that now proposed by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy. It seems to me that so far as the mere wording is concerned, that should be left to the responsibility of the Government. I think my hon. Friend will do well to accept the Amendment of the Home Secretary.

*(8.50.) MR. CHILDERS: I, also, was glad to hear the announcement made by the Government, who did not in the Scotch Committee hold the same language. It seems only reasonable that when a constable has not earned a pension, the right of the dismissed should not be subject to appeal, as it should be when the pension has been earned and is refused. The question becomes then one of law.

(8.54.) MR. E. ROBERTSON: I wish to know whether the Government will assent to a similar Amendment being introduced into the Scotch Police Bill, the words of which are most ambiguous. I beg to tender my warm congratulations to the Home Secretary on the manner in which he has met this serious difficulty. It will complete our satisfaction if the right hon. Gentleman will give us an assurance that corresponding modifications will be made in the Scotch Bill.

(8.57.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: The words of the right hon. Gentleman thoroughly express what we wish to secure, and I am quite willing to leave the responsibility of framing the words to the Government.

(8.58.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: I know that the clause gave considerable alarm to Local Authorities in the North, and the proposed alteration will allay that unensiness.

MR. STOREY: Will the alteration give the Local Authorities an absolute right of dismissal? And if so, will similar words be inserted in the Scotch Bill? Those are the points on which we wish to be satisfied.

MR. MATTHEWS: I will accept the words suggested by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy if he will allow me to add the words I have proposed relative to the withdrawal of pensions.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. MATTHEWS: I now propose to add the following words:—

"Or shall prevent his claim to pension from being refused on account of misconduct or negligence in the discharge of his duties, or on account of any of the grounds on which his pension, if granted, would be liable to be forfeited and withdrawn."

MR. HUNTER: Would the Lord Advocate apply this proposal to Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I think this is a matter on which I should be prepared to insert such an Amendment in the Scotch Bill.

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

(9.2.) MR. STOREY: I now beg to propose the Amendment which stands in the name of the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Atherley-Jones).

"To leave out from 'apply,' in line 20, to 'court,' in line 23, and insert:—'In the case of a borough to the council thereof, and in the case of a county to the joint police committee of the justices and the county council of the county in which the constable was last serving, and the council or the joint committee, as the case may be, may make such order as to the council or the joint committee may seem just.'"

I should myself have preferred to move the rejection of the clause, but I do not think I can go further under the circumstances than my hon. Friend proposes, and therefore, without pinning myself to its exact terms, I will move his Amendment as he has placed it on the Paper. The House knows that this is a clause giving an appeal in certain cases. It is not a case of contract. The Municipality does not agree to give the pension. It is the State which has stepped in, and having offered a sum totally inadequate to pay the pensions it proposes to compel municipality by law to make up the difference. As the ratepayers are to be the paymasters they may fairly ask that in a question between themselves and their employés the matter should be left for settlement by themselves. We have heard much about decentralisation and the necessity for allowing in the public interest the claim made for a free Local Government, but we are now brought face to face with the fact that after the Local Authorities have decided that a thing shall not be, there shall, nevertheless, be the thing. My experience is not that the Local Authorities treat their servants harshly. If any complaint can be made against the Local Authorities it is not that they are illiberal. This must obviously be the case, because those who elect the Municipal Authorities are, as a rule, small shopkeepers and workpeople who, having themselves felt at some time or other the pinch of poverty, are inclined to be generous where these allowances have to be made. But here comes the Home Secretary with a proposal that there shall be an appeal, and my hon. Friend's Amendment goes to the point as to what that Court of Appeal is to be. The Bill provides that it is to be the next Quarter Sessions having jurisdiction in the place where the constable last served. My hon. Friend's Amendment proposes to omit the words from "apply" to "Court," and to insert the words I have already read. I beg to urge on the Home Secretary, that in the case of boroughs which have no Quarter Sessions, this proposal raises one of the most burning questions that could be introduced. The want of these Courts of Quarter Sessions has caused a large amount of friction and personal antagonism as between the County and Borough Justices. The right hon. Gentleman's proposal reopens an old sore which we had hoped to have closed for ever, and my hon. Friend, in order to meet the objections to this proposal, suggests that the reference should be, not to the Court of Quarter Sessions, but in the case of a Borough to the Council, and in the case of a County to the Joint Police Committee of the Justices and the County Council. What can country gentlemen living miles away from these small Boroughs know of their needs and peculiarities? It may be said that the Watch Committee is practically the Town Council. It used to be the case that the Watch Committee was a mere Committee of the Town Council, but some years ago the Watch Committee was erected into a statutable body. That is, a body which would in the first place decide as to these pensions, and it is now proposed that there should be an appeal from the Watch Committee to the whole Council, who, certainly, have the best right to decide these matters. I think Town Councils may be trusted to settle such questions on principles of equity and fair play. Consequently, I regard the proposed appeal to the Town Council as a reasonable course that would obviate much friction. With regard to the counties, I would remind the House that in the Pilotage Bill which came before it we had an appeal given to the County Court Judge or the Stipendiary Magistrate. I should not object to such an appeal being given in Boroughs without Quarter Sessions jurisdiction, because the County Court Judge is constantly available in the Boroughs, and holds an absolutely independent position. We could, therefore, have confidence in him; and I may say the same of the Stipendiary Magistrate. At any rate, we strongly resent any measure subjecting the Town Councils to the review of Courts of Quarter Sessions, which otherwise possessed no authority in the Boroughs, and are without the respect and confidence accorded to the representative bodies.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 20, to leave out from the word "apply" to the word "just," in line 23, in order to insert the words—

"In the case of a borough to the council thereof, and in the case of a county to the joint police committee of the justices and the county council of the county in which the constable was last serving, and the council or the joint committee, as the case may be, may make such order as to the council or the joint committee may seem."—(Mr. Storey.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'to the next practicable Court of Quarter Sessions' stand part of the Bill."

(9.15.) MR. MATTHEWS: I would point out, that by the clause we have already passed a legal right to certain pensions is given to the Police under certain conditions: the House having admitted the legal right, it is proposed that the Court of Quarter Sessions, as a body conversant with Police matters, should be the Court before the consideration of the appeals, in cases where the Police Authority chooses to deny the constables the right which Parliament has conferred upon them. Now, what is the proposal of the hon. Member for Sunderland? I must confess that I have some difficulty in understanding it. Sometimes, as was the case when we were dealing with Clause 8, the hon. Member was for cutting down the discretion of the Police Authority, but now, when the question is whether the Police Authority have the right in refusing a pension, he actually proposes that the Court of Appeal should be the Police Authority itself.

MR. STOREY: No.

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Gentleman does not seem to understand the effect of his own proposal, and apparently has not read the Bill. The Watch Committee, which would have the granting or refusing of a pension, forms an important part of the Town Council itself, and that Town Council is to be the appeal against the Acts of its own Watch Committee; so that practically the hon. Gentleman gravely proposes that the very persons who have approved the dismissal of a constable without a pension shall constitute the Court of Appeal to hear the complaint of the aggrieved constable. The proposal is similar to others with which the time of the House has been wasted.

*(9.20.) SIR A. ROLLIT: I am glad to see the explicit resistance which has been offered to this Amendment by the right hon. Gentleman. No one can have a stronger sense of the political antipathies of the hon. Member for Sunderland than I have, but I would point out that this is a matter of contract only. The constable contracts with the Police Authorities for pay, plus pension, and if the question of affirming or refusing a pension is to be left to the Police Authority, it makes one of the parties to this contract the Judge in his own case. The constables are entitled to a judicial, not to an ex parte, decision. The proper authorities being the Quarter Sessions, I hope this proposal will not be pressed, as it seems to me to be destitute of all principle. I think there ought to be every guarantee of impartiality in the case of these appeals; and to entrust them to the Town Councils would be a fallacious procedure, because these bodies would be practically affirming their own decisions, inasmuch as the members of the Watch Committee form a large proportion of the Town Councils. Such bodies are certainly to be trusted to do what they believe to be right, but no one should be judge in his own cause in the result of which he has an interest.

*(9.25.) MR. CHILDERS: We are here dealing with a question of protection of the legal rights of police officers, and the only point for consideration is to whom should these persons, if they think they have been illegally treated, make their appeal? I am sorry to disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, but I regard the act of the Town Watch Committee as the act of the Council. If on that ground alone, I could not accept my hon. Friend's proposal; but I have also in my mind the decision arrived at on this matter by the Committee on the Scotch Bill, and I think it would be well to follow more nearly the analogy there established than to accept the proposition of the Home Secretary. In Scotland the Sheriff, who is a legal officer of great experience, is the person who would decide these appeals. The best analogy we can find in England is the County Court Judge, who holds in some respects a similar position to that of the Scotch Sheriff. I think it would be better to give the right of appeal, which is a valuable right to the Judge of the County Court, than to accept the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman. I would, therefore, ask the Home Secretary, who knows that I have done my best to support this Bill, whether he will not allow the appeal in England to be made to the County Court Judge.

(9.28.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I am sorry to differ in toto from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Edinburgh. I think the proposal of the Home Secretary is very much better than that of the right hon. Member for Edinburgh. I do not think it necessary that matters of this kind should be exclusively decided by a lawyer, because, while having regard to the law, we ought to have some consideration for equity and justice. It strikes me that the Court of Quarter Sessions would combine the judicial and equitable qualities, and that the nature of its experience specially qualifies it for dealing with these questions. Therefore I hold it to be the best tribunal we can have.

MR. J. C. STEVENSON (South Shields): I must say that I heartily concur with the suggestion that the County Court Judge should be constituted the Court of Appeal. The case of the pilots is, I think, analogous to the present question. By an Act passed last Session, pilots who had paid into the pilotage funds, and who were entitled to a pension, were given an appeal to the County Court Judge in England, and to the Sheriff in Scotland, against any decision of the Pilotage Authority. I agree with what is now proposed, and will support the leaving out of these words in order to leave room for the insertion of the words "County Court Judge."

(9.31.) DR. CLARK: The right hon. Gentleman, the Home Secretary, would save time if he would agree to the insertion of the words "the County Court Judge." If you only allow an appeal to Quarter Sessions you will have the Magistrates first sitting as a Police Committee, and then sitting to hear the appeals of the police against the decisions of the Committee. I know the Police Committees are not composed wholly of magistrates, but partly so. Still, I think the police have a right to have their cases heard by an altogether unbiased authority. We are passing an Act to give certain rights and privileges, and when those rights and privileges are denied to a man, either by a Watch Committee in a borough, or by a Joint Committee in a county, he ought to have an appeal to a judge whose decision ought to be final. I am sorry that you have not in this country a judge equivalent to our Sheriff, but the nearest approach to it is the County Court Judge, and I think that the appeal ought to be to him. I think the right hon. Gentleman, the Home Secretary, should accept the Amendment, seeing that he himself has admitted that there is a good deal to be said for it.

(9.35.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I am in favour of the appeal in Scotland lying with the Sheriff, as I think that is an admirable form of appeal; but I am afraid that the reasons that constitute that a specially appropriate Court of Appeal do not apply to the County Court Judge. In Scotland the Sheriff is a trained lawyer, and in the general case a good lawyer; but, at the same time, it is not merely on account of his being a trained Judge in an Appeal Court that he is an appropriate arbitrator on questions arising under this clause. The Sheriff in Scotland is not only a lawyer who holds Courts of Appeal, but he also is an administrative officer in the county, and is brought into daily contact and special relations with the police. The Sheriff in the county in Scotland is responsible for the peace of the county. He has the use of the police for the suppression of disorder and the preservation of the police. He is a member of every Police Committee in the county, and there are various other points of contact between him and the police. As an administrative officer he brings, in corroboration of his qualifications, the judiciary powers of deciding, which he has gained by experience. I would warn the House against accepting the County Court Judge in England as an analogy for the Sheriff in Scotland.

(9.38.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I thought the Home Secretary was going to agree to the Amendment, from his speech; but he has not done so. The Court of Quarter Sessions would be an admirable Court of Appeal in Ireland, as the County Court Judge there is the Chairman of that body. But it has been explained to me that the Court of Quarter Sessions in England consists of nobody but the Magistrates, and it seems to me that that would be a most dreadful tribunal to hear these appeals. There are very few police in English counties—England in this respect being exactly the reverse of Ireland—and there are a great many police in the towns; and if the Magistrates were to have the control of the police, it would be a most serious blow to the Municipalities. It seems to me that, if the proposal of the Government is adopted, the police will not know who are to be their masters—whether the Municipality or the Magistrates; but if you adopt the advice of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh, and leave the whole question of pensions, when there is a dispute, to a judicial mind like that of a County Court Judge, you will give the police fixity of tenure and judicial security for payment of what is due to them. I would point out that, in a letter to the Times, a Lord Lieutenant of a county not long ago insinuated that those Magistrates who speak against the Government in the House of Commons ought to resign. Well, it would appear from that that Lord Lieutenants might insist on Magistrates resigning in certain cases if they did not give pensions to the police.

*(9.42) CAPTAIN VERNEY: I must condemn the tone of the speech of the Home Secretary, who apparently has no practical knowledge of this subject, or how Quarter Sessions in country districts are conducted. If the appeal is to the County Court Judge, the policeman will say he has a legal claim, and the County Court Judge will simply decide the point of law brought before him. There can be no doubt there will be considerable jealousy on the part of the Borough Councils if the County Magistrates are allowed to override them in regard to police pensions. That argument which was used by an hon. Member below the gangway is a powerful one, and is a valuable contribution to the Debate. The argument of the hon. Member for Caithness, that the Joint Committees are partly composed of County Magistrates, was also a strong one against the proposal of the Government. As Chairman of the Quarter Sessions in Anglesea, and also member of the Joint Committee, I should have to decide in the one capacity upon my action in the other. In the rural districts the Chairman of Quarter Sessions, as a rule, sits with, perhaps, not more than one other Magistrate. I think the appeal should lie with the County Court Judge, as he is the one man in the county who is accustomed to decide claims for pay. Surely he would be fitted to decide the questions of law arising under these clauses.

(9.47.) MR. MACLURE (Lancashire, S.E., Stretford): I shall most emphatically support the Court of Quarter Sessions. If the appeal is to the Court of Quarter Sessions the County Committee can be excluded, and then there will be a Court in which the constables will have confidence.

(9.49.) MR. LEAKE (Lancashire, S.E., Radcliffe): I think that, so far as the Boroughs are concerned, the Government will be wise in leaving the arbitrament to the County Court Judge.

(9.50.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Under the clause as it stands, no matter within the discretion of the Police Authority will have to be determined by the Court of Appeal. The only question will be one of law, and it appears to me that the proper tribunal, therefore, will be the County Court Judge, and not the Quarter Sessions Court. The case for decision will really be in the nature of a civil action.

(9.51.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): The appeal is to be to the County Justices.

MR. MATTHEWS: No; to the Recorder of the Borough.

MR. STOREY: There are no Recorders.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I think the Home Secretary does not know his Bill. There is no Recorder mentioned in the Bill. So that really there will be an appeal from the Borough to the County Magistrates. Undoubtedly there is strong jealousy on the part of the Boroughs against the County Magistrates, and I think the right hon. Gentleman ought to insert some words giving an appeal from the Borough Police to the Recorder of the Borough or the County Court Judge.

*(9.52.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): The hon. Gentleman has not observed that the Court of Quarter Sessions, having jurisdiction in the Borough, is already in the Bill, and that Recorders preside in all large Boroughs over the Courts of Quarter Sessions. The right hon. Gentleman opposite committed himself to the opinion that they were really civil matters and questions of law. They are not civil matters, but criminal matters, and matters of fact. These are very proper to be decided in the Court of Quarter Sessions, and are utterly remote from those tried by the County Court Judges.

(9.53.) The House divided:—Ayes 107; Noes 60.—(Div. List, No. 227.)

(10.3.) DR. CLARK: Perhaps the Home Secretary might agree to make the matter optional. I beg to move an Amendment to that effect. In the case of a County, one-half the Police Committee consists of Magistrates, and therefore in appealing to the Justices, the constable would have, we will say, to appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober. I think he ought to have the right to appeal to someone who has not given a decision already.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 20, after the word "sessions," to insert the words "or to the County Court Judge."—(Dr. Clark.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(10.6.) MR. MATTHEWS: I take it for granted that Magistrates who are on the Joint Committee will be absolutely disqualified from sitting in the Court of Quarter Sessions on the hearing of an appeal against their decision. This is the rule in all appeals from Petty Sessions to Quarter Sessions. No Justice whose decision is appealed against does sit in Quarter Sessions on the hearing of the appeal, and if one did so, the decision of the Quarter Sessions would be invalid. The questions which will arise on appeal are all criminal questions or questions of fact. County Court Judges know no more, and, indeed, not as much, about what a police constable ought to do as members of the Quarter Sessions Court. The hon. and gallant Member opposite (Captain Verney) says his knowledge of Quarter Sessions dates back 30 years. I may say I practised in Quarter Sessions when the hon. and gallant Gentleman was still rolling on the briny ocean. Quarter Sessions deal with Licensing Appeals, and with appeals on other matters, and they are quite competent to act in this way.

(10.10.) Question put, and negatived.

MR. MATTHEWS: The next Amendment was suggested by my learned Friend the Member for the Leek Division of Staffordshire (Mr. H. T. Davenport). It is meant to meet the case of a Borough like Lichfield, which has a Court of Quarter Sessions, a Recorder, and a Police Force of its own. We want to provide that a constable of a County shall appeal to the Quarter Sessions of the County, and a constable of a Borough having a Quarter Sessions, to such Quarter Sessions.

Amendment proposed in Clause 11, page 8, line 20, leave out from "having," to "serving," in line 21, inclusive, and insert—

"For the county within which the constable last served; or if the constable last served in the police force of a borough having a separate police force and a separate court of quarter sessions, then to the next practicable court of quarter sessions for that borough."—(Mr. Matthews.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. STOREY: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will tell us what he proposes in the case of a large number of Boroughs that have a Borough Bench but no Court of Quarter Sessions.

*MR. MATTHEWS: They must go to the County.

MR. STOREY: I will not trespass on the House now because I have given notice that immediately these words are struck out I shall move a consequential Amendment to cover the case of Boroughs with a Bench of Magistrates.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

(10.15.) MR. STOREY: The clause as it now stands provides that in a County the appeal shall be to a Court of Quarter Sessions, and that in a Borough, with a separate Police Force and a separate Court of Quarter Sessions, the appeal shall be to the Quarter Sessions of that Borough. I do not contest the fairness of that provision, but I put to the Government the case, not of one, but of many towns, large and small. A very considerable number of Boroughs have Borough Benches of their own, and Police Forces of their own, and they do not want to have to appeal to the Court of Quarter Sessions. The right hon. gentleman must be aware that there is a long standing feud between the Magistrates of the Boroughs and the Magistrates of the Counties. [Cries of "No, no."] The hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Howard Vincent) says "No," but he cannot know much about it. ["Why not?"] Because he has never had much practical acquaintance with Boroughs. [Mr. Howard Vincent: "I am a Borough Member."] I know he has been a Borough Member for a limited number of years, but what does he know about the management of Boroughs? When I said a feud, I did not mean a personal feud. The County Magistrates used to claim jurisdiction in the Borough, and they used to sit with the Borough Magistrates and attempt to adjudicate with them. In the end, the Borough Magistrates appealed to the Superior Courts in order to be delivered from that state of things, and a working arrangement was made under which the Borough Magistrates sat for five days in the week, and the County Magistrates came in on the Saturday and took County cases. In the Boroughs we are strongly of opinion that, as we manage our own affairs municipally, we ought to do so judicially. What does the right hon. Gentleman propose in the Bill which he says he understands, and which he says I do not? He proposes that if in such large towns as South Shields, Stockton, Sunderland, and Gateshead, we have a dispute with a policeman as to his pension, we shall pass over the Borough Bench and go to the County Magistrates at Durham. The Municipalities object to such an arrangement, and therefore I beg to propose to add to the clause the words, "or if in a Borough with a Borough Bench but not a Court of Quarter Sessions for the Borough, then to the Borough Bench."

Amendment proposed, at the end of the last Amendment, to insert the words—

"Or if in a borough with a borough bench but not a court of quarter sessions for the borough, then to the borough bench."—(Mr. Storey.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(10.23.) MR. MATTHEWS: I am sorry that I cannot agree to any of the hon. Member's Amendments. I do not think that the hon. Member has thought out what he has proposed. This is a question of appeal, not a matter of legal right; and such appeal must go to a Court. A Borough Bench is not a Court; they have no jurisdiction, either by common law or statute; they have no place of meeting for the transaction of business. They have no corporate or collective existence at all; they are a mere congeries of atoms. Therefore, the proposal of the hon. Member is one which is simply impossible in law and impracticable in fact.

(10.25.) SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton): I really do not feel much impressed by the legal argument of the right hon. Gentleman. It is quite true that a Bench of Borough Magistrates may not have the jurisdiction of a Court of Quarter Sessions, but we are now debating a new statutory jurisdiction, and I cannot see why, when we are creating a new statutory jurisdiction de novo, we should not give it to the Bench of Borough Magistrates meeting in their usual place. This is not old business which has hitherto been transacted by the Court of Quarter Sessions; it is new business altogether; it is more in the nature of arbitration than anything else: it is the appeal of a policeman against the depreciation of his pension. It is quite true that words may be requisite to explain and guard the Amendment, but as to the legal impossibility, I must say that I am not impressed by the arguments of the Home Secretary.

(10.27.) MR. ADDISON (Ashton-under-Lyne): I really am quite astonished at the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman, the Member for Stockton (Sir H. Davey). All who are acquainted with Quarter Sessions know that they are a Court of Record, cognizant of such matters as those into which we are now inquiring, whereas the Borough Magistrates are not a Court at all in the legal sense of the word. The hon. Member for Sunderland speaks of a contest between Borough and Country Magistrates. I am well acquainted with Lancashire, and to say that there is any contest between the Borough Magistrates and the County Magistrates in that County, where there are many Borough Magistrates, is a mere fiction.

*(10.29.) MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I am amazed to hear the hon. and learned Gentleman say that there is no jealousy between the Borough and the County Magistrates in Lancashire. At every Quarter Sessions complaints are heard on the part of the Borough Magistrates of Manchester and Liverpool of their decisions being overridden by the County Magistrates. I trust the Secretary of State will inform himself on this point. I can assure him that if he does not listen with favour and consideration to the appeal on behalf of the Borough Magistrates, he will give a great deal of pain to a great many worthy supporters of the party of which he is a distinguished ornament. We have heard from the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Addison) that Borough Magistrates are not a Court. Well, my hon. Friend, the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey), who has been accused of ignorance, is well aware of that; it is a fact we have known for a long time; a fact which we dislike and which troubles us. We consider that Borough Magistrates, being such as we know them to be, are quite as capable of forming an opinion as Magistrates appointed by Lords Lieutenant of Counties. I trust yet that the Home Secretary will see fit to add these words which, by the hon. and learned Member for Stockton (Sir Horace Davey), have been declared to be necessary. I do not pretend to give a legal opinion, but it does not seem to me to be necessary that Borough Magistrates should be constituted a Court with full legal powers in order to act as a Court of Arbitration between policemen and those who govern them. However much we may be impressed by what the Home Secretary tells us; however much he tells us of the difficulty of making Borough Magistrates into a Court, it does not seem to me to be necessary, and I trust hon. Members opposite who represent borough constituencies, and there are a good many of them, I am sorry to say, will support our proposal.

*(10.31.) SIR A. ROLLIT: Hitherto I have supported the Government as to the appeal tribunal, but I hope some concession will be made to the strong feeling that undoubtedly exists in Boroughs. I wish to avoid exaggerating that feeling, but undoubtedly there does exist some jealousy between Boroughs and Counties in respect to the distinctions in jurisdiction between the Magistrates in either, for example, with reference to hearing licensing appeals; a feeling, I think, it would be well to get rid of. I confess there is a difficulty as to the Amendment, which is crudely worded, but it is of a technical and legal character. The Borough Magistrates exercise jurisdiction under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts, and a slight addition to their power would enable them to act in cases such as is here proposed. From the point of view of the policeman, it should be observed that he is dependant on the pension for his subsistence, and it is important to him to have a speedily and easily accessible tribunal to which he can go without expense. The Borough Magistrates present such a tribunal in Boroughs, and I cannot doubt that they would deal out substantial justice. I was much impressed by what was said by the hon. Member for the City of Edinburgh, but even then I supported the Government, believing that on the whole they had proposed the best tribunal; but I do hope that the Government will see their way to making this concession.

*(10.33.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): Speaking as a Magistrate of Liverpool, I hope the Government will make this concession. In Liverpool, as we know, there is an appeal to the Recorder, but there are two adjacent Boroughs where there is no Recorder, and where the appeal will be to Quarter Sessions: I mean Bootle, and, on the other side of the Mersey, Birkenhead. In these two Boroughs, practically running into Liverpool, the distinction will create some feeling it is desirable to avoid. Without going so far as to say there is ill-feeling between County and Borough Magistrates in Lancashire, I may say the distinction is felt; and whatever feeling there is should be removed, and at least should not be added to by increasing the points of distinction in jurisdiction. The distinctions are very prominently brought out when of members of the same family some are Magistrates in Boroughs and others in Counties.

(10.35.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): I think my hon. Friend who spoke from this side, and others, do not really see what the question is. If there is to be an appeal at all, it must be to a court or definite body with power to deal with the matter in question. It is perfectly intelligible that an appeal should be to the Court of Quarter Sessions, but in a borough which has no Court of Quarter Sessions the Borough Justices do not form any court at all, and have no means of forming a court. There is no court to which an appeal could be taken, and it would take an Act of Parliament to form Borough Magistrates into a specific court in order to deal with this matter. In such cases I submit it is only reasonable that the appeal should be to the Quarter Sessions of the County.

(10.37.) MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): But under an Act of Parliament Borough Magistrates have been constituted a court for the purpose of dealing with wrecks in certain cases. Surely there would be little difficulty in constituting a certain number of Magistrates into a Court to deal with these pension cases?

(10.38.) DR. CLARK: Under the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act they are constituted a court with assessors under the Board of Trade.

SIR E. CLARKE: Under special Act.

DR. CLARK: Yes; but the view presented to us is that they are a heterogeneous body, having no jurisdiction as a court. Why, they try and send persons to prison; they have various functions; they have clerk and officers; they have, as a matter of fact, been constituted a court under the Board of Trade. Your description is a caricature of their position. The House of Commons is, in theory, the secondary chamber to the Lords, but time has increased the power of the one and diminished the power of the other; and so, also, with these two classes of Magistrates. It is merely a technical, not a real difficulty that is raised. Borough Magistrates are, in fact, a fully competent court to deal with such cases as an Act of Parliament may entrust them with.

(10.41.) The House divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 116.—(Div. List, No. 228.)

*(10.50.) MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I rise to move the omission of Clause 13. It is a matter of great importance to pensioners, and it will be observed that my hon. Friend the Member for South Islington has notice of an Amendment to a like effect. It is a subject I raised in the Standing Committee, but it is of such importance that I venture to invite thereon the judgment of the House. Clause 13 provides that a constable's pension may be suspended if he takes employment in another police force, and that if a constable takes employment paid for by Government, or out of a county or borough rate, he shall not receive more pension than shall, together with the pay of his employment, amount to one-and-a-half times his police full pay. Clause 8 has dealt with offences for which a pensioner shall forfeit his pension, and this clause prevents him from following certain occupations. This, I think, is most unfair and undesirable. If a man has served 25 years in the Force he has fairly earned his pension, and if any County Council or Town Council or any Local Authority chooses to employ him in any light occupation, so much the better for him; but I see no ground on that account why he should forfeit his pension. We give by this Bill, as the Home Secretary has said, a policeman an absolute legal right to a pension; but I may point out that the second part of the section—there is not perhaps so strong an objection to the first part—the second part would absolutely prevent a pensioner from even taking charge of an empty house belonging to the County Council, because for that duty he would be paid out of a borough or county rate or fund. I hope I may have such support as may induce the Government to consent to the omission of the clause. It is of vital importance to pensioners. It puts a restraint upon industry, and a premium upon idleness. I may appeal to the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, who takes such an active interest in this Bill. He, I am quite sure, would not wish that a disqualification of the kind should attach to acceptance of a pension. I take his own case. He is in receipt of a pension for services rendered—

Sir E. Clarke

SIR G. CAMPBELL: No.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: No—well, then, it is an annuity. I think the hon. Gentleman called it an annuity in the Grand Committee. But he, I am sure, would admit the injustice of attaching to the receipt of this superannuation allowance a disqualification against the employment of his abilities in other directions.

Amendment proposed, in pages 8 and 9, to leave out Clause 13.—(Mr. Howard Vincent.)

Question proposed, "That Clause 13 stand part of the Bill."

(10.53.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: As the hon. Member has appealed to me, I say at once that not only can, I not support him, but I can hardly think he is serious in his proposal. He proposes that a man having served in a Police Force and being discharged with a pension, shall be allowed to go to the next town or county and there take service in another Local Force and continue to draw both pay and pension. That seems to me a preposterous proposal, and I do not think that the hon. Member can seriously mean to make it. The hon. Member cites, by way of illustration, the taking care of an empty house for a County Council, but this is not a case in point, because it will be noticed that the proviso is that pay and pension combined shall not be more than one and a-half times his full police pay. This prohibition against employment in other branches of the Civil Service while drawing a Civil pension is a principle generally applied. If I may make a personal reference, I may tell the hon. Member that I do not draw a pension, and that I served so long that I consider that I entirely paid for my annuity, and that I receive no contribution from the Government at all. That being so, I consider myself free to accept any employment that may be offered.

*(10.54.) SIR A. ROLLIT: The proposal appears to me to be not only a serious one, but one to be seriously supported. There is probably no stronger feeling among the police in reference to this Bill than that in favour of the omission of the clause before the House. The Bill proposes that the men shall have an absolute right to the pension on certain conditions, and the contract with them is for, say, plus, a pension at the end of a certain period of approved service. If the men fulfil those conditions, I cannot see why any limitation should be put upon their future employment. The case of the Army is analagous. In the Army the soldiers have pensions, and when they are discharged every one most earnestly and properly desires that they should find good employment. Both the present and the late Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police draw pensions from the Army, and do or did most meritorious service in the police at the same time. To proscribe a policeman able to work, and offered the opportunity for employment is justified by no reason whatever. His fitness to engage in his new employment is entirely a question for those who engage him; and having performed his part of the contract of service in the force he is entitled to the pension and the right to the profitable employment of his remaining time. In the interest of the force, and in the interest of the public, because it will be an additional encouragement to efficient service, I hope my hon. Friend will press the Amendment, with the result that it will ultimately be accepted.

(10.56.) COLONEL NOLAN: I supported the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sheffield in Committee, and I think it is founded on common sense. I do not think a man should get a pension so long as he is fit for his work; and I think two or three millions would be saved in Army, Navy, and Civil Service pensions if this principle were acted upon. If a man is fit for the work on which he is engaged, why drive or coax him out of the service with a pension? This was the point I maintained in the discussion on the Army Pension Bill, and I spoke for an hour upon it; but when once you have got rid of a man with a pension, let him be free to employ his time and industry as best he can. I therefore support the Amendment.

(10.57.) MR. MATTHEWS: The logic of the hon. and gallant Gentleman is difficult to follow. He is prepared to grant a pension to a man when he is disabled for further work, but this clause deals with the case of a man who shows that he is not disabled, having undertaken similar work. He leaves the police because he is no longer able to do the work.

COLONEL NOLAN: No, that is not the Bill.

MR. MATTHEWS: He either is discharged upon a medical certificate, or he is discharged at the end of 25 years' service. The hypothesis upon which a policeman receives a pension is either that he is medically unfit, or that, having served 25 years, his nerves are shattered and his strength gone through prolonged conflict with the criminal classes. The theory is that the man's exertions in the Public Service have worn him out. It is upon that theory, and that theory alone, that he is pensioned. But if the man takes service in another Force it proves that theory to be wrong, and, therefore, it is right the pension should be forfeited. The case of deferred pay is altogether different; there it is a matter of contract, and there is an end of it. But that is not the principle here, which is compensation to a man for exhaustion of mental or bodily faculties worn out in the Public Service.

*(11.0.) CAPTAIN VERNEY: One argument has not been advanced, and that is the great advantage of the public in being able to employ policemen. I shall support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sheffield on that ground. I think it would be a great misfortune and drawback not to be allowed to employ policemen, simply because they are in receipt of pensions, and, therefore, I shall indulge in the extremely novel sensation of supporting an Amendment proposed by the hon. Gentleman opposite.

(11.1.) MR. BURDETT COUTIS (Westminster): I also shall support the Amendment. I do not see why, after a man has earned his pension by serving the required period, any restraint should be placed on his making the best of the energies he may retain. I think the police feel very strongly on the point, and I certainly intend to support the Amendment.

(11.3.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I think we are going too far in this Bill. We are giving the police the enormous advantage of obtaining a pension at the age of 46 years. It certainly cannot be in the interest of the ratepayers to allow a man of 46 years to receive a pension, and then go on in the Service with full pay as well. No other of policemen. We are making most class of public servant—neither soldier nor sailor—is allowed such a privilege, and I do not think we ought to hold out such bribes, in order to catch the votes liberal arrangements in the interest of the police, but I do not think we shall be justified in going to this extreme.

(11.5.) MR. ISAACSON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I shall support the Amendment. Representing, as I do, an East End constituency I feel that I cannot do otherwise. I hold that, after a policeman has earned his pension by, say, a service of 25 years, he has a right to be perfectly free to do what he likes.

(11.7.) DR. CLARK: Policemen are compelled to pay a portion of their wages to the Pension Fund, and if they are so unfortunate as to fall sick, the sick leave is deducted for the period of service. As a matter of fact, the granting of these pensions will prevent agitation for higher wages, and the men will not get that increase of pay which they would have obtained if the pensions were not to be granted. A man of 46 years, even after 25 years' service, may be able to get light employment in various capacities, and I think it would be acting most unfairly towards him to prevent him doing so. I think he has an absolute right to his pension. He has paid for it, and if you prevent him working, simply because he receives a pension, I think you will deprive him of a great privilege. I know that in Scotland a number of ex-policemen find light employment. Whatever may be the case in London, we know that in the provinces very few policemen are worn out at the age of 46 years, and that most of them are quite fit for another 10 years' service. They are not likely to retire on a pension if they are able to continue in the Force at full pay.

(11.10.) MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): Two points have been lost sight of by the hon. Members who have supported this Amendment. In the first place it is clear that a police officer who gets a pension is not prevented from taking any other work, but he may undertake employment, the remuneration for which does not exceed one and a half times the amount of his former salary. If he should be able to get a salary in excess of that, the argument comes in that he is a man who ought not to be pensioned at all. It is said that this pension is an absolute right; but, on the other hand, I venture to suggest that this Bill was promoted not in the interests of policemen alone, but in the public interest. If a man is absolutely disabled by illness from work after a certain age, it is presumed he is incapacitated from taking other employment, and certainly nothing should be done to induce him to hold office after the time fixed by law as that at which he ought to retire. As a matter of fact, men are sometimes retained in office after they are unfit to serve. But who suffers from that? The public, of course; and our object ought to be to get rid of a man immediately he is past work. If you do not give him an opportunity of taking public employment in this way you will have the Service retaining men beyond the period at which they are fit to work. This is really a question for the rate-payers.

(11.12.) MR. HUNTER: I hope the Government will remain firm. This is a clause similar to one contained in the Scotch Bill, and upon that clause the Scotch Committee was perfectly unanimous. It was felt that men in receipt of a pension at an early age ought not to be allowed to go into the labour market and compete with those who have not the advantage of receiving a pension.

*(11.13.) MR. KELLY: I wish to ask a question as to what is the present practice. Is a man deprived of a part of his pension if he chooses to work after he has earned it? Surely it is not so. Let the House just consider what it would be to deprive policemen of the power of earning further money. Could a policeman live on a pension of £39 a year. I venture to say he could do nothing of the kind. The hon. and learned Member for Aberdeen talked about policemen who had been pensioned going into the labour market, and so, with their pensions, being able, upon unfair terms, to compete with other labour. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, on the other hand, talked about policemen being utterly worn out before they obtained their pensions. I think both these views are more or less erroneous. Now, I can understand it being contended that the pensions have nothing of the character of deferred pay (though that seems to be a total mistake, as they are to have 2½ per cent. taken from their pay), that no pensions at all ought to be given, or that this should in no case be done until a man is unfit for service, but if you are going to give pensions, then I hold that they should be given unconditionally, and that they should not be used as a means of depriving the public of the service of the best and most trustworthy men that can be obtained for that large number of posts for which pensioned policemen would have especial qualifications.

(11.15.) MR. STOREY: I almost felt inclined to vote for this Amendment a little while ago, and I am not sure that I shall not do so now. I submit that if a pension is a matter of right, its enjoyment ought not to be restricted by any conditions such as these. There are many posts which pensioned policemen could well fill to the public advantage. I hold that the position of the Home Secretary is utterly illogical, and I shall satisfy my ancient grudge against him by voting for the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield.

(11.26.) MR. STOREY: I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name—

*(11.26.) MR. LAFONE (Southwark, Bermondsey): I wish to ask, as a point of order, Mr. Speaker, whether it is respectful to the House that an hon. Member should put down so many Amendments on the Paper and not take the trouble to be in his place, leaving the Member for Sunderland to take them up, and entail a debate for upwards of an hour with the result that we are now only in the position we occupied when the Debate commenced.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is in order.

MR. STOREY: This clause contains provisions as to service in more than one capacity. The first sub-section of the clause provides that when a person has served as a Civil Servant within the meaning of the Superannuation Act, 1887, and afterwards joins the police, he shall be entitled to reckon his entire period of service in both capacities for the purposes of a pension. I want to know from the Government why they have introduced this provision? We have just decided that if a policeman be pensioned, and then goes into the Civil Service, he must suffer some deprivation of pension should his salary exceed a given amount. Why should Civil Servants entering the police be entitled to reckon their service prior to joining the Force, for the purpose of pension? I should have thought it was quite sufficient to reckon the service in the Police Force without taking into account what a man has been before becoming a policeman. If we are going to give a man a pension for becoming a policeman we ought not to take into account his services in some other capacity. I submit that there is no earthly reason why the provision should be retained in the Bill, and I, therefore, beg to move that Sub-section 1 of Clause 14 be omitted, and that the time for which a policeman may claim a pension shall be only that period which he has served as a police officer in some Force in the United Kingdom.

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 10, to leave out Sub-section (i.) of Clause 14.—(Mr. Storey.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section (i.) of Clause 14 stand part of the Bill."

(11.30.) MR. MATTHEWS: The inconvenience of these discussions is illustrated on this point by a reference to what took place in Committee. There the matter was discussed and a compromise arrived at. The hon. Member did not honour us with his assistance in Committee, and now he raises an abstract objection. We have arrived at an equation between the years of Civil Service and Public Service. There are cases in which members of the Civil Service have done good service in the police, and have taken the new service only on the condition that their former years of service should not be wiped out. If you do not establish a ratio of service in the two Services you establish the strongest motive why a man should not accept service in the Police Force. The case has more frequently arisen in the Metropolis, where Commissioners and Assistant Commissioners, after being admirable Civil Servants, have become admirable police officers. In both capacities they have rendered great service, and it would be most undesirable to discourage distinguished Civil Servants who have acquired valuable experience from taking service in the police; and they would be discouraged if they were not allowed to reckon their service as Civil Servants in the computation for pensions. Taking the difference in the age of retirement from the Civil Service and the present proposal in this Bill, which, though not defining an age, practically means retirement at from 46 to 50, we have arrived at the ratio as between service in either, and consider that four years in the Civil Service equals three years in the police. But all this was fully discussed in Committee, and I regret that it should be raised again.

*(11.33.) MR. PICKERSGILL: The right hon. Gentleman has repeatedly complained of raising in the House questions that have been discussed in Committee, but I do not think he has any right to make any such complaint. As I am giving him general support in furthering the progress of the Bill, I I hope I may not be suspected of any ulterior motive when I remind the right hon. Gentleman that he was fairly warned from these Benches, and also from the Front Opposition Bench, that very little time would be saved by taking the course of referring the Bill to a Grand Committee. From the character of the Bill we anticipated that discussions would be re-opened in the House as they have been from either side. After the warning the Government had, I hope we may not again have these complaints.

(11.37.) The House divided:—Ayes 158, Noes 30.—(Div. List, No. 230.)

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 12, to leave out the words "in England or Wales."—(Mr. Secretary Matthews.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'in England or Wales' stand part of the Bill."

(11.45.) MR. STOREY: I admit this is a formal Amendment, but I must say if a number of us had seen the Amendment in time, which the right hon. Gentleman suddenly proposed to Clause 4, which was not discussed in Committee, but accepted in Committee, we should have taken the opportunity to resist it at that time. As this is a consequential Amendment, and raises the same point, I may tell the right hon. Gentleman my point of objection. In Clause 4, as it originally stood, years of approved service by a constable in one Police Force in Great Britain should be reckoned as service on his joining another Force. It applied to Great Britain, and we did not make any objection, because the Police Force in Scotland is very much the same as in England. The Home Secretary has however, suddenly foisted on the ratepayers of Great Britain the Royal Irish Constabulary, the armed force which keeps the Irish people in order. I object that a force which is in no sense a police force, but which is simply a military force, kept for the purpose of dragooning the Irish people, should be placed on the same level as the purely civil forces of England and Scotland. I doubt not there are many decent men in the ranks of the Royal Irish Constabulary, but take them as a whole, they are more akin to a military than a civil force. Now, the hon. Member for Sheffield is presently going to move an Amendment that service in the Army and Navy shall be reckoned in computing pensions for policemen. Has he got the Government assent to that proposal? I understand that the Government are going to resist that Amendment to provide that service in the Army or the Navy should be reckoned. If this is the case, then with what consistency can they support the reckoning of the services of the Royal Irish Constabulary, which is much more like an army than a police force? We deeply regret that this fruitful source of discussion was not discovered on Clause 4; but, inasmuch as the same question now arises, it will be our duty to resist this Amendment. Holding our peculiar views—and intelligible views—of the constitution of the Royal Irish Constabulary the right hon. Gentlemen can hardly expect us to assent to all such members of that force who come over here being allowed to compete with our own people here for enhanced pensions. I shall take a Division against the Amendment.

*(11.48.) MR. BRUNNER: This proposal is exceedingly unfair to the English police. A great many of us are looking forward to the time when there will be a very large exodus of the Constabulary from Ireland where their numbers are far beyond the requirements of a peaceful country—

MR. SPEAKER: I do not think this discussion is in order. The point has been already settled. This is a consequential Amendment upon the decision the House has arrived at, and it is impossible for the hon. Member to raise the discussion again, as if it were a new question.

MR. STOREY: On the point of order, Sir, will you permit me to point out that the question settled upon Clause 4 was that years of approved service in any Police Force in Great Britain should be reckoned as approved service for a pension, but this practically raises the question of including Ireland.

MR. SPEAKER: Clauses 4 and 14 raise practically the same question, and, indeed, I may remind the hon. Member that he began his speech by remarking that this was a formal and consequential Amendment. I thought the hon. Member was going to make a few remarks, and not to raise the whole question again. He would be clearly out of order in doing that.

(11.50.) The House divided:—Ayes 57; Noes 128.—(Div. List, No. 231.)

It being after Midnight, Further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, stood adjourned.

Further Consideration, as amended, to be resumed to-morrow.

LOCAL REGISTRATION OF TITLE (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 334.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

REGISTRATION OF ASSURANCES (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 333.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

SUPPLY [16TH JULY] REPORT.

Order read, for resuming the Consideration of Postponed Resolution.

"That a sum, not exceeding £80,687, be granted to Her Majesty to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1891, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of the Irish Land Commission."

Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

(12.6.) MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I think it necessary to avail myself of this opportunity of bringing under the notice of the House a matter in connection with the administration of the Purchase Department of the Land Commission in Ireland. It must be evident that the Purchase Department will rapidly become, if it has not already become, by far the more important part of the Commission. It is equally plain that it is a matter of the gravest possible importance, not only to the people of Ireland, but also to the taxpayers in this country, that the Irish Land Commission should be administered in a way that is above suspicion. In my judgment, the Land Purchase Department of the Commission is administered in a most unsatisfactory way. The law has been expounded in a contradictory sense by the two gentlemen who are at the head of the Department, and, as laid down by one of them, it leaves the gate wide open for the most monstrous frauds on the Exchequer of this country. The law as it is now administered leaves it open to the Irish Landlords who desire to sell their estates to compel tenants to pay grossly unjust prices for their holdings, and to undertake obligations they are utterly unable to discharge. I shall bring under the notice of the Government certain statements which have been furnished to me by local men, regarding the estate of the Marquess of Waterford; and, I guard myself by saying, I am not prepared to vouch for their accuracy. They are charges of the most serious character, and I say it is the business and duty of the Irish Executive to see that they are properly investigated. In most, if not in all, of the cases in which agreements to purchase have been signed by tenants on the Marquess of Waterford's estate, the tenants were in arrear with their rent. I hold that, no matter what the merits of a case may be, wherever there is the slightest suspicion of duress, the tenant should always be able, up to the last moment, to get out of his transaction. On December 23rd, 1888, Mr. Lynch heard some cases from this estate, and refused to allow the tenants to withdraw from their agreement. The purchases were, therefore, compulsorily concluded, and a number of the tenants have since made default in their payments, being quite unable to find the money. I hold in my hand a letter from a well-known and respected priest, in County Waterford, who says nearly all Lord Waterford's tenants, who purchased, were forced to buy at about 20 years' purchase, and some of them had not been able to pay a single instalment of their payments. He says that the holding of the defaulters has been put up for sale by the Land Commission, and has been bought in at a nominal figure "it is said for Lord Waterford himself." If that is true there was never a more monstrous fraud. The case can be summed up thus. A landlord coerces a tenant, through fear of eviction, to buy at an extravagant price. The tenant being unable to pay the instalment, the holding is put up for sale by the Land Commissioners. The sale is boycotted, or, in other words, the neighbouring tenants will not bid. The landlord then comes forward and buys in the holding at a nominal figure, and the State has to bear the loss. Say that the State has advanced £100 in respect of the holding. Of this sum the Commission hold £20 as the guarantee deposit, the landlord getting £80. When the farm is sold it is bought in by the landlord, say for £50. The costs amount to about £10, so that the Land Commission get out of the whole transaction £60. The landlord, on the other hand, gets back the farm free of tenant right, and pockets £30 or £40 by the transaction. I think the Chief Secretary is bound to get up in this House and explain what flaw there is in my statement. The gate is wide open to these monstrous frauds. The information I have received shows that this very course of action I have indicated has been practised in more than one case on the Marquess of Waterford's estate, and, if the facts have not been correctly reported to me, the Chief Secretary is bound to explain whether it is a fact or not that it is possible to do such things in the Land Purchase Department, as the law stands; and if it is possible a more gross and shameful fraud on the Exchequer of this country was never perpetrated in the history of England. I wish now to draw attention to a most extraordinary case, which throws a lurid light on the proceedings of one of the members of the Land Commission, and constitutes a strong case for an inquiry into the administration and connections of Mr. Lynch. A certain estate in County Cork, belonging to Mr. Herbert O'Sullivan—formerly a butter merchant in Cork—was originally very much rackrented, the rental being £1,141. The Sub-Commissioners about two years ago reduced the rent—taking the whole estate—over 50 per cent. In spite of these immense reductions difficulties arose, and the tenants did not regularly pay their rents, and though it was sworn to in Court, and no attempt was made to deny it on the part of the landlord, that no combination had existed on the estate—that the Plan of Campaign had never existed on it, and that we agitators, on whose shoulders so much blame has been cast, had never operated there—so horrible had been the rack-renting that the tenants were unable to pay these reduced rents. Herbert O'Sullivan became a bankrupt, and the estate came into the hands of a Receiver, and it came out, in the course of negotiations for the sale of the estate, that the owner had refused £28,000 for it. After long negotiation the tenants signed an agreement to purchase the estate for £8,885, but the Land Purchase Department would only allow them to give £7,145. That conveys a most awful picture of the torture to which tenants have been subjected in the past. This case came before Judge Munro, of the Landed Estates Court, whom the Chief Secretary proposes as the head of the future Land Commission, and that learned Judge, after giving the history of the estate, said he would not accept the offer of the Land Commission, and he left the unfortunate tenants, over whom there are notices of eviction pending, in their present condition, subject to this enormous rent. In the course of the negotiations some very remarkable correspondence took place between a solicitor, named J. B. Lynch, the son of one of the Land Commissioners, and the Catholic curate of the parish, Father Twoomey. In one letter Mr. Lynch stated that the total price which they ought to receive from the tenant should be at least £13,000, and if the tenants agreed to this purchase, Father Twoomey would be accepted as tenant at a price much below the value of the property. The letter went on to state that if Father Twoomey negotiated the sale he would be allowed 5 per cent. on anything obtained over £13,000. That is to say, if they got £14,000, Father Twoomey would receive £50, and if they got £15,000, Father Twoomey would receive £100. A more indecent proposal was never brought before the House, and I say that the whole transaction assumes a grave and serious character when we remember that this sale would be carried out by the son of the man who has to decide on the ultimate carriage of the sale. I doubt whether it is decent or proper for a son of Mr. Lynch to practice in his father's Court at all; but when we find him trying to get Irish priests to induce the tenants to give a monstrous sum for an estate—and the valuation of the Land Commissioners themselves shows this to be a monstrous sum—I say it is an outrage, and calculated to give a rude shock to public confidence in this Commission, and, so far as Mr. Commissioner Lynch is concerned, it throws a doubt on his impartiality as between landlord and tenant in these transactions. The greatest possible responsibility is thrown on these Purchase Commissioners, both as acting between landlord and tenant in Ireland, and acting for the good and the future peace of Ireland, and as guardians of the Treasury. It should be their aim to secure the country against further complications and difficulties in levying the instalments of this purchase money. I need hardly say that this clergyman I have referred to did not respond to the letters of Mr. Lynch. All he did with regard to them was to put them in the way of being made use of in order to expose the transaction. Mr. Lynch did not stop at this. In this way he furnished us with the first proof of the methods adopted in these cases, but on the 13th December last he wrote again saying that unless he received an answer before Christmas he would have the ejectment put in force against the tenants. That is the case with regard to O'Sullivan's estate, and I assert that the facts, which I have proved by documentary evidence, require some explanation, for they throw the greatest possible doubt on the bond fides of Mr. Lynch. I will add nothing to the bare, naked facts, or their result on the character of Mr. John P. Lynch, who, I understand, is the son of the Land Purchase Commissioner himself. I think Mr. J. P. Lynch is no credit either to himself or the profession he belongs to. I now come to the third point which I desire to bring before the House, and which, I believe, is the most important of all. It has reference to a recent judgment delivered by Mr. Commissioner M'Carthy concerning a most important question which arose in the administration of the Land Purchase Act. The cases which came before the Court were those of tenants on the Lansdowne Estate. A long list of agreements to purchase was brought before Mr. M'Carthy, and the point was whether new tenants should be substituted for the evicted tenants. Mr. M'Carthy laid it down that in administering the Act he was bound to consider its meaning and spirit and the purpose of the Legislature in passing it, and he held that the purpose of the Legislature was to apply a remedy to the evils existing in Ireland, and that no case could be made out for the Land Purchase Bill unless it was intended for the removal of grievances. Accordingly,

Mr. Dillon

Mr. M'Carthy refused to sanction the agreements. I regret to hear that we have not heard the last of these cases as yet, and that the influential position and great connections of the Marquess of Lansdowne will be used for a most unworthy purpose—namely, for the purpose of putting pressure on the Land Commissioners, overawing Mr. M'Carthy, and making him go back on the judgments he has delivered, and consenting to transactions which he has condemned as hostile to the spirit of the Act, and thoroughly subversive of the object of the Legislature. But there is another way in which this judgment can be reconsidered. About a fortnight after this judgment was delivered, a somewhat similar class of cases were brought before Mr. Commissioner Lynch, and he gave a decision which, to use the words of the Daily Express, was at right angles to the judgment of Mr. Commissioner M'Carthy. That judgment reversed the judgment of Mr. M'Carthy and laid down principles of law which are absolutely subversive and contradictory of the principles laid down by Mr. Commissioner M'Carthy. Mr. Lynch said that the Commissioners had no jurisdiction to rescind a contract entered into between landlord and tenant. I think everyone will say that that judgment is absolutely contradictory of the judgment given by Mr. M'Carthy. Let us consider the character of the cases in reference to which Mr. Commissioner Lynch laid down this principle of the law. Everyone in the House will agree with me that the principles laid down by Mr. Commissioner Lynch are absolutely intolerable, and at variance with the objects and purposes of the House of Commons when it passed the Land Purchase Act. The cases dealt with by Mr. Commissioner Lynch came from an estate in Westmeath, and the tenants were said to be tenants of large grazing tracts. Commissioner Lynch annulled the agreements of sale because, as he alleged, on inquiry, he discovered that the tenants, although represented to him as being in possession under yearly contract of tenancy, were in reality not in possession at all at the time the agreements were made. He stated it was on this ground that he had refused to sanction the sales, and that had the tenants been put in bond fide possession, with stock of their own, he would have sanctioned the sale. I think the House is entitled to know which of these judgments can be accepted as the law in Ireland. It is a matter most vital to the future of the Purchase Act in Ireland and to any attempt to pass another Purchase Act. Mr. Commissioner Lynch distinctly laid it down that he refused the agreements on the ground that the tenants were not bond fide in occupation of their holdings. A more preposterous or monstrous fraud could not be conceived with regard to the intentions of the Legislature than the judgment of Mr. Commissioner Lynch. I believe that if the people of this country had understood the true nature of such transactions as that of which Mr. Commissioner Lynch has approved they would never have sanctioned the advance of 1s. more for the purchase of land in Ireland, and, therefore, it is of the most vital importance that the whole matter should be thoroughly investigated. Unless the Government can see their way to make a distinct declaration in reference to this matter, it will be the duty of the Irish Members to denounce the whole of the Act throughout the length and breadth of Ireland. I think that those who were in favour of this policy of land purchase are acting unwisely in mixing it up with the eviction policy. It should not be made subservient to the evicting landlords of Ireland, or turned into a department of the Property Defence Association, as I think it is being rapidly turned into. I believe that a new Department is to be started in connection with the Land Commission, known as the Congested Districts Department. It is proposed to place Mr. Commissioner Mc'Carthy at the head of it. I am informed that this is a scheme to get Mr. Commissioner Mc'Carthy out of the way, and that a threat is to be held over his head that if he is not subservient to the landlords in these matters he will be transferred to some other Department. If pressure is to be put upon Mr. Mc'Carthy to reverse his judgment, it will be one of the greatest scandals that have ever disgraced modern administration in Ireland. I feel that the matters I have called attention to deserve careful investigation, and if they are disregarded a serious blow will be struck at public confidence in Ireland in the administration of the Land Department. If the Government adopt the view of the law laid down by Mr. Lynch, and lend the public money of this country for the purpose of aiding the landlords to sell their land, the last hope will be taken away of any peace or order in the disturbed districts of Ireland. I shall be sorry if the Government take any such course. The chances that the Government have of passing the Purchase Bill during the coming Session of Parliament will be very materially lessened if we are in a position to come before the country and the House, and prove that the Purchase Bill has been used for such nefarious purposes, which will be the means of creating and perpetrating disorder rather than of creating peace in the country.

VOL. CCXLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

(10.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think the hon. Gentleman through the greater part of his speech must have conceived himself to be addressing the House not on the Report of Supply but upon the Land Purchase Bill which was brought forward at an earlier stage of the Session. His observations went beyond any criticism, legitimate or illegitimate, of the proceedings of the Land Commission. Towards the end of the hon. Gentleman's remarks he endeavoured to extract, or I may say, he demanded, from the Government an expression of their legislative policy in the next Session of Parliament. I conceive I should be grossly out of order if I followed the line the hon. Gentleman has traced out for me to pursue. In the few remarks I have to make I will confine myself to those remarks of the hon. Member in which he dealt with the present action of the Land Commission rather than the future action of the Government. I wish to offer one observation to this effect, that if the hon. Member is afraid, as he professes to be afraid, that the Government desire to drive Mr. Mc'Carthy out of the Public Service because of a judgment he has delivered, then I would suggest to the hon. Member and his friends that they should assist the Government in giving to Mr. M'Carthy and his Colleagues that fixity of tenure the Government desire to give them. The hon. Gentleman has alluded at great length to a statement made by Mr. M'Carthy upon the general principle which regulates his action as one of the Land Commissioners. I feel sure that the hon. Member has entirely misrepresented the views that Mr. M'Carthy holds. The hon. Member has attributed to Mr. M'Carthy the doctrine that within the four corners of the Act is to be found a provision which prevents public money being advanced to any tenancy created subsequent to the passing of the Act. I am perfectly certain that Mr. M'Carthy never uttered any judgment so wholly absurd and so wholly baseless, so utterly at variance with the judgment of his colleague, Mr. Lynch. Of course, if Mr. M'Carthy thinks and holds, as is probable, that bogus tenants should not be encouraged, he is right, and in that he would be supported by any Government, but to expand that doctrine into the absurd opinion that because a tenancy has been created since the passing of the Land Act, the tenant is not to be allowed money to purchase his holding, is not only a doctrine wholly inconsistent with the Act of Parliament, but to attribute to Mr. M'Carthy an opinion that he never for one moment entertained.

MR. DILLON : I did not say he entertained that opinion. I read out Mr. M'Carthy's statement. What I said was that Mr. M'Carthy claimed a discretion to refuse certain tenants on the ground which I read out, and Mr. Lynch said that no discretion existed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I am quite sure Mr. Lynch never said the Land Commission is bound to advance money to bogus tenants, and I feel bound to protect Mr. M'Carthy from the imputation that he holds that public money ought not to be advanced to tenants whose tenancies have been created subsequent to the passing of the Act. Now, the hon. Gentleman has given us a large number of details, for the accuracy of which he did not vouch, in relation to Lord Waterford's estates. Though the report of this Vote has been pending for many days, the hon. Member has given me no notice of the subjects he intended to refer to, and it is, therefore, somewhat difficult to reply fully to the speech of the hon. Gentleman. It is said that certain sales on Lord Waterford's estate in 1888 were carried out when the tenants were under duress. But that point has been threshed out before the Land Commission, and proved to have no foundation. The terms of the sale were such that the tenants would have had 20 per cent. reduction on their rents. So there was no reason to doubt the rents would be paid in the form of an annuity. Next, complaint is made that Lord Waterford bought in certain farms at a nominal price when, in default of the purchasing tenants, they were put up for sale. The hon. Gentleman did not tell us, but I conceive the land was subject to the original annuity. Nor did the hon. Gentleman tell us that the land was boycotted by the neighbouring tenants. Then the hon. Gentleman brought forward the conduct of a Mr. Lynch in regard to the sale of the O'Sullivan property. But this has really no connection with the Vote. Mr. Lynch was alleged to have offered a certain Catholic curate a commission if he could induce the tenants to give 17 years' purchase. It is said that Mr. Lynch is a son of Commissioner Lynch; but Commissioner Lynch took no part in this matter, and, as a matter of fact, so far from the Land Commission having anything to do with this action of Mr. Lynch, the Land Commission subsequently refused to authorise the purchase at more than nine or 10 years' purchase. The incident merely shows that Mr. Lynch did the best for his employer, and Mr. Lynch, the Land Commissioner, did his best for the State. How this can be made the foundation for an indictment against the Land Commission I confess I utterly fail to see.

(1.14.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I cannot agree that my hon. Friend has gone beyond the proper area of the subjects which may be debated on this Vote. As to the Waterford estate, the tenants were in arrear, and in cases in Ireland where the tenants are in arrear we cannot exercise too much caution in reference to the transactions of purchase, because when a tenant is in arrear the landlord has a terrible force of compulsion in his hand for inducing the tenant to agree to his terms of purchase. If the tenant will not so agree his only alternative is eviction, which, to an Irish tenant, means ruin. In the case of the Waterford estate the tenants who were in arrear entered into agreements to purchase. They represented to the Land Commissioners that these agreements had been signed under duress, but the Land Commissioners, disregarding that intimation, insisted on carrying out the agreements, with the natural consequences of default, and in all such cases where the landlords or someone were able to purchase the farms at a nominal sum, the balance between the nominal price and the original purchase money remaining unpaid becomes a dead loss to the State. I submit to the Chief Secretary the gravity of the fact, because his Land Purchase Bill holds out three alternatives in case of default in payment of instalments; the State is either to manage the farm, or to re-let it, or to sell it. The story told by my hon. Friend shows how two of those may fail. Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to advance the proposition that a tenant being evicted from a farm because of his inability to pay his instalments, another purchaser can make it pay when he buys the land at a nominal price, plus the instalments? The suggestion is absurd. In the case my hon. Friend cited the tenants were in arrears, they were put under duress, and agreed to pay an excessive and impossible purchase price; they failed to keep up their instalments, the Land Commission could neither manage the farms nor let them, and so had to sell at a dead loss to the State. My hon. Friend, though he did not pledge himself to personal knowledge of the facts of the case—though when he has done that it has not availed him with this House—yet has every faith in the credibility of his informants. My hon. Friend has made out a case which is certainly deserving of a better answer than has been given by the right hon. Gentleman, and the matter is one which ought to be inquired into. With regard to the O'Sullivan estate—

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With respect to that portion of the hon. Member for Mayo's speech, I listened in expectation of seeing the missing link to connect it with this Vote, but I cannot say that the hon. Member produces any link to connect it.

MR. SEXTON: It is rather embarrassing that a case which has been treated to an opening speech, and a speech in reply, now appears difficult of debate. I would submit that this John P. Lynch, who made this offer to the priest, is a solicitor now practising before the Land Commission, and that, therefore, it would be the duty of the Land Commission to restrain him from practising in that Court.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No.

MR. SEXTON: I say he made a corrupt and criminal offer to a priest.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I think this has not sufficient connection with the Vote.

MR. SEXTON: It is a function of the Land Commissioners to determine whether the solicitors practising before their Court are persons who ought to practise. But if you tell me, Sir, distinctly, I am not at liberty to pursue the subject, I will not do so.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I think it is not pertinent to the Vote.

MR. SEXTON: Very well, Sir. With regard to the conflicting judgments of Commissioners Lynch and McCarthy, and I think no one who heard the contention of my hon. Friend can doubt there is such a conflict, I say the Chief Secretary has entirely evaded the issue, which is whether a certain class of bogus tenants are to be brought into farms after the eviction of the preceding tenants, for the purpose of enabling them to complete the transaction of purchase and enabling the landlord to dip his hands in the pocket of the State.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I said no bogus tenants should be allowed aid to purchase.

MR. SEXTON: Then it is a question what is a bogus tenant. Mr. Commissioner Lynch has said that where a contract of tenancy exists, the Purchase Commission is not in a position to inquire further. But I say that is only the beginning of inquiry. The intention of this Parliament was to put an end to the evils arising from the impossible position in which tenants were placed, to emancipate them from the sway of the landlords. A vital question for the Land Commission to determine is whether or not a tenant who desires to enter into a contract of purchase is a bona fide agricultural tenant who lives by the cultivation of the land. In such a case Parliament has declared that the credit of the State shall be employed to assist him to purchase. But there are numerous cases in which landlords, having evicted their tenants, enter into contracts of purchase with new tenants who are not agricultural tenants in any sense, who are mere adventurers from towns in Ireland, who merely go into the farm and go through the form of contract with the landlord in order to enable the latter to pocket the money of the State. They pay no rent, they have no stock, for that is supplied by political associations, such as that with which the hon. Member for South Tyrone is connected; they engage to buy at an excessive price, and when the plunder is secured from the State and divided these bogus tenants disappear. It is difficult to reconcile the unwillingness of the right hon. Gentleman to give a frank reply to-night with the reception he gave a short time ago to a speech delivered in the House by my hon. Friend the Member for Cork. In that speech the hon. Member for Cork proposed a system of Courts of Arbitration in Ireland. I will not discuss that now, but I think I may say the right hon. Gentleman welcomed that proposal with effusion. Does the right hon. Gentleman not see that the establishment of such Courts of Arbitration, to determine in a reasonable and amicable manner disputes existing on estates where evictions have taken place, is at right angles with the policy that encourages the landlord to evict and then to bring in tenants upon whom he can impose any terms in order to secure the money of the State?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I never suggested anything like such a policy.

Mr. Sexton

MR. SEXTON: No, the right hon. Gentlemen can be very prudent and taciturn upon occasion. But I say we have a right to know as between these Commissioners what view is to prevail. Mr. Commissioner Lynch holds that if there is a contract of tenancy the Commission can inquire no further in the matter, but that is only the beginning of the inquiry. Mr. Commissioner M'Carthy contends that they have a right to inquire what is the security to the State, and I say there can be no security to the State where a bogus tenant is allowed to purchase. If the policy of Mr. Lynch is allowed to prevail it will lead to bad results. It will give fatal stimulus to eviction, and the public opinion of Ireland will be considerably set against the whole policy of purchase. The public opinion of England will revolt against immense sums of Imperial money being advanced on such a doctrine as that laid down by Mr. Lynch. The Government are fond of taking credit for the success of the said Ashbourne Act. If the Ashbourne Act has been administered with safety to the State, it is due to the sagacity and prudence of Mr. Commissioner McCarthy, whose views secure a just balance between the claims of the landlord, the tenant, and the State.

LONDON STREETS (REMOVAL OF GATES) BILL.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, I regret very much that I should have to trouble your Lordships for a few moments in reference to this Bill, at this stage. I regret that your Lordships did not follow the lead of my noble and learned Friend (Lord Bramwell), and reject this Bill at the Second, and if not at the Second, at the Third Reading. Because, my Lords, I think it would be a good thing to have rejected this Bill, coming as it did from this newly created London County Council without any Compensation Clause, whilst it takes away property rights which had been previously acknowledged. The County Council are very ambitious. They were, in the main, created to keep our sewers in proper order, and our streets well cleaned and lighted, but, in their ambition, they go in more for what is called haute politique, and they endeavour to bring in new principles of legislation, such as "betterment," besides endeavouring to take possession of the Corporate property of the London City Companies. And here, in a Bill which they bring in to clear away obstructions in the streets, they, as I have said, for the first time introduce a new principle, and bring in a Bill taking property without compensation. Well, my Lords, I think it would be useful, under those circumstances, if the Bill had been rejected either on the Second or on the Third Reading, but it appeared otherwise to your Lordships. The Prime Minister while favouring compensation thought the Bill should be read a second and a third time; so did the Opposition Bench, and the Chairman of Committees also was in favour of the Third Reading of the Bill, although he expressed an opinion in favour of considering a compensation clause. Nevertheless, notwithstanding all the arguments in favour of the Bill, the Third Reading was only carried by a majority of nine, and if we analyse the Division List we shall find it was practically mainly carried by the official supporters of the present Government. It was under those circumstances that I ventured to ask your Lordships to take advantage of what I cannot but consider a very wise provision in your Lordships' Rules of Procedure, and take time to consider whether, there having been this strong feeling expressed with reference to compensation, you should not delay the further progress of the Bill, and introduce a Compensation Clause into it. It is acting upon what I believe to have been the feeling predominant, at any rate, in the House on that occasion, that this clause is now proposed. Well, I venture accordingly, merely as a mouth-piece of others, to propose that this clause should be introduced into the Bill. I doubt very much whether any clause ever came before your Lordships drawn and backed with the authority which attaches to this clause. I myself, I need not say, have had no hand in it. It is a clause which is accepted by those who are interested in the Bedford estates, and it was sent to me voluntarily, without any communication on my part, on Saturday last, by Lord Selborne. It is drawn by him, or drafted by him. It has, I think I may venture to say, the approval of the Lord Chancellor, and, after what the Prime Minister said after the Debate on the Third Reading the other night, I venture to think it meets also with the approval of the Prime Minister. Few clauses have ever come before your Lordships' House so drawn and so endorsed, and I think I may venture to submit it to your Lordships' favourable consideration. Here, my Lords, I should at once sit down, and simply move the clause, were it not that I would, with your Lordships' permission, say a very few words with reference to the position which this House occupies with regard to this great question of property rights. A short time ago I attended a public dinner, at which two very distinguished Americans were present—Mr. Hurlbert and Mr. Dudley Field. I may say that Mr. Dudley Field is certainly the finest specimens of humanity at 85 I have ever seen, and he is also the finest orator I ever heard—I except none. Those two gentlemen spoke on that occasion, and I venture to bring before your Lordships what they said, as having a direct bearing upon this question, and upon all questions affecting property and liberty rights. Perhaps your Lordships, therefore, will allow me to quote what they said, and I hope that their language will not only have influence with your Lordships, but that it will be taken to heart by the nation, and also, perhaps, have influence in another place. Mr. Hurlbert said this:—

"The American Union is simply a union for the defence of liberty and property. I read with surprise in an address of Sir Frederick Bramwell that your British Parliament to-day is in the habit of enacting laws which wind up with this declaration—'Any contract to the contrary notwithstanding.' I can imagine nothing more amazing to Americans than that. One of the fundamental principles of the American Constitution is this: No State shall pass a law impairing the validity of contract."

Mr. Dudley Field followed, and said—

"Mr. Herbert has told you, and told you truly, that the foundation of American life and American Government is the sanctity of the home and the sanctity of contract. The State of New York, to which I belong, the proudest and most powerful of all the States in the Union, could not enact a law by which one dollar of rent could be taken from a landlord and given to any human being. We believe, and the majority of my countrymen believe, that Government was made, not to give property to anybody, but to protect everybody. To protect then and keep the peace is the duty of Governments. We call the other theory the "meddlesome theory." What right have you to interfere in my domestic concerns? You protect me, and I carve my own career for myself. It is that which we Americans consider our birthright. We hold these truths to be our birthright—that men are born equal, and that each man shall be left to judge for himself what is best in the pursuit of happiness for him."

Such a Bill then as this, taking away rights of property, could not, by any possibility, have passed through the American Legislature and become law, because you have the security in America of what is called the Supreme Court, and a written Constitution, in which the sanctity of contract is recognised as one of the main elements of freedom and liberty. If then, the American Senate or Legislative Assembly, departing from the written letter of the Constitution in this respect, were to pass a law taking a dollar out of one man's pocket to put it into the pocket of another, the Supreme Court steps in, squashes, and sets aside any such measure. Contrast with that what has been going on in this country for the last 20 years. Why, there is hardly a day on which the State does not interfere with somebody or other, either making, or breaking, or barring contracts, and you have, unfortunately, no such security as they have in the Supreme Court in America. There was a time when we resisted the extension of the Franchise, and what is called the Democraticising and Americanising of our institutions; but I now wish to Heaven our institutions were Americanised in the sense in which I have mentioned, which renders it impossible, owing to the existence of the Supreme Court, for such legislation as has been in fashion in this country for many years to be passed. There is hardly a newspaper in which you do not read, for instance, of the Crofters Commission meeting somewhere up in the north, in some out of the way place, that they reduced rents, say 30 per cent., and striking off, perhaps, 60 per cent. of arrears. But although we have no Supreme Court in this country, we have your Lordships' House. Practically, your Lordships' House is the only check at the present moment upon wild legislation, and against doing away with the rights of property. For, mind you, it is not merely a question of the Duke of Bedford, but the principle affects the small freeholder as well; it is a question affecting property of every sort or kind which anyone may have inherited or earned. Therefore it is that I hope your Lordships will take this strong position, and maintain it through thick and thin, that any Bill which comes to your Lordships, be it from what quarter it may, for the purpose of taking forcible possession of property, without compensation, will be rejected by your Lordships, or will be amended by your Lordships, putting into it a compensation clause. That is all that I invite your Lordships now to do. It is not to a very high level of ambition that I would wish your Lordships to rise. I would simply point out this, that although the County Council of London, as I have said, and I repeat it, have ignored the action of their predecessors, their predecessors, who, acting upon a dictum of the then Home Secretary as to compensation in this very case being needed, put into their Bill, introduced only five years ago, a Compensation Clause. All, then, that I am inviting your Lordships to do is to rise, as regards the defence of property rights, from the level of the London County Council to that of the late Metropolitan Board. I, therefore, beg to move the Clause which stands in my name; but there is just one very small omission in it to which I must call attention. That is, where the word "land" stands, "lands" ought to be read. It occurs in the first and last lines of the clause.

Moved, to insert at the end of Clause 4—

"Provided that if any lands shall be taken or injuriously affected by anything to be done under or by virtue of this Act, without the consent of the owner thereof, compensation shall be made for the same by the Council in the manner provided by the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Acts amending the same, the provisions of which Acts, so far as relates to lands taken otherwise than by agreement and to compensation for lands injuriously affected, shall be deemed for that purpose to be incorporated with this Act."—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

LORD MONKSWELL: My Lords, I do not propose to follow the noble Earl on the Cross Benches into his disquisition of the rights of property. It would appear that the noble Earl has little confidence either in the tribune of this House or in that of the House of Commons, for he comes and tells us here that the unanimous opinion of the Committee was that property shall be taken away without compensation according to law, and that a majority of this House agreed with the Committees of the House of Commons and of your Lordships' House. Neither shall I follow the noble Earl into the disquisition on the sacred rights of contract, because, after all the legislation that has taken place I think the noble Earl lets light in upon the question in putting his views forward; and besides, that does not seem to me to be the question which is at present before the House. This is really a very serious matter, but it is, perhaps, more serious even than my noble Friend seems to imagine; for this proposal is made, as the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees stated, after the Bill has been read a third time, and after a decision has been arrived at upon the measure in the Committees of the House of Commons and of this House, although no new evidence has been adduced. That, as the noble Earl has stated, is a very unusual course, and there must be very strong reasons indeed shown for taking such a course. But there is a great deal more than that. Let me ask your Lordships to consider what would be the effect of the reversal of those decisions of the Committees of both Houses. The effect would be this: It would be said that, by the action of your Lordships' House, you would be imposing a burden upon the ratepayers of London, and a burden, mind you, for the benefit, if anybody is to be benefited, of the noble Duke who is a Member of this House; and it would be said you propose to do that by a Party majority in this House. Now, I should like this matter to be cleared up a little. What is the position as between the noble Duke and the leaseholders? The position taken up by the leaseholders before the Committee of your Lordships' House was this, that they are the only persons who in reality are damaged if anybody suffers damage, and that the Duke himself is benefited and not damaged by the removal of these bars if they are removed by the Legislature. Mr. Balfour Browne, who represented the leaseholders in this House, used these words:—

"The attitude of the Duke in the House of Commons was this—For myself I do not care; I am simply here to support my tenants; I do not suppose that the alteration in the character of this district would really materially affect the district supposing it was all turned into shops and if thoroughfares were made through it, for I dare say the Duke's rent at the end of the present tenancies would be higher than they are to-day."

Under those circumstances it is, at least, doubtful whether the Duke desires the passing of this clause as proposed; but I should like to get a distinct answer from the noble and learned Lord (Lord Bramwell) and also from the noble and learned Lord by his side, as to whether or not they consider the leaseholders would have any chance of obtaining compensation. I understand the view of the noble and learned Lord is that they would not; I do not know whether the noble and learned Lord agrees with him. If the noble and learned Lord and the noble and learned Earl both agree that it is only the Duke that can get compensation, and not the leaseholders, I think they will find it exceedingly difficult to persuade the people of London that it is a just thing that the Duke of Bedford, who is not damaged at all, and certainly much less than his tenants, if there is any damage done, should get compensation, and that those tenants should not get a penny of compensation. You are asking compensation, then, only for the noble Duke the Duke of Bedford. Very well, but the Duke of Bedford himself asked for no compensation before the Committee of your Lordships' House; he was content with the decision of the House of Commons, and I think the Duke of Bedford was exceedingly well advised to be content with that decision. I do not know whether your Lordships quite understand the feeling of the ratepayers of London in this matter. I belong to that much-abused body which the noble Earl has talked about, the London County Council. I represent on the Council a certain body of ratepayers, and I am in the habit of coming into contact with other members of that body who represent other ratepayers of London; and I can say that, whether rightly or wrongly, the opinion in the mind of the average ratepayer is this—that the Duke of Bedford and other ground landlords have been obtaining, for many years, a very unjust and inequitable advantage out of the rates. It is said by the ratepayers of the County of London that the Duke of Bedford and other large landlords have had their property very largely increased in value, not owing to any money they have themselves expended upon the property, or not entirely owing to expenditure of their own upon it, but really owing to the money which has been subscribed by the ratepayers in furtherance of Metropolitan improvements. It does seem to me that the Duke of Bedford does not care to come to your Lordships' House to ask for compensation. It is the most extraordinary thing in the world that your Lordships should be asked to set aside the decisions of both Committees in favour of this noble Duke, who says himself he does not want compensation, and who, very likely, will not obtain compensation even if this clause is carried. There is just one observation which I should like to add in the name of the County Council. The noble Lord on the Cross Benches has said something about the action of the County Council, and I should like to say one word to the noble Lord in regard to the action of the Liberty and Property Defence League, of which he is such a pillar. It seems to me that, by pressing the rights of property far beyond anything which public opinion is likely to endorse, they are paving the way for radical reforms in the future which they would consider of a confiscatory nature. I can only once more entreat your Lordships not, at this stage of the Bill, to put in a Compensation Clause, giving compensation to the noble Duke for which he has not himself asked.

*THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I do not understand that this clause gives any right to compensation to anybody, but only a right to go before a jury and ask whether there is to be compensation paid or not, and if the jury says they think the parties have a right to compensation they will fix the amount. I do not see that the right to compensation becomes less clear because the party who goes to the jury happens to be the Duke of Bedford, and possesses a great deal of other property, or that it will then be affected because he happens not to have pressed his claims before this House. But, in truth, I think this clause will have very little practical effect; but I can quite understand the force of the observation which was made by my noble Friend the other night, that it is undesirable to sanction the principle, even in a small matter, that property may be taken away without giving the ordinary right to obtain compensation, which is given in every other case. The amount of land to be taken will be extremely small, probably only that which is under the gates; but you do take the land, and whenever you do take land compulsorily it is your habit to incorporate the Lands Clauses Act of 1845 in the Bill which takes it. The Land Clauses Act gives no right to compensation, it simply gives a right to the parties to go before the ordinary tribunals of the land to inquire whether compensation should be paid. Therefore, merely as a matter of principle it seems to me that the case for inserting the clause is complete. I confess that my feeling in favour of the clause is rather strengthened by the speech to which we have just listened. I cannot help feeling that if a Representative of the County Council in this House shows such warmth in resisting in a Bill of this description a provision which is merely one of principle, and which will practically leave no burden whatever on the rates, there must be some design which we do not see in the particular mode in which this Bill has been introduced into Parliament. I cannot help thinking that there are members of the County Council who hope that if we do pass a Bill, without taking the ordinary precaution to insert a clause with regard to compensation, in this small matter, in cases where larger sums are concerned the precedent will work against the owners of property. That, I confess, makes me think that, on the whole, it would be better that we should adhere to the ordinary Parliamentary practice in this case; that it does not matter two straws whether the Duke of Bedford has asked for it, or not; that what we have to do with in this matter is the Parliamentary practice; and that Parliamentary practice demands that we should follow the usual course, and insert this clause.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I cannot agree with the view which the noble Marquess has suggested to your Lordships. If we were proposing now to deal with a Bill which was under consideration for the first time in your Lordships' House, which had not been considered by a Committee of this House, and by a Committee of the other House, and passed by the other House, the case might be different; but I would ask your Lordships to consider the aspect which this case will wear if the course proposed by the noble Earl is followed. It will appear that—after a case has been considered in the other House by a Committee who unanimously came to the conclusion that it was not necessary to insert a Compensation Clause, the noble Duke, who is said to be the only person interested, having been represented before them, when the Committee of your Lordships' House by whom it was considered came to the conclusion that there should be no Compensation Clause—by doing what has never, so far as I know, been done before between the Third Reading and the passing of the Bill, your Lordships are willing to insert such a clause in favour of a Member of this House. By doing such a thing as this, it would seem that, on behalf of a Member of your Lordships' House, and for his benefit, you are taking a course which is absolutely unprecedented, and altering this Bill in a manner which will make it inconsistent with the views which have been taken by the other House, and by a Committee of your Lordships' House. I cannot think that such a course is likely to raise either the credit or character of your Lordships' House. I do not say that the imputations which are likely to be cast upon it will necessarily be just; but I am quite certain that if your Lordships take this course it will give rise to observations with regard to the action of your Lordships' House which those who are concerned for its credit and character and reputation would much rather not hear, because they would be unable to avoid the feeling that there is, at all events, some foundation for it. Now, I agree that this question may be said, as it has been put by the noble Marquess opposite, to be a question of principle; but is there any question of principle necessarily involved here? Are you wronging anybody when, there being only one person to whom this clause will apply, that person, having presented his case in the House of Commons, has been content not to petition your Lordships' House, or to suggest here that he has any claim to compensation? Where is the serious interference with the rights of property that is complained of, because you do not put in a special clause for compensating a person who has not suggested that he is entitled to such compensation, or that he has any desire for the insertion of such a clause? I confess I am at a loss to see how the non-insertion of such a clause in this extraordinary and unusual way would be a serious interference with the rights of property. I am certain that, such a clause not being there, if the persons concerned desired that it should be inserted they would bring the matter before your Lordships' House, and suggest that such a clause should be inserted. Where they do not take that course, then surely it is wantonly and unnecessarily putting this House in conflict with the action of the other House to take the course proposed at this late and unprecedented stage. On the other hand, I certainly fail to see how your Lordships not taking that course, is likely to inflict harm upon anyone, either at the present time or in the future.

Lord Herschell

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: As far as the question of precedent is concerned I can remind my noble and learned Friend of one instance in which I had a personally painful experience of a similar course being pursued after the Third Reading of the Land Transfer Bill, when, upon the Motion that the Bill do now pass, the House was adjourned for the purpose of inserting an Amendment.

LORD HERSCHELL: I did not mean putting in any Amendment. I meant putting in a Compensation Clause of this kind in a private Bill.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I thought my noble and learned Friend said there was no instance of such a course having been taken as far as the practice of the House goes. I misunderstood him; but that that did occur your Lordships will remember, and a new clause was ultimately put in upon the Motion that the Bill do now pass. I only rise for the purpose of setting right what I think is a misapprehension on that point. As I am addressing your Lordships I cannot help noticing the disguised menace, which is really the only argument brought forward by both the noble Lords who have addressed the House. What is the meaning of their continually saying, "This is a very awkward thing; this will expose you to a conflict with the other House and with the ratepayers," and so forth? If the thing is right, I trust your Lordships will have the courage to do it. If it be wrong let it be shown to be wrong, but I trust your Lordships will not yield to that sort of indirect menace that you must not do it because the ratepayers will be angry.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: My Lords, the noble Lord who moved this Amendment mentioned truly that, as far as the form goes, I am responsible for that form. I am willing also to be responsible for the substance, for it does appear to me that the principles which have been appealed to in this discussion are of much greater importance than the immediate question involved. What does the Amendment propose? Merely that that rule, and exactly that rule, shall be applied to this case which, as far as I know, has always been applied to every other case of the same kind. If land belonging to a private person is taken and injuriously affected, and those words have been construed by innumerable decisions under powers of this kind, for the public benefit, that land has to be paid for if the owner does not consent. That there is any reason why a difference should be made in favour of a permanent Public Body of the character of the London County Council is not to me obvious. On the contrary, I think that the power and permanence and great respectability of that body appear to me to constitute additional reasons why no new precedent infringing on the right of individuals to be compensated for property taken compulsorily from them should be made in its favour. It has been said by my noble and learned Friend on the Front Bench that such a clause as that now moved has not before been put in at this stage of a Bill which has passed without it in the other House, and through a Committee of this House. The answer is, that there has never before been occasion to do so. I quite agree that before putting in such a clause we should seriously and carefully consider whether the principles of justice require it. But I am perfectly certain that no such Bill as this, taking away private property for a public purpose, private property which upon the hypothesis is taken or injuriously affected within the meaning of the Land Clauses Act, has ever been passed before, and the fact of this Bill having passed the House of Commons would, in my opinion, go no further than to make it probable that the Committee of the House of Commons may not have thoroughly appreciated the step which it was proposed to take. And I can well understand that that might have happened there, as I have no doubt it happened in the Committee of your Lordships' House, from the position which the freeholder, in my view the only person who would come within those words, appears to have taken there. The freeholder appeared to oppose in the House of Commons; he did not appear to oppose here. But opposing the passing of the Bill is one thing, and waiving, or relinquishing, or consenting to give up a right to compensation, to which he would otherwise have been entitled, is another thing. I quite agree that, in these circumstances, and parties whom I assume not to be entitled to compensation having appeared to oppose before the Committees of both Houses, the attention of the Committee was rather directed to the position of these parties than to the principle involved as to the freeholder, who may possibly have thought he had a right to rely upon the ordinary course being taken, and that it would be taken. On the other hand, in favour of the Committees, I am quite disposed to admit this, that they may have misunderstood the position of the freeholder, and have supposed him to waive what, as far as I can see, there is no evidence whatever of his waiving, that is to say, his right to compensation. I cast no blame upon the Committee, if that was the view which they took; on the contrary, I have myself found in this state of circumstances a sufficient reason for not rejecting the Bill on the Third Reading. But upon the present Motion the question is different; and I do think that in such a case nothing less than the consent of the party interested ought to preclude him from claiming compensation, and it has not been made out to my satisfaction that there has been a deliberate relinquishment of the claim. If there was, and if that can be shown, no doubt, no claim will be made under this clause; but as far as the principle is concerned, it does seem to me that without proof of consent, without some less equivocal proof of waiver, it would be a very dangerous and a very unsafe thing not to introduce a clause which would enable a person whose land may be taken, or injuriously affected, if he has not consented, and if he does not consent, to claim in the ordinary way in which, as far as I know, every such person has always been held to be entitled to claim under every Bill giving compulsory powers which has hitherto passed. And, my Lords, I must also say that neither the humble estate nor the high estate, neither the poverty nor the wealth of the private person affected, ought, in my judgment, to induce your Lordships to depart from whatever may be the proper principle and proper method of dealing with this question.

LORD HERSCHELL: I do not know whether I may do so now, but I propose to add some words to this Amendment. The words which I propose to add will have the effect of providing that the words "injuriously affected" shall have the same meaning in this Bill as they have in the Lands Clauses Act.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I cannot imagine how any doubt could possibly be entertained on the subject, but as far as I am concerned by all means let those words be added; I have no objection.

LORD HERSCHELL: It has been suggested that some doubt might arise owing to the manner of assessing the compensation.

Moved to add at the end of the proposed Amendment the words: "that the words 'injuriously affected' shall have the same meaning as in the said Act."

On Question, "That those words be added to the proposed Amendment," agreed to.

On Question, "Whether to agree to the said Amendment as amended," their Lordships divided:—Contents 56; Non-contents 18.

Resolved in the affirmative; Bill passed, and returned to the Commons.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING PROVISIONAL ORDERS CONFIRMATION (No. 15) BILL.

House in Committee (according to order).

*THE SECRETARY TO THE BOARD OF TRADE (Lord BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH): My Lords, the amendments which stand in my name are to the two Orders which affect the City of London, and are little more than drafting Amendments. As they are matters of agreement, I think I need say no more about them. With regard to the Amendments standing in the name of the noble Lord opposite, those I shall be glad to adopt, with some verbal alterations which the promoters and other parties have agreed to. This Bill, as far as this particular Order is concerned, was the first opposed when the Order was made sending it to a Committee. Since that time an agreement has been come to between the parties concerned, the Corporation of the City of London, and the London County Council. Therefore, if your Lordships will now accept the Amendments which are on the Paper, there is every prospect that the Orders in question will pass through this House and the other House as matters of agreement. Under these circumstances, I beg to move the Amendments which stand in my own name, and in the name of the noble Lord opposite.

Amendments made.

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: Owing to the advanced period of the Session, it is necessary to ask your Lordships for some indulgence in regard to this Bill. If your Lordships consent to suspend the Standing Order, I propose to pass the Bill through its other stages this afternoon, in order that there may be a reasonable prospect of its passing through the other House of Parliament. Ample opportunity will be given to any one who desires to object within the number of days which have necessarily to expire; but unless this be agreed to there is grave fear that what I believe to be practicable now will be lost through lapse of time. I hope under those circumstances your Lordships will agree to the suspension of the Standing Orders.

Standing Order No. XXXIX, considered (according to order), and dispensed with: Amendments reported: Bill read 3^a, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

PILOTAGE PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 1) BILL.

PILOTAGE PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 2) BILL.

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: My Lords, these Bills, which are for confirming certain Orders under the Pilotage Act of last year, are the first which have been brought before Parliament under the Act. The circumstances under which I ask for a suspension of the Sessional Order are these. The Bills under which the Orders are made only came into force on the 1st January last year. The Local Authority required some time to consider whether they would apply for the Provisional Order, and when they did so the Board of Trade agreed to give it to them. Every possible expedition has been used to get the Bills ready for your Lordships, but, owing to the provisions of the Act, which make it necessary that a period of six weeks should elapse between certain stages of the Provisional Orders before they can be presented to Parliament, the time passed away, and the Orders could not come before Parliament sooner than they do. The first Bill refers to the Firth of Clyde, and the pilotage upon the Firth of Clyde, and is absolutely unopposed. It passed through the House of Commons absolutely unopposed. The second Bill refers to the port of Bristol, and that I believe also is now absolutely unopposed. There was opposition before the Committee of the House of Commons, but the Committee unanimously confirmed the Bill, after some two hours' discussion. Under those circumstances, I hope your Lordships will consent to the Standing Order being suspended.

Moved—

"That the Sessional Order of the 10th of March last, 'That no Bill brought from the House of Commons confirming any Provisional Order or Provisional Certificate shall be read a second time after Friday, the 27th day of June next,' be dispensed with, and that the Bills be read 2^a."—(Lord Balfour of Burleigh.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY: The noble Lord has certainly justified his Department so far in making out that they have lost no time in bringing these Orders before the House; but I think it would have been, under the circumstances, better if the Orders had been suspended for another year, considering that we have now arrived at the 5th of August, and that the Bills ought to have been presented more than six weeks ago. If the Bills are opposed I think it is very doubtful whether your Lordships should suspend the Standing Order, although if my noble Friend can assure the House there is no opposition to the Bills I should not oppose them.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: I cannot, of course, give an absolute answer that there is no opposition. That can only be decided by lapse of the time for petitioning. I think the time for petitioning with regard to No. 2 Bill will not have expired until 3 o'clock on Thursday. With regard to No. 1 Bill, that is absolutely unopposed, for the time expired at 1 o'clock to-day.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: Then would it not be better to postpone the second Bill until Thursday's sitting?

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: Under the circumstances, I will not move the suspension with regard to

No. 2 Bill to-day, but I hope the House will remember that it is not a new application if my name appears again on Thursday as moving for the suspension of the Standing Order. I move that the Order be suspended in regard to Pilotage Bill No. 1, and it be read a second time.

Motion withdrawn as applying to the second Bill, and agreed to as the first Bill.

Bill No. 1 read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

ALDERSHOT ROADS BILL.—(No. 219.)

Amendment reported (according to order); and Bill to be read 3^a on Thursday next.

COMPANIES (WINDING-UP) BILL.

(No. 229.)

Read 3^a (according to order), with the Amendments.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: There are some Amendments in my name, but with one exception they are purely draftaman's Amendments; that one is upon Clause 8, page 7, the exact words of which were objected to by my noble Friend on the previous stage of the Bill under what I have since become satisfied was a misconception, as the words under Sub-section 2, Clause 3, are sufficient to meet their purpose. Under those circumstances, I move that the Amendment be inserted.

Further Amendments made; Bill passed, and returned to the Commons.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 205.)

Amendment reported (according to order).

LORD HOUGHTON: Your Lordships may, perhaps, remember that in the previous stage of this Bill, Clause 8, which deals with the power of ecclesiastical, parochial, and charitable bodies to convey land for purposes connected with the Public Libraries Act, was seriously assailed, and, in deference to the suggestion of the noble Marquess opposite, I withdrew it, and said I would bring it up in another form of the Report. I have brought up the clause in a form which, I think, will meet the objections then raised; but there are two points upon which I should like to say a word to your Lordships. One of my noble Friends behind me took a general objection to the power of such Public Bodies to give land, although not to their power of selling or exchanging of it. Well, as regards the word "gift," I am informed that in several other Acts, such as the Schools Sites Act of 1841, the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act of 1854, and the Places of Worship Sites Act, 1873, a power of gift is found in each of those measures; and if land can be given for such a purpose as a literary institution it is difficult to see why it should not be given for the purpose of a public library. The other point was with regard to the application of the money derived from such land. My noble Friend behind me has suggested an Amendment in the last paragraph, to which I shall be very glad to agree, namely, that the money derived from the sale of the land shall be applied to the purposes of the Trust, and not as here stated. My noble Friend, Lord Meath, who is not present, brought up on a former stage an Amendment with reference to open spaces; he was anxious that no land which had been set aside for the purpose of being preserved as an open space should come under the operation of this clause. Upon that I have only to say that if he, or my noble Friend Lord Thring, who I believe had charge of the matter in his absence, will bring up an Amendment to that effect at the next stage of the Bill, on the understanding that its provisions should only apply to the Metropolis, or very large towns, I should not offer any objection to such an Amendment.

Moved, after Clause 7, to insert the following new clause—

8. "Any person holding land for ecclesiastical, parochial, or charitable purposes, may, subject as herein-after provided, grant, convey, or enfranchise, by way of gift, sale, or exchange for any of the purposes of the Libraries Acts, any quantity of such land not exceeding in any one case one acre in any manner vested in such person. Provided that no ecclesiastical property shall be granted or conveyed for such purposes without the consent of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England; that no parochial property shall be so granted or conveyed save by the Guardians of the Poor Law Union comprising the parish to which the property belongs, or without the consent of the Local Government Board; and that no other charitable property shall be so granted or conveyed without the consent of the Charitable

Lord Houghton

Commissioners; and the said Board and Commissioners respectively shall provide for the application of the money derived from the sale of any land with their consent under this section, regard being had to the purposes for which such land was held. Any land granted or conveyed to any library authority under this section may be held by such authority without any licence in mortmain."—(The Lord Houghton.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I am quite satisfied with what my noble Friend has said with regard to gifts, and as there are precedents with regard to gifts in analogous cases I shall certainly not press my Amendment. The other point to which I would call attention, is that the words after

"Said Boards and Commissioners respectively, provided that the application of such moneys derived from the sale of land under this Section regard being had to the purposes for which such land is taken,"

should be omitted, and the words

"Land taken in exchange, or money received from such sale shall be held on the same trusts as the land exchanged or sold "

should be inserted. I cannot see why there should be any difference made in the application of the money received from those portions of land to the purposes of the Trusts on which the land is held. I, therefore, beg leave to move that Amendment.

On Question agreed to, Bill to be read 3^a on Thursday next.

DIRECTORS' LIABILITY BILL.

(No. 242.)

House in Committee (on re-commitment) (according to Order).

Clause 3.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Upon this clause with regard to liability for statements in a prospectus, I have to move to omit lines 10 to 15, on page 2. That question arises in this form. The Bill has provided for the liability of Directors in respect of untrue statements made in a prospectus, which, presumably, upon the theory of the Bill, they are responsible for composing and issuing. It throws upon them the necessity of showing affirmatively that they believed, at all events, in the statements put forward by them. But, besides that, the Bill proposes to make a Director liable under circumstances which I will mention in a moment, for any statement which, in fact, is untrue in the report of any expert, whether the expert be an engineer, accountant, valuer, or what not. Now, I think it would be quite fair that a Director should be called upon to show that he had made a fair extract from or had correctly copied the report or valuation of an engineer, valuer, accountant, or other expert. That, of course, is a matter within his own knowledge, and it is a matter with regard to which he may be justly expected to be careful in what he puts before the public; but this Bill goes further. The Bill calls upon him to show affirmatively, and, in the first instance, without any evidence being called, that he did not himself do it; that he believed the statement which was made; that the valuer or expert was competent; because that is the only interpretation that I can give to the phrase "bonâ fide." Now, if I am to suppose that this is a conspiracy between the engineer, valuer, or accountant, and the Director, the law reaches that at present. That would be a fraud. Therefore, what this Bill does is this: the hypothesis of its necessity assumes that the Director is not in fraudulent conspiracy with the engineer or valuer, because that is reached by the law as it stands at present, but it says that he is, in the first instance, without any foundation being made to call upon him for it, to be called upon to show, in the words of the Bill—

"That he had reasonable grounds for believing that it was a correct or fair copy of or extract from the Report or valuation, and that he had reasonable ground for believing, and did, up to the time of the allotment, believe that the statement, Report, or valuation was made in good faith by the person by whom it was purported to be made."

That is, that he believes that the person who made it did himself believe it. Now, this is the first time in any legislation, as far as I am aware, in which Parliament has called upon a man to answer, not only from his own belief, but to state that he believes that some other person believed something, and not only that, but that he believed the person who believed that something, and made the statement about it, was competent to make it. I do not understand upon what ground it is supposed that a Director should be called upon to prove that rather than that the person who, by the hypothesis, has taken the shares upon the faith of the statements, should exercise his belief in regard to their untruth. It must, by the clause itself, be a fair copy or representation of what the engineer or valuer has said, and why on earth the Director is, more than the person who has taken the shares, to be called upon to exercise that belief, and that he should, in the first instance, satisfy a jury that he did believe the valuer was competent, and that he did make the valuation or Report in good faith I cannot understand. With reference to a statement which was made by the Director himself, and upon his own authority, in a prospectus, if he put his name to it, I quite agree that it is not unreasonable to say that if, as a matter of fact, an untruth is found in it, the issue may be changed, and that he may be called upon to show that it is either true or that he believed it to be true. That I can understand; but I do not understand why, when a Director says, as he impliedly does say by extract from or giving a copy of the valuation or accountant's Report:—"I, myself, have no knowledge of this, but I give you what the expert to whom I have applied says about it, and you must inquire for yourselves what the value of that expert's opinion is, what his reputation is among the set of valuers or accountants among whom he practises, and you must form your own judgment upon it," he is to be called upon to pledge his belief to the competency of that expert, and to the expert's own belief in the truth of the statements. All the Director says, and all I think he ought to be called upon to say, is—"This is an extract from," or "This is the valuers' opinion," but this Bill throws upon him not only the onus in respect of statements which he has made himself, but calls upon him to show, if anybody chooses to bring an action against him, that he believed the valuer did believe in good faith, and that the valuer was a competent valuer. It seems to me both unreasonable and improper that you should call upon a Director to do that, and for that reason I move to omit the clause.

Amendment moved, in Clause 3, page 2, lines 10 to 15, to leave out—

stock, as the case may be, believe, that the statement, report, or valuation was made in good faith by the person by whom it purports to have been made, and that the person making it was competent to make it; and")—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD HERSCHELL: This matter was fully discussed in Committee, and the view taken by the Committee was not that of my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. I imagine it will be considered here as free from those Party considerations which divide us as it was there. I cannot consent to the proposal of my noble and learned Friend. It seems to me to strike an absolutely fatal blow at this Bill. I believe if this Amendment were agreed to it would increase the mischiefs which exist rather than diminish them, as I hope to show your Lordships in a moment or two. My noble and learned Friend has dwelt upon a good many things concerning this clause, and has asked why you should not call upon a man to prove this, that, and the other; but he has not laid any stress upon this: that you have to prove that the person whom you see has issued an untrue statement in order to get money from the public who subscribed upon the faith of the untrue statement, that they acted upon that untrue statement, that they had been deceived by it, that they had lost their money in consequence of it. That you have to prove, and then my noble and learned Friend says, "Why are you not content with that? Why should you throw any onus on the man who has issued an untrue statement to the public, and got money out of them upon the strength of it?" For myself, I think that is a reason for saying that you should throw the onus on the man who has issued that untrue statement to the public. Then my noble and learned Friend says it is enough if the Director gives the name of a valuer or engineer who is of any kind of reputation. The proposition which my noble and learned Friend seems to lay down is this, that a man has a right to issue to the public a false statement, because that false statement is vouched for by someone of reputation in his profession, no matter how incompetent or how absolutely unfit to deal with the matter he may be; that the Director who issues it has a right to issue it without caring or troubling himself in the least as to the competency of the expert he has employed, to put it before the public as a thing they may rely upon, and then to say, "Though I had no reasonable ground to believe the man whom I employed was a competent man, though I put forward a false statement which he made, I shall be under no law." Now, just consider all this clause asks of him. It not only asks that he shall believe the statement which the expert made, but it says, "You who employed him shall show that you had reasonable ground to believe that he was a competent man." If he has employed the man, and put his statement before the public to induce them to part with their money, if he has induced them to act upon that man's statement, is it too much to ask that that man should show that he had reasonable ground to believe the person he employed was competent? What easier than to prove it in nine cases out of ten, if the man is really a competent man? But consider for a moment what would be the result if the proposal of my noble and learned Friend is adopted. I submit that this will be the result: that those who are going to launch companies before the public will be able to show that they employed an expert, and there will soon grow up a particular class of experts, who will be easily got to make such Reports. My noble and learned Friend talks of the proof being given by the person who has taken the shares. But it is known perfectly well to him that many things cannot be proved. You may have your suspicion that the man has gone to this, that, or the other person to get a Report, without troubling himself to ascertain whether the person to whom he went was a man on whom he could rely; but proof in these cases is very difficult; and the result of my noble and learned Friend's proposal will be that you will have less examination as to whether Reports have been made by fit persons, because you will positively put a premium upon Directors going to a man who is likely to make loose statements and favourable statements which may be desired; and if a Director goes to such a man he will know that he is no more liable than if he had employed the most competent valuer or engineer in the country; whereas here there is an advantage conferred upon a man if he goes to a person of known competency, because there will be no such likelihood of his making loose or inaccurate statements. This is really putting a premium upon Directors and Promoters—for it is the Promoters especially I am thinking of—going to men of but little competence, repute, and skill, and it would act in the opposite direction to that desired by those who are promoting this Bill, and by a large body of the public. It seems to me that if this Amendment be adopted it will strike a fatal blow at the Bill, and will make the condition of things worse than it is at present.

LORD MORRIS: As I proposed this identical Amendment in the Standing Committee on Law, I would ask your Lordships' indulgence while I make a few short observations upon it. It is quite true, as my noble and learned Friend opposite said, that my Amendment was rejected, but it was rejected by only a majority of one, and at a time when there was only a very small attendance, if my recollection is accurate, upon the Committee—seven noble Lords voted for the Amendments, and eight voted against them.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The Committee consisting of 45.

LORD MORRIS: But there were only 15 present.

LORD HERSCHELL: I did not put any stress upon the numbers, whether many were present or not. All I said was, I hoped it would be considered as free from Party bias here as it was there.

LORD MORRIS: I know my noble and learned Friend did not place stress upon the numbers, but still he alluded to the fact that the same Amendment had been proposed in the Standing Committee on Law, and I think it right to explain, because, if unexplained, that might affect noble Lords' views upon the subject. Without the slightest kind of communication with any person, and being wholly disinterested, as I am not a Director of any Company, I was so struck with what appeared to me the extraordinary imposition upon a Director under this clause, if it were allowed to stand, from the word "valuation," down to the end of it, that I proposed its omission. It does appear to me to be an unprecedented proposal, and I will take the liberty of saying one contrary to good sense, that any man should be called upon, not only to explain his own opinions or belief, or why he had acted upon them, but that he should be obliged to prove that he had reasonable grounds for relying upon the statements of another man, having been made by that man, in the honest belief that they were true. That is shortly, as has been put by the Lord Chancellor, the effect of the clause—that the Director had reasonable ground for believing that another man believed rightly and properly. I think that is an issue which ought to be imposed upon no Director and upon no man. There seems to be some sort of run at Directors at this moment, and I think we should be very likely to be legislating in a kind of panic on the subject by passing such a clause. But if, as it appears to me, that is an imposition upon Directors which should not be allowed to stay in the Bill, the second branch of the clause appears to me to be still more open to objection, and that is that he shall prove to a Jury if anything happens to the Company of which he is Director—and Companies may be affected, your Lordships must remember, by other causes, by perhaps bubble companies breaking up, and not by actual failure of the company in question—that the person whom he employed was competent.

LORD HERSCHELL: That is not the provision, but that he had reasonable ground for believing him to be competent.

LORD MORRIS: I know that, but we have to consider what a Jury would think, and that is the way a Jury would look at it; they never enter into fine logical distinctions, and practically, if the statements turned out to be untrue, they would probably come to the conclusion that the Director had no reasonable ground for believing them. He would put it in this way: that no Director who was solvent and had any regard for his personal character could ever employ any expert unless one who was eminent in his profession; because if he employed a Sir John Fowler, or a Sir Frederick Bramwell, the name of such an expert would be sufficient. But that would prevent any young man ever being employed, because it would be said at once to him, "I may be put upon my trial afterwards, and although I know you to be very clever and competent, still a Common Jury of the City of London will come to the conclusion that, as your name is unknown to fame, you are not a competent person." I venture to repeat, what I have already said in this House, that we ought to be satisfied with advancing to the extent that we have done, and that if there is any future legislation required of the subject it is quite time enough to adopt it when there are evils found which this present Bill, if passed into a Statute, would meet. Upon those grounds, my Lords, I should certainly support the proposition of the Lord Chancellor.

*LORD BRAMWELL: My Lords, I am not desirous of putting any unnecessary burden upon Directors. I am very much afraid of the Bill as it stands, but I cannot agree with the Amendment of the Lord Chancellor. Really, the proposition is this: that if the Report of an expert is relied upon in a prospectus, the Director shall be able to say not that he was competent, but that he believed him to be a competent man, and that he believed the Report was bona fide made. Now, what can be the objection to that? It is said that these cases will come before Juries, and even Common Juries. I know they will come before Common Juries, and if a company has turned out unsuccessful I know very well what may happen. But that is an excellent reason, my Lords, for not passing the Bill at all. If the Bill is to be passed it should be passed on principle, and if the man is able to give a good account of himself, and of his own opinions, why should he not be also called upon to give a good account of his opinion of the expert he has relied upon, and of that expert's Report? Just see what the consequence is if it is not so. A man desirous of "floating" a company, as it is called, goes to a great number of experts, and your Lordships will remember that the definition of an expert is a man whose profession enables him to be looked upon as an authority on a particular subject—he goes to a great many experts who do not agree with him, and after he has gone to the most respectable of them he goes to some man who will agree with him, in whom he has much less faith than he had in the half-dozen who rejected him, perhaps no faith at all, and whose Report he believes is made simply for the fee he would get for it, and not in consequence of its correctly representing his opinion. Now, that would really be the case if the Lord Chancellor's Amendment was adopted, and I think the noble and learned Lord must remember this, that when a man has been called upon to give evidence, and has relied upon the opinion of an expert, that it frequently happens to him to be asked: "Did not you consult Mr. A. B?—Yes.—Are you going to call him?—No." What is the inference from that? And he is, perhaps, asked the same question with regard to Mr. C. D., Mr. E. F., and so on. The conclusion from that is that he has gone to the best experts in the first instance, and their Reports have not suited his purpose; therefore, he has gone on until he has found some expert whose Report did suit his purpose. Now, I beg your Lordships to look at this proposition as the Bill stands. It does not make the Promoter or Director guarantee the good faith or skill of the expert; all it makes him do is to show that he believed in him and in his statements.

LORD HERSCHELL: That he had reasonable ground to believe in them.

*LORD BRAMWELL: I should have said had reasonable ground for believing in them. Why not? If that is true of his own sentiments and his own opinion, is it not true of his faith in those whose statements he has brought forward to the public and advised them are to be relied upon? And your Lordships will always remember there is a prima facie case made out against the Director or Promoter by showing in the first instance that the Report, or valuation, or what not, contained an untruth, and that calls upon him to show his good faith, and that he believed in the man who made it.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: My Lords, it has occurred to me to call attention to one thing which does not apply to this particular point, but rather more widely to the question of the onus probandi. I do not see any provision for the case of a Director having become of unsound mind, and being of unsound mind, at the time when the charge arises. I do not know whether the Bill applies either to a case where the Director is dead.

LORD HERSCHELL: In that case, I think no action would lie.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: Yes, I suppose the ordinary rule would apply in that case, that no action of tort would lie after death, and therefore we may dismiss the case of a man who is dead. But I cannot help thinking that the onus probandi, which this Bill introduces for the first time, upon a man who is of unsound mind at the time when the action arises would be to take from him the possibility of clearing himself, however honest his conduct might have been, and however well able he might have been to satisfy the burden of proof if he had been of sound mind. I do not know, therefore, whether my noble and learned Friend would be willing to put in at the end of the clause some such words as these:—"Provided always, that if at the time when any such action arises the Director is of unsound mind, the burden of proof shall be the same as if this Act had not passed." I cannot help thinking that otherwise some injustice will be done, because it would probably be the case that the company would have gone on for a time at all events, and the action might arise some time after the man had commenced acting as Director. It might also be the case that he had become of unsound mind, and totally unable to make even an affidavit as to his ground of belief with regard to any statements in the prospectus.

LORD HERSCHELL: I have never been able to appreciate the importance of this point with regard to the onus of proof. In a case of fraud, the onus of proof is upon the plaintiff, who alleges that a statement is untrue, to show that it was known to be untrue by the man who made it; but if it is once proved to be untrue, and the circumstances are not such as to make it clear that he knew it to be untrue, I have never known any case where steps had not to be taken to prove that the man did not know it. Of course, there may be a case where a man is dead, but that would be an entirely different matter; and if such an action were brought, the circumstances would be carefully scrutinised, and the result would depend upon a consideration of the whole case, whether, upon the whole, the proper conclusion was or not that the man believed the statement to be true. I do not myself think this shifting of the onus of proof would make any difference in the form of the issue for trial in a question of fraud. It has always been sufficient to launch an action of fraud if you prove that the untrue statement has been made; and that calls for an answer. That is all that is done here; and this calls for an answer, not by the persons who have lost their money, but by the persons who made the statement, or put forward statements made by the persons whom they have employed. In the view I take it will make no difference in the issue to be tried, and I do not believe it would make any difference in the working of the Act, or in the mode in which trials would be conducted. I should like to make one observation upon the suggestion that you might have a case of this kind tried before a Common Jury, and that it would be impossible to say what a Common Jury might do. Well, that amounts only to this: that you have not confidence in the tribunal which administers the law; not that the law is wrong. But the cases will not all be taken before Common Juries; some would be tried before Special Juries, or in other ways, and therefore it is no argument at all to say that you should make the law otherwise than what it ought to be, because it may be administered by a Common Jury. That is what the argument really amounts to, and I cannot give it my consent. I would remind the noble and learned Lord (Lord Morris) that in this country, and in Ireland too, I suppose, Juries are not left absolutely without control, and that if a Jury were, without any evidence, to find that a man had no reasonable ground which all the evidence went to show that he had, the verdict would not be allowed to stand. My Lords, I cannot help feeling very strongly about this. I do not wish to throw any undue burden on Directors, but it is undoubtedly a public evil that men do put forward too readily to the public untrue statements, upon the faith of which they get money subscribed, and I venture to say that this proposal of the noble and learned Lord will encourage that practice, because men will not then trouble their heads with the question whether the valuers, accountants, or engineers whom they employ are competent or not, provided they are recognised professional men, and indeed the more reckless they are the more advantageous their services will be to those who desire to float companies. It is suggested that no young man could ever be employed under such a clause as this, because Directors or Promoters would have no means of showing that they had reason to believe such a man to be competent, as they would in the case of men of high repute who had already become distinguished. Surely it is a reasonable ground for believing that a man is competent if you are assured by others in the profession to which he belongs that a young man, although his name may not be widely known, is quite competent in his profession. Therefore, my Lords, I am quite sure that if these words are omitted, the result will be that the measure will become rather mischievous than beneficial.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I cannot help repeating my noble and learned Friend's words: I also feel very strongly on this matter. It appears to me you are introducing a totally new head of liability. My noble and learned Friend has, from time to time, used the phrase, "makes statements which are untrue." That is fallacious, because all the Director makes by the hypothesis is the statement that is undoubtedly true, namely, that such and such a person has reported either as accountant or engineer or valuer, and of whose Report he gives either an exact copy, or a fair representation—that is all the Bill obliges him to do—a fair representation of what the expert has really reported. I must say I am a little surprised at the attitude of my noble and learned Friend Lord Bramwell opposite. It appears to me the argument he puts forward is something like this: you have taken a wrong course in this Bill altogether, and it does not matter if you add something else that is wrong—you have done something already which is a little unreasonable in this Bill, and, therefore, you cannot do much more harm by adding this clause. I am a little surprised, I confess, at this attitude being taken up by my noble and learned Friend. His observations, however, as to the result of such trials, and the mode in which these actions will be tried, appear to be admitted by my noble and learned Friend opposite. He said, with that expressive eloquence which he knows so well how to employ, "If it comes before a Common Jury I know what will happen." To put that into ordinary plain language that means that a Common Jury, in such a case, would find a verdict which they ought not to find by reason of their inclination to suppose that if a statement is once proved to be untrue it was known to be so. I say that is the very reason why you ought not to do this: you ought not to lay traps for a jury, or to assent to a provision which would enable them to give way to such a practice as this Bill seems likely to encourage. It seems to me it is quite reasonable to call upon a man wherever the onus of proof may have been originally to prove that that which he has himself said, or asserted upon his own authority, is true; or, if not in fact true, it is quite reasonable that you should call upon him to show that he had reasonable ground for believing it to be true: but when he tells you in terms—"I know nothing about this myself; but I have applied to a valuer, and this is the valuer's report." It appears to me to be unreasonable that you should then shift the onus of proof from the person who made the statement, and place it upon him in the first instance to show that the valuer was a competent valuer, and that he had reasonable ground for believing that the valuer's report was true.

*LORD BRAMWELL: I must ask leave to say another word.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: You are entitled to do so; it is Committee.

*LORD BRAMWELL: I will take my noble and learned Friend's own suggestion. The Director says: "I know nothing about this myself, but I have got a report from so-and-so, a valuer,"—does not he by implication also say—"whom I believe to be a competent and honest person"? And that is all my noble and learned Friend's clause makes him responsible for saying. But, supposing he does not say so in so many words, ought he not to say it? He would know very well that if he said to the public, "I know nothing, mind, about this report or this expert, whether he is an honest man or not," who would care a fig for the expert's report? Therefore, when he says, "I know nothing about the matter myself, but I put forward the report of an expert upon it," he clearly does by implication go on to say—"whom I believe to be a capable and honest man."

*VISCOUNT BURY: My Lords, I think that what has just occurred must have shown your Lordships that the very first thing that will happen in a trial of this kind will be that the matter will turn on a side issue as to whether a Director, or anyone making a statement on the authority of an expert, can prove that the expert whom he consulted in the matter was a reliable person. Now, if that expert happened to be a young man, of course the whole force and efforts of the legal minds on the other side would be devoted to proving that, being a young man, he was inexperienced; that he ought not to have been trusted at all; and that any reasonable man would have gone to Sir John Fowler, or some other great expert, and would not have consulted this young man. Perhaps, as a matter of fact, the expert who had been so called in might possess a very special knowledge of the matter in hand, and he might be really a very reliable person. But everyone knows how in a case of this kind the tendency would be to ride off upon the side issue of whether the man himself was a reliable person, leaving the main issue almost untouched. My Lords, I was one of the Committee; perhaps as a lay Peer I may be pardoned in stating the fact that I was one of the minority of that Committee; and I really must say that, whenever any question arose upon that Bill, I was struck with one special circumstance—that if one noble and learned Lord asserted positively that the effect of an Amendment proposed would be so and so, another noble and learned Lord immediately spoke up and contradicted him, and three or four noble Lords would follow one another, each of them differing in opinion from the first. It seemed obvious that when you have even the highest legal luminaries in the country discussing a matter like this, and they all disagree with and directly contradict one another when they are there for the very purpose of settling the matter, what will be the case when an unfortunate man is put on his trial for his life and his honour, which is more to him than his life, before a Common Jury. I say, then, that the present condition of hesitation as to the meaning of the clause only proves the mistake you have made in passing the Second Reading of this Bill and altering the Common Law of England, which has hitherto been that a man is innocent, or must be considered innocent, until he is proved guilty. By this Bill you have altered the state of things, and you say that any man is to be liable in his honour, his life, and his fortune for any inaccurate statement that is made in his name unless he can prove that he believed that statement was true—in other words, that he is to be presumed to be guilty unless he can prove himself to be innocent. This I believe to be the first time that departure has been made in English law. The Limited Liability Act has, no doubt, done a great deal of good in this country; it has enabled a great many of our most prominent and most responsible citizens, who are not immediately engaged in trade, or immediately connected with commercial pursuits, to join in them; but if it be an advisable thing to continue the advantages which have been enjoyed under this Limited Liability Act you must not make that profession, if you choose so to call it, on the face of it, a dishonourable one. In future anybody who chooses to start a new company—I doubt whether you will find many to do so—will do so at his peril. They will not be the best men in the country who will do so; they will not be the most responsible; they will not be those on whom you ought most to rely, because they must prima facie and as a first step put themselves under this Act, if it becomes an Act, and be presumed to be guilty, of malfeasance unless they can prove themselves innocent. My Lords, I think that this Bill is a great mistake; that it ought not to have passed a Second Reading; and that, as it is going through Committee, it ought not to be read a third time now. I certainly think you ought to take more time over this matter. The noble Lords who have been engaged in considering this Bill are not by any means of one mind as to the effect of all the Amendments which have been introduced into it. Noble Lords, many of whom have spoken upon it, have expressed, and do very freely express, out of doors, the opinion that this Bill is a very dangerous one, and for that very reason also I think that the further consideration of this important measure ought to be postponed. The real point, namely, preventing frauds upon investors, has not been grappled with in this Bill at all. I will not go into the general question, but will simply say that the real point is not the one which you have now before you, and I hope my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor will stick to this Amendment, for it seems to me that it is only a reasonable one.

*LORD TEYNHAM: I have listened with very great interest to the discussion upon the Amendments which have been placed on the Paper by various noble and learned Lords, but I should very much like to have the opinion of noble Lords on both sides of the House upon this cardinal question: whether this is a Bill which can be amended at all; whether there is not an original vice in its construction which renders it incapable of amendment. Your Lordships are aware that every law stands upon a certain sanction—no sanction, no law. Surely, hitherto the law has always preceded the sanction. First of all, you enact a certain law, and then you say what the penalty shall be if that law be violated; but now, my Lords, for the first time, I think, in the history of legislation, the sanction in Clause 3 comes first. First of all, you have a penalty of crushing magnitude invoked upon the head of some unfortunate man, not because he has broken any law enacted either by this Bill or any other Bill, but because, forsooth, his mind has not been at a certain time in such a condition as is desired by the Bill respecting some thing which may be of a highly speculative character, or some person about whom there might be very different opinions. It seems to me the very first principles of jurisprudence are attacked by such a measure. I do not see how it is competent for Parliament to place such a measure upon the Statute Book, and I should very much like to have the opinion of noble and learned Lords upon that point.

On Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause," their Lordships divided:—Contents 17; Not-Contents 34.

Resolved in the negative.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I suppose my noble and learned Friend will not now put me to divide upon the next Viscount Bury

Amendment, in lines 10 to 15, to leave out from "valuation" to the end.

LORD HERSCHELL: No; of course I should be "not content," but I shall not divide again.

Other Amendments made.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: In line 25 I should move to omit the words "he proves," and to substitute "it is proved." The object of this Amendment is to meet the possible case of the individual on whom the burden of proof is thrown being dead.

Amendment moved, in Clause 3, page 2, line 25, to leave out the words ("he proves,") and insert the words ("it is proved.")—(The Lord Selborne.)

LORD HERSCHELL: This is not an Amendment which I should myself have proposed, but it is not one which I will resist, if indeed it were any use resisting. In the view which I take I do not think it makes any substantial difference.

Amendment agreed to.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: Then, in lines 26 and 27, I move to omit the words "before the issue of the prospectus or notice." This imposes liability unless it is proved that, having consented to be a Director of the company, he withdrew his consent, and that the prospectus or notice was issued without his authority or consent. He would have to prove two things: first, that he withdrew; and next, that the prospectus or notice was issued without his authority or consent. The objection, as it strikes me, to the words which I propose to omit is this: A man might have been accidentally absent from a particular meeting at which a prospectus was agreed to, and, of course, as I read the whole clause, it would apply not only to a first issue, but to the issue of a prospectus at a later stage of the company. Surely a Director cannot be expected always to be able to be present at every meeting. But there is another and a stronger case. He may have been present when the subject of the prospectus was discussed, and when it was agreed to in a certain form; but afterwards, in his absence, material alterations may have been made without his knowledge, and the prospectus may have been actually issued in that altered form before he knew that any such alterations had been made in it. In that case, if he does all he can to dissociate himself from it, and withdraws his name from the list of Directors as not having authorised the prospectus, it seems to me it could not possibly be right to throw upon him the burden of proof that he had reasonable ground for believing what on the hypothesis he did not believe, because his reason for withdrawing would be the very fact that he could not consent to be made answerable for that prospectus.

Amendment moved, in Clause 3, page 2, lines 26 and 27, to leave out ("before the issue of the prospectus or notice.")—
(The Earl of Selborne.)

LORD HERSCHELL: I understand the proposal is that if a man withdraws his consent to be a Director at any time this shall apply. That no doubt is the proposal of my noble and learned Friend. But he might withdraw his consent; and, according to this, if he proved that he withdrew his consent to be a Director of the company at any time after the notice or prospectus was issued, although the shares were allotted on the faith of the prospectus which had been issued with his consent, he would not escape liability. He would still be liable, as I understand it, if my noble and learned Friend's Amendment were carried, because he has to prove two things: first, that the prospectus or notice was issued without his knowledge or consent; and then he has also to prove that he withdrew his consent. But that withdrawal, as I understand, need not be before the shares are taken. I quite understand the case which my noble and learned Friend alludes to. It is this: that although a man has consented to be a Director, and consented to have his name on a prospectus, yet, unless the prospectus was agreed to in the particular form in which it was issued, it is to be considered as having been issued without his knowledge or consent. I should propose, in lieu of my noble and learned Friend's words, that words to this effect should be adopted; that upon becoming aware of the issue of the prospectus he had forthwith given notice to the public that he withdrew his sanction. The effect of it would be to make the final proviso of sub-clause (1) read as follows:—

"Or unless he proves that, having consented to become a Director of the company, he withdrew his consent before the issue of the prospectus or notice, or that the prospectus or notice was issued without his authority or consent, and that, on becoming aware of its issue, he forthwith gave reasonable notice that it was so issued."

It is only fair and reasonable, I think, when a prospectus is issued, and the Director finds that it is not the prospectus he authorised, that he should give some public notice of the fact, because, if he goes on and says, "Never mind, although I do not believe it is true, let it go," I think he ought to be made liable.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I do not think the precaution is necessary which my noble and learned Friend proposes, but I will adopt his Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Amendment moved after the word "consent," in line 38, to add—

"Or that the prospectus or notice was issued without his knowledge or consent, and that on becoming aware of its issue, he forthwith gave reasonable public notice that it was so issued without his knowledge or consent."—(The Lord Herschell.)

A NOBLE LORD: May I ask whether there should not be some special form of public notice indicated?

LORD HERSCHELL: I have merely put in the words "public notice." There is an ordinary practice with regard to that. The way it is ordinarily done is by giving notice to the public in newspapers. If a man writes to say that a prospectus has been issued without his knowledge, it very soon gets into all the newspapers. I do not think there would be any difficulty on that head.

Amendment agreed to.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Then there is a proviso in the second subsection that "promoter" in this subsection means a party to the formation of the company. I would call attention to the fact that the definition does not include—

"Any person by reason of his acting in a professional capacity for persons who were engaged in procuring the formation of the company."

Those words seem to me to be open to very grave question. According to my experience, I should say that in the large proportion of cases the persons making him a promoter. You make him a promoter in another way; and if he acts in a professional capacity only, he would not be liable, provided you do not bring fraud home to him; of course, he would be liable for his fraud. But with regard to Sub-section 3, I should like to ask my noble and learned Friend whether there is any sufficient reason for limiting that sub-section to companies which are existing at the passing of the Act. New companies will be in the same situation. They may, at some later period, have occasion to make new issues of shares or debentures, just as much as companies which are existing at the time of the passing of the Act. It seems to me that in that case, where you have similar circumstances existing, the same law should be applied to both present and future companies.

LORD HERSCHELL: The difficulty I have felt about that is that with regard to existing companies you can, of course, do it, because it could not be held to be an invasion of the Act; but with regard to new companies what I fear is, that if you provide with regard to a subsequent prospectus, there would be a danger of something being done to enable it to be said "This is not a first issue," which would get rid of the stringent part of the Bill. That was my fear, and I have not quite seen how one can make certain that the words would not be used for the purpose of bringing about some evasion of the Act of that description. I am not quite sure that it would not do that, any more than a provision with regard to making first allotments of shares, because they might simply allot two or three shares only, for the purpose of making the real allotment not the first allotment of shares. That was my only fear.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: I cannot help thinking that ought to be met. The case would otherwise have to be dealt with under the previous sub-section. It seems to me that the difficulty is one which my noble and learned Friend's ingenuity is equal to overcome.

Clause 3 agreed to.

Clause 4.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: In line 5 of this clause, I think something should be put in to meet the alteration which has been made by my noble and learned Friend.

LORD HERSCHELL: I have an Amendment in line 6 which I think would meet it, to insert "not to affect any such Director." It would then not cast liability on any of the Directors without whose knowledge or consent the prospectus was issued.

Amendment agreed to.

&c. BILL.—(No. 167.)

Amendments reported (according to order.)

LORD HERSCHELL: My noble Lords, I have to move to leave out Clause 3, and to insert some Amendments in Clause 4. The effect of that will be to empower certain persons to act, as in the case of Consuls, instead of defining the persons who may solemnise marriages in certain regions and districts as defined in clause, and thereupon declaring, as is proposed to be done by Clause 10, what ministers, Governors, and so on may perform these functions. I think it would be much simpler to leave out Clause 3, and to amend Clause 4, by giving to certain persons, when authorised in the same manner as Consuls, the same authority as the Consuls have under the Consular Marriages Act. I believe that the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs agrees that this carries out the purpose in view.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNOTSFORD): I have the authority of the noble Marquess, who was unable to stay, for saying that he assents to these Amendments.

LORD HERSCHELL: There are some consequential Amendments. It will be necessary to leave out Sub-section 2 of Section 10, and to omit the 2nd schedule.

Amendments made; Bill to be read 3^d on Thursday next; and to be printed as amended. (No. 259.)

SILVER HALL-MARKING IN INDIA.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*THE EARL OF NORTHBROOK, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the opinion of the Government of India has been asked with regard to the proposal that a system of "hall-marking" should be applied to silver articles manufactured in India, and if any despatch has been received from India on the subject, whether he has any objection to lay a copy of it upon the Table, said: My Lords, before putting the question to Her Majesty's Government of which I have given notice, I should like to congratulate the Government on having been able in this Session of Parliament to remedy the grievance that has been felt for many years in connection with this matter by persons engaged in the manufacture of silver articles in India. It is twelve years, I think, since a Committee of the House of Commons recommended that the duty on silver plate in India should be repealed. That recommendation was repeated by the Royal Commission over which my noble and learned Friend Lord Herschell presided, and nine years ago Mr. Gladstone, when he was Prime Minister, also expressed a desire that this duty should be repealed. But from untoward circumstances, it has remained until the present year, and I can assure the Government that the feeling of gratification in India will be very keen at finding that the duty has at last been repealed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in another place, has explained that it is not the intention of the Government to abolish the system of compulsory hall-marking in this country, and he indicated that it was intended that a system of "hall-marking of silver articles" should be established in India in respect to articles exported from India to this country. The present state of the law in respect of the import of silver articles from India is, I believe, that under the Inland Revenue Act, 1884, articles of Indian plate can be imported into this country without being assayed here, and it seems to me that condition of things is perfectly satisfactory to the Indian manufacturers of silver. Although it may possibly be an advantage to establish in India a system of voluntary hall-marking, it might very seriously affect the silver trade in India if any system of compulsory hall-marking should be established in that country. It will be obvious to your Lordships that to require that an article of art manufacture made, perhaps, 1,000 miles from the place where the article would be assayed should be brought up to be assayed in a semi-manufactured state, and then sent back to the artificer to finish, would be a most cumbrous and restrictive measure with respect to the manufacture of silver in India. But, however that may be, the Chancellor of the Exchequer very properly explained in another place that the Government did not intend to take any action in this matter without communication with the Government of India, and that Her Majesty's Government are actually in communication with the Government of India on the subject. That statement was made three months ago, and what I have to ask Her Majesty's Government is, whether they have received up to the present time any answer to that communication, and if such an answer has been received, whether there is any objection to its being laid on the Table of your Lordships' House?

LORD KNOTSFORD: My Lords, the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India has requested me to reply to the noble Earl's question, and to point out that the intentions of the Government, as indicated in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, were communicated to the Government of India, but the Government of India do not appear to be content with the arguments and statements of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The correspondence on the subject is not yet complete, but there will be no objection as soon as it is complete to lay it on the Table of the House.

House adjourned at five minutes before

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 5th August, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

THE PUBLIC VACCINATOR AT DENABY.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether a Government Inspector was recently sent down to inquire into certain charges made against Mr. Rowland Hills, the public vaccinator at Denaby, Yorkshire; whether it was proved to the satisfaction of the Inspector that Mr. Hills had made an arrangement with a man to vaccinate babies, to charge for the same, and then to give the parents unsigned certificates, which were subsequently signed by Mr. Hills, and presented to the Doncaster Guardians, when they were again charged for, as though the vaccination had been free; and what further action the Local Government Board intend to take in the matter?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): One of the Medical Inspectors of the Local Government Board has recently made inquiries into alleged irregularities in the performance of public vaccination in the Doncaster Union. There appears to be no doubt that Mr. Hills, the public vaccinator, had made an arrangement by which children were vaccinated by a Mr. Smith, an unqualified medical practitioner. The certificates of vaccination were filled in with the usual particulars by Mr. Smith, who vaccinated the children, and were then submitted by him to Mr. Hills, who, after signing them, as having himself performed the vaccination, forwarded the certificates to the Vaccination Offices. In some of these cases, although the vaccination fees were charged to the Guardians, payment was made to Mr. Smith by the parents. The Board have communicated with the Guardians, and requested them immediately to determine the contract with Mr. Hills, and have informed them that it will devolve upon them to consider what action they will take with regard to the cases in which they have been improperly charged with the vaccination fees.

EAST INDIAN CIVIL SERVANTS.

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if the House will have an opportunity of discussing the Report of the Committee on the grievances of East Indian Civil Servants before any action is taken upon it; if it was intended that the Committee should report not only on the existence or non-existence of real grievances, but also on the specific remedies to be applied; whether the Government or the Under Secretary personally are pledged to the approval of the Report by the circumstance of the Under Secretary moving it in Committee, or whether he merely acted ministerially to carry out the resolutions of the Committee; and whether, if it is desired to take any action, either in the direction of conceding the recommendations of the Committee, or submitting those recommendations for the consideration of the Government in India, anything more can be done than to lay those recommendations before the Council of India in Downing Street, and to leave it to the majority of that Council to decide on a matter affecting the finances of India, and especially payments from the Home Treasury, in accordance with the power vested in them by the Indian Councils Act?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The reply to paragraphs one and three of the question is—No, and to the second and fourth—Yes.

THE INDIAN BUDGET AND THE INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now fix the date for the Indian Budget Statement; and whether, in view of the fact that the Indian Councils Bill affects more than 200,000,000 of Her Majesty's subjects, and that repeated undertakings have been given for its ample discussion at an early period of the Session, he will arrange that the Second Reading be taken with as little delay as possible?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I join in the expression of regret which I understand this question is intended to convey, that it has not been possible to take the Indian Budget at an earlier period in the course of the present Session. But that is due, I am afraid, to the fact that the House has debated other questions at very considerable length. In regard to the Indian Councils Bill there can be no doubt that it is a very important measure, affecting a large number of Her Majesty's subject. I also acknowledge that I have given repeated undertakings to the hon. Member that, as far as was in my power, an opportunity should be afforded for the consideration of the measure. It has not been possible to redeem those pledges. I deeply regret the fact, and I am afraid that it will not be possible to afford an adequate opportunity for the discussion of the Bill this Session. The hon. Member will see that I am unable at present to appoint a day for the Indian Budget Statement. As soon as we have got through the other business it will be taken.

MR. BRADLAUGH: In consequence of the answer which the right hon. Gentleman has just given in reference to the Indian Councils Bill, and the decided implication that it will be impossible to proceed with it in the course of the present Session, may I ask that it may be taken early in the next Session? I know that there are many Members, who, during the last two months, have specially intimated their intentions of taking part in the Debates upon it. It is quite certain that whenever it is taken there must be a long Debate on the Second Reading, seeing the number of Amendments which stand upon the Paper, and the avowed intention of raising in Committee the question of the elective principle.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think it will be better, under the circumstances, that I should say at once that the Government will not proceed with the Bill this Session.

Mr. Bradlaugh

WORCESTER GRAMMAR SCHOOLS.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther) whether the Charity Commissioners have decided that nothing can be done in the direction of the amalgamation of the two ancient Grammar Schools at Worcester; and whether he is aware that there is no room for two efficient schools of the kind in the same town?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The Royal Free Grammar School in Worcester could not legally be amalgamated with the Cathedral School without the consent of the governing body of the latter, the former being an open, and the latter a denominational, endowment. The Commissioners are aware that there is not room for two co-ordinate schools of the same classical type in the city. They propose, therefore, to provide that the Royal Free Grammar School shall give a practical, modern education, at a low cost.

THE CONGO FREE STATE.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, under the General Congo Treaty of Berlin, 1885, the Congo Free State undertook that merchandise imported into that country should remain free from import or transit dues; whether, in violation of that undertaking, transit duties and an export duty of 5 per cent. are now levied on all exported goods; and whether, when the Brussels Act comes into force, if ever, the Congo Free State will be at liberty to raise both import and export duties; and, if so, to what percentage?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.):

1. The Congo Free State was a party to the provisions of the Berlin Act. 2. We are not aware that the Congo Free State levies transit dues. The Congo Act allows export dues. 3. As to import dues, the maximum under the Brussels Act will be 10 per cent. ad valorem, except as regards spirits, which will be subject to special regulations. They were sanctioned by the Brussels Conference, chiefly in order to enable the State to undertake the measures designed to extirpate the Slave Trade.

Mr. O'KELLY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the United States of America only consented to recognise the Congo Free State on the condition that merchandise imported to that territory should remain free of Import and Transit Duties; whether the Brussels Act can be enforced according to International Law without the consent of the United States; whether at the Brussels Conference the American Envoy opposed the proposition that the Congo Free State should be permitted to levy Import Duties, and declared the Conference incompetent to modify the Berlin Treaty of 1885; and whether the United States has since given its adhesion to the Brussels Act, authorising the establishment of Import and Transit Duties by the Congo State?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: (1) Yes. (2) Not as far as regards United States citizens. (3) The United States Government, at the commencement of the deliberations, raised objections to the levy of duties by the Congo State. (4) But subsequently signed a declaration relinquishing the right of the United States to the free entry of American merchandise into the Congo State, on the same conditions and within the same limits as those specified in the declaration signed by the Signatory Powers of the Berlin Act. This provisional declaration is eventually to be supplemented by a Treaty.

Mr. O'KELLY: Under the present Act will the Congo Free State be at liberty to levy both Import and Export Duties?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes. The Congo Free State will have the same liberty to impose Export Duties as it has now.

Mr. O'KELLY: Will it be competent for America to send in merchandise without paying Import Duties?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: My previous answer explains that point. If the American Government accedes to the Brussels Act, American merchandise will pay the same duties as that of other Powers.

THE BANSTEAD ASYLUM.

Mr. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been drawn to the following passage in the last Report of Her Majesty's Commissioners in Lunacy (Appendix C, page 215), with reference to the Banstead Asylum—

"Applicants for discharge were also a legion during our visit. On this point we could only refer them to the Committee (having ourselves no power in the matter), and were then too often answered that they never had an opportunity of speaking to the Committee. Doubtless this answer is beyond the truth, but we fear that the changes incident to recent legislation have interfered with the regular visitation of the wards by the Asylum Committee;"

and whether, in view of this serious testimony, he will consider the desirability of taking away the duty of visiting the asylums in the county of London from the London County Council, and restoring it to the Justices, or of handing it over to the Metropolitan Asylums Board?

*MR. RITCHIE: My attention has been drawn to the passage referred to in the Report of the Commissioners in Lunacy with reference to the Banstead Asylum. I have been in communication with the London County Council on the subject, and the Chairman of the Asylums Committee of the Council, who is also chairman of the Banstead Asylum Sub-Committee, states as follows:—

"The date of the Report in question is October 26th, 1889. The County Council took over the Asylums in the previous July. Therefore, these were early times to report on. I have been on the Banstead Committee of Management without a break for 10 years, formerly as a Justice, latterly as a County Councillor; and have been at every fortnightly meeting in all those years, except, perhaps, three or four. I am sure the County Councillors have visited the wards and interviewed the patients more frequently and more thoroughly than the Justices did. There has never been a break in the regular statutory visitation; and every fortnight some of the Committee inspect some of the wards and interview some inmates."

I see no ground for proposing that the duty of visiting the Asylums in the County of London should be taken away from the London County Council.

CUSTOMS OUTPORT CLERKS.

SIR HORACE DAVEY (Stockton-on-Tees): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether a Memorial has recently been forwarded from a large number of the Customs outport second-class clerks, praying for compensation for loss of prospects, and for re-arrangement of promotion, and whether the Board have declined to grant the prayer of the memorialists; whether the Treasury contemplate any immediate improvement in the position of these clerks, on the lines of the recent improvement in that of the Second Division of the Civil Service; whether a further reduction in the number of the first-class outport clerks is contemplated, and whether the vacancies in the list of clerks rising to £300 are intended to be filled up; whether it is intended to apply the seven hours system to the clerks as a body; and, if so, on what terms; and whether he will include the alleged grievances of these clerks in the inquiry which it is understood he is conducting in the matter of the outdoor branches of the Customs Service?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): A Petition has been received from a number of Customs outport second-class clerks, and has been refused by the Board as unreasonable. No reduction in the number of Customs first-class outport clerks is contemplated, but, of course, no pledge can be given that the existing number shall be rigidly maintained. No vacancies in the list of clerks rising to £300 at present exist. It is not intended to apply the seven hours system to these clerks as a body, but clerks accept promotion to the first-class on the understanding that they are liable for the seven hours. I regret that I cannot extend the inquiry I have undertaken in the case of the outdoor branches so as to include these clerks.

THE GRENADIER GUARDS.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will consent to place upon the Table of the House copies of the Minutes of the Courts Martial on the men of the Grenadier Guards, recently quartered at Wellington Barracks; and will he further consider the advisability of securing to soldiers similar publicity of trial as that of civilians in Magisterial Courts, and which, by the publicity of their proceedings, aid in diminishing crime?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): To produce the proceedings of these Courts Martial would not be to the benefit of the Public Service. I may, however, inform the hon. Member that perfect publicity of trial is secured to soldiers, as all Courts Martial are open Courts to which the public has free access.

In reply to a further question by Mr. GOURLEY,

*MR. E. STANHOPE said: I would venture to suggest that the House of Commons is not the proper place for discussing these proceedings.

TREATIES OF COMMERCE.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can inform the House which of the Treaties of Commerce now existing with foreign nations expire in 1892, upon 12 months' notice on either side; whether any of the existing Treaties lapse without notice being given; if the Departmental Committee now examining the Treaties at the Board of Trade, is taking evidence upon the wishes of the commercial communities of the United Kingdom and of the colonies; and if their Report will be laid before Parliament, and opportunity be afforded for discussing it prior to any action being taken, and before the time at which notice to terminate, either wholly or in part, must be given?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Commercial Treaties with Bulgaria, France, Italy, Montenegro, Portugal, and Spain, are terminable at various dates in 1892, upon 12 months' notice on either side, and if no such notices are given, will thereafter be terminable at 12 months' notice at any time. None of the existing Treaties lapse without notice. The Treaties Committee will, doubtless, consult the commercial bodies of this country respecting the wishes of British trade, but it is not proposed to extend their inquiries over the whole British Empire. It is not intended to depart from the course heretofore adopted in regard to the Executive having the charge and responsibility of commercial negotiations.

JEWS IN RUSSIA.

MR. ATKINSON (Boston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if anything can be done to influence the Emperor of Russia in favour of the Jews in his Empire, now threatened with severe affliction?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: These proceedings, which, if they are rightly reported to us, are deeply to be lamented, concern the internal affairs of the Russian Empire, and do not admit of any interference on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

MALTA.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, since the General Election in September, 1889, the Council of Government in Malta met for the first time on the 29th January, 1890, when little or nothing was done; whether it was kept closed from 29th January to 14th May; whether, just as it had got into working order, its sittings were again brought to an abrupt termination on 25th June; and whether, as there is before the Council of Government at the present time a Motion for an Address to Her Majesty which, among other prayers, contains one for removing from the Civil List the sum of £1,000, out of which all the expenses incurred by Sir Lintorn Simmons and his suite have been ordered to be paid, he can state when it is intended that the Council of Government shall be summoned for the discussion of this Motion, and for the despatch of the business of the island?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The statement in the first paragraph of the question is correct. The delay was caused by the change of Governors owing to the death of Sir H. Torrens. The answer to the second paragraph is, Yes. The Council was adjourned on the 25th of June, after passing several important Estimates, ordinances and useful measures. It was adjourned earlier than the Governor had anticipated on account of the three un-official Members of the Executive Council sending in their resignation which has been accepted. It is hoped that others will shortly be appointed fairly representing the majority of the Council of Government, which will meet again after vacation in October next.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the decrees of the Council of Trent have been promulgated in the Island of Malta; and, if so, by whom, at what date, and under what circumstances?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I would refer the hon. Member to what was said by the Secretary of State in another place, on the 24th ultimo, namely:—

"The Legal Authorities in Malta have advised that it was duly promulgated there, that it was accepted by the Civil Authorities, and that it has ever since continued to be the Civil Law of the island. We have no information as to the date and circumstances of the promulgation."

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he has received a letter from Mr. Savona, bearing date 12th July, 1890, on the Constitution of Malta, and the recent proceedings in the Council of Government of that island; and, if so, whether he can state what answer, if any, has been returned to the letter in question?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I have no knowledge of any such letter.

MR. SUMMERS: I am prepared to give the right hon. Gentleman a copy.

COMPOSITIONS FOR SHIPS.

SIR WILLIAM PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what are the names of the compositions which have been used in the Navy for the first time since the date of Commander Pitt's appointment at the Admiralty; whether the experts on the late Committee or the technical Dockyard Officers have been consulted as to the efficacy of Commander Pitt's instructions for guidance in the application of compositions to the bottoms of Her Majesty's ships, and as to the applicability of these instructions to the various compositions in use in the Navy; and whether any manufacturers who supply compositions to the Admiralty have been consulted by Commander Pitt with reference to these instructions; and, if so, what firms or agents?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Apart from the compositions which have been applied experimentally, Rahtjen's composition is the one which has been adopted for the use of the Navy since the Committee made their Report. This composition was at the time under trial. The answer to the second question is "No," the Admiralty being fully able to deal with the matter themselves. The reply to the third question is "Yes," namely, the Maritime and General Improvement Company:—Messrs. Peacock and Buchan, and the Suter, Hartmanu, and Rahtjen's Composition Company.

RAILWAY RATES.

MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk District): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Board have agreed with the London and North Western Railway Company as to the classification and Schedule to be embodied in a Provisional Order and reported upon to Parliament; and, if so, whether such Report will be made by the Board during the present Session; and whether, in the event of disagreement with the Company, the Board will determine the classification and Schedule which they are of opinion ought to be adopted, and report thereupon to Parliament before the expiration of the present Session, or if they intend to postpone such Report till Parliament meets in November?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Board of Trade have not been able to agree with the London and North Western Railway Company as to the classification and Schedule to be made applicable to them. Consequently, the Board of Trade will take the course provided for by Sub-section 6 of Section 24, and will make their Report to Parliament before the end of the present Session.

STAMP FRAUDS.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the recent conviction, at the Central Criminal Court, of two men, named Falvey and Foskett, for stamp frauds, to the rider to the jury's verdict in the case, and to the observations of the Judge when sentencing the prisoners; whether it is a fact that there has been considerable laxity in the proper custody of the stamping dies in the Department of the Chief Superintendent of Dies at Somerset House, and who are the superior Revenue Officers primarily responsible for this neglect of duty; whether it is known how long the fraudulent practices in question have been carried on; whether there is any truth in the rumour that, owing to the circulation of fraudulent stamps upon the Stock Exchange for some time past, the State has lost several thousands of pounds of Stamp Duty; and whether any absolute knowledge on this head has been arrived at by the Treasury, and has that Department made any special and independent inquiry into the matter, or does it propose to do so?

*THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth): In the absence of my right hon. Friend I will answer the question. The Board of Inland Revenue are not prepared to admit that considerable laxity in the proper custody of dies in their Stamping Department exists. These dies are kept strictly as laid down by the regulations for which they are responsible, but on the rider to the Jury's verdict, in the case of "The Queen v. Falvey and Foskett," being brought to their notice, the Board themselves, with the assistance of their solicitor, commenced a searching inquiry, which is still proceeding, with a view of ascertaining, if possible, the person or persons responsible for the fraud, and of making, if found desirable, stricter regulations as to the custody of the dies. There is no reason to believe that these frauds have been going on for any length of time, and the evidence disclosed at the Police Court and at the trial only pointed to the fraudulent use of dies on three dates in March of this year. There is no reason to give credit to any rumour that the State has lost several thousands of pounds of Stamp Duties. The facts have not yet been sent officially to the Treasury, pending the inquiry by the Board of Inland Revenue, but they will be reported on as soon as that inquiry is completed.

SUGAR CONVENTION BILL.

MR. TATTON EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is true that the Sugar Convention Bill has passed the French Chambers; and what steps Her Majesty's Government intend to take to fulfil the international engagement made by this country?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Bill which has been passed by the French Chambers is not the Sugar Convention Bill, but one of domestic policy, designed to reconp the State for the great profits which the sugar refiners are said to have been making by the existing system. As regards the second paragraph of the question, the time for the ratification of the Convention expired on the 1st of August.

WESTMINSTER HALL.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicester, Mid): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether his attention has been called to the decay of the new stone-work on the west side of Westminster Hall?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The new stone-work of the new buildings on the west side of Westminster Hall has been carefully examined, and, with the exception of two or three small stones, which are evidently soft, there is no decay. Some interesting stones which were taken from the old buttresses have, however, been raised in corresponding positions in the new buttresses and these, having been covered up in the old buildings for many years are, now that they are again exposed to the atmosphere, showing signs of decay on the surface, but this, after a time, will probably cease to a great extent. With respect, however, to the new stone-work which has been used as a facing to the main wall in the interior of the Hall, I regret to say that, from some reason which cannot at present be explained, certain patches of the work are undoubtedly decaying on the surface, and, strange to say, in the same places as the decay had principally occurred in the old stonework before the repairs were effected. The architect, Mr. Pearson, is at present quite unable to account for this mysterious decay, and assures me that the stone selected for the work (Ketton) is the best for the London atmosphere, and this opinion would appear to be borne out by its standing well on the outside of the building. It is believed that there must be some peculiarity in the mortar of those parts of the old wall where the decay is taking place, and I intend to have the matter thoroughly investigated at once, with a view of ascertaining the cause, if possible.

THE NAVAL MANŒUVRES.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what information he has as to the firing of the heavy guns of H.M.S. Hero and Inflexible (the most powerful ships of the squadron which actually fired their heavy guns) during the present manœuvres on Friday last; whether it supports the account in the Times, of 4th August, that—

that at the conclusion of her independent firing on Friday the Inflexible reported that—

“The guns could not be run in, and that it was therefore necessary to take the pistons out, which could not be safely done at sea. If the operation had been real warfare instead of peaceable target practice half the heavy armament of these two powerful ships would have been disabled early in the action, not by the fire of the enemy but by their own inherent defects.”

MR. GOURLEY: I also beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it is correct that, during the heavy gun practice off the Scilly Islands on Friday last, two of the four 80-ton guns on board the Inflexible were for a considerable time disabled by accidents to their hydraulic gear, and that, on Saturday, one of the 44-ton guns of the Hero was disabled from the same cause; and whether, in consequence of these (and similar accidents during the Manœuvres of last year), Her Majesty's Government will consent to the appointment of a Departmental or Select Committee, to inquire into the whole system of gunnery in connection with the Navy, and more especially for the purpose of ascertaining whether the proposals for arming the ironclads now building under the Naval Defence Act, with big guns, are the most suitable for Naval warfare?

CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I also wish to ask the noble Lord whether it is true, as stated in the newspapers, that at heavy gun target practice off the Scilly Isles, on Friday last, two of the four 80-ton guns on board the Inflexible, and one of the two 44-ton guns on board the Hero became totally disabled; and will he inform the House who is responsible for the defective construction of these guns?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: No reports have as yet been received at the Admiralty of failure in the hydraulic arrangements for working the heavy guns of the Inflexible and Hero. As regards the Inflexible, all the 80-ton guns were in continuous use for 10 consecutive hours at the bombardment of Alexandria, firing the maximum charges of powder the whole time, and there was not the slightest failure of any sort whatever at any time in any of the hydraulic arrangements during the whole period of the action in question. As regards the Hero, her heavy guns have been continuously used for instruction during the last two years in the training of seamen gunners at Portsmouth, and during the whole of that period there has been no failure in the hydraulic arrangements for working the heavy guns. I have full confidence in my gunnery advisers and the Board of Admiralty are thoroughly satisfied as to the efficiency and system of working heavy guns in the Navy, and there is, therefore, no intention of appointing a Committee to inquire into the subject.

THE NEW MAGAZINE RIFLE.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can now state the result of the official inquiry as to the jamming and other defects in the new magazine rifle, mentioned in the Times report of the recent practice at Bisley?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I have not yet received a Report, and I must ask my hon. Friend to postpone the question.

THE PAPAL COURT OF ROME.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTICK (Whitehaven): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, during the last Administration of the late Sir Robert Peel, and subsequently, the British Government was diplomatically represented at the Papal Court of Rome by a functionary, who, although nominally attached to the British Legation of Tuscany, was, in fact, accredited to the Pope of Rome?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: At the time referred to, and subsequently, an Attaché to the British Mission in Tuscany resided at Rome, and was in confidential communication with the Papal Government. But he was not accredited to the Holy See.

Lord G. Hamilton

REPORTS, POLICE (COUNTIES AND BOROUGHES).

MR. HENRY J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that, in the "Reports, Police (Counties and Boroughs)" for 1889, the tables on pages 118 and 119 do not give the population according to the Census of 1871, so as to be uniform with the similar tables on pages 222, 223, 318, and 319, and that the table on pages 318 and 319 entirely omits the population in the case of about 31 boroughs; whether he will consent to a re-issue of the three tables, so as to make them uniform and complete; and whether he will take steps to prevent a repetition of these omissions?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The three tables were prepared by the Inspectors, and it is true there is some slight want of uniformity in them. I will give instructions, so that hereafter this may be remedied. The 31 boroughs have not been omitted, but having, in pursuance of the Local Government Act, been merged in counties, their figures are included in the County Returns.

CHURCH AND POOR'S LAND, DEFFORD.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith whether he is aware that in the new scheme for the administration of the Church and Poor's land of the township of Defford, in the County of Worcester, the Charity Commissioners have stipulated that the three representative Trustees shall have a ratable qualification of not less than £15, whereby all members of the working classes of the district, and also any other person occupying a house without land attached, will be entirely excluded from the administration of the charity; whether he is aware that instead of the share of the poor in the fund being distributed in coal, as hitherto, it is intended that this shall only take place after a preference has been shown by subscriptions to dispensary, infirmary, hospital, convalescent home, and provident clubs, a method of distribution which is generally objected to by the people of the country districts; and whether the Commissioners intend to take any action in the matter?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: According to the original Trusts of the endowment of the Church and Poor's Land of Defford, the Trustees are to be "landowners of Defford, which are of the best, largest, and ablest estates there," and the Commissioners consider that their proposal fairly represents the original qualification. The provisions for the application of income, which are inserted in the draft scheme, are those in general use in schemes for dole charities; they were approved by a Select Committee in 1884; they do not give preference to any one of the several alternate modes of application suggested, of which distribution in coal and other articles in kind is one.

ANGLO-FRENCH AGREEMENT.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government has entered into negotiations with France respecting Madagascar; and, if so, whether they will give the House an opportunity of pronouncing a judgment before concluding a Treaty on the subject?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I must ask the hon. Member to postpone the question until Thursday. I think I shall then be able to give him a more satisfactory answer than I could give him to-day.

ANGLO-GERMAN AGREEMENT.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is the case that Sections 1 and 2 of Article III. of the Anglo-German Agreement define the boundaries of the Cape Colony and the German Territories; whether the Cape Government have been consulted as to these boundaries; and whether it is the intention of the Government to consult the Cape Ministry as to the further delimitation of the Cape Territory at Walfisch Bay, before offering a settlement, or going to arbitration, as defined in Clause 2 of Article III. of the Anglo-German Agreement?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: As this question only appeared on the Paper to-day I must also ask the hon. Member to postpone it. Perhaps before question time is over I may be able to answer it, but I cannot at this moment.

Subsequently,

*SIR J. FERGUSSON said: Section 1 of Article 3 speaks of the Orange River as a boundary. As this made no change in the status quo, there was no question on which consultation was required by the Cape Government. The remainder of the section and the 2nd section do not define the boundaries of the Cape Colony; the contiguous territories belong to the Crown Protectorate of Bechuanaland, and to Khama's country, which is under Imperial protection. As regards Walfisch Bay, Her Majesty's Government have complete knowledge of the question in dispute, as stated on behalf of the Cape and on behalf of Germany. They would give the Cape Government every opportunity of strengthening their case before going to arbitration.

DR. CLARK: Was the right hon. Gentleman mistaken yesterday when he said that the Cape Colony would not be considered because its interests were not affected? As its interests are affected, will he carry out his pledge of May 19, that it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to ascertain and give due consideration to the opinion of the colonies before the question is finally settled?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have nothing to add to the very full answer I have given to the hon. Member.

P.C. MARR.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department whether a police constable named Marr, who, at the Manchester Assizes in December, 1888, was convicted of manslaughter, and sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment, being at the same time severely censured by the Judge for having perjured himself, has since his release been re-admitted into the Force, and is at the present time serving in the D Division of the Manchester City Police, or is on the probation list, with the view of being reinstated in the Police Force; and whether he can make any representations to the Police Authority in Manchester on the subject?

*MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; it is the fact that this man is on the probation list in consequence of there being a strong feeling among the Local Authorities that he was not guilty of the offence of which he was accused. It is not the fact, as alleged, that he was severely censured by the learned Judge.

ERZEROUH.

MR. SCHWANN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has had any further information as to the five prisoners incarcerated in the prison of Erzeroum for a full twelvemonth, namely, Bedros Athamian and four others, and as to the five prisoners imprisoned for the last three years in the gaol of Erzingian, namely, Ohannes Kaladjian, Boghos Berberian, Nichan K. Artzruni d'Eguin, Nichan Akevnian, and an Armenian priest of Seghert; whether he is aware that their only offence was having a patriotic song, written in pencil, in their wallets, which they had not published in any way, as is necessary for conviction according to Turkish law; and whether Moussa Bey has been brought to a second trial, as was reported was to be done; and, if so, what stage has the trial reached?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Grand Vizier denies that there are any Christian Armenians either at Erzeroum or at Erzingian who have been kept in prison any length of time without trial. Moussa Bey has not yet been put on his trial again, but he has not been allowed to leave Constantinople.

LIBEL ACTION AT MANCHESTER ASSIZES.

MR. SCHWANN: I had intended to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been drawn to the report of a libel action tried at the recent Manchester Assizes before Mr. Justice Vaughan Williams, wherein it was stated that the police had handed over to the plaintiffs in the case a petition against a house which it was alleged or suspected was used for immoral purposes, and if it is customary to treat such communications as privileged; and whether the police exceeded their duty in handing the document to the tenants of the house in question, upon which letter the case was based; but I will postpone it until another day.

OUTRAGES IN MACEDONIA.

MR. LEVESON GOWER (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether British Consuls in the Ottoman dominions enjoy the right or are granted permission to visit State prisons; whether, in that event, they ever do so; whether Her Majesty's Government are in possession of any Consular Reports upon the condition of Turkish prisons; and, should no such Reports be in existence, whether the Government will direct Her Majesty's Representative at Constantinople to request the Porte to give British Consuls facilities to test the accuracy of recent statements as to the horrible state of the prison in Uskup, and the habitual use of torture there and in other prisons of Macedonia?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am now able to reply to a question put by the hon. Member for Stoke on the 31st July, that inquiries have been made with regard to the reports appearing in the Daily News of the 29th of July; that the manager of the Salonica Railway emphatically contradicts those statements, and states that 10 months ago two Albanian women were run down and killed by an engine, and that, in consequence, some of their relatives a week afterwards fired on a train, but did no injury, and that there has been no repetition of any such outrage. It appears, therefore, that the information furnished by the Daily News correspondent that the stoker and three Mussulman passengers were killed is not correct. Her Majesty's Government have received the further information that the correspondent—a German gentleman named Weitz—who was expelled from Servia last winter for inventing sensational news, did not visit Pristina, as represented by him, but only went to Nievasovitz, and returned the same day to Uskup.

ARMENIA.

MR. LEVESON-GOWER: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is the fact, as stated by the Daily News correspondent at Erivan, in the issue of the 4th instant, that Martini-Henry rifles have been distributed by orders from Constantinople to the Kurds of Moosh, Bitlis, Van, Bayazid, and Alashgerd; whether the Turkish troops, in obedience to their instructions, shoot down any Armenians found in possession of firearms; whether the arming of Mussulmans and disarmament of the Christians in Bulgaria immediately preceded and occasioned the massacres in that country in 1876; and whether Her Majesty's Government propose to warn the Porte of the probable consequences of similar action in Armenia?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: We have received no information of the statements mentioned in the first and second paragraphs. As to the third, full particulars of the events of 1876 in Bulgaria will be found in the Blue Book presented to Parliament at the time. There might be much said for and against such a statement. As to the fourth paragraph, I have already stated that I must decline to give any particulars as to communication which Her Majesty's Government may consider it expedient to make to the Porte.

THE MERCHANDISE MARKS ACT.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the President of the Board of the Trade if, having regard to the unanimity of the Select Committee upon Merchandise Marks as to the desirability of the public prosecution either on the part of the Board of Trade, or of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Customs, in respect of offences against "The Merchandise Marks Act, 1887," and to the improbability of the House offering any serious opposition to the carrying out of such recommendation, he can introduce and pass a short Bill to that effect should legislative sanction be necessary?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: As I have not yet had an opportunity of seeing the Report to which my hon. Friend refers, which has not yet been circulated, I am not in a position to give an answer to the question; but when I have done so, it will be my duty to consider, in conjunction with other Departments of the Government, what course should be adopted. I am not sure that legislation would be necessary, but there would be no time to undertake it during the present Session.

THE VATICAN.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, during the last Administration of the late Sir Robert Peel and subsequently, the British Government was diplomatically represented at the Papal Court of Rome by a functionary who, although nominally attached to the British Legation of Tuscany, was in fact accredited to the Pope of Rome?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: At the time referred to, and subsequently, an Attaché to the British Mission in Tuscany resided at Rome, and was in confidential communication with the Papal Government; but he was not accredited to the Holy See.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether there are any Papers in the Foreign Office relating to the Special Mission of the Duke of Norfolk to the Vatican in 1887; and, if there are, whether they can be laid before Parliament?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: There are some Despatches in the case of the Mission of the Duke of Norfolk, and if it is desired they could be produced, but they are purely formal; there is nothing of a political character in them.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I wish also to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether there are any Papers in the Foreign Office relating to the Mission of Sir George Errington to the Vatican, and, if there are, whether they can be laid before Parliament?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: There is an extensive correspondence reaching from 1881 to 1885 in the Foreign Office relating to Sir George Errington's communications with the Vatican, which were left for future Secretaries of State in accordance with the undertaking given by Mr. Gladstone in 1883. As many of them relate to individuals, or to questions affecting Foreign States, they would require careful examination before any decision could be taken as to the possibility of presenting them to Parliament.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Were there not two Missions of the Duke of Norfolk to Rome?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Duke of Norfolk did go twice: whether there were two Missions I cannot say.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Were there not two separate charges against the public moneys?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think not.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): If the right hon. Gentleman produces any Papers to the House in connection with the Duke of Norfolk Mission, will he produce all with regard to Sir George Errington? I would remind him that when the matter was before the House recently he undertook, at the request of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) to look into the correspondence of previous Missions as well, and to consider whether they could not be brought before the House at the same time.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is perfectly accurate to say that I did undertake to consider whether I could produce a sort of narrative of the communications that had passed between successive Governments through the medium of gentlemen at Rome and the Vatican. That is a matter that will involve considerable labour and some time, and, therefore, I am not able to give any decision at present.

MR. DILLON: Do we understand that the matter will be considered at a future time?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Certainly.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): With regard to the ambiguous reply of the right hon. Gentleman as to the Mission of the Duke of Norfolk, I wish to ask if he was sent to Rome twice, and received different instructions on each occasion?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman will see that I am not prepared to answer questions of this kind off-hand. I can simply answer the question on the Paper of which I have had notice.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have answered the question already. On one occasion on which the Duke of Norfolk went to Rome he had no Mission whatever from Her Majesty's Government, and the second time it was on a purely formal and complimentary Mission.

MR. O'KELLY: Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to produce that portion of the correspondence relating exclusively to Ireland?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am not aware that any portion of the correspondence relates exclusively to Ireland, and, therefore, can give no undertaking of the kind.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Sir G. Errington's negotiations with the Vatican from 1881 to 1885 were such as to constitute his proceedings there a Mission in the ordinary sense of the word.

Mr. Dillon

*MR. W. H. SMITH: My hon. Friend will see that this is a question which is more a matter of opinion than a matter of fact. Sir G. Errington did not occupy the position of an accredited Ambassador or Minister to the Holy See, but, undoubtedly, he was the medium for making communications between the Government of Great Britain and the Holy See.

*MR. SUMMERS: Did Mr. Errington receive any appointment or any remuneration for his services?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I believe he was made a Baronet afterwards.

CARDINAL MANNING.

COLONEL SANDYS (Lancashire, S.W., Bootle): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been drawn to a letter which appeared in the Morning Post of 14th July, from the Secretary to the Royal Commission appointed by the late Government in 1884 on the Housing of the Working Classes, in which the writer says that—

"Cardinal Manning was accorded his precedence on that Commission not as a matter of courtesy, but as a personage of princely rank;"

whether this accordance of precedence was in conformity with a precedent created in the grant of a Charter for the Royal University in Ireland by the Government in 1880; whether the concession of such precedence on a Commission appointed under the Royal Sign Manual now confers such rank and precedence upon Dr. Manning, and would confer them upon any other Cardinal appointed by the Pope to a see in Great Britain or Ireland; and whether Her Majesty's Government will take steps to prevent in future such precedence being accorded over the highest representatives of the Protestant Churches?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have no official knowledge of what took place in 1884 under the Government of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, and no responsibility in respect to it. As Her Majesty's Government do not at present contemplate the appointment of any Cardinal upon any Royal Commission, it does not seem necessary to make any provisions with respect to the precedence which would be accorded to a Cardinal in such a case. The point raised in the second and third paragraphs of the hon.

Member's question is a purely legal point, which I cannot undertake to answer.

IRELAND—CASE OF MR. McCURTIN.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether an inquiry under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act has been instituted in the town of Tipperary; and, if so, for what purpose; and whether Mr. McCurtin was summoned to give evidence on the 29th July, and on his refusing to be sworn was committed to gaol for a week, and was taken handcuffed through the town on his way to the gaol; and, if so, for what reason handcuffs were used?

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, when Mr. William McCurtin was being conveyed to Clonmel Gaol on the 29th ultimo, he was handcuffed by the police; what was Mr. William McCurtin's offence, was he a first-class misdemeanant, and is it usual to put handcuffs on such prisoners; and what was the offence of Morgan Hayes, lately sent to prison from Tipperary, was he a first-class misdemeanant, and was he handcuffed to a prisoner who had several times been convicted of robbery?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): With the permission of the House I shall now also reply to the two questions of the hon. Member for South Tipperary on the same subject. The inquiry referred to is not one under the statute mentioned; but is the ordinary Magisterial investigation constituted and authorised in indictable cases by the Petty Sessions Act, Section 9, Sub-section 2. The questions asked witnesses are being confined to the subject-matter of the inquiry. McCurtin was, under the powers contained in that Act, committed in custody for eight days. Handcuffs were used as a crowd was observed to be collecting, and an attempted rescue was apprehended. A man named Morgan Hayes was sent to prison for seven days, with hard labour, in default of paying a fine of 10s. for an assault on a constable when on duty. He was handcuffed to a man who was convicted at the same Court of a minor offence. No record can be found of any recent convictions against that prisoner of the nature indicated in the question.

MR. DILLON: Why were these gross indignities inflicted upon persons accused of trifling offences?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In one of the cases there was a charge of throwing an explosive.

MR. DILLON: The only charge against Mr. McCurtin was that he refused to be sworn, and was sent to gaol for seven days as a first-class misdemeanant.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The charge before the Magistrate was throwing an explosive, and Mr. McCurtin refused to give evidence. In other words, he refused to assist in the administration of justice.

MR. SEXTON: Can the right hon. Gentleman state any fact in justification for the belief that a rescue was apprehended?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Such matters must be left to the judgment of the police, who, of course, must act at the moment.

POST OFFICE SICK PAY.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether full pay during sick leave has recently been granted to officers of the Post Office in England and Scotland; and whether the measure is to apply also to Ireland; and, if so, why the Belfast office has not been included in the new scheme?

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigton): Yes, Sir; the new rule granting full pay during sick leave applies to Ireland, and it is already in operation at Belfast.

LICENCES IN MONAGHAN.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can explain what special circumstances influenced His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to interfere to procure a licence for Charles Mitchell, of Shantonagh, County Monaghan, in opposition to the wishes of the inhabitants of the locality, the clergy of various denominations, and the landlord of the townland, and the repeated refusals of the Magistrates and the County Court Judge to grant such licence; whether he can give the name and denomination of the clergyman who is alleged to favour the granting of a licence to Mitchell, and give the number of Mitchell's customers, in addition to the inhabitants of the police barrack, the only house within a considerable distance of the licensed house, who are said to be anxious for drinking facilities; whether it is a fact that two of the three Resident Magistrates who attended the Castleblayney Licensing Sessions on the 20th July, reside outside the County Monaghan; and, if so, where do they reside; can he explain why they attended the Castleblayney Licensing Sessions; whether Mitchell's temporary retail licence will in the meantime be renewed; and whether he will advise the Lord Lieutenant not to give Mitchell any further help, either by the aid of Resident Magistrates, or by the use of His Excellency's influence with the Board of Inland Revenue, to establish what the inhabitants of Shantonagh regard as a source of demoralisation in their midst against their declared wish?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: (1 and 2) Charles Mitchell has held for some years a spirit-grocer's and beer-retailer's licence. The granting of a temporary publican's licence to Mitchell, pending the decision to be come to on his application to Quarter Sessions, was recommended by the Lord Lieutenant in the exercise of his discretion. The application to Quarter Sessions has not been opposed by the inhabitants of the locality. Two clergymen are opposed to it, and one, the Reverend Mr. Knox, a Presbyterian, favours it. I am informed that the number of Mitchell's customers in favour of the licence could not be readily ascertained, but that the great majority undoubtedly are so. (3) One of the Resident Magistrates referred to is a Magistrate for the County Monaghan, and had been acting for some months in the Castleblayney district. He lives at Armagh. The other who is likewise a Magistrate for the County Monaghan is Resident Magistrate for the greater portion of the sub-district in which the licensed premises are situated. He lives at Virginia, County Cavan. (4) They attended as Resident Magistrates connected with the Quarter Sessions district. (5) The temporary licence has been renewed until the hearing of the application at the Annual (October) Licensing Sessions.

REVISION COURT, MONAGHAN.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that great inconvenience and loss is caused to the inhabitants of portions of the Emyvale district of the North Monaghan Parliamentary Division who have to travel a distance of 18 miles to attend the Revision Court held in Monaghan; and whether, as Emyvale is a Petty Sessions district, with a population of about 9,000, he will cause a Revision Court to be held there?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I fear I cannot add anything to the reply given to a similar question on this subject asked by the hon. Member on 6th September, 1886. Since that date no new circumstances have come under the notice of the Government tending to alter the decision then come to. The decision then arrived at was stated by the then Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Holmes, Dublin University), who said—

"The places for holding Revision Courts are not determined by the Revising Barristers, but by the Lord Lieutenant in Council. In selecting the places the convenience of the electors and the suitability of the accommodation are carefully considered, regard also being had to the fact that every additional Court imposes an additional charge on the ratepayers. Careful inquiry was recently made as to the expediency of holding Revision Sessions at Emyvale and Scotstown. It appeared, however, that Monaghan, which is the market town of these districts, was probably the most convenient place for a large proportion of the voters residing therein; and as regards those at a greater distance, the Revising Barrister, by taking their cases first, was able to dispose of them on the first day of the Sessions. In any case, it is too late to make any change before the next Revision."

EVICTIIONS ON BLASKET ISLANDS.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Sheriff is bound to find means of conveyance for himself and his men when he is going on eviction duty, or to seize under a decree; and, if so, on what ground ships of Her Majesty's Navy are placed at the disposal of the Sheriff and his officers when going to evict tenants, or to seize for rent, on islands off the coast of Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Sheriff, under ordinary circumstances, is bound to find the means of conveyance for himself and his assistants to effect evictions; but where the forces of the Crown are requisitioned to secure the carrying out of the law in cases where the opposition to the evictions would otherwise render its enforcement impossible, the Government have decided that the Sheriff may be afforded accommodation in Her Majesty's ships for himself and assistants, with the protecting police force when they have to proceed by sea, the Sheriff, as already explained, paying the expenses of subsistence for his party.

MR. DILLON: As this is a very important question, I wish to ask the Home Secretary if it is true that the gunboat Britomart took away from Blasket Islands the property of the fishermen; and whether Her Majesty's Government have determined not only to assist in carrying out evictions, but also to despoil the fishermen of their property?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am afraid that I must have notice of the question.

CASTLE ISLAND, CORK.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether four policemen have been stationed for more than a year on Castle Island, off the West Coast of Cork; for what purpose are they stationed there; whether it is a fact that these policemen dig potatoes for the emergency men in charge of Mr. Mullasmion's evicted farm, row these emergency men into Schull, and do other work for them; and whether he can state how much it costs to maintain these four policemen?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that three policemen have been stationed on Castle Island since the 17th April, 1889. The strength was increased to four men in April, 1890. They are stationed there for the protection of Mullasmion's two caretakers and a neighbouring farmer who paid his rent, and on whose property outrage has been committed. The police do not dig potatoes for the emergency men. Having to accompany the caretakers to and from the island, they assist in rowing the boat in which all are conveyed. The police do not work for these caretakers. Approximate cost, since the formation of the protection post, £235.

DEATH THROUGH NEGLECT.

DR. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the death of Bridget Hoban, of Coolarn, Ballinatimon Union, County Mayo; if he is aware that the death has been caused through the neglect of the officials of the Union; that when the husband of the woman went to the doctor with an order to attend the wife on the 2nd of July, the doctor told him to go to hell; and if he will cause inquiry to be made into the circumstances of this case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot find that there is any Union in Ireland of the name mentioned. If the hon. Member will renew the question, stating the correct name of the Union and the name of the Medical Officer against whom the allegation has been brought, the necessary inquiries shall be made.

COLLEGE OF SCIENCE IN DUBLIN.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, notwithstanding the intimation conveyed in Mr. Ward Hunt's letter to Mr. Corry, of the 11th January 1867, namely, that the Treasury concurred in the arrangements proposed for placing and maintaining the College of Science in Dublin in a state of efficiency, the proposed arrangements have never since been made, although continual applications to that effect have been received from the Dean and Council of the College; whether the last memorial in December, 1889, of the Dean and Council on the subject correctly represented that the development of the College renders it urgently necessary to extend the buildings so as to relieve the congested condition of the laboratories and library, and to meet the requirements of the yearly increasing number of students; that new chemical and metallurgical laboratories and a new lecture room are required; that the attendance of students in the college is limited by the insufficiency of the present accommodation; and that the work of professors and students is interfered with, and rendered difficult by overcrowding, want of proper ventilation, bad lighting, and by the grave structural defects and general unsuitability of the buildings; and whether steps will now be taken to make such extensions and improvements as the health of the staff and students, and the interests of the College, urgently require.

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I am most anxious to see the College of Science developed and made thoroughly effective, which cannot be the case so long as the difficulties referred to in the second paragraph of the hon. Member's question exist, and I am in communication with the Treasury on the subject.

IRISH WITNESSES EXPENSES.

MR. PATRICK JOSEPH O'BRIEN (Tipperary, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, although John Moonan, of Drogheda, was allowed 10s. expenses by the Crown Solicitor, Mr. Caraher, for attending as a witness at the Drogheda Quarter Sessions on the 22nd April last, and Mr. Thomas Brady, Drogheda, Moonan's employer, was allowed the same amount for similar attendance, Sergeant Harbournne, of Drogheda, got cash order for these sessions, and paid Mr. Brady his expenses, but converted Moonan's 10s. to his own use; and whether he will inquire into the circumstances of the case?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that the allegation that Sergeant Harbournne converted Moonan's expense allowance to his own use is without foundation. The Sergeant handed both cash orders to Mr. Brady.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. HENRY J. WILSON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland where information can be found showing the extent to which the recommendations of the Royal Irish Constabulary Committee of Inquiry of 1888 have been acted upon?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As stated in reply to a question put by the hon. Member on August 6, 1889, the recommendations of the Committee of Inquiry of 1883, to which it is assumed the present question refers, were dealt with partly by the statute 46 & 47 Vic. c. 14, and partly by Departmental regulations. As then stated, the hon. Member can have a Return on the subject if he will put the necessary notice down on the Paper.

MR. JASPER TULLEY.

DR. FITZGERALD: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Jasper Tulley, Editor of the Roscommon Herald, now a prisoner in Tullamore Prison, is suffering from diarrhoea; that he is still sleeping on a plank bed; that he is stripped naked for a portion of each day; and that his life is in danger; and whether he can take any steps to secure an alteration of the treatment of this prisoner?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not yet received a special Report on this question, but the allegations therein contained appear from another Report I have received to be unfounded. If, however, the hon. Member will repeat the question I shall obtain further information.

DR. FITZGERALD: Since a similar question was answered yesterday, I telegraphed to Tullamore for information, and I have received a telegram in reply stating that the facts are true. I will put a further question on Monday.

GRANTS UNDER THE EDUCATION CODES.

COLONEL LLOYD ANSTRUTHER (Suffolk, Woodbridge): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether it is correct, as stated in a letter to the Times by the Rector of Baylham, Suffolk, that it is the intention of the Department to withhold the £10 grant under Article 105 from schools which already obtain a special grant under Article 104?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The letter from which the Rector of Baylham quotes was, I regret to say, due to a misapprehension on the part of an officer of the Department, and I am glad of this opportunity of again stating that the grant of £10, under Article 105 and Section 2 of the Code Act, 1890, will be in addition to any special grant obtained under Act 104 and Section 19 of the Elementary Education Act, 1876.

MR. SWINBURNE AND THE CZAR.

*MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury a question of which I have given the right hon. Gentleman private notice. It is whether his attention has been called to a poem by Mr. Algernon Charles Swinburne in the current number of the Fortnightly Review, containing a direct incitement to the assassination of the Czar; whether any representation relative to this publication has been made to Her Majesty's Government by the Government of Russia, and whether Her Majesty's Government intend to prosecute Mr. A. C. Swinburne or the publisher or printer of the Fortnightly Review for this gross incitement to assassination of the Sovereign of a friendly nation. Perhaps I may be permitted to read an extract. It says—

"Night brings but one red star—tyrannicide!"—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! This House has no control over a poet's opinions.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: This question is an illustration of the inconvenience of asking questions without putting a notice on the Paper. I received private notice from the hon. Member about a quarter of an hour ago that he would ask the question. I inquired of my right hon. Colleagues near me whether they had seen, or read, or heard of the publication, and I could not find that any of them had. A question of this consequence ought to have been placed on the Paper in the ordinary way if it was necessary to ask it.

*MR. P. O'BRIEN: I will put it on the Paper.

LORD DARTMOUTH AND MR.

HANBURY—PRIVILEGE.

MR. HANBURY: I wish to ask, with your permission, Sir, and the permission of the House, to make a statement on a matter of privilege, which need not form a subject of full discussion. It may be within the knowledge of some Members of the House that in the course of last week a letter was published in the Times signed "Dartmouth, Lord Lieutenant of Staffordshire." In that letter, as it appeared to me, Lord Dartmouth presumed to pass a censure upon me as a Magistrate of Staffordshire in his capacity of Lord Lieutenant, in connection with a subject in no way relating to any Magisterial duty, but for a speech actually made in my place in this House. On the next day Lord Dartmouth, on seeing his letter in print, somewhat hurriedly it seems, wrote another letter to the Times, explaining his first letter and conveying what purported to be his real meaning. I feel sure that this was a generous attempt to remedy the first error, but, unfortunately, it seems to have failed still more to express clearly what was really meant. The error admitted as to the first letter unfortunately characterised the second also. I therefore thought it my duty to send Lord Dartmouth the following telegram:—

"Expect letter from me to-morrow. Yours to-day makes case worse."

Thereupon that same evening I despatched a letter to Lord Dartmouth, expressed in decided and perhaps vigorous language, which I do not know that it is necessary, so far as relates to Lord Dartmouth, to make public, in view of what I think the thoroughly satisfactory explanation which I am now enabled to read to the House. My letter reached Lord Dartmouth on Sunday morning, and on Monday morning I received the following letter:—

"Patshull House, Wolverhampton, Aug. 3.

"Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt this morning of your letter of yesterday, and, in the first place, to express my regret at having given you cause to complain of want of proper consideration on my part for not communicating to you my intention to comment on your speech with reference to the action of the officers of the Guards in not returning the salutes of their men—in a letter to the Times. I, therefore, consider it my duty to offer you my apologies for this omission. Next I have, very decidedly, to assure you that I have no intention to pass any official censure as Lord Lieutenant of Staffordshire upon your action in Parliament, my sole object having been in alluding to my official position to emphasise my protest against that action, and I consider that I was protesting against your censure of the officers in my first letter. This really is all I have to say by way of explanation on this part of the matter, having had no wish whatever to question your privilege as a Member of the House of Commons. With regard to my second letter to the Times, published yesterday, I desire to explain that it was the result of a comment made to me personally that I had seemed in my (first) letter to express my regret that you were a Magistrate for Staffordshire, and this being entirely contrary to my meaning, I thought it right to supplement my first letter by my second. I go on to ask you to read the enclosed letter which I yesterday prepared to send to the Times, but did not post, thinking that after your telegram I had, on the whole, better wait for the letter from you which you led me to expect, but I do not now intend to despatch that letter, although I will ask you to return it at your convenience. No doubt you will gather from it that, under no pressure whatever, I repudiated any intention to pass any official censure upon you, and I have further to add that I claim no right as Lord Lieutenant to censure any Magistrate for speech or conduct, public or private, being well aware that it is not in my power to do so. This will, I hope, satisfy you that I never thought of interfering with your privileges, either as a Member of Parliament or a Magistrate. Merely adding that my private opinions upon the subjects as to which I wrote my letter to the Times of the 30th of July remain unaltered,

I beg to remain, dear Sir, faithfully yours,
DARTMOUTH."

"Robert W. Hanbury, Esq., M.P."

"P.S.—I should, I think, add that, having consulted no one on the subject of writing my protest to the Times, I am solely responsible for the letters which have appeared with my signature. DARTMOUTH."

I was doubtful as to the exact meaning of that last paragraph, and I received the following explanation of it:—

"Regret to find myself again misunderstood: never intended to express regret at your being a Magistrate for Staffordshire, which I do not feel privately. DARTMOUTH."

That is a very full and very complete explanation, and in its completeness it is certainly most honourable to Lord Dartmouth. It is honourable, I maintain, to make a frank admission even of mistakes much greater than this; and I feel sure that the House will be perfectly ready to receive and to accept with equal frankness so full an admission. With regard to myself and my humble share in the matter, I may say that my sole desire has been to fulfil what is almost my first and highest duty—to see that this House suffers no injury or disrespect from any action or neglect of mine as a Member. I hope, therefore, the House will consider that I acted rightly in firmly, but, I hope, courteously, requiring a complete recognition of its undoubted rights.

PRISON CLERKS.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is a fact that the Lords of the Treasury have for some time past been expecting to receive proposals from the Home Office as to the status of clerks in Her Majesty's

Mr. Hanbury

Prisons; and whether they have also been endeavouring to obtain a Report from the Departmental Committee appointed no less than four years ago?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Treasury has now received the papers referred to by the hon. Member.

SAVINGS BANKS BILL.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I wish to ask what the intention of the Government is with regard to the Savings Banks Bill in view of the opposition which has developed against it?

MR. STOREY: As the First Lord of the Treasury appeared to complain of my action with reference to this Bill, I may say that I have received communications from several large Savings Banks suggesting a series of Amendments. One of my correspondents says—

"You are accused of obstruction in this matter, but the Bill requires careful consideration in Committee."

I am acting in conformity with the view thus expressed.

MR. LENG (Dundee): May I ask whether the First Lord of the Treasury is aware that the unexpected withdrawal by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of Clause 11, as it appeared in the original draft of the Bill, has caused the greatest dissatisfaction among the best class of Savings Banks, and that there is a strong desire among them that the Bill should be maturely considered in another Session of Parliament?

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): Was this Bill introduced for the purpose of dealing with the actuaries, secretaries, and officers of the banks, and to safeguard the interests of depositors?

MR. SHAW LEFEBVRE (Bradford, Central): I believe that the great majority of Members on this side of the House are sincerely anxious to pass the Bill into law this Session.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): May I ask whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not received communications from large Savings Banks in Edinburgh and Glasgow which are opposed to some details of the measure, but which are, on the whole, satisfied with the Amendments which the Government have introduced?

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Do the Government propose to deal differently with Ireland in respect of Savings Banks?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I do not know whether any other hon. Gentleman wishes to put a question to me. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) appears to complain of the tone which I have used in making some observations on a previous occasion with reference to this Bill. If I used stronger language than was just in the circumstances, I am sorry for it. The Government really thought that this was a Bill which might have been received by the House with favour, as it was intended to secure and safeguard the interests of depositors. In securing the interests of depositors, they were also securing the interests of the officers of the banks, who were identified with the depositors, because it is obvious that if the bank were unsuccessful the officers associated with it must share in the failure also. Communications have reached the Government from Scotland, and I have now before me a letter from a Glasgow Savings Bank which states that, with the slight alterations which the Government propose, the Bill would satisfy the Trustees, and they hope that it will pass the House.

MR. STOREY: What is the date?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The 2nd of August. I do not doubt that there is a considerable opposition to the measure on the part of some hon. Members, and the Government are aware of it. Those hon. Members believe that the interests of the banks are affected by the measure. I stated last week that the Government could not force the measure through against a serious and protracted opposition at this period of the Session. If hon. Members who oppose the measure are still of opinion that they must protract the discussion and debate the measure in Committee, then the Government cannot ask the House to prolong its sitting. I regret this, but I still entertain the hope that hon. Members may, on re-considering the subject, find it to be possible to withdraw their opposition. The Government did intend to extend the benefit of the Bill to Ireland, but it was stated the other day that if it was objected to by the Irish Members it would not be so extended. It is a matter for the Irish Members themselves; if they desire to have the Bill, it will be extended to Ireland. I think that three or four months' delay in passing the measure would do harm, but if hon. Members feel it to be their duty to persist in opposing the Bill the Government have no alternative but to withdraw it for the present Session.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: If there is to be one law for England and another for Ireland the Irish Members will oppose it.

MR. STOREY: May I explain that I have received a letter from a Glasgow Savings Bank, urging that Clause 11 should be struck out, and other letters from different parts of the country pressing for Amendments in all directions.

*MR. CHILDERS: I do not think the answer of the First Lord of the Treasury on the subject of the Savings Banks Bill was quite conclusive. It appeared to leave open the possibility of the Bill being proceeded with. I have, with an hon. Friend on this side of the House, taken pains to ascertain the facts, and I have found that from the Opposition side of the House there is practically only one gentleman who has put Amendments on the Paper, the greater part of the opposition to the Bill coming from hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side, who are more or less within reach of persuasion, and in these circumstances I ask the right hon. Gentleman to reconsider his decision, the Bill being one of the very greatest importance. The other Amendments which come from this side, save those of the single Member to whom I have referred, are only two in all, involve no principle, and could be disposed of in 10 minutes.

MR. STOREY: It is an extraordinary proceeding on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to assume that because Amendments stand in the name of one gentleman therefore the opposition is by one gentleman. There are a number of—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! This is becoming a Debate. There is no question before the House.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I would ask whether it would be possible to have the Amendments considered by the Standing Committee?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In answer to the question addressed to me by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, I can assure him that the Government are most anxious to see the Bill passed into law.

I am afraid, however, the opposition to the measure is more extensive than he appears to imagine. As far as my hon. Friends behind me are concerned, I am quite prepared to say on their behalf that they will withdraw their Amendments if it will in the slightest degree insure the passing of the Bill. I will make one further attempt this evening in order to ascertain whether, without protracted Debate, it will be possible to carry the Bill. If I am unsuccessful I shall deeply regret it, but the only course then will be to withdraw the Bill for the present Session.

DUBLIN CORPORATION BILL.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask whether it was by the direction or with the sanction of the Government that the Collector General of Rates of Dublin, an officer of the Lord Lieutenant, appeared before the Committee of the House of Lords to-day in opposition to the insertion in the Dublin Corporation Bill of clauses drawn up by the Government themselves, and in consequence of which the clauses have been thrown out?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not, of course, know what happens in the Committees of the House of Lords, but in this instance I have heard with very great regret that the Committee of the House of Lords have thrown out clauses which the Government desired to see introduced into the Bill. Certainly no official of the Government has appeared before the Committee against the proposals of the Government.

MR. SEXTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that the Collector General of Rates of Dublin gave evidence against the clauses?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: What was extracted from him in cross-examination I do not know.

MR. SEXTON: I would ask whether the Government intend to move in the House of Lords to re-insert the clauses in the Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall have to consider that question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (GOVERNMENT BUSINESS.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, for the remainder of the Session, Government Business may be entered upon at any hour, though opposed, and shall not be interrupted under the provisions of any Standing Order regulating the Sittings of the House."
—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

(4.38.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I am not surprised at this Motion being made on the part of the First Lord of the Treasury, for after the attacks the right hon. Gentleman has repeatedly made on the Rules of the House, nothing that he can do in this direction forms, in my mind, subject for surprise. Of late, the First Lord of the Treasury and many of his Colleagues have been girding at us as though we were responsible for the terrible state into which public business had fallen. [Ministerial Cheers.] I thought that would elicit the usual cheer from hon. Members opposite, and as hon. Gentlemen opposite appear to endorse that view, it will be necessary to throw a little daylight on the question who is really responsible. I suppose that even hon. Gentlemen opposite will admit that this Session has been wasted. ["No, no!"] Well, I was curious to know that, because I follow with great interest the speeches hon. Gentlemen deliver up and down the country. One day I read in their speeches that owing to us on this side of the House the Session has been entirely wasted, and then, next day, I read a speech from another hon. Gentleman on the opposite side, to the effect that there never has been such a wonderful Session, and that the Ministry has covered itself with honour. ["Name!"] Who says this? Why, all of you. [Cries of "Divide!"] If hon. Gentlemen are anxious that the Session should end at a reasonable time, they will do well not to cry out "Divide!" and so try to prevent hon. Gentlemen on the Radical side from speaking, for we intend to do our duty, and, for my part, when hon. Gentlemen opposite cry "Divide!" it only leads me to believe that I am doing my duty, and makes me feel that I ought to do my duty still more fully. Unquestionably the Session has been wasted. Not even the ordinary business has been taken in reasonable time, and the question is, whose fault is it? I should say that it is the fault of Her Majesty's Ministers. They have frequently been accused of it, even by their own followers and their own organs in the Press, which charge them with having muddled the business of the House. What have they done? They have announced certain Bills in the Queen's Speech, they have brought them in, and there seems to have been a sort of rivalry amongst them, each Member of the Government wishing to bring forward his own measure before that of his Colleague. The Chancellor of the Exchequer entered the lists, and suddenly came forward with the Compensation Bill, but everything failed to pass. There was a considerable amount of discussion on all the Government Bills on both sides of the House, and after wasting a great number of days on them Ministers withdrew them. There is only one advantage to the country that has been gained by the present Session. At the commencement of the Session Ministers were going about the country and really persuading some people that although their politics were not sound they were good men of business. I think the bottom has been entirely knocked out of that illusion. I do not think that even their own supporters regard them as good men of business at this moment. We are told that we are responsible for what has happened, and that the failure of the business of the Session is due to our obstruction. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham the other day said that Ministers had done a great deal of good, but had been prevented from passing many of their excellent Bills owing to inveterate, professed, and avowed obstruction. I am perfectly ready to admit that when Bills are brought into this House which, practically, are raids on the public Treasury, it is the duty of Members on this side of the House to offer them a most strenuous opposition. It is their duty, when the forms of the House are used again and again to crush out discussion on this side, that we should use on our own part all the forms of the House in order to have discussion. But, Sir, as a matter of fact, there has been no obstruction this Session, for the simple reason that there has been no need of obstruction. All that is needed is to leave right hon. Gentlemen alone. Ministers have obstructed each other, and they are themselves responsible for the failure of legislation. We have at present one Bill before us—the Police Bill—and the First Lord of the Treasury complains that there has been obstruction in regard to that, but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby pointed out in the early days of the Bill that if it were referred to a Standing Committee it would have to be fully discussed on Report when it came down to the House. They have put the Bill off to the last days of the Session, and now they complain of that which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, with great prescience and knowledge of the House, foretold would take place. We may put aside the Police Bill, which will pass to-day or to-morrow, and there will then be no measure of a controversial character before us. But what is more important is that only one-half of the Estimates have been carried, although that is the primary business of the House. In order to be fairly discussed they ought to be brought in at a fair and reasonable time. Last year the Government put off the Estimates to the end of the Session, and when complaint was made of this the right hon. Gentleman pledged himself that this Session the Estimates should be brought forward at an early period, and that certain Votes which are usually put down at the fag-end of the Estimates should be taken first. Has that pledge been kept? Most unquestionably it has not been kept. We have reached now the last dying days of the Session, and we are still left with one-half of the Estimates undisposed of, and the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, not satisfied with having placed them in the position of being scamped, now insists on their being taken at a late hour of night when the Debates cannot be reported, and when hon. Members who wish to express their views will be met with cries of "Divide, divide!" That is adding insult to injury. On what ground does the right hon. Gentleman ask for this? On the ground that hon. Members are fatigued; and he asks us to adjourn shortly, because we are going to meet again in November. Well, we never asked the right hon. Gentleman to call a meeting of the House in November, and the proposal was not received with rapture even by hon. Members opposite. Why is it proposed to meet in November? In order that we may adjourn next year somewhere about the beginning of July. We are asked, in fact, to sit up all night now in order that we may adjourn early in July, 1891, instead of in August. I trust the government of the country will be in other hands in July next, and it will not be for the present Ministry to decide how long we are to sit. No Ministry has ever fallen so low as this one. They have done absolutely nothing. They are condemned by their own organs, and there is almost a mutiny amongst their own followers. Really, when I see them sitting there struggling against their followers and opposed by everybody, I do feel a sort of pity for them. Obstruction has not been necessary, but, for the sake of argument, I will assume that there has been obstruction, and that they have been prevented by it from carrying out their plans. Then, I say, I am rejoiced to think that it has been so useful. When I think of the Irish Land Purchase Bill, the Tithes Bill, and the Compensation Bill, I am thankful that hon. Gentlemen opposite have so good an opinion of us as to imagine it is owing to our action that such excellent results have been obtained. If you say the Session has been a failure owing to us, it appears that our tactics have been successful. The country is utterly sick of the present Parliament, and regards it as thoroughly played out. The Liberal portion of the constituencies look to us on these Benches to prevent as much mischief as we possibly can, but what they aspire to is a General Election. Surely the Government are not going to—I may say—throw pearls before swine—to throw legislation before those who will not pass it. I have been asked when there will be a General Election, and I have said not while the present Government can prevent it. They "lag superfluous" on that Bench, and they will continue to lag there superfluous. I say that Estimates ought not to be relegated to the end of the Session, and then discussed after midnight. I shall divide against the Motion, as a protest against the mode in which Ministers conduct business, and against the way in which they put off the Estimates till the last days of the Session, and then try and force them through in a more rapid way than is absolutely necessary.

(4.54.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): Whatever be the intention of this Motion its effect will be to punish the Scotch Members. I suppose the discussion on the English Police Bill will finish at 12 o'clock to-night, and then the Government propose to start the Scotch Police Bill.

MR. W. H. SMITH: No, no.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: The difficulty in which the House is placed in regard to these two Bills is owing entirely, in my judgment, to the rejection last Saturday of the Motion made to send the two Bills to the same Committee, so that they might be considered side by side, the measures being to a large extent identical. If this course had been accepted, probably by this time we should have been two-thirds through both of them. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Childers) said on Saturday he had made inquiry among the Scotch Members and found that four out of five of them desired the immediate passing of the Scotch Police Bill. I have made inquiries, and I find that the statement made by the Scotch Members was not that they desired the Bill to pass this Session, but that if it came on at all it should be immediately after the English Bill. That was not the statement made on Saturday.

MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): That was the statement I made on Saturday.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Then it had no relevance to the appeal I made to the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. CHILDERS: I stated three times that we were asked to ascertain whether it was the wish of the Scotch Members that the Scotch Bill should follow the English Bill or whether Scotch Supply should come first. The answer from the great majority of Scotch Members sitting on this side was that the Scotch Police Bill should come first. I doubt whether at the outside eight Members were of a different opinion.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I am glad of the explanation. I did not gather that from what was said on Saturday. I hope that the appeal made on Saturday may be renewed now with more success than it met with then. The Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberdeen will give the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of stating his views on the subject. I do trust, having regard to the entire absence of consideration of this Bill by the Scotch people, that the First Lord of the Treasury, in order to facilitate the progress of business in this House, will provide for the suspension of this Bill. The First Lord has conferred many favours on Scotch Members, and I hope he will add another to the favours he has bestowed upon them.

*(5.2.) MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Whitehaven): I do not rise to answer the speech of the hon. Member for Northampton, and I think he can have little confidence in what he himself said, seeing that he has left the House; but I have been in the House for a good many years, and have never known a Session when it has not been said by somebody that it had been wasted through the fault of the Government. I entirely approve the proposal to suspend the Standing Order for the rest of the Session, and I wish I could induce my right hon. Friend to carry his Motion still further, so as to get rid of the Standing Order altogether, because I am satisfied that such hard and fast rules do not conduce to the efficient transaction of business. As to the Scotch Members they have taken up a great deal of time, far more than their fair share. I remember Lord Sherbrooke, then Mr. Lowe, saying "Confound these Scotch Members. I really think there ought to be one Scotch Member with 60 votes." If an arrangement of that kind could be made, there is no doubt that business would be got through with much greater despatch. I urge upon the First Lord of the Treasury that he should consider seriously whether next Session he could not do something to amend the blunder that had been perpetrated in establishing this hard and fast 12 o'clock rule. It might, for example, be made for a later hour than 12, or, at all events, not allowing it to stand exactly as it is at present.

(5.10.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I do not know that the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has thrown much light on the subject, or done anything to conciliate Members sitting on this side of the House. I will say a word or two on this proposal, which I look upon as one for the convenience of the House. But, first, with regard to what was said by the hon. and learned Member for Dundee. The opinion of a great number of the Scotch Members was this: that if the Government intended to proceed with the Scotch Police Bill, it would be convenient that it should be proceeded with immediately after the English Bill. That opinion was expressed to the First Lord of the Treasury, who received and acted upon it in perfect good faith and courtesy. Now, I will say a word or two on the question whether the present proposal of the right hon. Gentleman is justified or not. There is a very dangerous tendency on the part of leading men of the Party opposite to lay the blame for the disasters of the Session on this side of the House. Against that I must emphatically protest. I hold that the Government when they bring forward an important Bill are bound to pass that Bill or to go out. A very great number of days, I think 25, have been spent over the financial proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and what has been most disputed in those proposals has been dropped in consequence of the opposition from this side of the House. No Government that I can remember has ever dropped the principal, the only great Bill of a Session, without going out or dissolving. ["What about the Compensation for Disturbance Bill?"] That was the House of Lords. I do not see why we should be alarmed at the proposal of the leader of the House, for no Bill to which hon. Gentlemen are strongly and keenly opposed will be more likely to pass in consequence of the adoption of the Motion. If the Government have mismanaged business, why should the House of Commons be punished, and it will be punishing the House of Commons not to permit this latitude in respect of the transaction of business, for if it is not allowed the Session must be prolonged. But I think that the Government ought to give a pledge that the power which they obtain will be used reasonably. The House, it should be remembered, meets now at 3 o'clock in the day, and it is a serious matter to sit very far into the night. Very important business, like the Scotch Police Bill, ought not to be taken at such a time as will necessitate any large part of the discussion being continued after 12 o'clock. If there is that honourable understanding, though I can understand hon. Members voting against the proposal for various reasons, I trust on this occasion they will vote in favour of that which is for the convenience of the House.

*(5.14.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I think it will be convenient to hon. Members that this question should be decided without much further debate. The right hon. Gentleman opposite asks me to give an undertaking that we shall use this power reasonably. I may at once say that the Government have no intention of using the power unreasonably. It must be obvious to the House that considerations of convenience demand that during these remaining days, or weeks, or perhaps months, of the Session we should at least have power to proceed after 12 o'clock with reasonable Bills to which no section of the House objects, but to which individual Members may object on the ground that to consider them would be to make progress with public business. It is most undesirable that at this period of the Session it should be in the power of hon. Members to terminate a discussion at 12 o'clock without finishing the business the House had entered upon. The House is very well aware that on many occasions questions have been fully discussed and were really ripe for decision by the House when that hour arrived, and so fresh debates arose when the House met the next day. I trust, therefore, that the House, taking into consideration the convenience of the House and the advancement of public business, will consent to the suspension of the 12 o'clock rule. With regard to the Scotch Police Bill, the hon. Member for Dundee assumed that we should bring in that Bill after 12 o'clock. I admit at once that it would be an outrage to ask the House to go into Committee for the first time on the Scotch Bill after 12 o'clock, and I am sorry that the hon. and learned Gentleman should have supposed that we could be guilty of such an outrage. It might be possible to ask the House to complete that Bill after 12 o'clock with a view to making progress with the business of the House, but we should not think of asking the House to begin the Bill after 12 o'clock. The hon. and learned Gentleman referred to a conversation that took place on Saturday with regard to the Scotch Bill, and to some observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Edinburgh with regard to the Bill. I have taken steps to ascertain what was the view of hon. Gentlemen opposite on the subject, and I was assured by the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Bridgeton and Edinburgh that it was the main desire of the Scotch Members that the Scotch Bill should follow the English Bill. I did not realise the contingency which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton has suggested now. I put a reasonable interpretation on the information which was conveyed to me, and that interpretation was that the great majority of Scotch Members did desire that the Bill should be dealt with in the course of the present Session, and should follow the English Bill; and I think I only attribute a plain meaning to the English language when I attribute that meaning to the information I received. We have had from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton a speech which I have heard before. The hon. Gentleman expressed that extreme sensitiveness which belongs to his nature, lest anyone should malign him and suggest that he is the author of obstruction in this House. The hon. Gentleman seemed anxious that the people in the country should not attribute to him that he is capable of carrying into practice those declarations which he occasionally makes from his place in the House when he assures us that he will render to the Government every possible opposition and make use of every form of the House in order to defeat their measures—because, even if they are good measures, they proceed from a bad Government. Well, Sir, the hon. Gentleman reminds me of the old proverb, Qui s'excuse s'accuse. I have no doubt that his apologia will be read in the country, and will produce the conviction that it is "Truth," and the hon. Member will be able to pose, not only as a hero, but possibly as a martyr in the discharge of his duties, and in the protection he will give to the country against the iniquities of Her Majesty's Government, and the necessity he finds for exercising a watchful care over their doings. The hon. Gentleman attributes to me and my Colleagues on this Bench differences which he has created in his own imagination. All that has been done has been done as the act of the Cabinet and of the Government as a whole, and the hallucination under which the hon. Gentleman labours with regard to my right hon. Friend who usually sits on my right and my right hon. Friend who usually sits on my left, is only to be attributed to the disordered imagination which extreme conscientiousness occasionally produces. I would now venture to appeal to the House not to carry this Debate any further. I do not propose to avail myself of the opportunity of entering into a defence of the Government for its proceeding, during the Session. I believe that even those who differ from the Government are not desirous of hearing our defence, but are much more desirous of making progress with public business. When we have occasion to make our defence, I have no doubt that it will be received by this House as it deserves. I trust that the House will now consent to proceed with the business before it, and, in conclusion, I would remind the House that even the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) has himself admitted that there are no Bills of a controversial character now before the House.

(5.23.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I regret that at the far-end of a long Session you are about to suspend the Standing Orders, the result of which will be that the Scotch business in Supply will be taken, as has been the case for two or three years past, at 3 o'clock in the morning. My hon. Friend the Member for Lanark desires to bring forward the notorious Wishart case on an Amendment for the reduction of the salary of the Lord Advocate; then, again, the Crofters Commission Board will have to be discussed, and something must be said regarding the re-construction of the Scotch Fishery Board. There are also upon the Paper three Scotch Bills, the Police (Scotland) Bill, the Factors Bill, and the Education of Blind and Deaf Mute Children Bill; the latter being a very peculiar Bill, introducing in Scotland a principle applying the public funds in a manner which is entirely new. We are asking when the annual massacre is to take place, and yet, at this moment, the Government are proposing to consider Bills of a highly controversial character in Scotland, and determining to carry them at whatever hour they may be reached in the morning. We are unable to believe the promises of the right hon. Gentleman. Formerly, when he told us he would do certain things, we expected them to be done, but we have found that year after year his promises are only made to be broken, and that the Government practically refuse to take Scotch business until they can do so by suspending the Standing Orders. The fact is that the Government are treating us with contempt, and I am afraid are teaching my colleagues to be a source of trouble to them, as the result will probably be that they will adopt the tactics which have been so successful in the case of the Irish Members. The Irish Debates are now over, and most of the Irish Members are going about the country enjoying themselves. Scotland, however, has to wait till the very end of the Session to find that its measures have still to be passed.

MR. WARMINGTON (Monmouth, W.): I should like to ask the Government whether they propose to extend this Rule to private Members' Bills which have passed the House of Lords and come back to this House?

*(5.28.) MR. W. P. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): The hon. Member for Caithness has said that Scotch measures were not considered last year until the extreme end of the Session. I would remind the House that is not the case, some of the Scotch Estimates were taken before the Whitsuntide holidays, therefore it is not fair to blame the Government, as the hon. Member has done. I hope, however, that next year it will be found convenient to take the Scotch Estimates at a somewhat earlier period than this year has been found possible.

*(5.30.) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is reasonable to press forward the Youthful Offenders Bill at this period of the Session? This Bill is a new "Whipping" Bill of the most sweeping character. If it is retained on the Paper, the only result will be that Members will be kept until 2 or 3 in the morning, and the sense of grievance which they would feel would scarcely contribute to the rapid dispatch of public business.

(5.31.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he does not intend to begin the consideration of any contentious measure after 12 o'clock, and whether it is not his intention rather to make progress after 12 o'clock with certain measures that might be objected to by some individual Member? I hope myself that the Government will proceed with the Scotch Police Bill, and pass it into law. I do not think I was formally committed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, but I remember saying to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgeton that I hoped the Government would shove along the Scotch with the English Bill. I only speak for myself, but I hope the Government will succeed in passing the Scotch Bill into law. The hon. Member for Caithness referred to the Bill for the education of the blind and deaf mute, and I am very sorry to hear that any Member of this House looks upon that as a contentious measure. It does not give us all we want, but those who are interested in this subject are anxious to make a start by getting this Bill through. I wish, farther, to point out that the form of the present Motion is somewhat novel. Hitherto the suspension of the Standing Order has been moved with regard to some particular business, but this proposal is that Government business shall be taken at any hour, and I take it that means that the House might sit to any hour on Wednesday. Now, this might be drawn into a precedent, and hereafter used at an earlier period of the Session in a more drastic fashion than could be justified. I think the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven to abolish the 12 o'clock Rule would be keenly resisted by hon. Members generally, and they would be exceedingly jealous of anything that might interfere with the practical working of that rule. We are all willing that it should be suspended on special occasions for special purposes, but we strongly deprecate any graver interference with it. I think we are entitled to an explanation why the Motion is proposed in this form.

Dr. Clark

(5.40.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I am sorry the hon. Member for Caithness is not in his place; but I can assure the Lord Advocate, from all I can learn, that there is a very sincere desire that the Education of the Blind and Deaf Mute Bill should be passed, and I hope the hon. Member for Caithness will not continue his opposition. I should like to add, further, that there is something to be said for Scotch Members. The First Lord of the Treasury has admitted that it is fair that the Scotch Estimates should be taken at a reasonable time. We live at a considerable distance; we have to make our arrangements; yet I do think that the First Lord has rather taken Scotch Members into his own hands. At all events, I think Scotch Members ought to be defended by him against the rather insulting remark of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven. I can only account for it by the fact that the Member who made the observations was not considered worthy of notice. I do not think these remarks should be repeated, if you wish the assistance of Scotch Members in the conduct of Imperial affairs. All I can say is, that if such remarks are continued the Scotch people will become more and more of the view that they should be left to conduct their own affairs without the interference of the dominant vote of English Members.

(5.43.) MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): Though I have Amendments down upon the Education of the Blind and Deaf Mute Bill, I regret very much that the hon. Member for Caithness regards it as a contentious Bill. I do not regard it as in any way contentious. Though it does not give nearly all that was recommended by the Royal Commission, yet it gives something, and I hope the Government are prepared to meet us by a reasonable concession, and to endeavour to pass the Bill. There is nothing of a partisan or sectarian character in the Bill, and it is one which both sides of the House desire.

*(5.45.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I rise for the purpose of reminding the right hon. Gentleman that he forgot to refer to a substantial part of the observations of my hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) with reference to forwarding Supply. The Scotch Members have vindicated their claim to be able to take care of themselves. But as an English Member, I wish to put forward a plea on behalf of English taxpayers, who, after all, form the great majority of those who contribute to the taxes, that this question of Supply should be dealt with on a more rational basis than Her Majesty's Government have dealt with it hitherto. The Government is well aware that they have broken faith with us in not bringing the Estimates on earlier, and in regarding that as a first duty. I should like to know how, in the interests of the English taxpayers, we are to adequately discuss these Estimates at 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning at the far end of the Session? I protest most emphatically against such proceedings, and I hope my hon. Friend will carry the matter to a Division, and that he will not hesitate to raise this question on every occasion he can until we have obtained a more rational method of dealing with Supply.

(5.47.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I cannot congratulate the Government on the particular moment they have selected for the suspension of the Rule. They have waited until the English Bill was practically through the House, and they have only begun this new system when Scotch business is coming before the House. The Government now ask us to sit until 2, 3, 4, or 5 o'clock in the morning; but if that is attempted, it will be resisted unanimously by Scotch Members. There is a special reason why the Scotch Police Bill should be considered at a reasonable time. Originally it was sent to a Committee composed of nine out of the 12 Scotch Tory Members and seven out of the 46 Scotch Liberal Members. The deliberations of a Committee of that kind in no degree correspond with the opinion of the Scotch people. The whole Bill was passed through the Committee in three days. The Report was taken under the protest of the minority. These circumstances alone constitute sufficient reason why the Bill should be discussed in this House. I do not want to make a double Division by moving the Amendment which I have upon the Paper, but I should like an assurance from the First Lord that it is not intended to press the discussion of the Scotch Police Bill at an early hour in the morning. If such a course were taken it would be doubly inexcusable, because unnecessary.

(5.49.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I can only speak again with the indulgence of the House, but I wish to say that the Government has no desire to act unreasonably. We cannot enter into an engagement to report Progress at a certain fixed hour after 12 o'clock; but we wish to treat the House fairly and reasonably, and I do not think the hon. Member will have any reason to complain of the action of my Colleagues or myself in considering any reasonable objection. With reference to the question of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Warmington) with regard to Bills coming down amended from the House of Lords, it will be the duty of the Government to give the House an opportunity of considering those Amendments. With regard to the Deaf and Dumb Children (Scotland) Bill, I hope when it comes down from the House of Lords that we shall have the assistance of the great majority of the Scotch Members in passing it. There is, I am glad to say, no sectarian feeling involved.

(5.50.) The House divided:—Ayes 199; Noes 50.—(Div. List, No. 232.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

(5.59.) POLICE BILL.—(No. 392.)

As amended, further considered.

Amendments made.

(6.0.) MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): The House will observe that the Pension Fund is to be made up from various sources, one of which is the deduction of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum from the wages of the constables. Now, that percentage will be recognised by all hon. Members as perfectly illusory, for the purpose of forming a substantial contribution to the fund; indeed, for all practical purposes, there might as well be no such contribution at all. What I propose is, then, that instead of the contribution being $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. it should be 5 per cent. I know it may possibly be argued by the right hon. Gentleman that this would constitute a heavy tax on the police; but when I compare the wages they received with those paid to men belonging to a similar class in life, I think the conclusion is justifiable that a deduction of 5 per cent. would not be excessive. For instance, in the Metropolis the constables start with wages of 24s. a week, and are supplied in addition with boots and clothing, while, in the event of a man being unmarried, he can have quarters, including fire and lighting, for the moderate sum of 1s. per week. Can it be said, then, that a deduction of 5 per cent. is too heavy? Further than that, I believe that, in the case of all other pension funds established for the benefit of bodies of workmen, the deduction is higher than $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I again pray in aid of the case of the Scotch Bill, in which it is provided that the rate of deduction in the case of officers above the rank of sergeant shall be $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. I trust the Home Secretary will leave this an open question, and that I shall be supported by hon. Members opposite instead of their giving the customary silent vote against propositions emanating from this side of the House.

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 31, to leave out the words "two and a half," and insert the word "five."—(Mr. Atherley-Jones.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'two and a half' stand part of the Bill."

(6.5.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): If this question had appeared as res nova there would have been a good deal of force in the contention of the hon. Member, because $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. may be called an infinitesimal percentage. It must be borne in mind, however, that the subject does not come before us as res nova. A series of Bills have been introduced by successive Governments, all of them containing a limit of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and this, too, is the contribution enforced upon all the workmen employed by the great Railway Companies.

(6.9.) MR. ATHERLEY-JONES: I will not press the Amendment, but will ask leave to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(6.10.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): We are always told that this Bill has been framed in the interests of the Public Service, and not merely of the police. In the Scotch Committee the majority insisted that officers above the rank of sergeant should pay 7½ per cent. instead of 2½ per cent. In the case of an officer, in all probability his contributions to the Pension Fund for the great part of his service have been based on a low rate of pay, whereas his pension is calculated on the higher salary received in the last few years. That is the ground on which the Scotch Committee varied the percentage, and the Amendment I am now proposing is somewhat of a compromise on the point. A question was also raised as to whether officers who had not contributed to the fund ought not to be subjected to a further deduction. The Government undertook to consider this, and I should like to know at what conclusion they have arrived.

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 33, after the word "deduction," to insert the words—

"(b) Every officer above the rank of sergeant sums after the rate of five per cent. of his pay."
—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(6.13.) MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member will understand that the observations I made on the last Amendment apply equally to this.

-SIR G. CAMPBELL: How about the question of deductions for non-contribution?

MR. MATTHEWS: We have considered that point, but we think it hardly necessary to alter the Bill in that respect, as very few such cases exist. No doubt in some parts there was a mistaken notion that a Chief Constable was not a constable in the ordinarily accepted sense of the term, and, therefore, was not allowed to pay anything to the Superannuation Fund. I think it would be very hard to make this Bill retrospective in such cases.

*MR. CHILDERS (Edinburgh, S.): I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I will not press my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Another Amendment made.

(6.15.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I have to move a new sub-section providing that in cases where a constable's pay has not been subject to deductions for the Pension Fund, it shall be competent for the Police Authority to diminish the pension as they may deem reasonable under the circumstances, but to an extent not exceeding one-fifth of the pension to which the officer would otherwise be entitled. I hope the Home Secretary will explain how the matter stands. He has once or twice ridiculed the idea that the word "constable" required defining, yet we have been told that in many counties the people were under the impression that a Chief Constable was not a constable, and that, therefore, his salary was not subject to deductions for pension. We have been told that in all boroughs the Chief Constables have contributed to the Superannuation Fund, but that the mistaken idea prevailed in several counties, and that the cases of non-contribution are so very few that it is hardly worth while altering the provisions of the Bill so as to deal with them. I say that if officers who have not contributed are put on the same footing as those who have, it would be a great scandal. It is to obviate any harm arising from such a cause that I wish to move my Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 7, at the end of Clause 15, to insert the words—

"A constable has not been subjected to the deduction from his pay as above provided, as a contribution to the Pension Fund, for at least two-thirds of his whole service, the pension awarded to him shall be diminished to such an extent as to the Police Authority may seem reasonable under the circumstances, not exceeding one-fifth of the pension to which he would otherwise be entitled."—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(6.20.) MR. MATTHEWS: I think the hon. Member is moving the Amendment in the wrong place. It more properly belongs to the section which applies to the cases of existing constables; and when we reach that part of the Bill, I shall be willing to accept a clause taken from Mr. Fowler's Bill, and which practically provides for the reduction of pension in these cases as suggested by the hon. Member.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: And will that apply to the Scotch Act?

MR. MATTHEWS: The case of Scotland is very different. There no member of the force has had deductions made from his wages for pension purposes. It would be a real grievance if a man who had been in the force 14 years and not paid any deductions, should at the end of another year be entitled to a pension, while a man just entering would have to serve 15 years and pay a percentage the whole time before becoming entitled to a pension. The case of England is that everybody practically has had to contribute to the Superannuation Fund, with the exception of a few chief constables, who have not been allowed to do so.

* (6.22.) MR. CHILDERS: I think the clause taken from the Bill of the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) is the best one that could have been framed to meet this difficulty.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Other Amendments made.

* (6.24.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I beg to move the omission of Clause 26, which gives power to charge upon the Police Fund the expenses when the military are called in to assist the police. This clause was not discussed in the Grand Committee, and introduces an entirely new principle which exists nowhere except in Ireland. I admit that were the military called in to assist the police on the responsibility of the County Council or some representative body, it might be reasonable that the locality should pay for it; but soldiers are called in on the signature of two Magistrates at the request of the chief constable—not representative people at all. Let me give the House three instances of this: A little while ago the soldiers were called in to assist the police in some tithe distraint at Anglesey by two Magistrates at the request of the chief constable. It was altogether against the wishes of the people, although they were not called upon to pay the cost. This clause may throw the burden on them in the future. I do not think the police are ever likely to be called in to assist at distraints for tithes in the future, because any Member for the County Council who voted for such a thing would lose his seat at the next election. Then, quite recently, the military were called on to quell some disturbances at Northampton. Their intervention was quite unnecessary, and the people were very angry about it. They would have been still more angry had they been called upon to pay the cost. The third case I wish to allude to is that of London. I do not think that Londoners would be very pleased if some unwise Home Secretary called upon the military to help the police when not necessary, and then threw the cost on the rates. Here are three instances in which the enforcement of this clause would create dissatisfaction. This is an entirely new departure, and I do not believe that anyone but the Irish people would submit to these conditions being imposed upon them. I think we ought to take a Division on this clause so as to see what hon. Members endorse the application of this entirely new principle. I submit that the clause is unnecessary, and that it will only breed ill-feeling and friction, and there is no demand for it from any quarter. It is an entirely new departure, and I hope the Home Secretary will not think it necessary to retain the clause.

Amendment proposed, to omit Clause 26.—(Captain Verney.)

Question proposed, "That Clause 26 stand part of the Bill."

* (6.31.) MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. and gallant Member is perfectly correct in saying that this matter was not discussed in Grand Committee. No one raised an objection to the clause. I took this clause bodily from the Bill of my predecessor. I do not think the Bill of Mr. Hibbert contained the clause, but the Bill of 1883 did, and all the successive Bills did. I will not argue whether it was wise to call out the military in Anglesey or in some other places, but I do not think the hon. and gallant Gentleman will dispute that there have been, and will be, occasions when it is necessary to call in the aid of the military. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War is giving up the system of having small bodies of troops in given localities, and is adopting the plan of concentration. Consequently, in case of the military being called in to aid the civil power, there will be travelling expenses incurred by the troops summoned to assist, and I see, to my astonishment, that it is Welsh Members who oppose this clause. I suppose that, on account of the unhappy tithe dispute, which is really only a passing incident in the history of Wales, I know no part of the country in which it may be more necessary than in Wales to be able to call in the military, because in no part of the country are the police forces so small as in Wales, because of the absence of lawlessness and the peaceable demeanour of the people. On the other hand, in case of emergency, such as the Turnpike Riots some years ago, the police forces would not be sufficient to cope with the disturbance. I do not attach very great importance to the clause; but it seems to me only fair that if the military are called out by the civil power, it would be extremely inconvenient that the expense should be thrown on the War Office Vote. If, at the request of the Local Authority, military are sent over to any given place, surely it is proper that the Local Authority should pay the expense.

*(6.36.) MR. CHILDERS: I regret I cannot agree with the Home Secretary on this question. So far from thinking this a small matter, I am afraid it is a large one. I do not attach much importance to it as a question of expenditure; but I think the principle which would be established by this clause is of great moment. A similar clause was in the Scotch Bill of this Session, and the Scotch Committee struck it out without opposition. If I remember right, the Lord Advocate entirely concurred in the omission. The fact is, it is an entirely new principle. All naval and military expenditure is defrayed out of the Votes of Parliament, and it is only upon the Estimates that the action of the Naval and Military Authorities can be challenged. If we allow a small amount of the military expenditure to be defrayed by any authority which is in no way responsible to Parliament, we shall prevent the possibility of the action arising out of that expenditure being challenged. As the right hon. Gentleman says he does not attach much importance to the matter, I trust he will consent to the omission of the clause.

(6.38.) MR. MATTHEWS: I do not share the constitutional scruples of my right hon. Friend, but inasmuch as my right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate approved of the omission of the clause from the Scotch Bill, I will not press the clause.

Question put, and negatived.

(6.40.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to move the omission of Sub-section 9 of Clause 29. This sub-section enables any constable, be he high or low, to accept the new Bill while availing himself of the privileges of the old Act. It seems to me entirely inconsistent with the principles of justice and right that a man should be allowed to pick and choose. Under this Bill no service under the age of 21 years is to count for pension; but in the old Act there is no such provision. A large number of men have entered the Service at 18, 19, and 20. In the Metropolitan Police Force there are 2,886 of such men. The other day the Home Secretary said it would be unjust to deprive them of service. It seems to me it would be unjust to allow them to take advantage of the new Bill while retaining the privileges they have under the old Act. A man can retire after 25 years' service, so that it is possible a man may retire at 43 years of age. I think it is altogether dangerous to allow men to retire at 46—the prime of life—and certainly I protest against some men being allowed to retire earlier.

Amendment proposed, in page 19, line 22, to leave out sub-section (9) of Clause 29.—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

(6.44.) MR. MATTHEWS: I do not think the hon. Member really means to press this Amendment. It is clear that it would not be just, for no reason whatever, to deprive a man of any sort of service which he is now entitled to reckon towards pension.

(6.47.) Question put, and agreed to.

*(6.51.) MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I propose to move the following Amendment:—

"That the pension to a constable, on retirement without medical certificate, shall be according to the maximum scale provided by Part I of the First Schedule to this Act," my object being to give Parliamentary sanction to the maximum scale. The Bill lays down a maximum and a minimum, and leaves it to the Local Authority to draw its scale anywhere between the two limits. As far as the Metropolitan Police is concerned, this House is really the Local Authority; and I ask, therefore, that this House, in its character of the Local Authority, shall do what the other Local Authorities throughout the country will do by resolution. The only legitimate alternative to the proposal I am submitting seems to be to leave it to the London County Council to fix the scale. I do not know whether that would be agreeable to the right hon. Gentleman or even to the London County Council unless they took over the entire control of the police. I very much regret that this House should be really the Local Authority for the Metropolitan Police; but as long as it insists on occupying that position, it ought not to shrink from the responsibility and the duties of the office, and, therefore, I say we ought to do by Act of Parliament what the other Local Authorities would be able to do by resolution.

Amendment proposed, in page 19, after line 42, after the word "follows," to insert the words—

"The pension to a constable, on retirement without medical certificate, shall be according to the maximum scale provided by Part I. of the First Schedule to this Act."—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(6.55.) MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member is not strictly accurate in calling Parliament the Local Authority in the Metropolis. The Secretary of State is the Local Authority of the Metropolis, although he is responsible to Parliament. I cannot assent to this proposition, and I may say it was made in the Grand Committee and rejected by a large majority.

(6.56.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman is not able to accept this proposal. It is either intended or not that the Metropolitan Police should be allowed to retire as suggested by the Home Secretary in Committee. All we say is, that if they are to have that privilege, it should be put into the Bill.

(6.58.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): This is one of the difficulties that will continue to arise as long as the
Mr. Pickersgill

Metropolitan Police are under the control of the Home Office. The right hon. Gentleman may technically be right, but we want to have the matter settled in such a way that the men will know exactly where they are. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will even now assent to the Amendment.

(6.59.) MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I shall be obliged to vote for the Amendment, because it seems not altogether impossible that the future Police Authority for the Metropolis will be the London County Council, and I wish to protect the Metropolitan Police from the benevolent régime of that body.

CAPTAIN VERNEY: As a member of the County Council, I heartily endorse what the hon. Gentleman opposite has said. There are several Metropolitan Members on that side of the House. I am watching them with interest, and hope they will tell the House what their views are.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I do not know whether the hon. Member is watching me among the rest, but I am going to support the Amendment.

(7.1.) The House divided:—Ayes 51; Noes 163.—(Div. List, No. 233.)

Amendment proposed, in Clause 31, page 19, line 42, insert—

"The Court of Quarter Sessions to which an application is to be made with respect to the decision as to the pension or allowance shall be the Court of Quarter Sessions for the county of London."—(Mr. Secretary Matthews.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

*(7.15.) MR. PICKERSGILL: The next Amendment raises an important and interesting point, which, I admit, was discussed in Committee, but not, as I think, satisfactorily decided. The short point of the Amendment is this: Admitting that pensions should be paid to the Commissioners of Police on their salaries, I raise objection to the further proposal of the right hon. Gentleman to pay pensions also to these gentlemen on their emoluments. The House will feel that the word "emoluments" is one of vague significance, and that we ought to know what it is that is included. According to the right hon. Gentleman, it includes a grant of £300 to each Commissioner for house rent—the idea, I suppose, being that they should live near their work, and, therefore, where rent is high. But it does not seem reasonable that when a man ceases to be an officer and becomes a pensioner, he should calculate his pension so far as regards this £300 on the same scale as that on which he calculates his pension on his salary as a whole. But I have another point: If you admit the principle of paying a pension on emoluments in the case of superior officers, I contend that you are bound also to give the same to the subordinate officers and the rank and file of the Metropolitan Police, and to effect that purpose I have an Amendment lower down on the Paper. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary says these officers have a kind of legal right to receive pensions upon their emoluments, and he quotes the Metropolitan Police Staff Superannuation Act of 1875. I have that Act in my hand, and the word "emoluments," so far as I can see—and I have only glanced rapidly through the measure—never once occurs. The Home Secretary is empowered to make regulations respecting superannuation allowances on the like principle and conditions as were in force at the time of the passing of the Act in respect of persons in the Civil Service of the State. We were informed in the Committee that with regard to the Civil Service, the rule is that, in the case of emoluments of this kind and of an allowance for house-rent, the pension is not calculated on the whole of the allowance, but only on a proportionate part; and, therefore, I maintain that the right hon. Gentleman in the regulations which he has issued, or has professed to issue, under the authority of this Act, has not really been using the powers which are given to him. In the regulation the word "emoluments," I admit, does occur. It says—

"To any person who shall have served a certain number of years such an allowance based on his annual salary and the emoluments of his office."

I do think that the right hon. Gentleman in introducing the word "emoluments" into the regulation has exceeded the powers given to him by the Act of 1875; but however that may be, we are now making new regulations with the Commissioners of Police. We are giving them, in many respects, substantial advantages which hitherto they have not possessed; and, that being the case, I hold that we are in a position to revise our contract. Under any circumstances, the House will see that we must have some definite statement as to what "emoluments" include. We are told that they mean house-rent, but I have an idea that they mean something else. On looking over the accounts, I see that the Commissioners are allowed £150 as expenses for visiting the dock-yards. Is that an emolument which comes under the clause? At present, having followed as closely as I could all the explanations offered by the right hon. Gentleman, I am totally in the dark as to what these "emoluments" consist of. I beg to move the Amendment standing in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 20, line 19, to leave out from the numbers "1875," to the end of sub-section (4) of Clause 31.—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

(7.23.) MR. MATTHEWS: This is a subject which was eminently fit for the consideration of the Standing Committee, but which is eminently unfit for the consideration of the House. It is a matter of such intricacy and complexity that I feel it is by no means easy for me to make myself intelligible. As the House is aware, the salaries originally attached to the offices of Chief Commissioner and Assistant Commissioners were in time recognised to be inadequate for the class of officers it was considered desirable to appoint, and to remedy this these officers were subsequently granted a "house allowance" of £300 a year. The salaries used to be £1,500 a year and £800 a year. The Home Secretary of the day shrank from asking for an increase of these salaries, which would have been the straightforward way of proceeding; and under the Metropolitan Police Staff Superannuation Act of 1875 it was provided that the Commissioner and Assistant Commissioner should get their pensions, not only on their nominal salaries, but also on their house allowances.

*MR. PICKERSGILL: That was done by regulation; it is not in the Act.

*MR. MATTHEWS: Probably not; but the Act enabled the Home Secretary to make regulations corresponding to those made by the Treasury under the Civil Service Regulation Act. The pension is not allowed on any emolument beyond these house allowances. If the contention of the hon. Member is right, that these payments cannot be made under the Act of 1875, then they will not be made under this clause, for all the clause does is to preserve to these officers that which they are entitled to under the Act of 1875. This clause simply preserves to these officers that which they have got already under a complicated net-work of Acts for which my predecessors, and not I, are responsible. If the old status does not give the right to have this £300 a year for house allowances, it will not be conferred by this clause. It really requires a study of half a dozen Acts of Parliament to see how this clause applies, but it is quite clear that it only preserves existing rights.

(7.15.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: This is a very important question, and it looks to me very much as if a job was being perpetrated. The right hon. Gentleman says that previous Home Secretaries deceived Parliament. [Cries of "No!"] Yes; Parliament was deceived when it was induced to pay the policeman's rent.

*MR. MATTHEWS: I have not made the assertion the hon. Gentleman attributes to me, and I would beg the hon. Member not to impute to me what I have not said.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I think that is the reasonable construction of the right hon. Gentleman's words. He told the House it was desired to raise the salaries of these gentlemen, but Home Secretaries did not like blankly to ask for an increase of salary for them, and so they asked for rent. If that is not deceiving Parliament, I do not know what is. Well, I say it is unreasonable and unfair to impute to previous Home Secretaries that they deceived Parliament. It is well-known that rents are high in the Metropolis, and it was quite reasonable to give their rents to these high officers. Now, however, you are giving these men favourable terms, and you are going to let them have this privilege in addition. I say it is something very like a job, and that this Amendment ought to be accepted.

Question put, and agreed to.

*(7.32.) MR. PICKERSGILL: It now logically follows that the House should accept the Amendment which stands next in my name. It is that the annual pay of the constable shall be deemed to include the value of all lodgings supplied to him, if any. I may point out that a provision substantially identical with this was introduced into a similar Bill brought forward by the Liberal Government in 1882. As the former Bills have been constantly quoted, I think that is a very strong precedent to bring forward.

Amendment proposed, in page 20, line 24, after the numbers "1875," to insert the words—

"The annual pay of a constable shall be deemed to include the value of all lodging, if any, supplied to him."—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(7.33.) MR. MATTHEWS: There is no analogy whatever between the two kinds of allowance, and I do not think it logically follows that this Amendment should be agreed to. I have only asked the House to preserve a right already existing. If you are going to give a constable a right to a pension upon an allowance of this kind, you will, I think, be establishing a bad precedent.

Question put, and negatived.

Other Amendments agreed to.

Schedule 1 postponed.

Schedules 2, 3, and 4 agreed to.

*(7.38.) MR. MATTHEWS: I now move to re-commit the Bill in respect of Clause 29 and the 1st Schedule. Two hon. Members have Amendments to the same effect which involve some slight change, and I have expressed the intention of the Government to support them if they moved the Amendments. My own Amendments provide for a slight alteration of the scale, so as somewhat to increase the maximum after 25 years' service. The proposal was originally made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Mr. Baumann) and rejected by the Committee. A number of Metropolitan Members on both sides of the House since told me that a slight increase in the scale for the Metropolitan Police would not in itself be onerous on the ratepayers, and would go far to satisfy the members of the force who look forward to obtaining the two-thirds pension at a somewhat earlier period than is now provided for. The whole of the evidence in the Blue Book tends to show that the Metropolitan policeman is worn out after 25 years' service or thereabouts, and it is on that principle that we allow him to retire after 25 years' service without a medal or certificate. I have placed Amendments on the Paper, which will make the scale progressive.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be re-committed in respect of Clause 29, and Schedule 1."—(Mr. Secretary Matthews.)

(7.40.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: The House must thoroughly understand what this means; it means a reversal of the decision of the Grand Committee, arrived at by an enormous majority. Up to a certain point the Home Secretary was able to carry that Committee with him, but there came a point when the Committee revolted against his proposals; the proposal he has placed on the Paper was submitted to the Standing Committee and rejected by 15 to 6. Again, this is a surrender to the agitation in the Metropolitan Police Force against which the Home Secretary hitherto struggled, and as we supposed, struggled manfully. This is the question on which Mr. Monro went out of office, and on which the Home Secretary was supported against Mr. Monro. It is true he has not, in so many words, conceded the two-thirds pension after 25 years; he effects a compromise in a way, as it were, to save his honour. He has come back to the old argument that constables are worn out after 25 years' service. But we must distinguish between constables in a technical sense and constables in a practical sense. It is true, men who walk the streets are worn out after 25 years, but the officers are not worn out after such service. It is the officers who were led by Mr. Monro, and who got up the agitation. The agitation was repudiated by the men. It was an agitation which we thought the Home Secretary was going strongly to resist; but it was an agitation to which he has now yielded. Before he left office Mr. Monro told the officers they were bound to win, and they practically have won.

(7.45.) MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I entirely disagree with the observations of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy as to the opinion of the Grand Committee on this subject. The concession of the Home Secretary is exceedingly generous, and one which will be readily accepted by the police. It will prove a great benefit to the whole of the Force, men as well as officers. I have an Amendment on the Paper giving two-thirds, but I shall not think of pressing it after the generous concession of the right hon. Gentleman.

(7.46.) SIR W. BARTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): What the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy has said with regard to what took place in Committee is quite correct, and I hope my right hon. Friend, in the new schedule, will adhere to the minimum rate placed in the Bill. It is very important, in country districts especially, that we should have an opportunity of stating what we believe to be a fair and reasonable and proper pension for the police. We should like to have the minimum retained, as it is, because in many places the minimum would be absolutely sufficient for all purposes.

(7.47.) SIR G. TREVELYAN: I earnestly hope that the appeal of my hon. Friend will be accepted, but that is not quite enough. It is quite impossible that anyone who does not agree with the proposal of the Home Secretary, and who has any sort of responsibility in the House should pass this matter by without a word. I regarded the original proposal with the greatest apprehension. I consider it a most serious thing that a man should have an absolute right after 25 years' service to have any pension whatsoever, unless he is incapacitated. The Home Secretary by this alteration, which is contrary to the vote of the majority of the Committee, is showing too great a willingness to yield to the interests of the police, and in some cases too little thought for the interests of the ratepayers. Under the Scotch Bill, if a man retires at 25 years he will get, not two-thirds, but under one-half, 28-60ths, and he will not obtain two-thirds until he has actually served 34 years. Just think of the contrast between a policeman in Glasgow or Aberdeen and in London. My hon. and gallant Friend (Sir W. Barttelot) hopes the minimum will be kept up so that the Police Commissioners in the provinces may be enabled to apply a much lower standard for their police. I am afraid very great discontent will arise in these provincial forces, as I am afraid it may arise in the Scotch Forces. Have hon. Members considered what they are doing in giving a two-thirds pension after 25 years' service? Just imagine what would happen if a foreman in a Government establishment, who probably was harder worked than a police officer, could claim a pension of two-thirds of his salary after 25 years' service. Think what you will really do for the Police Force itself. The men of long service are the flower, the very backbone of the Force, and one effect of giving this pension will be that there will be very quick retirement, very quick promotion, and men will retire at the very top of their salaries. For these reasons I regard with dismay the change which the Home Secretary proposes, which, I must own, I regard with great apprehension.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill re-committed in respect of Clause 29 and Schedule 1.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 29.

(7.55.) MR. LEAKE (Lancashire, S.E., Radcliffe): The Amendment I propose affects areas in the county of Lancashire, in which the police are able to get better pensions than those granted under this Bill. Under these circumstances the police claim a little consideration at the hands of the Government. I do not think I could have a stronger argument to urge for this Amendment than that the Police Authority, representing not only the Quarter Sessions but the ratepayers, through the County Council, have unanimously asked for consideration.

Amendment proposed Clause 29, page 18, line 42, after otherwise insert—

"Provided that, if a constable who has been in the service of a Police Authority not less than 10 years before the passing of this Act accepts its provision, the Police Authority may increase the pension to which he shall be entitled under the provisions of this Act by an annual sum not exceeding the excess over such pension of a pension to which he may become entitled if he declines in writing to accept the provisions of this Act."—(Mr. Leake.)

Sir G. Trevelyan

Question proposed, "That these words be there inserted."

*(7.58.) MR. MATTHEWS: I would suggest that the Amendment which stands in the name of the hon. Member for the Stretford Division of Lancashire (Mr. Maclure) would carry out exactly the object the hon. Gentleman has in view, and do it rather more completely and effectually. In the first place it is important that a condition should be that the Police Authority have, under the existing law, been in the habit of granting higher pensions than those which this Bill gives. The hon. Member will observe that such a condition is contained in the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. Maclure). The only reason for conceding such a point as this is that there have been reasonable expectations formed of a certain scale of pensions being granted, and that it is really hard to deprive existing constables of this expectation.

(7.59.) MR. LEAKE: I am quite prepared to accept my hon. Friend's Amendment in preference to mine.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 29, page 19, line 29, after "Act" insert—

"In the case of any existing constable to whom this Act applies, who has served not less than 10 years before the commencement of this Act in a Police Force in which the Police Authority have heretofore, under the provisions of former Acts, granted pensions of higher amount than authorised by the scale adopted by that Police Authority under the provisions of this Act, and who becomes entitled to a pension under this Act, then, notwithstanding anything in this Act, the pension may, if the Police Authority think fit, exceed the amount prescribed in the adopted scale, so as it does not exceed the amount which might have been granted if this Act had not passed."—(Mr. Maclure.)

*MR. CHILDERS: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman how this affects the rate of pensions now granted in such counties as Lancashire, for instance?

MR. MATTHEWS: In Lancashire pensions are given under the 3rd and 4th Vict., which applies to all county forces. It provides a rough scale of retirement, upon medical certificate, under the age of 60, with a pension of between two-thirds and one-half pay. I gather that very nearly two-thirds of the pay are allowed after 25 years' service, and strong representations having been made not to disturb existing arrangements, so far as the expectations of the men are concerned, who have been looking forward to their pensions during many years' service, I have assented to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, added to the Bill.

Schedule 1.

(8.7.) SIR. G. CAMPBELL: The object of the Amendment I have to propose is to make the minimum pension the same as is provided in the Scotch Bill. In other words, I would give a wider option to the Local Authority. The Home Secretary says the Bill gives a certain latitude to the Local Authority—who may fix the scale of their pensions within a certain maximum and minimum, and I propose that the minimum shall be such that the English counties shall not be compelled to give more than the burghs and counties in Scotland can give. I in no way affect the discretion of the counties to give more, all I propose is, that the authorities shall have power to adopt the Scotch scale if they see fit.

Amendment proposed in Schedule 1, page 23, line 15, to leave out "two-sixtieths," and insert "one-sixtieth."—(Sir G. Campbell.)

Amendment negatived.

(8.10.) MR. MATTHEWS: In deference to a wish that has been expressed, I propose to change the maximum of the pension from 30-50ths to 31-50ths. Though I myself think it introduces a somewhat lopsided scale, altering the proportion between maximum and minimum thus, yet I believe this is desired, and will meet general acceptance.

Amendment proposed in page 23, line 18, after the second word "thirty," to insert the word "one."—(Mr. Secretary Matthews.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'one' be there inserted."

(8.11.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: It is well the ratepayers should realise the effect of this. I believe the moment the Bill passes, there will be a large exodus of men from the higher ranks of the Force, and especially in the Metropolitan Force, members of which, having business connections in London, will retire at a comparatively early age, and devote their energies to other pursuits. This will be followed by promotions, and again and again the same thing will take place, until the Service will become emasculated, and the ratepayers will suffer from heavy pension imposts. However, we have made our protest and can do no more. The Home Secretary is the master of many legions, and it is useless to argue.

(8.12.) DR. CLARK: Will the right hon. Gentleman amend the Scotch Schedule in the same fashion, or is this to apply to the English Bill only? If so, will the right hon. Gentleman explain the reasons for making the distinction?

MR. MATTHEWS: We are not now discussing the Scotch Bill, nor have I charge of it.

*(8.13.) MR. CHILDERS: Is it not desirable to make some modification by which Local Authorities could adopt a scale between the maximum and minimum?

(8.14.) MR. MATTHEWS: In the provincial forces the authorities may draw their scale of pensions anywhere they like between the extremes mentioned in the Bill.

(8.15.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 117; Noes 41.—(Div. List, No. 234.)

Other Amendments made.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I have an Amendment which comes next, which follows the lines of the Scotch Bill. I hope the right hon. Gentleman may see his way to accept it.

Amendment proposed, in Schedule 1, Part 2, page 25, Scale D, line 12, after "shillings," to insert—

"Or if there be no widow, an annual sum not exceeding five pounds as the police authority may determine."—(Mr. Howard Vincent.)

MR. MATTHEWS: I cannot accept my hon. Friend's Amendment, nor I confess can I quite follow it—

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I do not press it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Other verbal Amendments (Mr. Matthews) agreed to.

Schedule agreed to, as amended.

Bill reported ; as amended, considered ; read the third time, and passed. (8.35.)

POLICE (SCOTLAND) (RE-COMMITTED)

BILL.—(No. 398.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(9.2.) MR. HUNTER: I beg to move the omission from the 1st Clause of the words "Not less than 25 years' approved service." Owing to fundamental alterations made in the Bill in Committee, there has been created a curious state of affairs. No man under the age of 60 years can obtain a pension; no man over the age of 30 can join the force, and, therefore, in order to get a pension a man must have at least 30 years' service. I think it would be far better to omit these words.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 1, page 1, line 7, to leave out the words "Has completed not less than 25 years' approved service, and."—(Mr. Hunter.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed be left out, and stand part of the Clause."

(9.4.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): If the hon. Member will look at a later section, he will see that this provision is introduced mainly in the interests of those already in the force.

Question put, and agreed to.

(9.5.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to move the omission of the words "twenty-five," and the substitution therefor of the word "thirty." I do so for this reason: No constable over the age of 25 can be admitted to the Force, and yet his pension will not become payable until he has reached the age of 55, so that between the maximum age of entering and the minimum age of retiring, there is an interval of 30 years. The effect of the pension will be to increase the number of old men in the Force, for those who are drawing towards the pension age will naturally remain in it until the pension is earned. I think it is desirable we should get as many young men in as possible.

I think it would be highly inconvenient to establish by Act of Parliament the principle that 25 years' service is sufficient to qualify for a pension, when other provisions in the same Bill make it impossible for anyone to obtain a pension until he has served 30, and perhaps 34 years. To do so would be to create discontent in the Force. I think the words "25 years' approved service" should be withdrawn. The insertion of the words "thirty years" could not possibly be prejudicial to the men, and such an alteration would probably induce men about 21 years of age to enter the Force. It would also prove more satisfactory to the working classes who are opposed to pensions of this kind, if we insist that a pension shall only become payable after 30 years' service. In the Civil Service it is necessary for a man to serve more than 25 or 30 years in order to entitle him to a pension.

Amendment proposed in Clause 1, page 1, line 9, to leave out "25" and insert "30."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question proposed, "That '25' stand part of the Clause."

(9.12.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: This question had been discussed by the hon. Member with great moderation, and I intend to follow the same course. When the scheme of superannuation is matured, the result will be that no policeman will come in after 25 years of age, and no policeman will go out with a pension till he is 55, so that we shall have 30 years' service. This is one of the first of the Amendments which touch upon the whole scale and rate of figures in the Bill. In the Select Committee certain modifications were moved on these figures, and all in the direction of a more economical system of pensions. I do not profess to be in complete personal agreement with all that has been done, but I am quite prepared to stand by what has been agreed upon by the Select Committee. The Bill had been very carefully considered. An admirable temper prevailed in the Committee, and we had the advantage of the presence of some Members specially conversant with the subject. Under these circumstances I am quite prepared to adopt the recommendations of the Committee, except on one point, which does not involve a serious amount of dissension.

(9.16.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I am very glad to hear this announcement by the Lord Advocate, and I am sure it will very much facilitate business. The Scotch Committee have made the Bill as tolerable as possible, and we might go farther and fare worse. If the Government will accept the recommendations of the Scotch Committee, and not act as they did in the case of the English Bill, I shall be satisfied, although the majority of the members of that Committee are Conservatives, they showed some independence and—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order. The hon. Member is not speaking to the Amendment.

(9.17.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): My hon. Friend has anticipated what I intended to say. I do think, as he had so much to talk about on the English Bill, he might have allowed us a little opportunity on this Bill. It did strike me that the effect of the clause as it now stands might prevent men joining the force until they were nearly 25 years of age, and I am anxious to get them in at a lower age. Still, after the announcement of the Lord Advocate, I hope the Scotch Members generally will accept the Bill without further discussion.

Question put, and agreed to.

(9.20.) MR. CALDWELL: In line 11, of page 1, I wish to insert the word "five" after "sixty." This refers to the age at which the constables of the higher rank become entitled to a pension. Very often they are as fit for duty at 65 as at any period of their life, and therefore I do not think it unreasonable to fix the limit at 65.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 1, page 1, line 11, after "sixty" to insert "five."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'five' be there inserted."

*(9.21.) MR. CHILDERS: I hope my hon. Friend will not persist in this Amendment. Unfortunately, experience does not entirely bear out his suggestion as to their bodily strength at 65, and it is not desirable to retain men in the force at too advanced an age.

Question put, and negatived.

(9.22.) MR. CALDWELL: I now propose to move the omission of sub-section (b.)

Amendment proposed in Clause 1, page 1, line 16, to leave out sub-section (b.).

Question, "That Sub-section (b) stand part of the Clause," put and agreed to.

(9.23.) MR. HOWARD VINCENT: There is an Amendment standing in my name, reducing from 20 to 15 years the period at which, if incapacitated, a constable shall be entitled, upon medical certificate, to retire and receive a pension, but after the intimation of the Lord Advocate, I am afraid it will be quite useless for me to press this and other Amendments I have put upon the Paper. I ought, perhaps, to apologise for having put down so many Amendments to a Scottish Bill, but so many of the Scottish Members were on the Select Committee that very few were left to place Amendments on the Paper contrary to the conclusions of the Committee. I have received letters from a large number of police officers in Scotland, calling attention to the very serious injury which may result from the difference between the conditions of superannuation in Scotland and in England. I do not intend to trouble the House by reading them. But I may point out that even now there is a considerable migration from the Scotch Police to the English Police, and the Government proposals will not tend to stop it. I will ask the Lord Advocate whether he cannot see his way, in any degree, to accept some of my Amendments, with the view of assimilating the superannuation in the two countries. I will simply formally move the first of my Amendments.

Amendment proposed in Clause 1, page 1, line 21, to leave out twenty and insert 15.

Question proposed, "That the word 'twenty' stand part of the Clause."

(9.24.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I think my hon. Friend has taken a course which is most judicious and sensible in the Parliamentary situation in which he finds this Bill. My hon. Friend has stoutly maintained, both here and elsewhere, that the figures he proposed were really the proper and just figures in relation to the police, but I am bound to tell him that I view the matter rather from the general aspect in which it presents itself. We have already discussed the subject in Committee in a very fair and practical way. The Committee was fairly representative of all Scottish interests, and the conclusions they arrived at are embodied in the Bill as it now stands. I am not prepared now to go back on them. On the contrary, as I gather from the opinion of my hon. Friends, as well as that of hon. Gentlemen opposite, they are a fair and reasonable reward for the police. I concur in that opinion, and as regards the practical details, there is only one point upon which I shall ask the Committee to go back, and that is the question of $2\frac{1}{2}$ instead of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. as the deduction in the case of superior officers.

(9.26.) MR. HUNTER: I also have an Amendment to increase the period to 25 years, but as I find on examination that, so far as the Pension Fund is concerned, there is extremely little difference between the limits of 20 and 25, I shall not move that Amendment. There can be no doubt that the weak point in this usuperannuation scheme is the medical certificate. If you give men a right to retire at a certain age, by some mysterious process, they can always get the necessary medical certificate. There is no doubt when a policeman reaches the retiring age, he will suddenly find that his constitution is not sufficiently strong for his work. If he retires just before he has completed 20 years' service he gets a gratuity of about £116, whereas the pension he is entitled to at the end of the 20 years is worth over £400, so of, course, he will strive hard to serve the full period.

Question put, and agreed to.

(9.29.) DR. CLARK: I think some reason should be given for the difference which is made by these Bills in the position of the Scottish constable as compared with the English constable. The work which the Scottish policeman has to perform in Glasgow, for instance, is far harder than in London. The Scottish criminal is of a worse type than the English criminal. He is, generally speaking, stronger physically, and defends himself more. The constables are in consequence assaulted more frequently, and have harder work altogether. Yet the English policeman is to be entitled to a pension at 46 years of age, while the Scottish policeman requires to be 55. As this might touch the rates, I shall not support the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Howard Vincent) in any of his Amendments. We must permit the Government to have for the same description of officials one class of legislation in England and another in Scotland, and repeat the old story of having privileges given to England and Ireland—those in the case of Ireland being of a special character—whilst Scotland is left alone.

Mr. J. P. B. Robertson

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 4.

MR. CALDWELL: I move the second Amendment standing in my name.

Amendment moved, Clause 4, page 3, line 34, at end, add

"But not less than 15 years' continuous approved service shall be in the force from which any pension is claimed."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I cannot accept the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

Clauses 4, 5, 6 and 7 agreed to.

Clause 8.

(9.35.) MR. HUNTER: I move to leave out sub-section "c." This Amendment raises rather an interesting question as to the status of the police after they have obtained their pensions. Before the Select Committee a proposal was made by the hon. Member for Dundee practically to retain the pensioned men as a kind of reserve police, available for duty on Sundays and on special occasions. That proposal was negatived, and the question that now arises is whether, when a policeman has completed his time and obtained his pension, he should not be made a free and independent man. The sub-section provides that the pension shall be forfeited if the grantee refuses to give to the police all the information and assistance in his power for the detection of crime, apprehension of criminals, and suppression of disturbance of the public peace. The object of the clause is to retain the service of the pensioned police as auxiliaries. I do not entertain any strong objection to that, but I object to imposing such a penalty as the forfeiture of pension. I attach enormous importance to the security of the pensions, and one of the points in the Bill of which I most approve is that which makes pensions a matter of right, and makes them a matter of property rather than of grace or favour to be continued or discontinued according to the goodwill of the Local Authority for the time being. It strikes me that in London this sub-section might operate very harshly and injuriously. Suppose, for example, a policeman who has served in the Police Force of Glasgow receives a pension and retires to his old home in the highlands, and supposing there occurs one of those disturbances which call for the intervention of the police, if the pensioned policeman does not do his utmost to suppress the disturbance under this sub-section, the Glasgow Authority may stop his pension. Surely such a pensioner would be placed in a very awkward and invidious position. In the first place he will have arrived at an age when it is supposed he is no longer fit for active service, and in the next place he is called upon to act in his own highland home amongst his friends. He is put in this dilemma, that he must either sacrifice the pension he has earned by long years of service or he must raise his hand as a volunteer auxiliary to assault and injure, perhaps his father or brother, or other near relative. It seems to me that under this Bill cases of very great hardship must arise between divided duty on the part of the pensioned constable, and I would ask the Government whether it is worth their while to retain a clause of this sort. It can be of extremely small utility to the Police Force, because the supposition is that these men are all incapable of acting as policemen. It may be said that in such a case as that I have referred to it would not be compulsory on the Authority in Glasgow to take away the man's pension, but the dread that it may be taken away, and the uncertainty of the position, are evils of the highest magnitude, not to be incurred without some adequate or sufficient reason of public utility. No such reason is forthcoming, and it seems to me that while on the one hand we ought, as I think the Committee upstairs did, carefully scrutinise the Bill to prevent charges being put on the ratepayers, on the other hand, we should give the policemen every conceivable security which is not inconsistent with the principles of economy. Financially, I think the clause is worth nothing, as no pension fund would be affected by its loss, and even at the tenth hour I would still appeal to the Committee to strike the clause out of the Bill, and to give to the pensioners that feeling of security which is worth more than money itself.

Amendment moved, in Clause 8, page 7, line 16, to leave out Sub-section (c.)."
—(Mr. Hunter.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section (c) stand part of the Clause."

(9.42.) SIR G. TREVELYAN: I must say that in all the discussions that took place on the English Bill, I thought that on the sub-section dealing with the future employment of ex-policemen, the most difficult one for Members to make up their minds upon, looking at the important and conflicting arguments we heard. There is on the one side the danger that a very serious political power may be given over to a retired policeman, owing to these words, "the suppression of any disturbance of the public peace," but on the other hand, there is the serious consideration that in London you are making a reserve force of several thousand men—almost young men of between 41 and 50 years of age. Those of us who thought that the London police were over well treated in this respect were not very unwilling that these men—who are like officers on half-pay—should be called on to act in case of a disturbance, seeing that they will be as efficient as the ordinary police. But that consideration does not apply in the case of Scotland, where the men will be broken down in the knees and over 55 years of age, and very little use in a serious disturbance. The consideration, however, felt in England as to the danger to a retired policeman who might sympathise with some strong political or social movement applies equally to Scotland, particularly highlands. I shall be very glad if the Government will agree to omit the part of the sub-clause which deals with the suppression of disturbances of the public peace. I should certainly be very unwilling to vote for the omission of the previous lines, for I think that however a pensioned policeman is, he is bound as an ex-public servant to do all he can for the detection of crime and the apprehension of criminals.

(9.45.) MR. ESSLEMONT: This is one of the points on which I hope the Government will give way. I have been very much opposed to anything like making the Bill uniform with the English measure, because I have felt that if, as some of my hon. Friends think should be the case, the Bill is levelled up to the English measure, it may be necessary also to level it down to that measure. I hope the Lord Advocate will not find himself bound by anything in the English Bill, and, as to this subsection, having had as wide an experience as most hon. Members of the police in Scotland, I believe that it will be of no practical value whatever. I think it will be open to grave abuse, and will cause great irritation, and I therefore trust it will be omitted.

(9.47.) MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I am unwilling to support any material alteration to the Bill as it stands, because in the Select Committee we gave the best consideration we could to it, and because, in spite of the reproaches sometimes uttered against Scotch Members, as to the time we take in discussing Bills, we bid fair to-night to despatch our business with more expedition than our English brethren have done. But I would venture to repeat a suggestion to the Government in regard to this sub-section which was made by the hon. Member for Aberdeen. I think it will be agreed that there is a great deal of force in the argument that a pensioned policeman should not be called upon to do police duty in a place where he had never served as a policeman. It would be clearly unfair that a constable enjoying a pension should be expected to act as a sort of spy over the Police Authorities in a different part of the country to that in which he had earned his pension. What I would suggest is that in addition to the omission of the words objected to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division these words should be added—

Sir G. Trevelyan

"If the grantee refuses to give to the police all the information and assistance in his power within the police area of the force in which he has last served."

(9.50.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The Committee considered the clause as a whole, and I think we were fairly unanimous in the solution we found for the difficulties we had to encounter. The subject was discussed in a very temperate and fair manner. In whose interests are these restrictions made? In the interests of the rate-payers. It is not likely that, say a Town Councillor of Glasgow, would strain a point against a man who had served for a long time in the police force and had had a pension awarded to him. I cannot imagine that anything but a liberal view would be taken of the clause. I shall, therefore, oppose any limitation of the kind suggested.

(9.53.) MR. HUNTER: It has been suggested by my right hon. Friend (Sir G. Trevelyan) that instead of attacking the whole clause I should limit the Amendment to the words, "for the suppression of any disturbance of the public peace." I accept that suggestion, and I would ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

(9.56.) DR. CLARK: I am against the principle of this clause, because I think that if a man has served till he is 58 or 60 years of age, and during the time of his service a certain proportion of his salary has been deducted he has an absolute right to his pension, and you ought not to impose these conditions any more than you ought in the case of an ex-Cabinet Minister, or an officer of the Army or Navy, or a Judge. I do not see why my hon. and learned Friend should withdraw any portion of his Amendment. We know that in the highlands, for instance, the Police Authority is not elected by the people, but to the extent of one-half consists of gentlemen who sit by right of property. There may be disturbances in the future as there have been in the past, and we know that the police sympathise with the people in their grievances. The complaint has been generally that whilst the local police sympathise with and assist the people, foreign police are sent in who adopt a very different attitude. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will meet us a little on this point, and we will assist him with the Bill as far as we possibly can.

(9.58.) MR. A. SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I think a policeman has an absolute right to his pension after he has served for the allotted time. On this ground I object to the sub-section, and I also object to it because it will, if carried, produce a set of informers all over the country. I think it unfair to place a retired policeman in the position of an informer. The right hon. Gentleman says the Police Authorities of Glasgow would not strain this power against the police. That seems to me to be the strongest argument against the clause, because if it is to be of no effect it ought not to be in the Bill.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(9.59.) MR. HUNTER: I now beg to move the insertion of "and" after the word "crime," so as to enable me to propose the Amendment in its modified form.

Amendment proposed in page 7, line 17, after the word "crime," to insert the word "and."—(Mr. Hunter.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'and' be there inserted."

DR. CLARK: Might I ask whether, on this point, the Government will give way to us? I think it will very much facilitate business if they do.

(10.0.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: This must be considered with regard to Scotland as a whole, and I think it is not unreasonable to exact that a retired policeman should not refuse to give any assistance he can to the police. I hope the House will not give effect to the notion that there is not likely to be fair play. I do not think there is any reason for striking out the words. All we want to prevent is the suggestion that the ratepayers or taxpayers are supporting a man who is really, by his conduct, adding to their burdens.

(10.4.) MR. FINLAY (Inverness, &c.): I do not look on these words as imposing on the police any special duty. I regard it as the duty of every citizen to give to the police all the assistance in his power. The neglect of that duty on the part of a retired policeman would not, I think, be improperly punished by the withdrawal of his pension.

VOL. CCCXLVII. [THIRD SERIES.]

(10.5.) MR. D. CRAWFORD: I hope my hon. Friend will not think it necessary to divide on his Amendment.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I hope the Government will give way on the point. My hon. Friend the Member for Inverness (Mr. Finlay) has pointed out most distinctly that an obligation lies on the retired policeman as on other citizens to do his duty. What is suggested by this sub-section is that a retired policeman should keep himself in reserve, so that if there are any particular duties to do, he may be called away from his ordinary employment to do them. For instance, a man might be sent to Fraserburgh or Netherhead during the fishing season to assist in keeping the public peace.

*(10.6.) MR. CHILDERS: I have followed very carefully this Debate on what is a purely practical question. I put it to myself as an English Magistrate—supposing in the district where I live, there were a number of old policemen from 55 to 70 years of age living on their pensions, and it were necessary to take steps to suppress a disturbance of the public peace, should one naturally call upon the retired policemen? I think not. I think, however, we should require them to give all the assistance they could in the detection of crime, but not expect of them the physical burden of putting down disturbers of the peace who might be 30 years their juniors.

(10.8.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: Considering the way we have met the Government they might very well give way to the feeling of the Scotch Members on this small point. When you come to the question of the disturbance of the public peace you touch political questions. The clause may be applied in election time, or in the case of Crofter disturbances.

*(10.9.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government would be exceedingly glad to meet the wishes of the Scotch Members in the matter if it were possible to do so, but I am bound to point out that a similar provision has already been passed in the English Bill, and that to strike it out of this Bill would be to make a difference between England and Scotland, which is not desirable. I cannot think that any injury will result from the retention of the provisions. It will be in the power of the Police Authority to deal with each case that arose, and I do not believe that any injustice will under any circumstances be done by retaining the provision as it stands.

MR. J. B. BALFOUR (Clackmannan, &c.): There are a great many differences between the Scotch and English Bills. There are differences, for instance, both in regard to age and scale of pensions. The similarity between the two Bills in this respect cannot, therefore, be cited against the Scotch Members.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I must say the reason the right hon. Gentleman gives for refusing the request of the Scotch Members is a very bad one. The very fact that this Bill is different in principle to the English Bill is surely a reason for making a difference in a matter of detail.

*MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): This clause was carried by probably the largest majority obtained in the Committee, and the matter was thoroughly threshed out. There is no one who wishes to be fairer to the policemen than myself, but on the whole I think this clause is extremely fair.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: My opposition is to the principle of the Bill, and, therefore, I have not interfered with the details. I only rise now to remind the First Lord of the Treasury how the subsequent events have justified the Motion he made that both of these Bills should be referred to the same Committee. The First Lord of the Treasury has now excused himself from meeting the wishes of the Scotch Members on this small point by alleging that the English Bill contains a similar provision. The English Bill cannot be altered, and that fact is put forward as a justification for refusing to yield to our request.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: Let me very respectfully suggest to the First Lord of the Treasury that it is just because this Bill very materially differs from the English Bill that he is going to get it through so amicably. Under these circumstances I think he might give way.

(10.14.) MR. HUNTER: There is one complete answer to the First Lord of the Treasury, and that is: that, under the Scotch Bill, the men will not be superannuated until they are 55. Under the English Bill the men may be superannuated eight years earlier. The hon.

Mfr. W. H. Smith

Member for Lanarkshire (Mr. Hozier) is quite in error as to the views of the Committee on this point. It is true the clause, as a whole, was carried by a majority of 12 to 4, but this particular point was never submitted to the Committee at all. The First Lord of the Treasury cannot see the possibility of any person suffering any injury. That is quite right, speaking as an Englishman from an English point of view; but he has no idea of the depth of bitterness of the Scotch Tory. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that it is not only possible, but probable, that injury will be done. With regard to suppression of crime I give way, but the disturbance of the peace is a totally different matter. It is likely that this clause will be utilised for the purpose of trying to deprive men who have served their time of their pension. That is quite within the limits of experience, and it is important we should give to the Highlanders the security that such a thing cannot happen. I hope that, even at the last moment, the Government will give way.

(10.18.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 75; Noes 127.—(Div. List, No. 235.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Clause 8, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

(10.25.) DR. CLARK: I very much regret the Government have not seen fit to give way to the Scotch Members on this point, and, as a means of expressing our dissatisfaction, we must oppose the clause altogether. Personally, I consider the clause totally unnecessary. I shall vote against the Third Reading, but I hold that if you give police constables a pension you ought not to take it away for any other reason than you take away pensions from anyone who has served in the Army, Navy, and Civil Service.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 9 agreed to.

Clause 10.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 41, to leave out all after "shall" to end of Clause, and insert—

"Prejudice the existing right of any police authority to dismiss any constable, or to reduce him to any lower rank or lower rate of pay, or shall prevent his claim to pension from being refused on account of misconduct or of negligence in the discharge of his duties or on account of any of the grounds on which his pension, if granted, would be liable to be forfeited and withdrawn."—(The Lord Advocate.)

(10.34.) MR. HUNTER: I do not rise to object to these words, but to remark, this Amendment was proposed in the Select Committee, and was then defeated by a narrow majority, by the casting vote of the Lord Advocate himself. He now makes the proposal himself, and I hope he will take no exception to the renewal of other proposals where decisions were carried in Committee by the casting vote of the Chairman. When we come to a later Amendment, I shall invoke the precedent the right hon. Gentleman is now setting.

(10.35.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: This is singularly ungracious. It is true that decisions were arrived at in Committee by narrow majorities, and in several instances I was called upon to give a casting vote. But I have cheerfully given way where I thought I could do so in the public interest, and to meet any generally expressed view. I shall make no complaint of any such citation of my action.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended, agreed to.

Clause 11.

(10.36) DR. CLARK: Does the expression "Sheriff" include the Sheriff Substitute? It is not included in the definition clause.

(10.36.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: According to my recollection of the Bill of last year, the expression does include the Sheriff Substitute.

(10.37.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: But I think that is undesirable. The Sheriff is a great officer, and though I do not say a word to derogate from the dignity of the Sheriff Substitute, he does not occupy that high position an official should have if he is to over-rule the Local Authorities in a great burgh. I think this function should be confined to the Sheriff.

(10.38.) MR. ESSLEMONT: I entirely disagree with my hon. Friend. The Sheriff Substitute is present in the district, and we look to him in all practical business of this kind, but the Sheriff is sometimes a political opponent with whom we have differences of opinion. I am sure Scottish feeling will be in favour of including the Sheriff Substitute.

(10.38.) DR. CLARK: I am strongly desirous that the phrase should include the Sheriff Substitute, and if there is any doubt on this point, I would suggest an addition here or in the definition clause. The working Judge is the Sheriff Substitute, the Sheriff is but an ornamental official, and his appointment often but a political job.

(10.38.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I find I am quite right in my interpretation; the expression "Sheriff" includes Sheriff Substitute.

Clauses 11 and 12 agreed to.

Clause 13.

(10.39.) MR. CALDWELL: The Amendment I have to propose is with the object of providing that no constable in receipt of a pension shall be appointed to an office, the remuneration for which is provided by moneys voted by Parliament or raised by the rates. It is quite conceivable that a policeman might, after receiving a pension, be appointed to an office paid for out of the rates, and thus receive better payment than he actually received when a younger man in full active employment in the force.

Amendment proposed in page 8, line 32, to leave out "If a," and insert "No."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question proposed, "that the words 'If a' stand part of the Clause."

(10.40.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I think the restriction in the Bill represents the general view of the Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and question proposed "That Clause 13 stand part of the Bill."

(10.41.) MR. HOWARD VINCENT: I took the opinion of the House on an Amendment to omit a similar clause in the English Bill, and the English Bill is much better than the Scotch Bill in many respects. Possibly Scotch Members may be willing to accept the exclusion of this clause.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 14 agreed to.

Clause 15.

(10.42.) MR. J. P. SMITH (Lanark, Partick): In view of the intention of the Government to accept the Amendment standing next to mine for deleting the sub-section, for the insertion of which I and others voted under a misapprehension, I do not propose to move my Amendment standing next.

(10.42.) MR. HUNTER: If the hon. Member will not move his Amendment I will move it for him. What I wish to bring about is this, and if the Amendment of the hon. Member opposite accomplishes the end I have, I need not move. In Committee it was agreed that the deductions from the officers should be $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. If the proposition had been 5 per cent., I should have voted for it, for that, I think, is the proper sum to be deducted. Then an Amendment was proposed by the hon. Member for Lanark, that an officer should not suffer any deduction beyond $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., a proposal I am bound to say, I could not agree with. Nearly the whole of the Committee agreed that there should be a substantial distinction between the contributions of the officers of the constables and sergeants. The argument used to induce us to give pensions to constables and sergeants has no application to officers.

*MR. HOZIER: May I ask to what Amendment the hon. Member is speaking?

THE CHAIRMAN: I understand the hon. Member proposes to move the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for the Partick Division.

*MR. HOZIER: I do not think he is speaking to it.

MR. HUNTER: I was mistaken as to the particular Amendment.

*(10.43.) MR. HOZIER: I beg to move my Amendment. The increase of pay when a member of the force is promoted from the rank of sergeant to inspector is so slight—

MR. HUNTER: On a point of order, Sir, I wish to move and omit the words "seven and a half," and insert "five." Shall I be precluded from doing that by the result of the Amendment the hon. Member is about to move?

THE CHAIRMAN: I will put the Amendment in such a form that the hon. Member's right will remain.

*MR. HOZIER: The intention of my Amendment simply is that officers of superior rank shall not be called upon to contribute $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., but only $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. like the rest of the force. I think, as a matter of fact, there was a general agreement upon this in Committee. The figures gave a majority of two for the Amendment, which was carried, but, certainly, two hon. Members voted under a misapprehension. I hope the Committee will agree to the deletion of the sub-section.

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 9, to leave out the words "every officer above the rank of sergeant liable at the rate of."—(Mr. Hozier.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

(10.44.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I think the decision of the Committee is one that cannot be maintained, and if it were necessary to dwell upon that, I could give some figures that would be absolutely convincing. At the same time, I desired to ascertain, as far as I could, the prevalent opinion among Scotch Members, and, so far as I am able to gather, no one is in favour of $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and I think that figure is untenable. In point of fact, it would reduce the pay of an inspector of the lowest rank below that of a sergeant of a highest rank for a period of five years. The pay of an inspector of the second rank being £90 reduced by $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. will be £83 5s., while that of a sergeant of the highest rank reduced by $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. will be net £83 9s. Such a statement is quite enough to blow $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. out of the water. The preponderating opinion is, I think, in favour of 5 per cent., but I think it would be well for the Committee to avoid a distinction which involves no advantage from a financial point of view, and may result in an irritating effect upon the Service. I hope the Committee will agree to the general reduction all round being $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

(10.45.) MR. DONALD CRAWFORD: So far as I am able to ascertain, I think the general feeling is in favour of 5 per cent., and I should be quite willing to concede that. I think most of us in the Select Committee were under the impression that salaries rise more rapidly in the higher grades than they actually do. But, at the same time, I feel strongly that, even in the case of constables, $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. is a very small contribution indeed towards earning a pension, and financial authorities have remarked upon this. I think that in the higher salaries, it is reasonable to fix the contributions at 5 per cent. I think we ought to look at the financial side of the question, although the Lord Advocate seems to think that is unnecessary. The scheme is really a different scheme to that presented to us on the Second Reading of the Bill.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I did not say it was unnecessary to look at the financial side of the question, all I said was that the difference was so small that it could not be said to have any bearing on the actuarial calculation.

MR. DONALD CRAWFORD: I am not quite sure that it requires to be made out by figures, but we are not entitled to disregard any part of the financial position, having in view the position at the end of 30 years, and the probable increase of the Force with the increase of population. I do not think we are entitled to throw away any just source of income, and I think in these cases 5 per cent. is not an unreasonable contribution.

*MR. HOZIER: The actuarial calculations put before us in Committee were based on the distinct understanding that no one paid more than $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

(10.47.) MR. E. ROBERTSON: I hold that the view taken in Committee had no reference to actuarial calculations at all; it turned upon matters of equity and fair play as between various members of the Force. It was represented that the men who retired on high pensions, the men in the higher branches of the Service, would be contributing a very much smaller proportion towards their pensions than the less fortunate individuals who had never emerged from the lower ranks. I have not the figures now, but they show a startling disproportion against the poorer men, and in favour of those who, after promotion, retire on the higher pensions, having contributed on the lower scale during nearly the whole of their terms of service.

(10.48.) MR. ESSLEMONT: I am not quite sure whether my hon. Friend has considered that these superior officers above the rank of sergeant will contribute to the age of 60, and others only to 55. I am bound to say I think it is rather hard that a fine should be put upon the men who rise. Is it not sufficient that they have to serve another five years? I think the $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. might be maintained. I confess I have sympathy with the idea of charging more when a man gets to the higher rate of pay, but here it must be pointed out that our pay is not uniform, and some men who have not risen above the rank of sergeant will get as high pay as Inspectors in some instances. It is less a matter of pay than of grade and merit. I think $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. might be adopted, and that it is scarcely worth while contesting the point.

(10.49.) MR. HUNTER: I base my consideration of the point upon the question of justice and fair play between the officers and the men, and between the police and the public at large. If this were a fund upon which pensions were to depend, and these were to be measured by the amount of contributions, it is obvious that proportionately much higher contributions would be required from the officers than from the men. But the Government are granting £40,000 a year, and the contributions of the men are but a fifth or sixth of the amount they will receive. It may fairly be contended that the Government should not make a proportionately larger contribution towards the pensions of the officers than the pensions of the men. There are these considerations also, that the wear and tear and exhaustion by exposure to all weathers is greater among the men than among the officers; also that the wages paid the men are not sufficient to enable them to make any provision for old age, but that is not so with the officers, whose pay exceeds the income of many men of middle class. There is certainly no argument ad misericordiam for the officers. It is fair they should contribute a larger sum than the men, and my opinion is, that if the proceedings in Committee had been conducted with more deliberation, 5 per cent. would have been inserted. With regard to what the hon. Member for Lanark has said as to two Members of the Committee having changed their opinions, I do not think we can take account of that, because if they are here, they can explain their position, and if they are absent, it is not well that their views should be represented by proxy. It is within the power of the Government, of course, to upset the decision of the Select Committee, but I think it would more conduce to progress and the harmony of our proceedings if they accepted the compromise of 5 per cent.

(10.52.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Throughout the proceedings before the Committee I stated, as I did also in private communications to Members, that I should ask the House upon this point to go back upon the finding of the Committee.

(10.52.) MR. J. P. SMITH: I may explain that in Committee figures were put before us which seemed to show that the pay of the inspector was three times that of the ordinary constable, £100 to £33, and upon that it was estimated the contribution of the inspector should be three times that of the constable. But on further examination of the figures, it appeared that the difference in pay was as 10 to eight, or £100 a year to 33s. a week. The fact is, the rise in pay is extremely gradual in the grades of the Scotch Police Force, and this sudden increase in contribution would reverse the positions as regards pay in some instances.

(11.0.) MR. ESSELMONT: I may point out that this provision will work very unequally. In some counties the inspector gets only 28s. per week, and you will deduct 5 per cent. of his pay, while the constable, who in another town gets 30s. a week, will pay only 2½ per cent.

Amendment put, and negatived.

Clause 15, agreed to.

Clause 16.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 16, page 9, line 25, to leave out "stoppages and."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

(11.5.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I think this matter was sufficiently discussed in Committee, and the clause as now framed is a fair compromise. It met with general approval in the Committee, and I hope it will not again be discussed here. The Scotch Authorities are well treated under this Bill. Glasgow, for instance, will be a great gainer by the arrangement now proposed, for its rates will be relieved of a charge of something like £1,200 a year for pensions. I do trust this Committee will accede to what, after all, is a settlement of matters of detail, and not engage in a mighty amount of discussion about a very small affair.

(11.6.) DR. CLARK: It seems to me that Clauses 16 and 19 are closely allied to each other, but the Debate will take place on the latter. If you pass it, you will make the police rate liable for any deficiency. This scheme will entail a lot of intricate book-keeping, but I think we had better give a trial to the arrangement proposed.

(11.8.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: We went carefully into this matter in Committee, and I must say that this suggestion did not meet with any support.

MR. ESSELMONT: I may explain that there were originally sub-sections giving the police an interest in certain convictions. I thought that a vicious principle and one altogether undesirable to be introduced into the Bill. I can see no objection to these small contributions going into the Police Fund, which, I think is their proper destination; and I hope the compromise, which I think was a fair one, will be accepted by the Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 16 agreed to.

Clause 17.

(11.9.) MR. CALDWELL: In this clause I desire to substitute in line 2, page 11, the words "two months" for "thirty days." My reason is that the County Council Authorities in Scotland do not, in consequence of the great distance, find London easily accessible, and, in the event of this scheme for the distribution of the grant not proving acceptable to them, 30 days would scarcely be sufficient to enable them to make the necessary representations against it.

Amendment proposed, in Clause 7, page 11, line 2, to leave out, "thirty days," and insert "two months."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

(11.10.) DR. CLARK: This may seem a trifling matter, but it is very important—Scotch County Councils should have an opportunity of considering the scheme.

(11.11.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: The subject of regulations providing for these and other schemes is a somewhat complicated one, and is governed by such a consideration, among others, as the period at which Parliament sits. In order to preserve uniformity of system the period of 30 days was introduced, but, personally, I have no strong feeling on the subject.

(11.12.) MR. BUCHANAN: I think it is very desirable the period should be extended in view of the fact that there is sometimes a fortnight's vacation at Whitsuntide or Easter.

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Very well, for the present I will accept the term of two months, on the understanding that if I find, on inquiry, it is inconvenient, we shall revert to the former proposal.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause 17, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 18 agreed to.

Clause 19.

(11.15.) MR. J. P. SMITH: I think that if the Amendment I have to move on this clause is carried, it will remove the only possible ground of attack against the Bill. I believe that under the scheme, there will be no liability on the Police Fund for many years, but, if it should arise, it ought to be removed, and the acceptance of this Amendment will get rid of any difficulty which may be felt in regard to it.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 29, "to leave out Sub-section (1)."—
(Mr. Parker Smith.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section (1) stand part of the Clause."

(11.16.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I agree with my hon. Friend opposite that what took place in the Select Committee has practically established what I ventured to assure the House on the Second Reading—namely, that there will be no burden cast on the rates in the ordinary case until a period which may be roughly represented as about 30 years. I believe hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who sat on the Committee were on the whole satisfied that that is the case. At the same time, one has to deal with a problem which is not a matter of absolute certainty. We have to take into account the fact that the actuarial calculations upon which we all relied, are liable to the fluctuations and incidents of the number of funds which have to be dealt with. I am aware that some hon. and right hon. Gentlemen think that those difficulties might have been avoided if we had a central fund. It is conceivable that even the best actuarial calculation may prove to be fallacious. I put it to the Committee whether it is wise to infuse any doubt as to the sufficiency of the rights conferred on the constables. I do not think it would be a satisfactory or business-like way of dealing with a case of this kind, if we were to set up a fund, and say that that is all we have to go upon, and that nobody shall be liable beyond it. I hope the Committee will not look upon this question as one of more than theoretical interest. I am satisfied that Members of the Select Committee and Members of the House are convinced that to throw the ultimate liability on the rates is not to indicate the slightest doubt as to the solid ground we are upon.

(11.18.) MR. CHILDERS: On the whole, although not without doubt, I think it would be well to adopt the Motion of my hon. Friend. In point of fact, the Police Fund, as a whole, will always be solvent, and this Mr. Finlaison fully admitted, especially after the changes made in the Schedule. It is therefore useless to give it an additional security, which would be misunderstood, and may have the effect of interfering with strict economical management. I hope the Government will yield this point to the general feeling of Scotch Members.

(11.22.) MR. ESSLEMONT: I think it would be in the interest of those who will receive the benefit that an assurance should be given to the constituencies in Scotland that there will be no local rate for this purpose. This is a most important clause. On the general principle of the Bill I have hitherto supported the Government, but I have always contended that, before imposing any burden on the rates, the ratepayers ought to be consulted. The sum offered by the Government for the superannuation of the police should be devoted to that purpose, but we ought not to impart any degree of uncertainty into the matter. The people of Scotland should understand that the Government cannot deprive them of this source of revenue, without providing another source. The Lord Advocate has assured us that there is no fear of losing the source from which the money is supplied, and the right hon. Gentleman, one of the Members for Edinburgh, has intimated that, with economical management, the fund will suffice. With such opinions in his favour, I hope my hon. Friend the Member for Partick will press his Amendment. I hope the Government will see that there is no danger in giving way on this point, and that they will accept the Amendment.

(11.25.) MR. HOZIER: The hon. Member seems very tender hearted towards the ratepayers on a theoretical point, but he nevertheless allowed himself to be led on another occasion by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stirling Burghs, who speaks about "the naked brutality of the relief of the rates."

(11.26.) MR. HUNTER: In the Committee the retention of the clause was decided by the casting vote of the Lord Advocate. I certainly object to throwing the ultimate liability on the ratepayers. There will be constant pressure put upon the Local Authorities to make the conditions of pensions less hard, and if they have the fathomless depths of the ratepayers' pockets behind them, the Local Authorities may be tempted to yield to that pressure. Besides, it should be remembered that these authorities are often very much under the control of the head police officers. It was proved before the Committee that it was almost impossible that the sum of £40,000 to be granted by the Government will be exceeded, and that constitutes another reason why they should accept this Amendment. If the Government had only contributed to the Pension Fund in the same proportion as the most liberal railway companies contribute to their employés' funds, the grant would not have exceeded £20,000 annually, whereas it is to be double that amount; therefore they are treating the police most liberally in this matter. The difficulty of those of us who have been supporting the Government in that matter is that, if this Amendment is not accepted, we shall be unable to justify these proposals to our constituents, who will see that the police are being dealt with with enormous liberality, and who will not be satisfied unless they are assured that not a single penny of the charge will fall on the rates. I hope the Government will not persist in the course they have adopted, but will allow the Amendment to be adopted.

(11.30.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 136; Noes 77.—(Div. List, No. 236.)

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 20 and 21 agreed to.

Clause 23.

(11.40.) MR. HUNTER: I beg to move an Amendment to this clause. Clause 23, page 14, line 12, leave out the words "or part." The object of this Amendment is to prevent the Local Authority from returning to the constables some indefinite and undetermined portion of their contributions. I cannot see the necessity for introducing such an element of doubt and ambiguity. I hope, therefore, my Amendment will be accepted.

MR. CHILDERS: This question is one that was very fully discussed on a former occasion, and, for my own part, I should be disposed to give the Local Authorities a certain amount of latitude in this matter.

MR. BARCLAY (Forfar): I think that, seeing how vague and ambiguous is the proposal as it stands in this Bill, the Government might consent to the omission of these words.

(11.42.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: As has just been stated, this matter has already been carefully considered by the Committee, and I may remind hon. Members that as the Bill originally stood, it merely enabled the Local Authority to return these contributions by using the word "may," but the Committee still further strengthened the clause by inserting the word "shall," so as to enforce the provision. It was thought that having in that way strengthened the right of the constable the object of this part of the clause was sufficiently guarded.

Motion made, and Question, "That the words 'or part' stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

Other Amendments made.

Bill reported.

(12.5.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Perhaps the House will agree to take the Report now.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this Bill be now considered."—(The Lord Advocate).

MR. CALDWELL: One or two of us who did not press our Amendments in Committee have a few words to say on the Third Reading, and we object to the Third Reading being taken now.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, considered; to be read the third time to-morrow.

LOCAL TAXATION (CUSTOMS AND EXCISE) DUTIES BILL.—(No. 404.)

Order for Third Reading read.

*(12.7.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): This being a Money Bill, I hope the House will permit some verbal Amendments to be made. I think it will be of advantage.

Several verbal Amendments made.

*(12.12.) MR. RITCHIE: I beg to propose that the Bill be read a third time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Ritchie).

MR. CALDWELL: I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the Third Reading, but with the object of pointing out the position taken up by the Government on the occasion of the Second Reading. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) then pointed out that if the licensing clauses were dropped the whole Bill would go.

*MR. RITCHIE: I beg the hon. Member's pardon. It may save him some trouble if I deny having made such an assertion. What I said was that if any Amendments were adopted which would alter the character of the Bill the measure would be dropped.

(12.13.) MR. CALDWELL: The right hon. Gentleman said on the Second Reading—

"Unquestionably if the hon. Member for Barrow is successful in his onslaught the whole Bill will have to go, and none of the powers, which I think are universally approved, will go into the hands of the Local Authorities."

The right hon. Gentleman also made other observations to the same effect, and I think that it is perfectly obvious that the Second Reading of the Bill was carried on the pledge of the Government that in the event of the licensing clauses being defeated the whole Bill would go. I think that is the plain interpretation of the right hon. Gentleman's words. Well, the licensing clauses have gone, the Government having practically been defeated by Mr. Caine. The whole object of putting on the additional taxes was to provide funds for the compensation of publicans, and the balance was distributed for other purposes. I venture to say that the Government, having got the money and brought forward the Bill for an express purpose, it is a breach of faith with the House and the country to proceed with the measure when they declare that in the event of the compensation clauses being dropped the whole Bill will go.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): No declaration of the kind was ever made. It was said that if the Motion of the hon. Member for Barrow on the Second Reading was carried the whole Bill would go; but the two matters are entirely different.

MR. CALDWELL: I have read the words of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, and the public can form their own opinion. As to the education question, the Government were very anxious on the clauses dealing with the Scotch portion of the money that it should only be applied for the purpose of freeing education in the compulsory standards, but it has been pointed out that in the great majority of schools—in all but 98—the school fees are abolished in all the compulsory standards already, and that the grant under the Bill will go for the purpose of relieving education in subjects above the compulsory standards. The point I wish to emphasise is that the position taken up by the Government in respect of free education in Scotland will bind them when they come to deal next year with the same question in England, and will compel them to free education, not only in the compulsory standards, but in all the schools.

*(12.19.) MR. ASHER (Elgin, &c.): Before this Bill is read a third time I desire, in a very few words, to make an appeal to the Lord Advocate with respect to that part of Clause 2 which limits the application of the £40,000 to relief from the payment of school fees in the compulsory standards in Scotland. The Lord Advocate has undertaken that the money will be distributed among the State-aided schools, in the same way as was done with the grant of last year; and we, of course, know that the right hon. Gentleman will do everything he possibly can to fulfil that undertaking. But the point to which I wish to direct the attention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, before it is too late, is whether it would be possible, under the Bill as it stands, for the Education Department to fulfil the undertaking which he has given. The clause in question is divisible into two parts. The first relates to the application of the money, and the second to its distribution. Under the first part it is expressly enacted that the money shall be applied in relief from the payment of fees in the compulsory standards. Under the latter part the Education Department merely have power to regulate the manner in which the money is to be distributed among the schools. The serious difficulty which seems to me to arise is that the Scotch Education Department, who are to exercise the function of distributing the money by Minute among the State-aided schools, will have no power to give a share to those schools in which, prior to this Act, the fees have been abolished in the compulsory standards. I will illustrate the difficulty by taking a particular case. Take the case of a school in which the grant of last year was sufficient to cover all fees in the compulsory standards, which were therefore abolished, and in which the grant, under the present Bill, will be sufficient to cover the fees in the standards other than the compulsory standards. Now, I understand that it is the intention of the Government that the schools in that position are to receive a share of this grant. Well, it seems to me that two difficulties will be encountered. The Education Department has to pass a Minute. They have got to distribute the grant among the schools. I should think their first duty would be to see how, under the Act, the grant is to be applied, in order to discover what schools are to participate in it. By the Bill, as it stands at present, the grant, when it is given to an individual school, must be applied in relief of the payment of fees in the compulsory standards, and if the Scotch Education Department find that a certain number of schools, prior to the passing of this Act, have no fees in the compulsory standards, and could only apply the money, therefore, in relief of fees in the non-compulsory standards, they will be driven to the conclusion that these schools cannot participate in the grant. Then, what can the School Boards do with the money if it is given to them? They must look to the Act to see what they have to do with it when they get it. The Act says it shall be applied in relief of school fees in the compulsory standards. How are the Boards to administer it, when fees have been already abolished in the compulsory standards? They cannot apply it in relief of fees which have been already abolished, and under the Bill they cannot apply it in relief of fees in the non-compulsory standards. Are they to go through the fiction of re-imposing fees in the compulsory standards for the mere purpose of remitting them? It is a serious misfortune that the sum of £40,000 has not been increased to £90,000, but it would be a matter that every one would lament if by any possibility, through the retention of unnecessary words in the section, the intention of both sides of the House were to be frustrated as to the division of the £40,000 amongst all the State-aided schools in Scotland, on the principle of the Capitation Grant. My reason for interposing at this stage is that, after carefully considering the matter and forming the best opinion on it I can, I am convinced that difficulties of the most serious character will arise in the administration of this grant if the words limiting its application to the compulsory standards are retained in the clause. I hope the right hon. and learned Gentleman will still see his way, either by re-commitment or in the other House, to clear the Bill of the ambiguity which the presence of these words involves.

(12.26.) MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I have listened to the hon. and learned Gentleman's observations with very great surprise. I have not observed that the hon. and learned Gentleman has been present during recent Debates, and I conclude from his speech that he has not heard or read any Report of our proceedings, because the very question which has caused him so much wonder and anxiety has been discussed over and over again in this House, in Committee, and on the Report stage; and every point which has preyed on the hon. and learned Gentleman's mind, and from which he desires relief, has been pressed on the attention of the House and the Committee by hon. and right hon. Gentleman sitting on the same Bench as himself. The hon. and learned Gentleman will forgive me, therefore, for not entering into detail on the matter. The long statement he has given us, with admirable lucidity, has been made in various forms during the hon. and learned Gentleman's absence, and if he has not been supplied with an answer to that statement, I would venture to refer him to any Report of the Debates, where he will find full corroboration of his own views from Gentlemen sitting on his own side, and an ample answer, if not refutation, of them from mine.

*(12.29.) MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): The right hon. and learned Gentleman has simply repeated his conduct on the first occasion when this matter was brought forward. There were then two quite different and distinct Amendments before the House, one to increase the sum of £40,000 to £90,000, and the other to provide that, if the sum remained £40,000, it should be applied without restriction. The right hon. Gentleman, instead of dealing with this latter Amendment, confused the two, alleging that the second was a mere repetition of the first, and, therefore, required no answer. In consequence, I raised the question again on the Report, and then the right hon. Gentleman was discreet enough to hold his tongue. If my hon. Friend should search the Debates for any answer from the Lord Advocate he will find none. The Solicitor General spoke for the Government, and all he said was that, practically, the £40,000 could be applied at the discretion of the School Boards, so that I had not succeeded in showing what harm these words would do in the Bill. I think a case has now been made out as to the harm they will do, namely, that they will, at the very least, create a legal ambiguity. I regard it as most unsatisfactory that the Chief Law Officer of the Crown in Scotland should have slurred this question over without an answer.

(12.30.) SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I do not exactly agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Caldwell) in thinking the Government were bound, when the licensing clauses were done away with, to withdraw the Bill altogether. I do not think they could help themselves. Having provided for the raising of the money, they were bound to do something with it. I regard the Bill as one of great importance, which should not pass to another place without a word of recognition from us. It is, no doubt, the great Bill of the Session, and it is the Bill which makes this Session memorable. We spent 25 nights over it, and I believe the country does not think we spent too long a time. 406 Bills have been before the House this Session, and I think this one has excited more interest in the country than all the other 405 put together. It seems to me that the system of giving to Local Bodies large sums of money raised by local taxation is a very bad system. I am sorry to see it seems to be becoming popular, because I am sure it will lead to a great deal of evil and corruption in our local affairs. The Bill, however, might have been a great deal worse. What we feared when we fought it was that it would have led to the strengthening and the consolidation of the great drink interest throughout the country. Now the money is to be spent on a very good purpose, namely, the promoting of the education of the people. Some of it is to be used for police purposes. That is a very good thing too, because we all know the police would be hardly necessary in this country if it was not for the expenditure on drink. On the whole, we have a good deal to be thankful for, and can part with the Bill in pretty good humour. I shall always remember it with interest because it is the first Bill ever brought in by a responsible Government which has been based avowedly on the principle of trying to make people sober by act of Parliament, and reducing intemperance by diminishing the temptations to drink. I cannot help shedding a tear over the suspensory clause. The Government appear to be like game-preservers. They bring up the game, and when they have arrived at maturity, they shoot them. I hope, however, the Government will not be discouraged from pursuing the course they announced when they brought in the Bill. I have read of wild talk about there being no more legislation of the kind for the next 20 years, and about the foolish action of the Prohibition Party. When I see that, I always remember the words of Mr. Disraeli, who once said:—"Never take the words of your opponents." I hope the Government will not say that, because they cannot get a certain amount of money to strengthen and endow the liquor trade, they will never do anything more for temperance. They have declared plainly in this House that there are far too many liquor shops, and I think they ought to do something to get rid of them. Although we had to fight against this Bill, I can assure them the Prohibition Party are ready and anxious to assist them in any attempt in that direction, and I am sure that in such an endeavour they will have the support of the great majority of this House, and the immense majority of the people.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 20, to leave out the word "ten," and insert the word "twenty."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'ten' stand part of the Clause."

MR. JACKSON: I do not know whether this has been agreed to by the Lord Advocate; if not, I must ask that Progress be reported.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanarkshire, Partick): I think it has been agreed to by the Lord Advocate. The Amendment is to allow the owners to have some larger percentage than the Bill provides.

MR. JACKSON: Under the circumstances it would be well to report Progress.

Committee report Progress; to sit again to-morrow.
